CHIUN, or Chevan. This word occurs in the Hebrew of Amos v. 26, which is cited Acts vii. 43: "Ye took up the tabernacle of Moloch, and the star of your god Remphan, figures which ye made to worship them." The import of the Hebrew is, "Ye have borne the tabernacle of your kings, and the pedestal (the Chiun) of your images, the star of your gods, which ye made to yourselves." The LXX. perhaps, read Repham, or Revan, instead of Chiun, or Chevan, and took the pedestal for a god. [Those who have noticed the Lingam of India, will know why the pedestal was considered as a deity: that is, the pedestal, the disk, and the erect column, were each of them considered as forming part of the image. This is, perhaps, the oldest hint at the worship of this Indian idol: and, possibly, the Chiun of the Hebrews, pronounced Chiven, is no other than the "Quiven-Lingam" of Hindoo Idolatry. Vide BAAL PEOR.] Others think, that three deities are named here, Moloch, Chiun, and Remphan. Others, that the three names mean only one god; that is, Saturn, and his planet. Salmassius and Kircher assert, that Kuon is Saturn, and that his star is called Keiran among the Persians and Arabians, and that Remphan, or Rephan, signified the same among the Egyptians. They add, that the LXX. writing in Egypt, changed the word Chiun into Remphan, because it had the same signification. Vide REMPHAN. Basnage (Jewish Antiquities, tom. ii. p. 576.) concludes, that Moloch was the sun, and Chion, or Chiun, and Rephan, the moon. [They were, like the Lingam, allusions to the great progenitor of mankind.] Vide FRAGMENTS, Nos. CVIII. CCLXXXII.

CHLOE, Κλοή: green herb; a Greek word.

CHLOE, a Christian woman of Corinth, who gave St. Paul notice of the divisions at Corinth, by some of her family, 1 Cor. i. 11.

CHORAZIN, Κοραζίν: the secret, or here is a mystery; from ῥαζ, secret, mystery, and the adverb ῥα, as.

[CHORAZIN, a town in Galilee, near Capernaum, not far distant from Bethsaida, and consequently on the western shore of the sea of Galilee. It is upbraided by Christ for its impudence, Matt. xi. 21; Luke x. 13.

CHOZIBA, a town in Judah, 1 Chron. iv. 22: probably the Caseb, Casbi, or Achzib, of Josh. xv. 44; Micah i. 14.

CHOSEN. Vide PREDESTINATION.

CHRIST, a title of office; from the Greek Christos, anointed; answering to the Hebrew Messiah. Vide JESUS, and MESSIAH.

CHRISTIAN, the title given to those who believed Jesus to be the Messiah, at Antioch, Acts xi. 26. They generally called themselves brethren, faithful, saints, believers. They were named by the Gentiles, Nazarenes and Galileans. It has been the opinion of several, that Christian was originally derived from the Greek Chrestos, good, useful; and Suetonius says, Claudius expelled the Jews from Rome, because they were continually quarrelling concerning Chrestus. Vide I. CLAUDIUS. Christ, says Lactantius (de vera Sapientia, lib. iv. cap. 7.), is no proper name, but one denoting power; for the Jews used to give this appellation to their kings, calling them Christs, or anointed, by reason of their sacred unction. But, he adds, "The Heathen, by mistake, call Jesus Christ CHRESTUS:" and Tertullian (Apol.) says, "The name of Christian comes from the unction received by Jesus Christ; and that of Chrestianus, which you sometimes through mistake give us (for you are not particularly acquainted with our name), signifies that gentleness and benignity whereof we make profession."

CHRONICLES, Books of. This name is given to two historical books of Scripture, which the Hebrews call Dibri-Jamin, "Words of Days," i. e. Diaries, or Journals. They are called in the LXX. Paralipomena, which signifies, things omitted; as if these books were a supplement of what had been omitted, or too much abridged, in the books of Kings, and other historical books of Scripture. And, indeed, we find in them many particulars which are not extant elsewhere: but it must not be thought that these are the records, or books of the acts of the kings of Judah and Israel, so often referred to. Those ancient registers were much more extensive than these are, and the books of Chronicles themselves refer to those original memoirs, and make long extracts from them.

The compiler of these books is unknown. Some have thought it was the same who wrote the books of Kings; but if so, whence are those variations in dates, narratives, genealogies, and proper names? Why those repetitions of the same things, and very often in the same words? The Hebrews commonly ascribe the Chronicles to Ezra, who, they say, composed them after the return from the captivity, assisted by Zechariah and Haggai, who were living. This opinion is proved, first, from the similitude of style; from the recapitulations and general reflections which are sometimes made on a long series of events; secondly, the author lived after the captivity; since, in the last chapter of the second book, he recites that decree of Cyrus, which granted liberty to the Jews; he also carries the genealogy of David down to Zerubbabel, who was the head of those who returned from the captivity; thirdly, there are certain terms and expressions in these books, which they think are peculiar to the persons and times of Ezra.

But if these marks seem to determine for Ezra, as the writer of these books, others seem to prove the contrary. First, the genealogy of Zerubbabel is continued down to the twelfth generation: but Ezra did not live late enough for that. Secondly, in several places the author supposes the things which he mentions to be then in the same condition as they had formerly been, for example, before Solomon, and before the captivity, 2 Chron. v. 9; and 1 Kings viii. 8; see also 1 Chron. iv. 41, 43; v. 22, 26; 2 Chron. viii. 8; and xxi. 10. Thirdly, the writer of these books was neither a contemporary nor an original writer; but a compiler and abridger. He had before him ancient memoirs, genealogies, annals, registers, and other pieces, which he often quotes; sometimes he gives extracts from them, sometimes only the substance of them; sometimes he inserts large fragments from them, without changing any thing, and without taking the trouble to reconcile disagreeing matters. Whence we sometimes find the genealogy of the same person given more than once.

It seems that his chief design was to exhibit correctly the genealogies, the rank, the functions, and the order, of the priests and Levites; that after the captivity, they might more easily resume their proper ranks, and re-assume their ministries. He had also in view to shew, how the lands had been distributed among the families before the captivity; that subsequently each tribe, so far as was possible, might obtain the ancient inheritance of their fathers. The author quotes old records by the name of ancient things, 1 Chron. iv. 22. He recites four several rolls, or numberings of the people; one taken in the time of David, a second in the time of Jeroboam, a third in the time of Jotham, and the fourth in the time of the captivity of the ten tribes. He speaks elsewhere of the numbers taken by order of king David, and which Joab did not finish. Hence we may see the extreme accuracy which the Jews endeavoured to secure in their genealogies and historical documents.

Commentators have much neglected the books of Chronicles, induced thereto by a false persuasion, that they contained few things but what had been illustrated in the books of Samuel and the Kings: but, Jerom truly observes, that these books contain a great number of important things for the explanation of Scripture, that all the scriptural traditions are contained herein (Omnia traditiones scripturarum in hoc continentur); and that it is deceiving ourselves to imagine, we have any knowledge of the holy books, if we are ignorant of these, Abque illo, si quæ scientiam scripturarum sibi voluerit arrogare seipsum irrideat. Also, that in the Chronicles we may find the solution of a great number of questions that concern the gospel. Hieron. Epist. ad Dommionem.

There are many variations, as well in facts as in dates, between the books of Kings and the Chronicles; [which, however, may be explained and reconciled, chiefly on the principle, that these books are supplementary to those of the Kings: not forgetting, that the language was slightly varied from what it had been; that various places had received new names, or had undergone sundry vicissitudes; that certain things were now better known to the returned Jews, under other appellations than what they formerly had been distinguished by; and that from the materials before him, which often were not the same as those used by the abridgers of the histories of the Kings, the author takes those passages which seemed to him best adapted to his purpose, and most suitable to the times in which he wrote. It must be considered, too, that he often elucidates obsolete and ambiguous words, in former books, by a different mode of spelling them, or by a different order of the words used; even when he does not use a distinct phraseology of narration, which he sometimes does.] The first book contains a recapitulation of sacred history, by genealogies, from the beginning of the world to the death of David, A. M. 2289, ante A. D. 1715. The second book contains the history of the kings of Judah, and part of those of Israel, from the beginning of Solomon, A. M. 2290, to the return from the captivity, A. M. 3468, ante A. D. 596.

The Jews have Chronicles or histories in their language, but they are incorrect, and modern.

The Samaritan Chronicle was published by M. Bernard. M. Basnage has inserted it, with some remarks, in his History of the Jews: it begins at the Creation, and continues to the taking of Samaria by Saladin, 1187. It is very short and inaccurate. Vide SAMARITAN.

[CHRYSLITE, Κρυστόλιθος: a gilded stone.

CHRYSLITE, a precious stone, probably the tenth on the high-priest's pectoral; bearing the name of Zebulun, Exod. xxviii. 20; xxxix. 19. It is transparent, the colour of gold, with a mixture of green, which displays a fine lustre. The Hebrew תרשיש tarshish is translated by the LXX. and Jerom sometimes carbuncle; by the Rabbins beryl: it was the seventh foundation of the New Jerusalem, Rev. xxi. 20.]

[CHRYSOPRASUS, χρυσόπρασος: a gilded look.

CHRYSOPRASUS, the tenth of those precious stones which adorned the foundation of the heavenly Jerusalem; its colour was green, inclining to gold, as its name imports, Rev. xxi. 20.]

CHUB, חֹב, Ἀβυσς: he that extinguisheth; from חָבַה chabah, to extinguish.

CHUB, This word occurs only Ezek. xxx. 5; it probably signifies the Cubians, placed by Ptolemy in the Mareotis. Ptolem. lib. iv. cap. 5.

[Bochart thinks this to be Paliurus, a city in Marmorica, because the Syriac word denotes paliurus, a sort of thorn so called.]

CHUN, כֵּן: preparation: otherwise, cakes; from כָּנַן cavanim; according to the Syriac, a window.

CHUN, a city of Syria, conquered by David (1 Chron. xviii. 8); perhaps named from Chana, a son of Ham.

[Probably, "settledness," a settled situation; a fixed abode: for such is the import of this root, when applied to cities, as Numb. xxi. 27; Psalm cvii. 26; Hab. ii. 12. In the Antonine Itinerary called Conna: by Ptolemy Gaana.]

CHURCH. The Greek word ἐκκλησία, signifies an assembly, whether common, or religious: it is taken (1) for the place where an assembly is held; (2) for the persons assembled. In the New Testament it generally denotes a congregation of the faithful, or Christian assemblies, as at Corinth, Ephesus, Thessalonica, &c.

In the Old Testament, ecclesia is sometimes taken for the society of the Jews; as Numb. xx. 4: Why have ye brought the congregation of the Lord (the assembly, the body of God's people) into the wilderness? Eupuchs, bastards, the Ammonites and Moabites, shall not be admitted into the church of God, Deut. xxiii. 1, &c. They shall not be received into the land; Israel shall neither marry with them, nor permit their residence; or, they shall not be received as proselytes to the religion of the Lord: this shews extreme aversion and contempt for these people, as profane persons, with whom the Hebrews were to have no commerce, civil, or religious.

Moses permitted the Edomites and Egyptians to enter into the congregation of the Lord after the third generation (Deut. xxiii. 8); if an Egyptian or Edomite settle in the land, and is willing to become a sojourning proselyte, his children, after the third generation, may marry Israelitish women, and enjoy Israelitish privileges; or, if a Hebrew marries an Edomite or Egyptian woman, his children cannot be esteemed true Israelites, till the third generation: they cannot marry an Israelitish woman, or be admitted into the temple, or public employments. [Some suppose the office of magistracy, &c. is chiefly intended by "congregation of the Lord."] ful, who have preserved the true religion from the beginning, and will preserve it. The history of this church is narrated by Moses, from the beginning to his time; from Moses to Christ, we have the sacred writings of the Hebrews.

Moses is our guide from Shem to Abraham, but he does not inform us, whether the true religion were preserved by the descendants of Ham and Japheth; nor how long it subsisted among them: we see, that Abraham's ancestors worshipped idols in Chaldaea, Josh. xxiv. 2. On the other hand, we know, that the fear of the Lord was not entirely banished out of Palestine and Egypt when Abraham came thither: for the king of Egypt feared God (Gen. xii. 17; xx. 3), and had great abhorrence of sin. Abraham imagined, that there were at least ten or twenty righteous persons in Sodom, Gen. xviii. 23, &c. It is very credible, that the sons of Abraham, by Hagar and Keturah, did for some time preserve the faith which they had received from their father. Job, who was of Esau's posterity, and his friends, knew the Lord. The Ammonites and Moabites descended from Lot, did not, probably, fall immediately into idolatry.

The Ishmaelites, sons of Hagar and Abraham, value themselves on having always adhered to the worship of the true God, and as having extended the knowledge of him in Arabia, as Isaac did in Palestine; but we are certain, that in the time of Mahomet, and long before, they had forsaken the true faith.

CHUSHAN-RISHATHAIM, חֹשֶׁן רִשְׁעִים: Ethiopian: or blackness of iniquities; from חֹשׁ cush, and רֶשַׁע rasha, iniquity.

CHUSHAN-RISHATHAIM, king of Mesopotamia, oppressed the Israelites eight years; from A. M. 2591, to 2599. Judg. iii. 8, 9, 10.

CHUZA, כּוּזָא: the seer, or prophet; from חָזָה choza: or Ethiopian; from cush.

CHUZA, steward to Herod Agrippa, and husband of Joanna, Luke viii. 3.

CILICIA, Κιλικία: which rolls, or overturns; from חָלַךְ halach.

[CILICIA, a country of Asia Minor, on the sea-coast, at the north of Cyprus, and south of mount Taurus. Its capital was Tarsus.

A synagogue of this province is mentioned Acts vi. 9, and as St. Paul was of this country, and of a city so considerable as Tarsus, it may be thought that he was also of this synagogue; so that it is likely he was one of those who had been disputing with Stephen, and were overcome by the arguments of that proto-martyr. Vide TARSUS. We cannot but think, too, that we perceive somewhat in the conduct of the governor (Acts xxiii. 34.) favourable to the inhabitants of Cilicia, notwithstanding the proverb which is quoted under the article CAPPADOCIA.]

CINNAMON, קִינָמון kinnamon; LXX. Κιννάμωμον. God commands Moses to take cinnamon, and other sweet spices, and make a perfumed oil with them, to anoint the tabernacle, and its vessels, Exod. xxx. 23. The cinnamomum is a shrub, whose bark has an admirable scent; several of the moderns confound it with the cinnamon-tree, and cassia aromatica: others distinguish three species. The true cinnamon is rare. Matthiolus assures us, that he could never find it; and in Galen's time, it was hardly found any where, but in the emperor's cabinet. Pliny says, it had been formerly valued at 1000 denarii; but its price was raised to double what it had been, by the great waste made by the Barbarians, who had burned all the trees. Matthiolus is of opinion that the cinnamomum is lost in Arabia, as the balsam-tree is in Judæa. Some Rabbins suppose aloes to be understood.

No one at present questions, but that the cinnamomum spoken of so confusedly by the ancients, is our cinnamon: it is a long thin bark of a tree, rolled up, of a dark red colour, of a poignant taste, aromatic, and very agreeable. The finest cinnamon comes from the isle of Ceylon. Some other barks are likewise called cinnamon, such as clove cinnamon, white cinnamon, and cassia lignea. Clove cinnamon is the bark of a tree, in the isle of Madagascar, called Ravensara. White cinnamon is the bark of a tree which grows in America, at Jamaica, and St. Domingo. Cassia lignea is the bark of a tree, called by the people of Malabar, kakout-arua.

There is no probability that Moses intended the cinnamon of Ceylon; but there might be cinnamon in Arabia, or Ethiopia; or the Hebrew word cinnamon, used by Moses, may signify something besides cinnamon. The Hebrew reading is kinnamon, Exod. xxx. 23; Cant. iv. 14.—[or cinnamon might be imported then into Egypt, Arabia, &c. as it is now into Europe; so that it might come originally from Ceylon.]

CINNERETH, כִּנְרֵת, or כִּנְרִית: harp, or guitar; from כִּנָּר kinnor: otherwise, as a light, from the adverb כֵּן ke, as, and the noun נֹר nur. light; land newly ploughed.

I. CINNERETH, or Ceneroth, or Cinneroth, a city of Naphtali, Josh. xix. 35. Many believe, and with probability, that Cinnereth was the same as Tiberias; for, as the lake of Genezareth (in Hebrew, "the lake of Cinnereth") is, without doubt, that of Tiberias; it seems reasonable, that Cinnereth and Tiberias should likewise be the same city, Deut. iii. 17. Vide TIBERIAS.

II. CINNERETH, the lake of, the sea of Tiberias, or the lake of Genezareth, or Genezar (1 Mac. ii. 67.), are names given it from the city

Cinnereth, or Tiberias, lying on the western shore, toward the southern extremity; or from the district of Genezar, on the eastern coast. It is called, likewise, "the sea of Galilee," because on the north, west, and east, it is inclosed by Galilee.

[This lake is called in the plural Cinneruth, Josh. xi. 2; xii. 3. From this circumstance, it is credible that there were originally two cities, which at length became united. The Hebrew cinnur, or kinour, was a musical instrument of the stringed kind, and its modern representative is certainly the harp. There is nothing unlikely in deriving the name of a town from a musical instrument; either by allusion to its shape, or to its streets corresponding to the number and position of strings, &c. So Drepanum in Sicily, imports a reaping hook; Zancle the same, now Messina, from the circular form of its harbour, round which it stood; and many others, as Clypea, i. e. Clupea; Cnemis; the Delta, &c. Was the town of Cinneroth famous for harpers? was it raised, like Thebes, to the music of the harp? was there any particular school of music here, like the Odeum of Athens? Vide II. TIBERIAS.

CIRCUMCISION. This term is Latin, circumcidere, to cut all round, because the Jews in circumcising their children, cut off after this manner, the little skin which covers the prepuce. God enjoined Abraham to use circumcision, as a sign of his covenant. In obedience to this order, Abraham, at ninety-nine years of age, was circumcised: also, his son Ishmael, and all the males of his property, Gen. xvii. 10.

God repeated the precept of circumcision to Moses: he ordered that all who intended to partake of the paschal sacrifice should receive circumcision; and that this rite should be performed on children, on the eighth day after their birth. The Jews have always been very exact in observing this ceremony, and it appears that they did not neglect it when in Egypt. But Moses, while in Midian, with Jethro, his father-in-law, did not circumcise his two sons born in that country; and during the journey of the Israelites in the wilderness their children were not circumcised: probably by reason of the danger to which they might have been exposed in sudden removals, &c. because of their unsettled state, and manner of life.

The law mentions nothing of the minister, or the instrument, of circumcision: this was left to the discretion of the people. They generally used a knife, or razor. Zipporah, the wife of Moses, used a sharp stone (Exod. iv. 25.), as did Joshua, Josh. v. 3. It is very probable that the Egyptians were accustomed with these knife-like stones, to open such bodies as they embalmed. Some pretend, that knives of this kind are less dangerous than those of brass, or iron; and do not cause so great an inflammation of the wound. The Galli, who were priests of Cybele, cut themselves with a sharp stone, as the safest method, says Pliny (lib. xxxv. cap. 12.) Samid testâ matris Deum sacerdotes, qui Galli vocabantur, virilitatem amputabant, nec aliter citra perniciem. So Ovid (Fast. 4.): Ille etiam saxo corpus laniavit acuto, &c. Vide STONE.

The ceremonies observed in circumcision are particularly described by Leo of Modena, cap. viii. and may also be seen in Allen's Modern Judaism.

We are not perplexed in discovering circumcision among the Arabians, Saracens, and Ishmaelites. These people, as well as the Hebrews, sprung from Abraham; but they never practised circumcision as an essential rite, to which they were bound, on pain of being cut off from their people. Circumcision was introduced with the law of Moses among the Samaritans and Cushians. The Idumæans, though descended from Abraham and Isaac, were not circumcised till subdued by John Hircanus. Those who assert, that the Phœnicians were circumcised, mean, probably, the Samaritans; for we know, from other authority, that the Phœnicians did not observe this ceremony. As to the Egyptians, circumcision never was of general and indispensable obligation on the whole nation; certain priests only, and particular professions, were obliged to it.

[We know so little of the principles of the Arabians, Idumæans, &c. that it seems to be somewhat hazardous to say what they thought of circumcision: the probability is, that they did esteem it obligatory, as their descendants do at this day. But, they postpone the administration of the rite till their sons are of the age of Ishmael: and it is thought that they performed the operation in a different manner; which the Jews would not allow to be the true circumcision, but only concision.]

Philo gives none but natural or symbolical reasons for this practice. Westing, an eminent physician, is of opinion, that there were natural reasons for the Egyptians, of both sexes, receiving circumcision. Artapanus [cited Euseb. Præpar. lib. ix. cap. 28.] assures us, that Moses communicated this rite to the Egyptians. Origen thinks, that circumcision became so general among strangers, from a belief that an angel put to death those who were not circumcised, but had no power over those who had received circumcision. Many are of opinion that the Egyptians began to be circumcised in the reign of Solomon. Others, as Bochart, suspect that the Egyptians borrowed this custom, not from the Jews, but from the Arabians. Lastly, it is generally supposed, that the Hebrews were the first who practised it. Vide Spencer, de Leg. lib. i. cap. 4.

Circumcision is never repeated: When the Jews admitted a proselyte of another nation, if he had received circumcision [concision], they were satisfied with drawing some drops of blood from the part usually circumcised; which blood was called "the blood of the covenant." Epiphanius says, that the Samaritans, when they became Jews, were circumcised again, as, for instance, Symmachus, who embraced Judaism. Three witnesses were present at this ceremony, to render it authentic; they blessed God, and recited the following prayer: "O God! grant, we beseech thee, that as thou hast received this man into thy covenant, he may find good works, and thy protection in the law."

Jews who renounced Judaism, sometimes endeavoured to erase the mark of circumcision: as 1 Macc. i. 15, "They made themselves uncircumcised, and forsook the holy covenant." The Rabbins pretend, that Esau was the first who disguised his circumcision, when he deserted the covenant of the Lord, and the religion of Abraham and Jacob. Some are of opinion, that the Israelites in the wilderness had done so, which obliged Joshua to circumcise them a second time, Josh. v. 2. Under the persecutions of the Romans, after the destruction of the temple, many Jews were guilty of this; and it seems as if St. Paul alluded to the same thing: "Is any man called, being circumcised, let him not become uncircumcised," 1 Cor. vii. 18.

Jerom and others have affirmed that the mark of circumcision was indelible; and that what is said in the Maccabees should be understood of fathers who would not circumcise their sons. Origen (Περὶ ἀρχαίων, lib. iv.) says the same, though he admits (Philocalias, cap. 1.) that many, in order to conceal it, put themselves into the surgeon's hands, to recover their skin again. Epiphanius speaks of the instruments used and the means practised for this purpose; and Carniolus Celsus has a whole chapter on the subject. Galen mentions it much in the same manner as Celsus. Bartolin cites Ægineta and Fallopius, who taught the secret. Buxtorf, the son, in his letter to Bartolin, cites a great number of Jews, who speak of this practice as customary among the apostates from their religion. Vide FORESKIN.

[CIRCUMSPECT, cautious, seriously attentive to every part of the revealed will of God, and careful to avoid casting stumbling-blocks in the way of others, Exod. xxiii. 19; Ephes. v. 15.]

CISLEU, כִּסְלֵו: rashness, confidence, the flauts; from כִּסְלֵו cisel.

CISLEU, the ninth month in the ecclesiastical year, and the third in the civil, or political year of the Hebrews. It is supposed to answer pretty nearly to our November, O. S. Vide the JEWISH CALENDAR, vol. ii. ad fin.

CISTERN. There were cisterns throughout Palestine, both in cities and in private houses. As the cities were mostly built on mountains, and the rains fall into Judæa at two seasons only (spring and autumn), people were obliged to keep water in cisterns; in the country to supply their cattle, and in cities for the convenience of the inhabitants. There are cisterns of very large dimensions, at this day, in Palestine: some 150 paces long, and 60 wide; others 122 paces long, and 54 wide. There is one at Ramah 32 paces in length, and 28 wide. Wells and cisterns, fountains and springs, are seldom distinguished accurately in Scripture. Those of Solomon are the most extensive and curious.

[Worldly engagements are called "broken cisterns that can hold no water," from their unsatisfying and unstable nature, Jer. ii. 13.]

CITIES OF REFUGE. Vide REFUGE.

CLAUDA, Κλαύδα: the Vulgate calls it cauda, the tail. In Hebrew, clauda may signify a broken voice, or lamentable voice; from קול col, a voice, and דַּוָּה davah, to languish; or, from the Greek λανθμός, lamentation; but it must be agreed, that this word is neither Greek nor Hebrew: in Latin, clauda signifies lame.

CLAUDA, a small island towards the south-west of Crete, called Cauda, or Gauda, in Pliny, but in the Acts (xxvii. 16.), and in Ptolemy, Clauda.

CLAUDIA, Κλαυδία: Κλαύδιος: Latin: lame.

CLAUDIA, a Roman lady converted by St. Paul, 2 Tim. iv. 21. Some think she was the wife of Pudens, who is named immediately before her. Martial speaks of Claudia, the wife of Pudens. Others conjecture, that Claudia was a British lady; wife of Aulus Rufus Pudens: but these are [very probable] conjectures.

I. CLAUDIUS, emperor of Rome, succeeded Caius Caligula, A. D. 41, and reigned upwards of thirteen years. King Agrippa contributed much, by his persuasions, to his reception and possession of the empire; which was tendered him by the soldiers. In return, he gave to Agrippa all Judæa; and to his brother Herod the kingdom of Chalcis. He ended the dispute between the Jews and the Alexandrians, confirming the Jews in the freedom of that city, and in the free exercise of their religion and laws; but he would not permit them to hold assemblies at Rome. Joseph. Ant. lib. xix. cap. 4; Dio. lib. lx.

Agrippa dying in the fourth year of Claudius, A. D. 44, the emperor again reduced Judæa into a province; and sent Cuspius Fadus as governor. About this time happened the famine, foretold by the prophet Agabus, mentioned Acts xi. 28—30.

At the same time, Herod, king of Chalcis, obtained as a favour from the emperor the authority over the temple, and the money consecrated to God, with a power of deposing and establishing the high priests. In the ninth year of Claudius, A. D. 49, this emperor published an order, expelling all Jews from Rome, Acts xviii. 2. It is very probable, that the Christians, being confounded with the Jews, were banished likewise. Suetonius plainly intimates it, when he tells us that Claudius expelled the Jews, by reason of the continual disturbances excited by them, at the instigation of Chrestus: Judæos, impulsore chresto, assidue tumultuantes, Roma expulit. This is the true and ancient way of spelling the title Christ. Vide CHRISTIAN. Claudius was poisoned by his wife Agrippina, and was succeeded by Nero.

II. CLAUDIUS LYSIAS, tribune of the Roman troops, which kept guard at the temple of Jerusalem. Observing the tumult raised on account of St. Paul, whom the Jews had seized, and designed to murder, he rescued him, and (Acts xxi. 27; xxiii. 31.) carried him to fort Antonia, and afterwards sent him guarded to Cæsarea. Vide PAUL.

III. CLAUDIUS FELIX, successor of Cumanus in the government of Judæa, and husband of Drusilla, sister of Agrippa the younger. Felix sent to Rome Eleazer, son of Dineus, captain of a band of robbers, who had committed great ravages in Palestine; he procured the death of Jonathan, the high-priest, who occasionally represented his duty to him, with great freedom, and defeated a body of 3,000 men, which an Egyptian, a false prophet, had assembled on the mount of Olives. St. Paul being brought to Cæsarea, where Felix usually resided, he treated him well, permitted his friends to see him, and to render him services, hoping he would procure his redemption by a sum of money. Acts xxiii. A. D. 58.

Felix, with his wife Drusilla, who was a Jewess, desired Paul to explain the religion of Jesus Christ. The apostle spoke with his usual boldness; and discoursed to them concerning justice, chastity, and the last judgment: Felix, being terrified, remanded him to his confinement. He detained the apostle two years at Cæsarea, and was glad of this opportunity to oblige the Jews, who were extremely dissatisfied with Felix, on various accounts. He was recalled to Rome, A. D. 60. and many Jews going thither to complain of the extortions and violences he had committed in Judæa, he would certainly have been executed, if his brother Pallas, who had been Claudius's slave, and was now his freedman, had not preserved him. Felix was succeeded by Pontius Festus. Joseph Ant. l. xx. c. 7.

[CLAY, a substance frequently mentioned in Scripture, and universally known. Clay was formerly used in the east, as it is to this day, for sealing. Norden and Pocock both observe, that the inspectors of the granaries in Egypt, after having closed the door, put their seal upon a handful of clay, with which they cover the lock. This may tend to explain Job xxxviii. 14, where the earth is represented as assuming form and imagery from the brightness of the rising sun, as rude clay receives a figure from the impression of a signet.]

CLEAN, CLEANSE, Vide PURIFICATIONS and PURIFY; also ANIMALS.

CLEMENT, Κλήμης: Latin: mild, good, modest, merciful.

CLEMENT, mentioned Phil. iv. 3. St. Paul says, "Clement's name is in the Book of Life." The generality of Fathers and interpreters conclude that this is the same Clement who succeeded in the government of the church at Rome; and that church seems to intimate the same, when in the office on St. Clement's day, it appoints this part of the Epistle to the Philippians to be read. Grotius, on the contrary, is of opinion, that the Clement mentioned by the apostle was a priest of the church at Philippi.

Chrysostom thinks that the Clement of whom Paul speaks was a constant fellow-traveller of the apostle. Irenæus, Origen, Clemens of Alexandria, and others of the ancients, assert, that Clement was a disciple of the apostles; that he had seen them, and heard their instructions. Epiphanius, Jerom, Rufinus, Bede, and some others were of opinion, that as the apostles Peter and Paul could not be continually at Rome, but made frequent journeys to other places, yet as it was not proper Rome should be without a bishop to supply this absence, they established Linus, Anaclet, and Clement there.

The Constitutions inform us, that Linus was ordained by Paul. Tertullian and Epiphanius say, that Peter ordained Clement. Rufinus tells us, that this apostle chose Clement for his successor; but Epiphanius believes, that after he had been made bishop of Rome by Peter, he refused to exercise that office, till after the death of Linus and Anaclet, A. D. 91, which was the tenth of Domitian's reign: and this is the opinion most generally received.

The church of Corinth having been disturbed by divisions, Clement wrote a letter to the Corinthians, which was so much esteemed by the ancients, that they read it publicly in many churches. It is still extant, and some have inclined to rank it among the canonical writings. The emperor Domitian intending to declare war against the church, a revelation of his design was made to Hermas, who was ordered to inform Clement, that he might communicate it to the churches, and exhort them to provide against the coming storm. We have no certain accounts of what occurred to Clement during this persecution: we are assured, that he lived to the third year of Trajan, A. D. 100. Rufinus and pope Zozimus give him the title of martyr, and the church, in its canon, places him among the saints who have sacrificed their lives for Jesus Christ.

CLEOPAS, Κλέωνας: the whole glory, or glory altogether; Greek: from κλέος, and πᾶς. It may also be derived from the Hebrew חֶלֶף chalaph, to change.

CLEOPAS, according to Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. lib. iii. 11.), and Epiphanius (Hæres. 78. cap. 7.), was brother of Joseph, both being sons of Jacob. He was the father of Simeon, bishop of Jerusalem, of James the Less, of Jude, and of Joseph or Joscs. Cleopas married Mary, sister of the Blessed Virgin: so that he was uncle to Jesus Christ. Cleopas, his wife, and sons, were disciples of Jesus Christ: but Cleopas did not sufficiently understand what Jesus had so often told his disciples, that it was expedient he should die, and return to the Father. Having beheld our Saviour expire on the cross, Cleopas lost all hope of seeing the kingdom of God established by him on earth.

Going to Emmaus with another disciple on the third day after our Saviour's death, Jesus joined them, and proceeded in company with them to Emmaus. While he was breaking bread, their eyes were opened, and they knew him: but he left them; and they instantly returned to Jerusalem, Luke xxiv. 13, et seq.

Usuardus and Ado say, that Cleopas suffered martyrdom, and was buried in the same house where he had received Jesus Christ at his table.

CLEOPATRA, Κλεοπάτρα: glory of the father, or of the country; Greek; from κλέος, and πατήρ, father, or πατρίς, one's country.

Many princesses of this name are either tacitly, or expressly, mentioned in Scripture:

I. CLEOPATRA, daughter of Antiochus the Great, and wife of Ptolemy Epiphanes, king of Egypt. Antiochus the Great, designing to make himself master of Egypt, gave his daughter Cleopatra in marriage to the young king Ptolemy, hoping she would espouse his interest; but Cleopatra preferred the interest of her husband to the unjust views of her father. We are of opinion, that this princess is described, Dan xi. 17. which may be rendered, "He shall be confirmed in his design of getting possession of the whole kingdom belonging to the king of the south (i. e. Egypt); he shall pretend to act up-rightly with him; he shall give him his daughter (Cleopatra) in marriage, in order to destroy him: but she shall not stand on his side, neither be for him."

II. CLEOPATRA, daughter of the above Cleopatra, and Ptolemy Epiphanes. She married Ptolemy Philometor, her own brother: she is mentioned Esther xi. 1, Apoc.

III. CLEOPATRA, daughter of Ptolemy Philometor, and the latter Cleopatra, married first Alexander Balas, king of Syria [Vide II. ALEXANDER], and then Antiochus Sidetes, the brother of Demetrius Nicanor. Vide VII. ANTIOCHUS. This princess is named in the Maccabees, chap. x. She designed to poison her son Gryphus, but he prevented her, and obliged her, by his politeness and affected good manners, to drink the draught she had provided for him; A. M. 3882, ante A. D. 122. Vide VIII. ANTIOCHUS.

IV. CLEOPATRA, sister and wife of Ptolemy Physcon. After the death of her husband Ptolemy, she sought to place Alexander, the younger of her two sons, on the throne of Egypt: but the great men of that kingdom obliged her to follow the law of primogeniture, and to make Lathyrus, the eldest, king: however, she so embroiled his affairs, that he was compelled to retire to Cyprus. She reposed great confidence in the Jews of Egypt, and gave the command of her troops to Chelcias and Ananias, who were both of that nation: she pursued her son Lathyrus into Cyprus; and thence into Palestine, where she formed an alliance with Alexander Jannæus. Vide III. ALEXANDER.

As she had formed a design to rid herself of her son Alexander, king of Egypt, he put her to death, ante A. D. 88. A. M. 3916.

V. CLEOPATRA, the last queen of Egypt, daughter of Ptolemy Auletes, sacrificed her two brothers and her sister Arsinoë, to her ambition. She had such an ascendancy over Mark Antony, (vide ANTONY) that to marry her he put away Octavia, sister of Augustus. There was an intimate friendship between her and Alexandra, mother of Mariamne, and mother-in-law of Herod the Great. Vide ALEXANDRA.

When Cleopatra passed through Judæa, in her return from a journey she had made with Antony to the Euphrates, Herod received her with all imaginable magnificence. She endeavoured in vain to gain his affections. He conducted her as far as Pelusium, and loaded her with presents. Shortly after, the battle of Actium was fought, wherein Antony was overcome by Augustus: Antony fled to Cleopatra, in Egypt, and Augustus followed him. Cleopatra killed herself by the sting of an asp, A. M. 3974; ante A. D. 26.

CLOTHES. Vide VESTMENTS.

CLOUD, (1.) A collection of vapours. (2.) morning mists: "Your goodness is as a morning cloud, and as the early dew it goeth away," Hosea vi. 4; xiii. 3. Job, speaking of the chaos which covered the whole earth, says, that God had shut up the sea (or the waters) with doors; had made a cloud the garment thereof, and thick darkness a swaddling-band for it. Isaiah prays to God to hasten the coming of the Righteous One, and to command the clouds to pour him down upon the earth, Isaiah xlv. 8. Et nubibus pluant justum.

When the Israelites had left Egypt, God gave them a "pillar of cloud" to direct their march, Exod. xiii. 21, 22. This cloud attended them from Succoth, according to Jerom, in his Epistle to Fabiola, or from Rameses, according to others; or only from Ethan, till the death of Aaron, as the Hebrews say; or to the passage over Jordan, as say the generality of commentators. This pillar was commonly in front of the tribes: but at Pihahiroth, when the Egyptian army approached behind them, it placed itself between Israel and the Egyptians, so that the Egyptians could not come near the Israelites all night, Exod. xiv.

In the morning, the cloud moving on over the sea, and following the Israelites who had passed through it, the Egyptians followed the cloud, and were drowned. This cloud from that time attended the Israelites; it was clear and bright during night, in order to give them light, but in the day it was thick and gloomy, to defend them from the excessive heats of the desert. "The angel of God which went before the camp of Israel, removed and went behind them; and the pillar of the cloud went from before their face, and stood behind them" (Exod. xiv. 19); where we observe, that the angel and the cloud made the same movement; as it should seem, in company.

Rabbi Solomon and Aben Ezra suppose there were two clouds; one to enlighten, the other to shade the camp. St. Paul says, that the pillar of cloud was a figure of baptism: it enlightened the Israelites by night, as baptism enlightens us; and was a continual earnest of God's protection.

The Lord appeared at Sinai in the midst of a cloud (Exod. xix. 9: xxxiv. 5.); and after Moses had built and consecrated the tabernacle, a cloud filled the court around it, so that neither Moses nor the priests could enter, Exod. xl. 34, 35. The same occurred at the dedication of the temple of Jerusalem by Solomon, 2 Chron. v. 13; 1 Kings viii. 10.

The cloud resting on the tent was a sign of God's presence, Exod. xvi. 10; xxxiii. 9; Numb. xi. 25. The angel descended in the cloud, and from thence spoke to Moses, without being seen by the people, Exod. xvi. 10; Numb. xi. 25; xxi. 5. It is usual in Scripture, when mentioning the appearance of God, to represent him as encompassed with clouds, which serve as a chariot, and contribute to veil his dreadful majesty, Job xxii. 14; Isa. xix. 1; Matt. xvii. 5; xxiv. 30, &c.; Psal. xviii. 11, 12; xcvi. 2; civ. 8. The Son of God is described as ascending to heaven in a cloud (Acts i. 9); and at his second advent, as descending upon clouds, Matt. xxiv. 30; Rev. xiv.

CLYSMA, or Clisma, or Colsum, the place where the Israelites passed the Red Sea, as is expressly shewn by Eusebius, Philostorgius, Cosmas the Egyptian, a monk, and Gregory of Tours. Clysma, according to Epiphanius, was one of three ports which lay on the Red Sea. The first was Ailat, the second Berenice, and the third at the castle of Clysma. Suez is now its representative. Vide PLATES, No. exc.

CNIDUS, Κνίδος: according to the Vulgate, gnidus, orach; from the Greek κνίδιον, [a herb of a purgative quality, which abounded in it.]

[CNIDUS, a city standing on a promontory of the same name, in that part of the province of Caria, which was called Doris. It was remarkable for the worship of Venus, and for possessing the celebrated statue of this goddess, made by the famous artist Praxiteles. The Romans wrote to this city in favour of the Jews, I Macc. xv. 23. St. Paul passed it in his way to Rome, Acts xxvii. 7.]

COA, קוּא or קוּד: fair, or market: otherwise, hope: otherwise, assembly; from קוּד kava: otherwise, rule, or string; from קוּ kau. The Massorites make only one word, מִקוּד ma-coah, assembly.

COA is mentioned 1 Kings x. 28, and 2 Chron. i. 16: horses were brought to Solomon from Coa, at a certain price. The Septuagint read, ἐκ Θεοκόβε. Some, by Coa, understand the city of Coa, in Arabia Felix; others Co, a city of Egypt, and capital of the province called Cypopolitana.

The Hebrew מִקוּד יָקְרוּ בְּמִדְיָר may be translated; "They brought horses to Solomon from Egypt and from Michœ." Pliny (lib. vi. cap. 29.) assures us, that anciently the country of the Troglodytes, near Egypt, was called Michœ. Others translate, "They brought horses, and pun thread;" [linen-yarn—Eng. Trans.] supposing that the Hebrew mikoa, signifies thread. Jarchi supposed it to mean a string of horses, fastened from the tail of one to another;—they brought horses in strings—at a settled duty or price: and this interpretation is followed by several expositors. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CCXC. Bochart, by mikoa, understands tribute; and translates, "They brought horses—and as to the tributes, this prince's farmers received them at certain rates."

[COAT. Vide VESTMENTS.]

COCK, a well known and tame bird. He generally crows three times in the night, at midnight, two hours before day, and at break of day.

COCK-CROWING, vide FRAGMENTS, No. CCLXIII.

[COCKATRICE, a venomous serpent, which it is extremely difficult to identify. Vide NATURAL HISTORY, FRAGMENTS, vol. ii. ad fin.]

[COCKLE. This herb is only mentioned Job xxxi. 40. By the Chaldee it is rendered "noxious herbs;" and our translators have placed in the margin "noisome weeds." Michaëlis, after Celsius, understands it of the Aconite, a poisonous plant, growing spontaneously and luxuriantly on sunny hills, such as are used for vineyards. This interpretation suits the passage, where it is mentioned as growing instead of barley.]

CŒLE-SYRIA, in Greek, Coile-Syria, Hollow Syria: the valley between Libanus and Antilibanus, says Strabo (lib. xvi.), extending from north to south; from the entrance of Hamath beyond Heliopolis, or Baal-Beck. Dionysius, the geographer, supposes it to lie between Libanus and mount Casius.

But, in the larger sense, the country south of Seleucia, to Egypt and Arabia, is called Cœle-Syria. Josephus (Antiq. lib. i. cap. 11.) places the country of Ammon in Cœle-Syria; and Stephens, the geographer, fixes the city of Gadara in it, which was east of the sea of Tiberias. The following is a list of the cities in Cœle-Syria, according to Ptolemy: Abila, Lysanum, Saana, Inna, Damascus, Samulis, Abida, Hippos, Capitolias, Gadara, Adra, Scythopolis, Gerasa, Pella, Dium, Philadelphia, and Canatha. Hereby we see that it included several cities of the Peræa.

Cœle-Syria has no particular name in Scripture, but is comprised under the general one of Aram; and, perhaps, Syria of Soba, or Aram Soba, extended to Cœle-Syria; of which, notwithstanding, we know not any good proofs: for we cannot tell where the city of Soba was, from which Aram of Soba is supposed to take its name; unless it be the same with Hobab, Gen. xiv. 15, or Chobal, as the LXX. read it.

COHORT; in Latin, cohors; in Greek σπεῖρα: a military term used by the Romans. A cohort was generally composed of 600 foot soldiers: a legion consisted of ten cohorts, every cohort being composed of three maniples, and every manipule of 200; a legion, consequently, contained in all 6,000 men. Other allow but 500 men to a cohort, which would make 5,000 in a legion. It is probable, that cohorts among the Romans, as companies among the moderns, often varied as to their number.

COLHOZEH, כֹּלְחֹזֶה, Κάλεζε: wholly a prophet: otherwise, seeing all; from כָּל col, all, and כֹּחֵז cozah, a prophet.

COLHOZEH, father of Shalum, Neh. iii. 15.

COLOSSE, Κολόσσαι: punishment, correction; from κολάζω, I punish.

COLOSSE, a town of Phrygia, the Greater. [It stood on the river Lycus; being situated at an equal distance between Laodicea and Hierapolis. These three cities were destroyed by an earthquake, according to Eusebius, in the tenth of Nero, that is, about two years after the date of Paul's Epistle.] Some believe, that St. Paul never visited this place, though he preached in Phrygia; but that the Colossians received the faith from Epaphras. Paul having been informed, either by Epaphras, then prisoner with him at Rome, or by a letter from the Laodiceans, that false prophets at Colosse had preached the necessity of legal observances, wrote that epistle to Colosse which we now have, wherein he insists on Jesus Christ as being the only mediator with God, and the true head of the church.

The apostle was then prisoner at Rome, A. D. 62, having with him, besides Epaphras, Timotheus, Aristarchus, Marcus, Luke, Demas, and Jesus, surnamed Justus. His letter was carried to the Colossians by Tychicus, his faithful minister, and Onesimus. Several Greek copies, instead of Colossæ, read Colossæ; and some critics maintain this reading: but the Latin copies constantly read Colossæ. Some Greek, as well as Latin writers, have supposed this epistle was written to the faithful at Rhodes, a city famous for the colossal image of the sun, which stood in its port.

COMFORTER, vide PARACLETUS.

COMMON, means sometimes profane, unclean. "To eat with common hands," without washing one's hands, Mark vii. 2, 5. "I have never eaten any thing common," says Peter (Acts x. 14, 15.); but he heard a voice from heaven, saying unto him, "What God hath cleansed, that call not thou common." "There is nothing unclean [or profane] of itself," Rom. xiv. 14.

CONCUBINE, פִּלְגֶשֶׁת pilgesh. This term, in Western authors, commonly signifies, a woman, who, without being married to a man, yet lives with him as his wife: but, in the sacred writers, the word concubine is understood in another sense; meaning a lawful wife, but one not wedded with all the ceremonies and solemnities of matrimony; a wife of the second rank, inferior to the first wife, or mistress of the house. Children of concubines did not inherit their father's fortune; but he might provide for them, and make presents to them. Thus Abraham, by Sarah his wife, had Isaac, his heir: but, by his two concubines, Hagar, and Keturah, he had other children, whom he did not make equal to Isaac. As polygamy was tolerated in the East, it was common to see in every family, beside lawful wives, several concubines. Since the abrogation of polygamy by Jesus Christ, and the restoration of marriage to its primitive institution, the abuse of admitting and maintaining concubines has been condemned among Christians; but clandestine marriages were long tolerated, and women so married were frequently called concubines by writers on the early periods of ecclesiastical history.

CONCUPISCENCE. This term is used by the apostle John, to signify an irregular love of pleasure, wealth, and honours (1 John ii. 16.): "All that is in the world, the lust of the flesh, and the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life." Concupiscence is both the effect and cause of sin: bad desires, as well as bad actions, are forbidden; the first and principal care of every man who would please God, is to restrain his concupiscence. The word is taken for a disorderly appetite to any thing. When the Hebrews demanded change of diet, in mutinous terms, with excessive and irregular desire, God punished many of them with death, and the place of their burial was called the graves of lust. God prohibits the desiring with concupiscence, any thing which belongs to our neighbour. Concupiscence is generally taken in a bad sense; particularly for carnal inclinations.

CONDEMN, to declare guilty; this expression is used not only in judicial acts, but in whatever relates to them. The priests condemned lepers of impurity; that is, they declared them unclean. So Dan. i. 10, "Thou shalt condemn my head to the king [Eng. Tr. make me endanger]; and Job ix. 20, "My mouth shall condemn me;" God shall judge me by my own words. "The righteous that is dead, shall condemn the ungodly which are living," Wisd. iv. 16.

[CONEY, צִנְעָה, an unclean animal, Lev. xi. 5. There is little doubt that the Saphan is the Ganim Israel, or, as it is called by Mr. Bruce, the Ashkoko. This animal is quite harmless, and of nearly the same size and quality as the rabbit, but of a browner colour, smaller eyes, and a more pointed head. Its feet are perfectly round, and very fleshy and pulpy; notwithstanding this, however, it builds its house in the rocks, Prov. xxx. 26. They are gregarious, and live in large families. Vide NATURAL HISTORY, FRAGMENTS, vol. ii. ad fin.] says (chap. iii. 6.) that the Jews came to receive baptism, confessing their sins. James (v. 16.) requires us to confess our faults one to another; and St. John says, that if we confess our sins, God is faithful and just to forgive them, 1 John i. 9.

We see, in the Acts of the Apostles, that many Gentiles who were converted, came and confessed their sins, ch. xix. 18.

CONFESSOR. The name of confessor has been given to those who confessed the doctrine of Jesus Christ before heathen or persecuting judges; or to those who firmly endured punishment for defending the faith: if they died under their torments they were called martyrs. Jesus Christ says, he will confess before his heavenly Father, those who shall have confessed him before men (Matt. x. 32.); and Paul commends Timothy (1 Tim. vi. 12.) for having confessed a good confession [Eng. Tr. profession]; that is, for having, at the hazard of his life, given a glorious and steady testimony to the truth. The same apostle says, that Jesus Christ witnessed a good confession before Pontius Pilate, 1 Tim. vi. 13.

In the ceremony of the solemn expiation, under the Mosaic law, the high priest confessed in general his own sins, the sins of other ministers of the temple, and those of all the people. When an Israelite offered a sacrifice for sin, he put his hand on the head of the victim, and confessed his faults, Levit. iv. 4. Some interpreters believe, that he not only declared himself in general a sinner, but that he confessed in particular that sin for which he offered this sacrifice. We are assured, that the Jews, at this day, make private confession of their sins on the day of solemn expiation, by them termed cippur; which is said to be after this manner:—Two Jews retire into a corner of the synagogue, one bows very low before the other, with his face turned towards the north: he who performs the office of confessor, gives the penitent thirty-nine blows upon the back with a leathern strap, repeating these words: "God, being full of compassion, forgave their iniquity, and destroyed them not: yea, many a time turned he his anger away, and did not stir up all his wrath." And as in this verse, thus recited, there are but thirteen words in the Hebrew, he repeats it three times, and at each word strikes one blow; which makes thirty-nine words, and as many lashes. In the mean time, the penitent declares his sins, and at the confession of every sin, beats himself upon his breast: this done, he who has performed the office of confessor, prostrates himself on the ground, and receives nine and thirty lashes from his penitent, Deut. xxv. 3; 2 Cor. xi. 24.

Lord; from כֹּן kun, to establish, and יָה yah, the Lord.]

[CONONIAH, one of the principal officers placed by Hezekiah over the store rooms which he had built, 2 Chron. xxxi. 12.]

CONSCIENCE, the testimony, or secret internal judgment of the soul approving its actions which it judges to be good, or reproaching itself with the commission of those which it judges to be evil. Conscience is a moral principle which determines on the good or evil tendency of our actions. In Rom. xiii. 5, Christians are required to be submissive to secular powers, "not only for fear, but also for conscience sake." Paul permits them also to eat at the houses of Gentiles, if invited thither, and to partake of what is served at their tables, without making particular enquiries from any scrupulosity of conscience: asking no questions for conscience sake. But if any one, meaning to inform them, says, "This has been sacrificed to idols," eat not of that meat, says he, for his sake who gave you this information; and, likewise, lest you should wound another's conscience, 1 Cor. x. 25—29. If he who gives you this notice be a Christian, and notwithstanding the information he gives you, you eat; he will condemn you in his heart, or will eat of it after your example, and thereby will wound his own conscience: if he be a Heathen, and he sees you eat of it, contrary to Christian custom, he will conceive a contempt for you and your religion, which had not power to cause you to refrain from so small a gratification.

CONSECRATE, Consecration; the offering or devoting any thing to God's worship and service. In the law, God ordained that the first-born of man and beast should be consecrated: he consecrated the race of Abraham, particularly the tribe of Levi, and more especially the family of Aaron. Consecrations depended on the good will of men, who consecrated themselves, or things, or persons depending on them, to the service of God, whether for a time only, or in perpetuity.

Joshua devoted, or set apart, the Gibeonites to the service of the tabernacle, Josh. ix. 27. David and Solomon devoted the Nethinim (remains of the ancient Canaanites). Hannah consecrated her son Samuel to the Lord, to serve all his life in the tabernacle. The angel who promised Zechariah a son (Luke i. 15.), commanded him to consecrate him to the Lord, and to take care that he observed those laws during his whole life, which the Nazarites (who were consecrated to God, though but for a time) observed during their consecration.

The Hebrews sometimes devoted fields or cattle to the Lord; after which they were no longer in their own power. [Did not Jacoo do the same? Gen. xxviii. 22.] If they desired to possess them again, they were obliged to redeem them. David, and other kings, often consecrated to the Lord the arms and spoils of their enemies, or their enemies' cities, and country. Vide ANATHEMA, and DEVOTING.

In the New Testament, we also see consecrations. Believers are consecrated to the Lord, as a holy race, a chosen people, 1 Pet. ii. 9. Bishops and other sacred ministers are devoted more peculiarly, &c.

CONTRADICTION, or Opposition, antilogia. There are many seeming contradictions in Scripture, which interpreters and commentators have endeavoured to reconcile. It is impossible that the Holy Spirit of Truth, the Author of the Scriptures, should contradict himself; or that there should be any real disagreement in what he delivers. But, we should consider our own imperfect knowledge in things divine and supernatural; our ignorance of the ancient sacred language, history, and customs; the loss of many ancient documents; the condescension of God in expressing himself often after a popular and human manner, though in reference to his divine perfections and operations: these among other things contribute to render the text of Scripture obscure, and to occasion appearances of contradiction, which are indeed but appearances, and which originate in our own imperfect conceptions. There is nothing but truth in the sacred writings, though it be in some places clearer than in others.

[CONTRADICTION is perfect, imperfect, or seeming:—perfect, when two narrators differ entirely in their affirmations; imperfect, when they differ in some things only, but agree in the main; seeming, when they use words which till thoroughly considered and understood, appear contradictory, but which, after due consideration, bear a coincident meaning. Also, when two persons relate the same history, if each select some circumstances which the other omits, they may seem to contradict each other; whereas, when all the circumstances reported by each are assembled in their due order, the whole, so far from being contradictory, becomes complete; and each, by his distinct testimony, confirms the relation of the other. Much the same might be said of seeming contradictions of opinion, in speakers or writers; each enforcing those particulars, or that view of a subject, which appears most suitable to his present purpose, but not thereby impugning the different particulars, or views, of another; whose mind leads him to a distinct and different, but not therefore contradictory, conception of the subject.]

CONTRITION, sorrow for sin, attended with a sincere resolution of reformation. Scripture never uses this term in this sense, but has many equivalent expressions; without contrition there is no repentance, and without repentance no remission of sins: "A broken and a contrite heart, O God, thou wilt not despise," Psal. li. 17.

[CONVERSION, a turning from one state, manner of life, course of conduct, or principles, to another; as from the worship of idols to that of the true God. In the Gospel it means a change of mind, spirit, disposition, or behaviour. So the apostles are advised to forsake the haughty, ambitious, and worldly views of men, to become like children, to entertain child-like sentiments, Matt. xviii. 3. Sinners are converted when they turn from sin to God, Psalm li. 13. when they forsake their old courses, and practise holiness in heart and life. "When thou art converted strengthen thy brethren" (Luke xxii. 32.), when thou art changed and recovered from thy feebleness of mind to sentiments of greater fortitude, to feelings of stronger faith, and more devout assurance, then strengthen those who may be ready to sink into despondency, error or apostacy, and endeavour to prevent the prevalence of these evils over their minds, by recollecting those hazards to which thou hast felt thine own exposure.]

To CONVERT. The literal signification of this word denotes—changing: "Thou hast turned for me my mourning into dancing," Psalm xxx. 11. "Turn ye not unto idols," Lev. xix. 4. God turned the heart of the king of the Assyrians. "Turn thou us unto thee, O Lord, and we shall be turned." It is usually applied to those who are converted from bad to better, from the error of their ways to seek after God.

COPONIUS, the first governor of Judæa, established by Augustus, after the banishment of king Archelaus to Vienne, in France. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xvii. cap. 1, 2, 3, de Bello, lib. ii. 12.

[COPPER, one of the six primitive metals, and the most ductile and malleable after gold and silver. Of this metal and lapis calminaris is made brass, which is a modern invention. There is little doubt but that copper is intended in the many passages of our translation of the Bible, which speak of brass. Copper was known prior to the flood, and was wrought by Tubal-Cain, the seventh generation from Adam, Gen. iv. 22. It appears to have been used for all the purposes for which we now use iron. Job speaks of bows of copper (xx. 24); and the Philistines bound Samson with fetters of copper, Judg. xvi. 21. In Ezra viii. 27, there is mention of "two vessels of fine copper, precious as gold." The LXX.

Vulg. Castallo, and Arabic, render "vases of shining brass;" the Syriac, "vases of Corinthian brass." It is more probable, however, that this brass was from Persia, or India, which Aristotle thus describes: "It is said that there is in India a brass, so shining, so pure, so free from tarnish, that its colour differs nothing from that of gold. It is even said, that among the vases of Darius, there were some, which the sense of smelling might determine, whether they were gold or brass. Bochart takes this to be the chasmal of Ezek. i. 27, and the fine brass of the Revelation, i. 15; ii. 18, the electrum of the ancients.

Ezekiel (xxvii. 18.) speaks of the merchants of Javan, Jubal, and Meshech, as bringing vessels of brass (copper) to the markets of Tyre. According to Bochart and Michaëlis, these were people situated towards mount Caucasus, where copper mines are worked at this day.]

COPTÆ. The Egyptians who profess Christianity are called Copts at this day: probably from Aiguptos, or Aicuphtos, the ancient name of Egypt, and of the Egyptians.

[COOS, Point, or summit, an island in the Mediterranean Sea, at a distance from the south-west point of lesser Asia, 1 Macc. xv. 23. Paul passed it in his way to Jerusalem, Acts xxi. 1. It is now called Stancora, or Lango.

Thought by some to be the same as the Hebrew Koa, called by the Greeks Coon; and Coos, sometimes: whence Pliny remarks, that it was also sometimes called Ceam, and Coon. The Coan vests, which probably were not unlike our gauzes, or transparent muslins, are thus alluded to by Horace:

Altera nil obstat, Cois tibi pene videre est

and by Tibullus:

Illa gerit tenues vestes, quas femina Coa
Texuit—

Vide also Seneca, Epist. 96. Pliny, lib. xi. cap. 33. Esculapius had a temple here, enriched with various offerings.]

[CORAL, a hard, cretaceous, marine production, resembling in figure the stem of a plant, divided into branches. It is of various colours, black, white, and red. The latter is the most valuable. It is ranked by the author of the book of Job (xxviii. 18.), and by the prophet Ezekiel (xxvii. 16.), among precious stones.]

CORBAN, קרבן: Mark vii. 11; from the Heb. קרבן karab, or hekerib, to offer, to present. It denotes a gift, a present made to God, or to his temple. The Jews sometimes swore by corban, or by gifts offered to God, Matt. xxiii. 18. Theophrastus says, that the Tyrians forbade the use of such oaths as were peculiar to foreigners, and particularly of corban; which, Josephus informs us, was used only by the Jews, lib. i. contra Apion.

Jesus Christ reproaches the Jews with cruelty towards their parents, in making a corban of what should have been appropriated to their use. Matthew expresses this reply from children to their parents: "It is a gift—whatsoever thou mightest be profited by me," i. e. I have already devoted to God that which you request of me. [Is not the idea to this effect: that succour which you request of me is already devoted to God: therefore I cannot profane it by giving it to you, although you are my parent, and such might be my duty?—Now this might take place in particular articles, without the child's whole property being so devoted; or it might be a pretence to put off the soliciting parent for the time: this the Jewish doctors esteemed binding; yet easily remitted.] The form of this vow is in express terms mentioned in the Talmud; and though such a vow as this is against both nature and reason, yet the Pharisees, and the Talmudists, their successors, approve it

Those sons who declared every thing corban which they should contribute to the support of their father and mother, were induced to this by passion only; for had they done so through avarice, what could they have gained by devoting that to God which they refused to their parents? But, without actually devoting it to God, they pretended it was already corban with respect to their parents, q. d. my whole fortune as to you is corban; I can give you no share of it; I have vowed to communicate nothing of it to you.

To facilitate the practice of these vows, so contrary to natural duty, to charity and religion, to confirm and increase the superstition of their people, the Jewish doctors did not require them to be pronounced in the most formal manner; it was of little consequence whether the word corban were mentioned, though this was most in use, provided something was said which came near it. These vows, thus imperfect in their terms, the Talmudists call handles; because, as it is sufficient to lift up a vessel entirely, if we take it by the handle; so to complete a vow, it is enough to pronounce any word of it; e. gr. may this be as the temple to me, or as the altar, or as the fire, or as the sacrifice: this vow was binding. They permitted even debtors to defraud their creditors, by consecrating their debt to God; as if the property were their own, and not rather the right of their creditor.

Josephus (Antiq. lib. iv. cap. 4.) remarks, that, among the Jews, men and women sometimes made themselves corban, i. e. consecrated themselves to God, or to certain ministries in his service. If they were afterwards desirous to quit their obligation, they gave to the priest, for a man fifty, for a woman thirty shekels; or they agreed with the priest for so much as was satisfactory, according to his valuation.

Philo, de specialib. legib. speaking of those who devoted themselves to God, quotes Lev. xxxii. 2, 3, 4: "He who has devoted his soul (his life, his person) to God, shall pay for a man, from twenty years of age to fifty, fifty shekels, for a woman thirty. From five years to twenty, a boy shall pay twenty shekels, a girl ten. From a month old to five years, five shekels for a male child, three for a female. From sixty years and above, for a man fifteen, for a woman ten shekels. If he who has made the vow be too poor, he shall present himself before the priest, and shall pay according to estimation." For what reason, says Philo, in all this, is there no consideration of the age, or wealth, &c. of those who make the vow? He answers; first, because the vow is of equal dignity, be the condition of those who make it what it may; secondly, it is not decent to value those who make vows, as we do slaves, according to their beauty, their graceful stature, or their good health; the principal reason is, thirdly, that the equality of conditions which is despised by men, is considered and esteemed by God; a fourth reason might have been added—to repel, by means of a proper fine, a trifling inconsiderate spirit—a rash spirit—in making vows without due consideration.

Moses speaks of different sorts of corban, or dedications by the Hebrews, of part of their estates, which might be afterwards redeemed, or if it were cattle, sanctified, Lev. xxvii. 9.

They who made a vow neither to eat nor drink till they had killed Paul, Acts, xxiii. 12, in some sort made every thing corban that belonged to them; or every thing that might supply them with meat and drink.

CORBONA signifies, also, the treasury of the temple, where offerings, made in money, were deposited. The Jews taking up the money which Judas had cast into the temple, after he had betrayed Jesus Christ, scrupled to deposit it in the temple treasury, because it had been the price of blood; and as such was esteemed impure. By this word, such persons were likewise described as had devoted themselves to the service of God and his temple, Joseph. contra Appion. lib. i. There are various cases, relating to this practice, in the Mishnah, under the title Nedarim.

CORD. To put cords about one's reins, to gird one's self with a cord, was a token of sorrow and humiliation: "God looseth the bow of kings, and girdeth their loins with a girdle," says Job xii. 18. The servants of Benhadad king of Syria presented themselves before the king of Israel, with sackcloth on their loins, and ropes on their heads, imploring Ahab's clemency, 1 Kings, xx. 31, 32. Isaiah, iii. 24, threatens the daughters of Sion with giving them cords for girdles.

Cord is often used for inheritance: "I will give thee the land of Canaan, the cord of thine inheritance," Psalm cv. 11. Joseph hath a double cord, (Ezek. xlvi. 13) a double portion; which expression originated from the custom of measuring land with a cord. So Joshua distributed to every tribe a certain number of cords, or acres. "My cords (Eng. Tr. the lines. i. e. my lot) are fallen in an excellent country," Psalm xvi. 6.

"The cords of hell compassed me about," 2 Sam. xxii. 5; Heb. the cables of hell (of the grave); alluding to the fillets bound about dead bodies: he also calls them the bands of death. The LXX. instead of cables of hell, translate it, pains of death, Psalm xviii. 6.

The cords of sinners, Psalm cxix. 61, the snares with which they catch weak people. The cords of sin, Prov. v. 22, are the consequences of crimes and bad habits: bad habits are, as it were, indissoluble bands, from which it is almost impossible to extricate ourselves.

Beruch vi. 3, speaks of a custom among the Babylonians: "The women with cords about them, sitting in the ways, burn bran for perfume: but if any of them, drawn by some that passeth by, lie with him, she reproacheth her fellow, that she was not thought as worthy as herself, nor her cord broken." This is explained by Herodotus, lib. i. cap. 199, "the Babylonian women," says he, "have a custom of prostituting themselves once in their lives in honour of Mylitta: they stand near the temple of the goddess, with cords about their heads, as marks of their devoting themselves; they are separated from one another by lines (cords); into these strangers enter, carry off whom they choose, and break the cords which hang about their heads."

To stretch a cord, or line, about a city, signifies, to ruin it, to destroy it entirely, to level it with the ground. Lam. ii. 8, "The Lord hath purposed to destroy the wall of the daughter of Zion; he hath stretched out a line upon it."

The cords extended in setting up tents furnish several metaphors: "Lengthen thy cords, strengthen thy stakes." The cords of Jerusalem shall not be broken, nor the nails which fasten them be pulled out. Isa. xxxiii. 23. "Thy cords are loose, loose, they could not well strengthen their mast." Jer. x. 20. "My tabernacle is spoiled; all my cords are broken."

CORÆÆ. Josephus says, Corææ was the first town in Judea, North. It lay near the castle of Alexandrium, which was on the top of a mountain, between Corææ and Jericho.—Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 24, xiv. 6, xvi. 2.

CORIANDER, a small round seed, of a good scent. Moses says, that the manna which fell in the wilderness was like coriander-seed; its colour was white. Exod. xvi. 31. Num. xi. 7. See MANNA.

CORINTH, Κόρινθος: which is satisfied, or ornament, or beauty; from κορεία.

CORINTH, a celebrated city, the capital of Achaia, [called anciently Ephyra] seated on the isthmus which separates the Peloponnessus from Attica. St. Paul came to Corinth, A. D. 52, Acts, xviii. 1. This city was one of the best peopled, and most wealthy of Greece. Its riches produced pride, ostentation, effeminacy, and all vices the consequences of plenty. Lasciviousness, particularly, was not only tolerated, but was, in some sort, consecrated here, by the worship of Venus, and the notorious prostitution of numerous attendants devoted to her. The Corinthians pretended to philosophy, politeness, and learning. Such was Corinth when Paul arrived there. He lodged with Aquila and his wife Priscilla, who, as well as himself, were tent-makers by occupation: thus he got a livelihood by his labour, without being burdensome to any. He preached in the Jewish synagogues, and converted some. From Corinth he wrote two Epistles to the Thessalonians, A. D. 52. Afterwards, observing that the Jews of Corinth, instead of being benefited, opposed him with blasphemy, he shook his raiment, and said, "Your blood be on your own heads, I am clean; I will go unto the Gentiles." He went, therefore, and lodged with Justus, surnamed Titus, a Gentile, but one who feared God. Many of the Gentiles afterwards embraced the faith. Paul suffered much here; but Jesus Christ said to him, "Be not afraid, I have much people in this city." He continued eighteen months in this city, or the neighbourhood.

He left Corinth, A. D. 54, and went to Jerusalem. About A. D. 56, he wrote his first Epistle to the Corinthians, from Ephesus. Herein he reproves some persons who disturbed the peace of that church; he complains likewise of disorders in their assemblies; of law-suits among them; and of a Christian who, by taking his father's wife, had committed incest with his mother-in-law. This letter produced in the Corinthians abundant sorrow, great vigilance against the vices reprov'd, and a very beneficial dread of God's anger; they repaired the scandal given, and expressed determined zeal against the crime committed, 2 Cor. vii. 9, 10, 11.

The apostle having understood the good effects which his first letter had produced among the Corinthians, wrote a second to them, from Macedonia, probably from Philippi, A. D. 57. He expresses his satisfaction at their conduct, justifies himself, and comforts them: he glories in his sufferings, and exhorts them to liberality. There is great probability that St. Paul came to Corinth towards the end of this year, A. D. 57. Vide Acts, xx. 2. & 2 Cor. xii. 14; xiii. 1.—Usher, Tillem. xlii.

[CORINTH was one of the most noble cities of Greece; only Athens and Sparta could claim precedence of it. Its original name, Ephyra, was derived from a daughter of Ocean, named Ephyra, who first settled this district, as Pausanias says; but Stephens says, from Ephyrus, son of Myrmex, by his wife Epimetha. The name of Corinth was derived from Corinthus, son of Marathon: but the Corinthians were persuaded that it was derived from Corinthus, a son of Jupiter. The Sun and Neptune contended for this region: and submitted their pretensions to the arbitration of Briareus: who awarded to Neptune the Isthmus and its adjacencies; to the Sun, the hill on which the city stood, i. e. the Acro-Corinthus: whence the Acro-Corinthus was called Helipolis, "Sun's town:" N. B. the Sun afterwards, of his own accord, gave place to Venus; whose famous temple was here. Corinth being placed at the neck of land which forms the passage into the Peloponnessus, had on each side of it a gulf, or deep bay; that to the east called the Ægean; that to the west, the Ionian. Ovid therefore calls Corinth bimaris, double-sea'd. This situation occasioned the commerce and wealth of the city: because, there was a great concourse of merchants from Italy on the one side, and from Asia on the other, who here met and transacted their dealings. It had, of course, two ports: that on the Ægean was named Cenchrea; that on the Ionian, Lechæus. The top of the Acro-Corinthus enjoyed a very extensive view, both east and west, down the gulfs; as well as north and south, over the land.

It appears from hence, that Corinth was founded in the early ages, whose transactions afterwards became the subject of fable; and we must often look through the fable, to obtain some idea of the history which it includes. E. gr. The Sun—dryness—contended with Neptune—humidity for this soil: which contest was decided by the hundred-handed Briareus, or persevering and multiform labour.]

ing to the legion surnamed Italian, (or rather Italic) Acts, x. 1, &c. He was a Gentile; one who feared God; of constant devotion, and much charity. His whole family served God. It pleased God to favour him, in a miraculous manner, with an introduction to the knowledge of the Gospel: an angel directed him to send for Peter, from whom to receive instructions on that important subject. This direction he obeyed; and as the apostle was beginning to relate gospel truths, the Holy Spirit fell upon him and his family, and they were added to the Christian church, as the first fruits of the Gentiles. Vide PETER.

Usuardus, and other Latins, make Cornelius bishop of Cæsarea, in Palestine. The Apostolical Constitutions (lib. vii. cap. 46) notice a Cornelius, as a bishop of that city after Zachæus; but they do not say he was this centurion. Eusebius, bishop of that church, does not reckon him among his predecessors. We have the Acts of Cornelius, but they are neither original nor authentic. Some modern Greeks make him bishop of Ilium, others of Scepsis, not far from it. The Greeks, in their Menologies, consider him as a martyr. They keep his festival September 13; the Latins, February 2. Jerom says, that the house of Cornelius, at Cæsarea, was afterwards changed into a church, which Sta. Paula visited with great devotion, A. D. 385.

[It deserves notice, that Julian the Apostate reckons only two persons of consideration, who were converted to Christianity, on its first promulgation:—Sergius Paulus the Pro-consul, and Cornelius the Centurion. It is probable, from this reference, that Cornelius was a person of greater importance than is usually understood by us.]

CORNER, angulus, the extremity of any land, country, habit; of the beard or hair; of a people, building, table, altar, &c. "Thou shalt not round the corners of thy head, nor mar the corners of thy beard," says Moses, Lev. xix. 27. Thou shalt not cut it off entirely towards the ears, at the extremity of the chin. "All Israel, all the extremities (corners) of the people, assembled at Mizpeh," Judg. xx. 2. Some understand by the extremity of the people, all the people without exception, from one end of the land to the other: others suppose, only the principal and chief. So, 1 Sam. xiv. 38, "Draw near, all ye chief (corners) of the people." Isaiah, xix. 13, "They have reduced Egypt, even they who are the stay (corner) of all the tribes thereof. And, Zeph. iii. 6, "I have cut off the nations, their corners are desolate." Vide FRAGMENTS, No. XII.

The corner sometimes signifies the most distinguished place, that part of an edifice which is most in sight. Zechariah, speaking of Judah after the return from captivity, says, "Out of him came forth the corner, out of him the nail," Zech. x. 4. This tribe shall afford corners, heads; it shall produce the corner-stone, the Messiah. Corner is taken likewise for the most retired place of a house: Prov. xxi. 9; xxv. 24: "It is better to dwell in a corner of the house-top, than with an angry woman in a wide house." Acts, xxvi. 26, St. Paul speaking to Agrippa of our Saviour, and his resurrection, tells him, "these things were not transacted in a corner, but very publicly."

COSAM, Κωσαν: in the Vulgate, Casan, he that divines; from κοσάω. Son of Elmodam, one of our Saviour's ancestors, Luke iii. 28.

COTTON, a kind of white soft wool, found in a brown nut, which is produced by a shrub, the leaves of which resemble those of the sycamore-tree. This plant puts forth abundance of beautiful yellow flowers; the ground of this flower is purple, and striped internally. There is an oval bud in the middle, which grows as big as a pigeon's egg: when ripe, it turns black, and divides at top into three parts; the cotton is as white as snow, and with the heat of the sun swells to the size of a pullet's egg. There are three black berries in the bud, as big as lupines, that stick close together.

It is our opinion, that Scripture speaks of cotton under the Hebrew name, schesch w (Exod. xxv. 4); in Latin, translated byssus. The word xylinum, which signifies cotton, may be derived from schesch, or xes, and linum; and that of gossypium, which signifies the same thing, from the Hebrew, agos, a nut, and pioth, mouths, because the nut which produces cotton, opens, and protrudes the wool which it contains.

COVENANT. The word testamentum is often used in Latin, and διαθήκη, diatheke, in Greek, to express the Hebrew בְּרִית, berith, which signifies covenant; whence the titles Old and New Testament are used improperly to denote the Old and New Covenant.

The first covenant with the Hebrews, is that made when the Lord chose Abraham and his posterity for his people, and gave them circumcision as the mark of his covenant with them; a second covenant, or a solemn renewal of the former, was made at Sinai, comprehending all who observe the law of Moses. The new covenant, whereof Jesus Christ is the Mediator and Author, and which was confirmed by his blood, comprehends all who believe in him, and are in his church.

The first covenant between God and man, was made with Adam, at his creation, when he was prohibited to eat a certain fruit, Gen. ii. 16.

A second covenant God made with man after his fall, promising not only forgiveness, on his repentance, but also a Messiah, who should redeem the human race from the death of sin, and from the second death, Rom. v. 12, 19.

A third covenant God made with Noah, when he directed him to build an ark, wherein to preserve animals and men; to re-people the world after the deluge, Gen. vi. 18.

This covenant was renewed after the waters of the deluge had ceased, and were retired, and Noah with his family had left the ark, Gen. ix.

These covenants were general between the patriarchs Adam and Noah, and their posterity: that which God made with Abraham, was limited; concerning that patriarch, and his family by Isaac exclusively, Gen. xii. 1. xv. 4, 5, 18.

The seal, i. e. confirmation, of this covenant, was the circumcision of all the males in Abraham's family. The effects of this covenant appear throughout the Old Testament; the coming of the Messiah, is the consummation and end of it. The covenant of God with Adam, forms what we call the state of nature; that with Abraham, explained farther under Moses, constitutes the law; that covenant ratified through the mediation of Jesus Christ, is the kingdom of grace.

In common discourse, we usually say the Old and New Testament; the covenant between God and the posterity of Abraham; and that which he hath made with believers by Jesus Christ; because these two covenants contain eminently all the rest, which are consequences, branches, or explanations of them.

The greatest, most solemn, most excellent, most perfect of the covenants of God with men, is that made through the mediation of Jesus Christ. This eternal covenant must subsist to the end of time, the Son of God is the guarantee of it, it is confirmed with his blood, the end and object of it is eternal life, and the constitution and laws of it are infinitely more exalted than those of the Old Testament. Vide the Epistles to the Galatians, and to the Hebrews.

CEREMONIES AT MAKING A COVENANT.

The prophet Jeremiah, chap. xxxiv. 18, speaks of a remarkable ceremony, not noticed in the historical books of Scripture: the Lord says, "I will give to punishment the men who have not performed the words of the covenant which they had made before me, when they cut the calf in twain, and passed between the parts thereof." At what time, and on what occasion, this covenant was sworn to, no one can tell. Probably, it was not long before this threatening was denounced, since they who had thus sworn, were still living. The custom of cutting a victim in two, of placing the several moieties upon two different altars, and making those who contracted this covenant pass between both, is well known in Scripture, and in profane authors. Vide Gen. xv. 9, 10, 17.

[The passage, Heb. ix. 16, which in our translation is rendered testament, &c. may perhaps receive illustration, by being referred to such a ceremony, as is above described. "Now, where there is a testament, διαθήκη—a COVENANT, the death of the testator—διαθεμνός,—the CONFIRMER OF THE COVENANT—is necessary; for a testament—"covenant"—is of no authority while the confirmer of the testament—covenant—"is living:" i. e. while that beast was not slain, between whose divided parts the persons covenanting were to pass, the covenant wanted the most solemn token of its ratification. The instance of the covenant made with Abraham may serve to confirm this sense: the burning lamp (rather, the shekinah) passed between the separated parts. Had Abraham already passed? Or, did he afterwards pass? Or, did only the party proposing the covenant pass?—hereby binding himself in the most solemn manner. Diatheke may signify not so much a covenant made between two equal contracting parties, as a proposal offered by one party for the acceptance of the other: so, let him "take hold of my covenant,"—my proposals, Isaiah, lvi. 4. (but vide FRAGMENTS, No. CCLXXVII.) Hosea, ii. 18; Psalm xxv. 14, &c. So, the Lord proposed to Abraham (Gen. xv. 18) to give him posterity, and to give his posterity that land, but what could Abraham stipulate to do, or to give?—the obedience of circumcision; as a token on his part. Vide FRAGMENT CXXIX.]

COVENANT of Salt, vide FRAGMENTS, No. CXXX.

COUNCIL, is occasionally taken for any kind of assembly; sometimes for that of the Sanhedrim, at others for a convention of pastors met to regulate ecclesiastical affairs. Thus the assembly of the apostles, &c. at Jerusalem, (Acts, xv.) met to determine whether the yoke of the law should be imposed on Gentile converts, is commonly reputed the first council of the Christian church.

I say nothing here of other councils, since that of the apostles; because they are not mentioned in Scripture. Some believe, that the apostles met in council to compose the creed. Vide CREED.

COUNSEL. Beside the common signification of this word, as denoting the consultations of men, it is used in Scripture for decrees of God, the orders of his providence. God frustrates the counsels, the views, the designs of princes; but "the counsels of the Lord stand for for ever," Psalm xxxiii. 11. "They have condemned the counsel of the Most High," Psalm cvii. 11; they have opposed his will. "The Jews rejected the counsel of God against themselves," Luke, vii. 30; the favours of God, his proposals for saving them. Jesus Christ, Isaiah, ix. 6, according to the LXX. is called the angel of the great counsel, the minister, the executor of the great and admirable design of God, for the salvation of mankind.

COUNTRY, patria: the land where we were born; the town where we dwell. It is taken likewise for family, Psalm xcv. 7. Patria, in Greek, signifies—a race, a nation.

The heavenly country denotes that residence in heaven, which is hoped for by Christians.

COURT, atrium; Heb. חצר chazer [Eng. Hazor]. The courts belonging to the temple of Jerusalem were three: First, the court of the Gentiles, because the Gentiles were allowed to enter no farther [vide FRAGMENTS, No. L.] Secondly, the court of Israel, because Israelites, if clean, had a right of admission into it. Thirdly, the court of the priests, where the altar of burnt-offerings stood, where the priests and Levites exercised their ministry. Israelites, who offered sacrifices, might bring their victims to the inner part of this court, but could not pass a certain separation which divided it: they withdrew as soon as they had delivered their sacrifices and offerings to the priest, or had made their confession, with laying their hand on the head of the victim; if it were a sin-offering. Vide the PLATES: Plans of the TEMPLE.

Before the temple was built, there was a court around the tabernacle; it was not large, and was formed only of pillars, and of veils hung by cords. Vide TABERNACLE and PLATE. These courts resembled those of the Egyptian temples, around which edifices were spacious courts with colonnades. The palaces of kings, and of great men had extensive courts, as appears from those of Solomon and of king Ahasuerus. Vide the Article on COURTS of PALACES.

The evangelists mention the high-priest's court, and Luke speaks of the strong armed man who guardeth the palace; i. e. the armed guard at a great man's door, as we see Swisses, or porters, at the gates of great men's houses.

Court is used for a city, (vide Ezek. xlvii. 17; xlviii. 1: i. e. the cities of Ennon and Netophath.) In the Hebrew, this is frequent: including all those towns, in which the word Hazer is combined, q. d. Hazer-Suza, the court of Suza; Hazer-Shual; so, Hazer-a, Hazer-im, Hazir-oth: these names of towns, signify courts. The courts of Jerusalem are put for the city.

COUS, or Cos, or Cosus, Κῶς: from קוץ koz, thread, united. An island in the Archipelago, opposite Cnidus and Halicarnassus. Acts, xxi. 1.

COZ, קץ, Κῶς: thorn, uneasiness, watching; from קץ cutz. Father of Anub and Zobeab, 1 Chron. iv. 8.

COZBI, כוזבי; liar; from כוזב cazab, to lie: otherwise, as sliding away; from the adverb כז ki, as; and זז zuz, to slide away. [Deceiver; says Simon, a daughter, when the parents hoped for a son: but, the appellation Cuzbee is given among the Hindoos to a courtesan; and, possibly, the root of this word is Sanscrit, as are the roots of several words used in this history.]

COZBI, daughter of Zur, a prince of the Midianites: this princess, with others of her sex and age, seduced the principal Israelites, by arts and allurements, to commit idolatry. Zimri having publicly entered her tent, in company with her, (vide FRAGMENT, No. CXCIII.) Phinehas, son of Eleazar, followed, and thrust them both through with his sword, in the midst of their infamous embraces. Numb. xxv. 6, 15.

CRASSUS. When Marcus Crassus marched against the Parthians, he came into Judæa, and took from the treasury of the temple of Jerusalem 8,100 talents of gold, and 2,000 talents of silver; as he intended farther to carry off the sacred vessels and veils of the temple, the priest Eleazar, who had the keeping of them, told him, he would show him a beam of massy gold, if he would promise him on oath, to touch nothing else. Crassus swore he would not; whereupon Eleazar discovered a golden beam to him, which weighed three hundred minas, concealed in another of wood, upon which hung the richest veils of the temple. The avarice of Crassus was not satisfied; but he carried off all the gold that was in the temple. The vengeance of God punished his sacrilege: for having invaded Parthia, he perished there, with the greater part of his army. He was celebrated for his vast wealth and avarice. Dr. Prideaux tells us, from Plutarch, that after he had consecrated the tenth of his property to Hercules, had feasted all the Roman people at ten thousand tables, and had given to every Roman citizen a donation of as much corn as would last him three months, he found the remainder of his estate to be seven thousand one hundred Roman talents, which amounts to above a million and a half of our money. Prid. Connect. &c. Part i. book v.

CREATOR, Creation, To create. These terms properly signify a production of something out of nothing. The Hebrew uses the verb ברא bara, to form, to signify creation, having no word which accurately expresses absolute creation out of nothing.

into order, to regulate. I think our word compose expresses this and somewhat more, as I doubt not, the Hebrew word does, though it may stop short of absolute creation.]

CREED, or ΣΥΜΒΟΛΟΝ, is a title given particularly to the Apostles' Creed, which is, as it were, an epitome of the doctrine of Christ, and of the Christian church: a sign, a badge, a signal, by which Christians could distinguish one another. Rufinus, de Symbol. p. 529, mentions a tradition, that when the apostles were about to separate finally, they assembled together, and each communicating his thoughts concerning the principal articles of faith, they composed this symbol, as an abridgement and compendium of the Christian faith. Jerom, Epist. lxi. cap. 9, also ascribes to the apostles the symbol, or creed, which passes under their name. Leo (Epist. xxvii.) says, that it contains twelve articles of the twelve apostles. Some even have pretended, that each apostle contributed his article. But there is no authority for this opinion, nor any agreement among those who have advanced it.

Those who were to be baptized usually rehearsed the creed before baptism; and in some places they pronounced it publicly, from the gallery of the church, in presence of all the people. Aug. Confess. lib. vi. cap. 2. It was received from the apostles without writing; and several Fathers assert that it was forbidden to write it. [Aug. Serm. ccxii. Hieronym. Ep. lxi. Cyrl. Cathet.] It appears from what they relate, to have been shorter than that we now have; and, probably, it was not every where the same. Ambrose (Epist. vii.) thinks, that the church of Rome long preserved it without addition. But that the creed we now use is longer than that of the ancient Romish church, appears by Rufinus, and by copies which have come down to us. Vide Vossius, Usher, de Symbolo, Father Alexander's Dissert. Eccl. tom. i. Du Pin, &c.

CRESCENS. St. Paul, 2 Tim. iv. 10, says, "Crescens is departed to Galatia," or to Gaul, say some. Eusebius, Theodoret, Epiphanius, the Chronicon Alexandrinum, Nicephorus, and others, maintain, that Crescens preached in Gaul. Some believe that he founded the church of Vienne, in Dauphiny; and this is a tradition of that church, but it is not very ancient; nor is it above two hundred years since Crescens was put into the litanies of that church. Crescens died, the Latins say, June 27; the Greeks say, July 30. The Apostolical Constitutions fix his apostleship in Galatia, and declare that he died there. Constit. lib. vii. cap. 46.

CRETE, Κρήνη: carnal, or fleshly; from the Greek, κρήνη; in Hebrew, the Isle of the Caphthorim, or of the Cretim, or Kerehtians.

CRETE, an island now called Candia, in the Mediterranean, I. Macc. x. Acts xxvii. St. Paul sent Titus, his beloved disciple, to Crete; and writing an epistle to him, he charges him to rebuke the Cretans severely, and in strong terms, to prevent their adherence to Jewish fables, human ordinances, and legal observances: for, as he adds, the Cretans, as one of their own prophets (or poets) witnesses, "are always liars, evil beasts, slow bellies," Tit. i. 12, 13. This Cretan poet, whom the apostle quotes, is Epimenides. Vide CAPHTOR.

[This island is in the Mediterranean sea, almost opposite to Egypt; and may be considered as having been originally peopled from thence, most probably by a branch of the Caphthorim, which being called Ciratas, or Cretes, gave their name to the island. It is proper to understand this, because the Cretans are famous for describing their island as the birth-place of Jupiter; and they boasted, also, of possessing his tomb. The first of these events they commemorated on their medals, by representing this deity in his infant state; and the latter they confirmed, by shewing to travellers the sepulchre of their venerated patron in the recesses of mount Ida. But, the name they gave him, fully proves that both he, and his fellow islanders, derived their transit from Egypt. In a cave was a seat, called the throne of Jupiter; and near it was an inscription, in ancient characters: "This is the tomb of Zan"—which is no other than the Egyptian Zoan, or "Aun the recumbent." If the common notion of Zoeh, whence Zoeh-aun, be adopted, as "causing to wander," then, it will import, "Aun the director of migration," but as it is usually taken in a bad sense in Scripture, I prefer the former idea: though it is very possible that the Hebrew application of the word, might not be acknowledged by the neighbouring nations. Vide ZOAN.

Crete was so named, says Pliny, from the nymph Creta, daughter of Hesperis; but Stephens says from Crete, daughter of Jove and the nymph Ida; Anaximander says, from Curetes, a king of the island, whom Eusebius in Cæron, calls Cretem, who was, he says, one of the Curetes, by which Jupiter was hid and nursed [one of the Ciratas, who introduced the worship of Jupiter]. The Cretans affected the utmost antiquity, as a nation, and distinguished themselves as Etsocretenses, "true Cretans." Homer celebrates this island as famous for its hundred gates (whether of cities, or of temples?) which Virgil, Æneid. iii. seems to refer to cities; but in the Odyssey, Homer calls this island "ninety-"ninety-cities." Being surrounded by the sea, its inhabitants were excellent sailors, and its vessels visited all coasts.

*O magna vasti Creta dominatrix freti,
Cujus per omne litus innumera rates
Tenere portum, quidquid Angris tunc

The Cretans were also famous for archery, which they practised from their infancy. But the glory of Crete was Minos the legislator, son of Jupiter and Europa; or rather Manueh, (the same radically as Manoah, father of Samson) which truly was but another name for Jupiter himself. In fact, I presume the same establishment as brought over the worship of the East, brought over also the political institutions of Noah. He was the first, it is said, who reduced a wild people to regularity of life; and in order to effect this the more completely, he retired during nine years into the cavern of Jupiter: which I take to be precisely the same as what is related by the Hindoo Puranas, that Sami Rama performed austere devotion nine years in the hollow of a tree, before she effected her settlement: and if the same word signified the hollow of a tree, and the hollow of a cavern, then this explains the emblem of Jupiter sitting on a tree. It is said, that after nine years Minos established religious rites. It is at least certain, that the laws, rites, and usages of Crete, were copied by the Greeks. Lycurgus, Thales, &c. travelled into Crete. The ancients were persuaded, as Pliny speaks, quidquid in Creta nascitur, infinito prætere ceteris ejusdem generis alibi genitis; that whatever was produced in Crete, was infinitely superior to that of the same kind, which was produced any where else.

We have ventured to suppose, in direct opposition to CALMET, that the Philistines, who appear to be tribes conformed in many respects to the Cretans, did not from Crete people that part of the shores of the Holy Land called Philistia; but, that the Philistines peopled the island of Crete, migrating from the shores of Egypt, or of Judea. We have thought the Philistines were a Hindoo nation, first settled on the coast of the Red Sea, afterwards extending themselves from thence to Canaan, and so to this island.

The Cretans were one of the three K's against whose unfaithfulness the Grecian proverb cautioned: Kappadocia, Kilicia, and Krete. Vide CAPPADOCIA.

It appears also, that the character of this people for lying, was thoroughly established in ancient times; and when Homer's Ulysses designs to deliver a falsity, he always prefaces it by assuming the character of a Cretan; usually swearing in that character to the truth of what he is about to affirm. In common speech the expression "to cretanise," signified to tell lies. This contributes to account for that detestable character which the Apostle (Titus i. 2) has given of the Cretans, that they are "always liars." This was not only the opinion of Epimenides, from whom St. Paul quotes this verse, but of Callimachus, who has the same words. When Epimenides adds, that "the Cretans are savage beasts," or fierce beasts, and gor-bellies," bellies which take a long time in being filled; he completes a most disgusting description. Polybius represents them as disgraced by piracy, robbery, and almost every crime, lib. iv. 8. Strabo, x. 477. They were also seditious. Polybius, iv. 53. Livy xli. 25.

Crete was taken by the Romans under Metellus, hence called Creticus, after a vigorous resistance of above two years. This island, with the small kingdom of Cyrene, on the coast of Lybia, formed a Roman province. In the reign of the Emperor Leo, it had twelve bishops, subject to Constantinople. In the reign of Michael II. the Saracens seized it; and held it, till after 127 years, they were expelled by the Emperor Phocas. It remained under the dominion of the emperor, till Baldwin Earl of Flanders, being raised to the throne, rewarded with it Bonifacio Marquis of Montserrat, who sold it to the Venetians, A. D. 1194. Under their government it flourished greatly; but was unexpectedly attacked by the Turks, A. D. 1645, in the midst of peace. The siege of Candia lasted 24 years, being commenced in 1646, and ending in 1670. It cost the Turks 200,000 men. It is now subject to the Turks, and, consequently, is impoverished and depopulated. In many places it is unhealthy also.]

CRISPUS, chief the Jewish synagogue at Corinth, was converted and baptized by Paul, Acts, xviii. 8, about A. D. 52. 1 Cor. i. 14. Some affirm that Crispus was bishop of Egina, an island near Athens. The Greeks observe his festival, October 4.

CROSS, a kind of gibbet made of pieces of wood placed cross-wise; whether crossing at right angles one at the top of the other, or in the middle, or diagonally, or fork-wise. The Greek stauros, a cross, often denotes only a piece of wood fixed in the ground, by the Latins called palus, or vallum. Death by the cross was a punishment of the vilest slaves, servile supplicium: crucifixion was a mark of infamy. This punishment was so common among the Romans, that pains, afflictions, troubles, &c. were called crosses; and the verb cruciare was used for sufferings both of body and mind.

The punishment of the cross was common among among the Syrians, Egyptians, Persians, Africans, Greeks, Romans, and Jews. Pharaoh's chief baker was beheaded, and his carcass fastened to a cross, Gen. xl. 19. Haman prepared a great cross whereon to hang Mordecai, Esth. vii. 10. Joshua orders to hang the king of Ai on a cross, Josh. viii. 29.

The Jews confess, that they crucified people, but not while living: they say, they first put them to death, and then fastened them to a cross, either by the hands, or the neck; and many instances occur of men thus hung on a gibbet after death: but there are indisputable proofs of their crucifying men alive. The worshippers of Baal-peor (Numb. xxv. 4) and the king of Ai (Josh. viii. 29) were hung up alive; as were the descendants of Saul, by the Gibeonites, 2 Sam. xxi. 9. Josephus (Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 22) relates, that Alexander Jannæus, king of the Jews, ordered eight hundred of his rebellious subjects to be crucified, and their wives and children to be executed before their eyes, at the feet of their crosses, while they were yet living.

The law ordained, that persons executed should not be left on the cross after sun-set, because, he who is hanged is cursed by God, Deut. xxi. 22. The body of the king of Ai, crucified by Joshua's orders, was left on the cross only till evening. The Jews believe, that the souls of those who remain on the gibbet without burial enjoy no peace, but wander till their bodies are buried. This also was a notion of the Greeks and Romans, as appears in Homer, Iliad 4, and Virgil—

Nec ripas datur horrendas & rauca fluent
Transportare prius quam sedibus ossa quierint.

ÆNEID VI.

The cross to which our Saviour was nailed, had the form of a T, i. e. the old Samaritan Tau, which resembled the Greek Tau, not the present Hebrew. But we are not to understand this resemblance rigorously; as we have reason to conclude that our Saviour's cross, represented a line crossing another at right angles, and traversing it thus, †. So old documents, the coins of the emperor Constantine, &c. describe it. St. Jerom compares it to a bird flying, to a man swimming, or praying with his arms extended like a cross: [i. e. the head piece rose above the transverse beam.]

Sometimes the criminal was crucified on a tree, and fastened to it with cords.

Sometimes he was fastened with his head downwards: thus Peter was crucified, from respect to his master Jesus Christ, not thinking himself worthy to be fixed to a cross in the same manner as he had been. Chrysostom, in Petr. & Paul. Abdias, in Petro, &c. Seneca speaks of this punishment, Alios converso capite in terram suspendere, Consol. ad Matr. cap. 20.

Sometimes a fire was kindled at the foot of the cross, by the smoke and flame of which the sufferer might perish. The emperor Alexander Severus, commanded one to be executed in this manner, who was a cheat, a quack, and a dealer in (as it were) smoke, that hereby there might be some relation between his crime and his penalty.

The common way of crucifying was by fastening the criminal with nails, one at each hand, and one at both his feet, or one at each foot; for this was not always the same: the ancients represent Jesus Christ, sometimes as crucified with four nails, as Cyprian, de Passione; clavis sacros. pedes terrebrantibus: and sometimes with three nails: Greg. Naz. carm. de Christo Patiente. Crucified persons were frequently bound with cords; this, which seems in one sense gentler, because it occasions less pain, was, in another sense, more cruel, because the sufferer was hereby made to languish longer. Arbori infelici recti suspendite, Livy, lib. i. St. Andrew is said to have been thus fastened to the cross with cords; Abdias, Hist. Apostol. lib. iii.

Sometimes they used both nails and cords for fastenings. Lucan, speaking of one who had been crucified, and afterwards taken down from the cross, says,

Laqueum nodosque, nocentes
Ore suo rupit.
Insertam manibus chalybem, nigramque, per artus
Stillantis talis sanie, virusque, coactum
Sustulit. LUCAN, lib. vi. de Maga Thesala.

Although the condemned person was generally fixed to the cross with nails, yet sometimes it was otherwise. The martyr Pionius, when about to undergo this punishment, stripped himself, extended himself on the tree, and gave his members to the soldiers, to be fastened with nails. When they used both cords and nails, there was no difficulty in lifting up the person, together with his cross, he being sufficiently supported by the cords; and executioners concerned themselves very little about the pains and torments of a malefactor condemned thus to die.

Before they nailed him to the cross, they generally scourged him with whips, or leathern lashes, which was thought more severe, and more infamous, than scourging with cords. Sometimes little bones, or pieces of bones, were tied to these scourges, to increase the pain. Slaves, who had been guilty of great crimes, were fastened to a gibbet, or a cross; and were thus led about the city, and beaten. Our Saviour was loaded with his cross; and as he sunk sunk under the burden, Simon, the Cyrenian, was constrained to bear it after him, and with him, Mark, xv. 21; Luke, xxiii. 26.

The criminal was crucified quite naked. The Saviour of the world, in all probability, was not used more tenderly than others who suffered this punishment. Christians, out of respect and modesty, represent Jesus Christ covered decently, sometimes from his loins to his knees; but it is credible, that they had no such regard to Jesus Christ, whom they did not distinguish from a malefactor; and who voluntarily bore the shame and punishment of our sins.

Some say this cross was fifteen feet high; that the arms of it were seven or eight feet long; that the top on which the title, or sentence of Christ's condemnation, was fastened, was a piece of wood added afterwards, with a board, on which was written, Jesus of Nazareth, King of the Jews. But this is all conjecture, and rather against probability, as it should seem from circumstances, that the cross was much lower; so that a person speaking from it could easily be heard, that a foot-soldier's spear could reach to the body of our Lord, and that a reed, or cane, in addition to a person's height, could reach his mouth.

Painters commonly represent the cross as lowered when our Saviour is fastened to it, and afterwards to be set upright again, and the body of our Saviour raised with it: speculative persons use these considerations to aggravate the excess of pain which he endured at his crucifixion. But this opinion is not at all probable. Is it common to have the gibbet first pulled down when the criminal is to be hanged upon it, in order afterwards to put it up again, when the person to be executed is fastened to it? The shaking and motion of the cross, together with the weight of the body, might, without any thing else, have broken the crucified person's hands and feet, and have loosened him from the cross, with inexplicable pains. Nonnus, author of the tragedy intitled, The Suffering Jesus, St. Austin, and the most learned interpreters, are of opinion, that Jesus Christ was nailed to the cross, as it stood already erected; which adds to the probability of the opinion, that the cross was but low: for how, or why, should they raise him to any considerable height?

It has been thought, that below the crucified person's feet was a kind of footstool, or piece of wood jutting out, on which his feet were laid and fastened. St. Gregory of Tours (de Gloria Martyr. lib. i. cap. 9) intimates this; and many crosses are made in this manner. It must be confessed, that without this the criminal could not continue long nailed to the cross, while the whole weight of his body was bearing on his hands. But others assert, that there are no traces of such a footstool in those descriptions of the cross which the most ancient Greek and Latin writers have left us. But they speak of a kind of wooden horse, upon which the sufferer was, as it were, mounted; that so his hands might not be torn asunder by the weight of his body: this was a large peg, fixed about half way up the cross, as appears in Justin, Dial. cum Tryphone; Irenæus, lib. i. cap. 46; and Tertullian, contra Nationes, lib. ii. The same is asserted by several able critics.

Sometimes those who were fastened upon the cross lived long in that condition. St. Andrew is believed to have lived three days upon it; others nine days. Eusebius (lib. vii. cap. 8) speaks of certain martyrs in Egypt, who were kept on the cross till they were starved to death. Pilate was amazed at Jesus Christ's dying so soon, because naturally he must have lived longer (Mark, xv. 44.) if he had not had power to lay down his life, and to take it up again. The legs of the two thieves were broken, to hasten their death, that their bodies might not remain on the cross on the sabbath-day, and to comply with the law, which forbade the bodies to hang after sun-set: but among other nations they were suffered to continue long: sometimes, till they were devoured alive by birds and beasts of prey:

— Cruxillum tollat in auras,
Viventesque oculos offerat altitibus.

PAUDENS.

Generally, after death, the bodies were devoured by wolves, dogs, and birds: or if the crosses were higher than usual, they either became a prey to the birds, or putrified and fell to pieces. Guards were appointed, to observe that none should take them down and bury them, Lips. de Cruce, lib. ii. cap. 15, 16. The history of the Ephesian matron, and the soldier set to guard the crosses, is well known. The Roman soldiers, who had crucified Jesus Christ and the two thieves, kept guard near the crosses till the bodies were taken down.

The Hebrews do not pray for those of their nation who are hanged, or at least not publicly in the synagogue; they did not permit them to be placed in the tombs of their families, till their flesh had been first consumed in the public sepulchres. Perhaps for this reason Joseph of Arimathea desired leave from Pilate to lodge the body of Jesus in his own tomb; that it might not be thrown undistinguished into the public burying-place, [which apparently was close adjoining the place of crucifixion.] Vide JESUS CHRIST, ad fin.

Jesus Christ says, that his disciple must take up his cross and follow him. The cross is the sign of ignominy and sufferings; yet it is, as

I may say, the badge and glory of Christians. Jesus Christ is the way we are to follow: there is no attaining that glory and happiness which is promised us in the gospel, by any other means than by the cross of Christ.

CROWN, an ornament frequently mentioned in Scripture, in very common use, apparently, among the Hebrews. The high-priest wore a crown about his mitre, or the lower part of his bonnet, tied behind his head. It seems as if private priests, and even common Israelites also, wore a sort of crown: God commands Ezekiel not to take off his crown, nor assume the marks of mourning, Ezek. xxiv. 17, 23. This crown was a ribbon, or fillet, in Hebrew called פֶּאֶר paer, which surrounded the head; a custom practised by others in the East, who wore on their heads merely such a fillet, or ribbon, which differed in colour only, and value, from the diadem of princes. When Moses commands the Israelites to bind the words of the law on their hands, and as frontlets between their eyes, he intimates the use of crowns and bracelets among them, Deut. vi. 8. See the PLATES to SOLOMON'S SONG, Plate VII. Nos. 1 to 4.

New married people of both sexes wore crowns, but richer and more beautiful than those generally used, Isaiah, lxi. 10; Cant. iii. 11. It was customary to wear crowns of flowers on festivals and other joyful occasions.

The crown, mitre, and diadem, royal fillet and tiara, are frequently confounded. Crowns are bestowed on gods, kings, and princes, as marks of their dignity. David took the crown from the god Moloch, or Melcom, which was of gold, and enriched with jewels, and placed it on his own head (1 Chron. xx. 2; 2 Sam. xii. 30); or, rather, he held it suspended over his head, for it weighed a talent; unless he took out the jewels for his own crown. (Vide FRAGMENT, No. CCLXXXII.) The Amalekite who valued himself on killing Saul, brought that prince's diadem, or royal fillet, to David,—2 Sam. i. 10. The diadem was placed on the head of young king Josiah, when he was presented to the people, 2 Chron. xxiii. 11. Baruch says, the idols of the Babylonians wore golden crowns, Baruch, vi. Queens, too, wore diadems among the Persians, Esth. ii. 17. God says, he had put a crown of gold on the head of the Jewish nation, which is represented as his spouse, Ezek. xvi. 12. Gold crowns were sent to kings and conquerors, 1 Macc. x. 20; xiii. 33. See the PLATES, of EASTERN VEILS.

Kings sometimes used several diadems, when they possessed several kingdoms: king Ptolemy, having conquered Syria, made his entry into Antioch, and put two diadems on his head, that of Egypt, and that of Asia. In the Revelations, the dragon with seven heads had seven diadems, one on each head, Rev. xii. 3; and the beast which sprung out of the sea, with ten horns, had, likewise, ten diadems. Lastly, the Eternal Word, the True and Faithful One, had many diadems on his head, Rev. xix. 12.

Persons of elevated dignity wore this ornament. Haman tells king Ahasuerus, that he whom the king was pleased to honour, should have a diadem on his head, Esth. vi. 8.

On festive occasions, people wore crowns, or diadems; but there always was a difference, in form or matter, between the crowns of kings and those of private persons. The diadem of kings was generally a white fillet, bound about the forehead, the extremities whereof being tied behind the head, fell down on the neck behind. Sometimes they were made of gold tissue, adorned with jewels. That of the Jewish high-priest, which is the most ancient whereof we have any description, was a fillet of gold, placed on the forehead, and tied with a ribbon of azure blue; this was not put on till after the high-priest had covered his head with his bonnet.

CROWN of Thorns. Pilate's guards set a crown of thorns on the head of Jesus Christ, with intention to insult him, under the character of the king of the Jews, Matt. xxvii. 29. We cannot tell of what species it was composed; white-thorn, buck-thorn, and others, have had their several advocates. Vide THORN, also the NATURAL HISTORY, Article RABKA.

CROWN, figuratively taken, signifies honour, joy. "Ye are my joy and my crown," says St. Paul to the Philippians, iv. 1. Crown is used likewise for reward, because conquerors in the public games were crowned with wreaths, garlands, &c.

To CRY. "The blood of Abel crieth from the ground, where it was spilt," Gen. iv. 10. "The cry of Sodom ascended up to heaven," Gen. xviii. 20. "The cries of the Israelites, oppressed by the Egyptians, rose up to the throne of God," Exod. iii. 9. "I expected that my vineyard should produce fruits of righteousness, and behold a cry," Isaiah, v. 7. "If my land cry against me, and the furrows thereof complain," says Job, xxxi. 38. The emphasis of these expressions is such, that any explanation would only weaken them.

CTESIPHON, a city on the Tigris, three miles from Seleucia, the capital of that part of Assyria called Calonitis. Eusebius, Jerom, and the Chaldee interpreters, thought it was situated where Calneh had stood, Gen. x. 10.

CUBIT, a measure used among the ancients. The Hebrews call it אַמָּה amma, q. the mother of other measures; in Greek ἰσχυρ. A cubit originally ginally was the distance from the elbow to the extremity of the middle finger: this is the fourth part of a well-proportioned man's stature. The common cubit is eighteen inches. The Hebrew cubit, according to Bishop Cumberland, and M. Pelletier of Rohan, is twenty-one inches; but others fix it at eighteen inches. The Talmudists observe, that the Hebrew cubit was larger, by one quarter, than the Roman.

Lewis Capellus, and others, have asserted, that there were two sorts of cubits among the Hebrews, one sacred, the other common; the sacred containing three feet, the common containing a foot and a half. Moses (Numb. xxxv. 4.) assigns to the Levites 1000 sacred cubits of land round about their cities; and in the next verse he gives them 2000 common ones. 1 Kings, vii. 15, the two columns of brass, in Solomon's temple, are reckoned eighteen cubits high; and in 2 Chron. iii. 15, thirty-five cubits. Vide Booz.

Villalpandus, and several writers after him, allow the sacred cubit to exceed the common cubit only a hand's breadth. He supposes Moses to speak of the common cubit, when he describes it as the measure of a man's arm folded inward, Deut. iii. 11; and that the sacred cubit was a hand's breadth longer than this, as Ezek. xliii. 13, "These are the measures of the altar after the cubits; the cubit is a cubit and a hand's-breadth."

The very learned and ingenious Dr. Arbuthnot says, that to him it seems plain, that the Jews used two sorts of cubits, a sacred one, and a profane or common one: for in Deut. iii. 11, the bed of Og is said to have been nine cubits long, and four cubits broad, after the cubit of a man. But (Ezek. xl. 5) Ezekiel's reed is said to be six cubits long, by the cubit and hand's-breadth; whence it appears, that the larger cubit, by which the reed was measured, was longer than the common one, by a hand's-breadth, or three inches, &c. Tables of Coins, Weights and Measures, &c.

Notwithstanding these reasons, we are persuaded, there was but one cubit among the Hebrews, from the Exodus to the Babylonish captivity; and this was the Egyptian cubit, the measure whereof was taken, some years ago, from the old standards extant at Grand Cairo; and, that only after the captivity, Scripture notices two sorts of measures, to distinguish the ancient Hebrew cubit from that of Babylon, which the captives had used during their abode in that city. On this is grounded the precaution of Ezekiel, in observing, that the cubit he is speaking of is the true old cubit, larger by a hand's-breadth than the common cubit.

[“Freret, D'Anville, and Bailli, have proved that the Egyptian cubit, being invariably twenty-four digits, is equal to twenty and a half French inches; and the present cubit, called Draa Masri, is precisely divided into twenty-four digits, and contains twenty and a half French inches. I have measured several of them with a pied du Roi (standard foot) of copper, but I found that all varied from one to three lines, (or tenths of an inch). The Draa Stambouli is of twenty-eight digits, or twenty-four inches, wanting one line. VOLNEY's Travels, Vol. I. p. 38. E. Ed. From this remark, and from a history in Baron du Tott, who found the measures used among the Turkish architects to vary several inches in a yard; we may perceive that no force is put on the cubit of Scripture, by supposing that it varied in different kingdoms and states; not to say, in different districts and cities; or at different times.]

CULON, or Caulon, a town of Judah, mentioned only in the Greek, Josh. xv. 60.

CUMANUS, governor of Judæa after Tiberius Alexander, A. D. 51. He committed so many acts of injustice and extortion against the Jews, that they were obliged to complain to Quadratus, governor of Syria, by whose order Cumanus was sent in chains to the emperor Claudius at Rome, by whom he was exiled, and the government of Judæa was given to Claudius Felix, brother to Pallas. Joseph. Antig. lib. xx. cap. 5.

CUMMIN, a plant very like fennel, it produces blossoms, and branches in an umbellated form. Jesus Christ reproved the Scribes and Pharisees, who, though they very carefully paid tythe of mint, anise, and cummin, yet neglected good works, and more essential obedience to God's law, Matt. xxiii. 23.

CUP. This word is taken in Scripture in a proper sense, and in a figurative sense. In a proper sense, it signifies a common cup, such as is used for drinking out of at meals; or a cup of ceremony, used at solemn and religious meals; as at the passover, when the father of the family pronounces certain blessings over the cup, and having tasted it, passes it round to the company and his whole family, who partake of it.

CUP, in a figurative sense, generally imports afflictions or punishments: "Stand up, O Jerusalem, which hast drunk at the hand of the Lord the cup of his fury," says Isaiah, li. 17. And the Psalmist (lxxv. 8): "In the hand of the Lord there is a cup, the dregs thereof all the wicked of the earth shall drink them." In the same sense, men are represented as drunk with sorrow, with afflictions, with the wine of God's wrath; which expressions are consequences following this first metaphor of a cup.

It is derived from the custom observed at entertainments for the guests to drink round out of the same cup. Such persons as refused to drink in their turn, at feasts, were not endured: "let him drink or begone," was a kind of proverb.

Cup of Blessing (1 Cor. x. 16) is that which was blessed in entertainments of ceremony, or solemn services, wherein the company drank round. Our Saviour, in the last supper, blessed the cup, and gave it to each of his apostles to drink, Luke, xxii. 20. [or rather, a Cup over which God was blessed for having furnished its contents:—and occasionally, for having afforded cause, as well as means, of rejoicing.]

Cup of Salvation (Psalm cxvi. 13) a cup of thanksgiving, of blessing the Lord for his mercies. We see this practice in 3 Macc. vi. 27. where the Jews of Egypt, in their festivals for deliverance, offered cups of salvation.

The Jews have at this day cups of thanksgiving, which are blessed, in their marriage-ceremonies, and in entertainments made at the circumcision of their children. Some commentators believe the cup of salvation to be a libation of wine poured on the victim sacrificed on thanksgiving occasions, according to the law of Moses, Exod. xxix. 40; Numb. xv. 5; xxviii. 7, 14.

Cup, in the style of Scripture, denotes, likewise, share or portion: "The Lord is the portion of my cup," because at meals each had his cup. Or, the prophet alludes to those cups which were drunk by every one in his turn: q. "I will have no share in the inheritance, the feasts, sacrifices, portions, society of the wicked; God alone is sufficient for me; he is my portion and my cup; I desire nothing farther."

For remarks concerning Joseph's cup, in proof that he did not divine by his cup, vide FRAGMENTS, No. XXI.

CURSES. God denounced his curse against the serpent which had seduced Eve, Gen. iii. 14, 17; against Cain, who had embroiled his hands in his brother Abel's blood, Gen. iv. 11. The Lord promised to bless those who should bless Abraham, and to curse those who should curse him. The divine maledictions are not merely imprecations, or impotent wishes; but they carry their effects with them, and are attended with all the miseries they denounce, or foretel.

We find, that holy men did sometimes prophetically curse particular persons. Noah *curse*d Ham, Gen. ix. 25; Jacob *curse*d the fury of his two sons, Levi and Simeon, Gen. xlix. 7. Moses enjoins the people of Israel to curse all violators of the law, Deut. xxvii. 15; Joshua *curse*d him who should undertake to rebuild Jericho, Josh. vi. 26; and history informs us, that these imprecations had their effects; as had those of our Saviour against the barren fig-tree, Mark, xi. 21.

But these *curse*s are not consequences of passion, impatience, or revenge;—they are predictions, and therefore, not such *curse*s as God condemns. No one shall presume to curse his father or his mother on pain of death, Exod. xxi. 17; nor the prince of his people, Exod. xxii. 28; nor one that is deaf, Lev. xix. 14; whether a man really deaf is meant here, or one who is absent, and therefore cannot hear what is said against him. Blasphemy, or *curse*ing of God, is punished with death, Lev. xxiv. 10, 11. In the Gospel, (Matt. v. 11.) Jesus Christ pronounces blessed, those disciples who are (falsely) loaded with *curse*s; he requires his followers to bless those who curse them; to render blessing for *curse*ing, &c.

The Hebrews say, that Barak *curse*d and excommunicated one Meroz, who dwelt near the brook Kishon, but who came not to assist Israel against Jabin. Wherefore Barak excommunicated him by the sound of 400 trumpets, according to Judg. v. 23: "Curse ye Meroz, saith the angel of the Lord, curse ye bitterly the inhabitants thereof." Barak himself, they say, is this angel of the Lord. Others believe it was the archangel Michael, general of the Lord's army, who *curse*d Meroz, the angel of the land of the Canaanites. Vide DEVOTING, EXCOMMUNICATION, ANATHEMA.

CUSH, כוש, Xousi: Ethiopian, or black.

[This name is thought to denote terror, af-fright, i. e. to foes; such being the import of the Arabic root; the Chaldee root, in its duplicate form, takes the same sense.]

I. CUSH, eldest son of Ham, and father of Nimrod, Gen. x. 8. The Easterns affirm that Cush, son of Canaan, and grandson of Ham, had a son named Habaschi, the father of the Abyssinians, whom the Persians call Black Indians. Hebrew grammarians derive Habaschah, which denotes Ethiopia, from Habouseha, which signifies a people formed of a mixture of nations, from different countries, who live together; and this is the true derivation of the word Habasch, as the country so named comprehends the Abyssinians, the Nubians, &c. Scripture knows nothing of Cush, son of Canaan, nor of Habasch, son of Cush: but only of Cush, son of Ham, whose sons were Seba, Havilah, Sabtah, Raamah, Sabtecha, and Nimrod, Gen. x. 7, 8. Part of Arabia, especially to the south, was formerly comprised under the name Ethiopia. We have no other person in Scripture of this name; but several countries are called by it. The Vulgate, LXX. and other interpreters, ancient and modern, generally translate Cush, Ethiopia: but there are many passages wherein this translation is certainly erroneous. It is necessary, therefore, to examine the several acceptations of the word Cush, and to be well advised on that particular Cush to which any passage of Scripture refers.

["It is a tradition among the Abyssinians, which they say they have had from time immemorial, and which is equally received among the Jews and Christians, that almost immediately after the flood, Cush, grandson of Noah, with his family, passing through Atbara from the low country of Egypt, then without inhabitants, came to the ridge of mountains which still separates the flat country of Atbara from the more mountainous highlands of Abyssinia.

"Their tradition says, that, terrified by the late dreadful event of the flood, still recent in their minds, and apprehensive of being again involved in a similar calamity, they chose for their habitation caves in the sides of these mountains, rather than trust themselves again on the plain. It is more than probable, that, soon after their arrival, meeting here with the tropical rains, which for duration still exceed the days that occasioned the flood, and observing, that going through Atbara, that part of Nubia between the Nile and the Astaboras, afterwards called Meroë, from a dry climate at first, they had after fallen in with rains, and as those rains increased in proportion to their advancing southward, they chose to stop at the first mountains, where the country was fertile and pleasant, rather than proceed farther at the risk of involving themselves, perhaps in a land of floods, that might prove as fatal to their posterity as that of Noah had been to their ancestors.

"While improvements were going on prosperously in the central and northern territory of the descendants of Cush, their brethren to the south were not idle; they had extended themselves parallel to the Arabian gulf; which was in all times called Saba, or Azabo, both which signify south, [whence the queen of Sheba, or Saba, or Azabo, is called "queen of the south," Matt. xii. 42. Sabeans, Isaiah, xlv. 14. Joel, iii. 8.] not because Saba was south of Jerusalem, but because it was on the south coast of the Arabian gulf, and from Arabia and Egypt was the first land to the southward which bounded the African continent, then richer, more important, and better known, than the rest of the world.

"By that acquisition they enjoyed all the perfumes and aromatics in the East; myrrh, and frankincense, and cassia; all which grow spontaneously in that stripe of ground, from the bay of Bilur west of Azab, to cape Gardefan, and then southward up in the Indian ocean, to near the coast of Melinda, where there is cinnamon, but of an inferior kind.

"The mountains which the Agaazi inhabit, are called Habab, from whence it comes that they themselves have got that name. Habab in their language, and in Arabie likewise, signifies a serpent, and this I suppose explains that historical fable in the book of Arum, which says, a serpent conquered the province of Tigré, and reigned there."

Cush is Ethiopia, and Cushite is Ethiopian; many Ethiopians are white—many Cushites are negroes, black. Bruce's Travels, Vol. I. p. p. 376, 381, 397, 409.]

II. CUSH is the name of a country watered by the Araxes. They who, on occasion of this Cush, have translated Cush, Ethiopia, have made way for that unwarrantable opinion of the river Gihon being the Nile; but we believe, that by Cush, on the river Gihon, is meant the ancient country of the Scythians, on the Araxes. Herodotus (lib. i. cap. 201, lib. iv. cap. 11) says, that the first habitation of these people, was on the Araxes, but being forced from thence by the Massagetæ, they passed this river, and retired into the country of the Cimmerians. Justin (lib. i. § ii.) makes the Phasis and Araxes as it were the limits of the Scythians south. Diodorus Siculus (lib. xi.) says, the Scythians, near Media, dwelt at first on the Araxes, and that the Saci and Massagetæ are branches of the Scythians. The word Cuthæi and Cutha, כּוּתָּא, whence some have derived Scythæ, or Scuthæ, is the same as Cush. The Chaldees generally put the tau, ט, where the Hebrew use schin, ש, they say Cut כּוּת, instead of Cush כּוּשׁ. The Cuthæans, who came and inhabited Samaria, were originally from the country of the Medes, bordering on the Caspian Sea; and, consequently, they came from the Cush we are speaking of. There are sensible remains of this name still extant in this country and in its neighbourhood, as the Quitians, the Coëtheans, or Coëta, the Cytheans; the cities of Cotatus, Cetemane, Cythanum, Cyta, Cytaia, Cethæum, Cethena.

III. CUSH. Josephus says (Antiq. lib. i. cap. 7) that the Ethiopians call themselves by this name, which also is given to them by all Asia. Jerom tells us, that the Hebrews thus call the Ethiopians; as do the LXX. Jeremiah (xiii. 23) says, "Can the Cushæan change his skin?" In Ezekiel (xxix. 10) the Lord threatens "to reduce Egypt to a desert, from the tower of Syene, even unto the border of Cush," or Ethiopia; and, Isaiah (xi. 11) says, "He will recover the remnant of his people from Egypt, and from Pathros, and from Cush." All these marks agree with Ethiopia Proper, or Nubia, south of Egypt.

IV. CUSH. Bochart (Phaleg. lib. iv. cap. 2) has has shown clearly, that there was a country called Cush, in Arabia Petrea, bordering on Egypt, which extended itself principally on the eastern shore of the Red Sea; and at its northern extremity. The proofs are these: Zipporah, the wife of Moses, a native of Midian, is called a Cushite, Numb. xii. 1. Now, Midian, as Josephus, Ptolemy, and Jerom all agree, was situated on the east of the Red Sea, in Arabia. Habakkuk, iii. 7, mentions the land of Cush, or Cushan, as synonymous with that of Midian: "I saw the tents of Cushan in affliction, and the tent-curtains of the land of Midian did tremble." Job, xxviii. 19, speaks of the "topaz of Cush." Now, the topaz is found only in an island of the Red Sea, near Arabia. Isaiah, xviii. 1, and Zephaniah, iii. 10, describe Egypt as situated beyond the rivers of Cush; which cannot be understood of the rivers of Ethiopia. King Tirhakah, (2 Kings, xix. 9) who marched to attack Sennacherib, and Zerah, who at another time invaded Judah, (2 Chron. xiv. 9) were both kings of Cush, i. e. of the country bordering on Egypt and Palestine, as all the circumstances of their histories demonstrate. Thus there are, at least, three countries named Cush, in Scripture, all of which have been confounded together by interpreters, under the general name of Ethiopia.

[The family of Cush appears to have been numerous; and the establishments of this family to have been proportionately dispersed, not in one region only, but in several. We find them in

1. Bactria, west of the Gihon, Gen. x. 7, 8.
2. Assyria, west of the Caspian.
3. Arabia, east of the Red Sea, on the coast. Numb. xii. 1. 2 Kings xix. 9. 2 Chron. xix. 16. 2 Chron. xiv. 9. Isaiah xxxvii. 9. Hab. iii. 7.
4. Southern Ethiopia; or, Ethiopia south of Egypt. This is the Ethiopia best known to the Greeks and Romans.

1. CUSH. Bactria. Gen. x. 7, 8. Of this we have treated in Excursion, No. vi. the proofs there adduced may justify the placing of a Cush in this country. The Syriac in 2 Chron. xvi. 8. for Cushites reads Indians: both Syriac and Chaldee in Isaiah, xi. 11. and Zeph. iii. 10. for Cush read India. Jonathan, the Chaldee paraphrast, in Gen. x. 6. for Cush reads Arabia: so the Chaldee on 1 Chron. i. 8, 9. It is impossible that Arabia near Judæa should be intended: but the Indian Cushites were also called Arabes, Oreites, Erythreans, and Ethiopes; and these Arabes, whom we have referred to Bactria, no doubt, were meant by the paraphrast. The prophet Isaiah enumerates "Elam, Cush, and Shinar." xi. 11. The Samaritans in Josephus, Ant. lib. xi. cap. 4. say,

"Salmanassar, king of the Assyrians, brought us hither from the countries of Cuthia and Media." "The province of Cutha is a region in Persia," says Josephus, lib. ix. cap. 14.

2. CUSH. Assyria. As the dispersion of the Jews was principally in Assyria, it may be, that to this dispersion the prophet Zephaniah refers, chap. iii. 10. where he speaks of the return of Judah from captivity, "from beyond the rivers of Cushan, my suppliants, even the daughters of my dispersed, shall bring mine offering."—But see Excursion No. xxi. as the dispersion did extend even to the ancient Hindoostan. St. Jerom, in his Catalogue of Ecclesiastical Writers, mentions St. Andrew as preaching the gospel on the rivers of Colchis, the Apsarus, and Phasis: and calls the natives Ethiopians, i. e. Cushites. He also says the same of Matthias. In altera Ethiopia ubi est irruptio Apsari et Hyssi portus, predicavit.

3. CUSH. Arabia. The prophet Habakkuk alludes to this settlement of the Cushites, chap. iii. 7. "I saw the tents of the Cushites in affliction; and the tent curtains of the land of Midian did tremble." We know the land of Midian, connected by this prophet with Cushan, too well to be mistaken.

4. CUSH. Ethiopia, south of Egypt. The eunuch of Queen Candace is in the Syriac rendered the Cushite. Acts viii. 27. This is the country usually called Ethiopia.

In Isaiah xviii. 1. rivers of Cush, are rivers of Ethiopia: i. e. south of Egypt. Comp. Jer. xiii. 2.]

[This distinction is of greater importance than it may at first appear; because, by attributing to one country, called Cush, what properly belongs to another Cush, at a considerable distance from the former, much confusion ensues; and confusion too, of a nature not easily remedied. It should be, however, remembered, that all ancient writers have at least equal confusion in their descriptions of Ethiopia (Cush), and arising from the same cause—the different families of the Cushites: which by various removals inhabited these places, so widely separated from each other.]

CUSHI, כּוּשִׁי, Κοῦσι: troublesome, importunate; from כּוּשׁ kashah: otherwise, forage, chaff: from כּוּשׁ kash: otherwise, cucumber; from כּוּשׁ kisha: but this etymology is very dubious.

I. CUSHI, brought David news of the defeat of Absalom, 2 Sam. xviii. 21.

II. CUSHI, father of Shelamiah, Jer. xxxvi. 14.

III. CUSHI, father of the prophet Zephaniah, Zeph. i. 1.

CUSPIUS FADUS, sent after the death of Agrippa, to govern Judæa, A. D. 45. As soon as he came into this province, he ordered one Ptolemy to be hanged, who had been captain of a band of robbers, and had plundered Judæa with impunity. After this, being informed that one Theudas, a sorcerer, pretended to be a prophet, and had seduced great numbers to believe, that he would stop the course of the river Jordan with a word only, and would procure them a passage through it, without being wetshod, Fadus sent a body of horse against him and his followers. Many were killed, and the rest fled. Theudas was taken, and his head cut off, (Antiq. lib. xx. cap. 2) A. D. 45. Fadus was succeeded by Tiberius Alexander, A. D. 46.

CUTHAH, כּוּתָּא, Xṣṭh: which is broken or bruised; from כּוּתָּא cathath: otherwise, combustion. This being the name of an Oriental nation, its etymology can hardly be found in Hebrew.

CUTHAH, a province in Assyria, whose inhabitants were transplanted into Samaria by Salmanesser. The Cuthæans worshipped the idol Nergal, 2 Kings, xvii. 24, 30. We are of opinion, that Cutha and Scythia are the same place, and that these Cuthites came from the land of Cush, or Cuth, Gen. ii. 13. [The name is written Cutha, with the Chaldee termination.] Vide Cush II.

CUTHITES, a people who dwelt beyond the Euphrates, and were from thence transplanted into Samaria, in place of the Israelites, who had before inhabited it. In our opinion, they came from the land of Cush, or Cutha, on the Araxes, their first settlement being in the cities of the Medes, subdued by Salmanesser, and his predecessors; and that the Israelites were substituted for them in those places whence the Cuthites came. Scripture observes that the Cuthites, on their arrival in Samaria, &c. continued to worship the gods they formerly had adored beyond the Euphrates. The Lord, being hereby provoked, sent lions among them, which destroyed them. This being reported to Esarhaddon, king of Assyria, who succeeded Sennacherib, he appointed an Israelitish priest to instruct them in that worship which was pleasing to God: but these people thought they might reconcile their old superstitions with the worship of the God of Israel.

They therefore worshipped both the Lord and their false gods together, and made of the lowest of the people priests of the high places. They continued this practice long; but afterwards they forsook idols, and adhered to the law of Moses, as the Samaritans, their descendants, do at this day. When the Jews returned from their captivity, the Samaritans, by their deputies, desired to assist them in rebuilding the temple, telling them that since the reign of Esarhaddon, they had constantly worshipped the Lord, Ezra, iv. 1, 2. But Zerubabel, and Joshua son of Jozedek, with the elders of Israel, answered that they could not grant their request; the king of Persia having given his licence to Jews only to build a temple to the Lord. Hereby it appears, that the Cuthites hitherto had no common temple in their country; but that in each city they worshipped God, and, perhaps, idols in consecrated places, or on the high places. Josephus (Antiq. lib. xi. cap. 8) informs us, that they did not build a common temple on mount Gerizim till the reign of Alexander the Great. Vide SAMARITANS.

CYATHUS, a cup used in the temple for libations. Vide Cup.

CYAMON, a place opposite to Esdraelon, Judith, vii. 3, Gr. In the Latin, Chelmon; perhaps the same as Camon, placed by Eusebius in the great plain, six miles from Legio, north.

CYAXARES I. son of Phraortes, having succeeded his father in the kingdom of the Medes, levied a great army to revenge himself on the Assyrians. Having defeated them, he led his troops to the siege of Nineveh; but while he was thus employed, the Scythians from the Palus Mæotis, having marched round mount Caucasus, burst into Media. He made haste to defend his own country, but was defeated, and lost the empire of Upper Asia, which the Scythians possessed twenty-eight years: from hence they passed into Syria and Palestine. Some believe, that during this expedition they made themselves masters of Bethsan (afterwards named Scythopolis, or the city of the Scythians), and plundered the temple of Venus of Askalon. Vide Anus. [Herodotus lib. i.] Cyaxares died after forty years' reign, and was succeeded by Astyages, otherwise called Ahasuerus. Cyaxares began to reign about A. M. 3391, died about A. M. 3430.

CYAXARES II. son and successor of Astyages, king of the Medes, observing the progress of Evil-merodach, king of the Assyrians, or Belshazzar, his son, called Cyrus to his assistance, who was his nephew, son of Cambyses, king of the Persians, and of Mandane, daughter of king Astyages, and, consequently, sister to Cyaxares. They jointly attacked Babylon (vide BELSHAZZAR and BABYLON), A. M. 3444. Xenophon says, that Cyrus left the government of Babylon to his uncle Cyaxares, who held it only two years. This Cyaxares is otherwise called Darius the Mede. See DARIUS.

CYDIDA, Cydis, Kadesh of Naphtali, a city of Galilee.

CYPRESSUS,

CYP

CYPRESSUS, or Cypressus, a very tall straight tree, cultivated with great difficulty; its fruit is not-edible; its leaves are bitter, and the very smell and shade of it are dangerous, says Pliny, lib. xvi. cap. 33. Hence the Romans considered it as a fatal tree, and used it at funerals, and mournful ceremonies. The wood is always green, very heavy, of a good smell, never rots, nor is it liable to be worm-eaten. The cypress is distinguished into male and female: the branches of the male are somewhat horizontal, those of the female upright; from this latter are generally taken palisades for gardens, and for treillages. The fruit is round, olive-coloured, and as large as nuts, it grows in separate places: the Latins call it conus, because of its figure. It is composed of a kind of scales, in the clefts whereof are hidden little seeds flat and angular. The cypress-tree is common on mount Libanus; the Eastern writers sometimes draw comparisons from it, as a beautiful and large tree. "I was exalted like a cedar in Libanus, and as a cypress-tree on the mountains of Hermon." Ecclus. xxiv. 13. Mount Hermon made a part of Libanus. "Simon, son of Onias, the high-priest, appeared as a fair olive-tree budding forth fruit, and as a cypress-tree, which groweth up to the clouds," Ecclus. l. 10. The spouse in the Canticles says, "The beams of our house are cedar, and our rafters of cypress," (Cant. i. 17), in Hebrew, beroth, which by many is interpreted fir; but more properly a sort of cypress, called bruta, q. berutha, having the smell and solidity of cedar, but it does not grow so tall.

CYPRIARCHES, i. e. governor of Cyprus. Nicanor has this title, 2 Mac. xii. 2.

CYPROS, a castle built by Herod the Great, above Jericho, in honour of his mother Cypros.

I. CYPROS, wife of Antipater, and mother of Herod, Phazael, Pheroras, Joseph, and Salome.

II. CYPROS, daughter of Herod the Great, by Mariamne, the sister of Alexander and Aristobulus, and wife of Antipater, son of Salome. This Cypros had a daughter of the same name.

III. CYPROS, daughter of Phazael, brother to Herod the Great, and of Salampso, daughter of the same Herod and Mariamne. She married Agrippa the Great, and was mother of Agrippa the younger, of Drusus, Berenice, Mariamne, and Drusilla.

[CYPRUS, fair, or beautiful, 1 Mac. xv. We have given it as our opinion that the Philistines, or Phœniciana, passed from the shore of the Red Sea to the Mediterranean, and peopled the islands of Crete, (Vide CRETE) and Cyprus.]

CYPRUS, the largest island in the Mediterranean, situated between Cilicia and Syria.

CYR

Its inhabitants were plunged in all manner of luxury and debauchery. Their principal deity was Venus.

The apostles Paul and Barnabas landed in the isle of Cyprus; Acts xiii. A. D. 44. While they continued at Salamis, they preached Jesus Christ in the Jewish synagogues; from thence they visited all the cities of the island, preaching the gospel. At Paphos, they found Bar-Jesus, a false prophet, with Sergius Paulus, the governor: Paul struck Bar-Jesus with blindness; and the proconsul embraced Christianity.

Some time after, Barnabas went again into this island with John, surnamed Mark, Acts xv. 39. Barnabas is considered as the principal apostle, and first bishop of Cyprus; where it is said he was martyred, being stoned to death by the Jews of Salamia.

CYPRUS, or Cyperus, a shrub, in Hebrew כפר copher, in Latin, cypsus, Cant. i. 13; iv. 13. It is so common in the isle of Cyprus, that the island is thought to take its name from it. This shrub produces a very sweet flower; but those which grow in Cyprus excel all others. Some likewise grew in the territory of Engedi, as the spouse in the Canticles, i. 13, alludes to "a bunch of cypsus, in the vineyards of Engedi," Vulg. Pliny says, the best cypsus was that of Canopus; next to it that of Askelon, in Palestine. Dioscorides says the same. Some are of opinion, that the cypsus and the privet are the same: but the cypsus is rather the al-henna of the Arabians. The Eastern people use it, with the leaves of senna, to blacken their hair. The leaves of the cyperus odoratus, are like those of a reed, long, thin, and hard: the stem rises to about two feet, is straight, triangular, without knots; at the top of it are the blossoms, which have several stamina collected into large buttons. The seed is hard, triangular, and covered with a black skin: the roots are long, knotty, twisted one within another, blackish, and of an agreeable smell. [Vide the PLATE of AL-HENNA, No. I. of the PLATES to "SOLOMON'S SONG."]

CYRENE, קיר קרנה: wall; from קר kir: otherwise, coldness; from קר kor: otherwise, meeting; from קר kara: otherwise, a floor; from קר kereth. The true etymology of this word is foreign from the Hebrew tongue.

CYRENE, a city and province of Lybia Pentapolitana, between the great Syrtes and the Mareotis; at present called Cairoan, in the kingdom of Barca. [The district of Cyrene, was sometimes called Pentapolis, by reason of the five principal cities which it contained, Cyrene, Apollonia, Arsinoë, Berenice, and Ptolemais.] From hence came Simon the Cyrenian, father of Alexander and Rufus, on whom the Roman soldiers laid a part of our Saviour's cross, cross, Matt. xxvii. 32; Luke xxiii. 26. There were many Jews in the province of Cyrene, great part of whom embraced the Christian religion; but others opposed it with much obstinacy. Among the most inveterate enemies of our religion, Luke reckons those of this province, who had a synagogue at Jerusalem, and excited the people against Stephen, Acts xi. 20.

After the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus, one of the ruffians, or assassins, of Judæa, going to Cyrene, persuaded the Jews of this city, to follow him into the desert, upon an assurance that he would demonstrate to them by signs and miracles, that God had suspended his wrath against the Jews, and that they might shortly rebuild Jerusalem. Catullus, governor of the country, marched against these people, surrounded the wood wherein they were, and cut them to pieces. He preserved Jonathan from the slaughter, and used him in discovering a pretended conspiracy, wherein he maliciously included the best men of the country.

II. CYRENE. There is mention in the Old Testament, of another province called Cyrene, different from that in Africa. We read in the Vulgate, that Tiglathpileser transplanted the inhabitants of Damascus to Cyrene, as the prophet Amos had foretold about twenty-five years before, 2 Kings, xvi. 9; Amos, i. 5; ix. 7. Not certainly to that Cyrene, near Egypt, where Tiglathpileser had no power; but to Iberia, or Albania, where the river Kir, or Cyrus, runs, which falls into the Caspian Sea. Josephus Antiq. lib. ix. cap. 12, says, they were transported into Upper Media, which agrees with our opinion; for, anciently, Media was very large.

Amos says, that the Aramæans were originally of Kir; intending, probably, to include under Kir, the people beyond the Euphrates, and those of Mesopotamia, whence the Aramæans (the Syrians) in reality came, who were descended from Aram, son of Shem. [English transl. Kir.]

[CYRENIUS, governor of Syria, Luke, ii. 1, 2. As very great difficulties have been raised, on the history of the taxing under Cyrenius, we shall state, at some length, our remarks on that subject; and the rather, as it appears, by history, that Cyrenius was not governor of Syria, till nine or ten years after our Saviour was born. The following dates are reckoned by the year of Rome.

Cyrenius was not of a noble family; but, by early public services, he obtained the honour of the consulship of Rome, A. U. 742; and he gained a memorable victory over the Homonadenses, A. U. 747, or 748. Usher thinks he was then proconsul of Cilicia; but others think he was sent into that province as an extraordinary officer. However, having finished this war, he might be sent, say they, into Syria, for the purposes of the enrolment to be made there, A. U. 749, which is about the time fixed by Luke; for Herod died A. U. 750, or 751. Cyrenius was appointed governor to Caius Cæsar, A. U. C. 755. He was famous for dispatching affairs of importance in a rapid and masterly manner.

It is granted, on all hands, that Cyrenius was not properly governor of Syria at the time of our Lord's birth, though he was afterwards; but Saturninus was then governor. Nevertheless, for the purposes of this enrollment, Cyrenius might be associated with Saturninus; or, though now sent into Syria as an extraordinary officer, yet being afterwards governor of this province, he might be best known under this title, i. e. "Governor Cyrenius," "Cyrenius, governor of Syria," as we call an officer during his life by the title he has borne, though now no longer bearing that commission.

We should observe on this passage, (Luke ii. 1, 2) first, that the word οικουμένη, rendered all the world, sometimes signifies only the whole of a country, region, or district; as certainly, Luke xxi. 26, perhaps, Acts xi. 28. But the expression, all the country, is peculiarly proper here, because Galilee, as well as Judæa, was included; and perhaps all places where there were Jews.

Secondly, that the word απογραφῆς, rendered taxing, should have been rendered enrollment; as a taxation did not always follow such enrollment, though such enrollment was generally the prelude to a taxation. The difficulty of this passage lies in the word πρωτῆ, "first," because there really was a taxation, ten or eleven years afterwards, which, as a decisive mark of subjection to the Roman power, was very mortifying to the Jewish nation. And to this taxation Gamaliel alludes, Acts v. 37, "Judas of Galilee (vide JUDAS GAULONITES) rose up in the days of the taxing," when mobs, and riots, &c. were very frequent, under pretence of liberty.

Dr. Prideaux thought he had found traces of a Roman census, or universal assessment, or enrollment in the second census of Augustus; and that the time occupied in making it, before it came to Judæa, accounts for the difference between the dates when the decree was issued, ante A. D. 8, and the period of its execution, at Jesus's birth, ante A. D. 3, or 4; observing, that a census of the same kind, made by William the Conqueror in England (Domesday Booke), was six years in making. Dr. Lardner, however, objects, that the census of Augustus was of Roman citizens only; whereas this of Luke is not so restricted; but evidently implies Jewish subjects, and of every town.

Justin Martyr, in his first Apology, says to the emperor and senate, "You may [of the birth of Jesus, in Bethlehem] assure yourselves, from the census made in the time of Cyrenius, your first procurator in Judæa;" and this description of Cyrenius, as we shall see, deserves notice. Clement of Alexandria, Origen, and Tertullian, appeal to this census of Cyrenius. The emperor Julian the Apostate says, "The Jesus whom you extol, was one of Cæsar's subjects. If you make a doubt of it, I will prove it, by and by, though it may as well be done now: for you say yourselves, that he was enrolled with his father and mother in the time of Cyrenius." Apud Cyril. lib. vi.

Assisted by this information, we may combine the narrative of St. Luke into the following order; which, probably, is not far from its true import.

In those days, Cæsar Augustus issued a decree, [he being displeased at some parts of Herod's conduct, and meaning he should feel his dependence on the Roman empire] that the whole land of Judæa should be enrolled, as well persons as possessions, in order that the true state of the inhabitants, their families, and their value in property of every kind, might be known and recorded. Accordingly, all were enrolled, but the taxation did not immediately follow this enrollment, because Augustus was again reconciled to Herod (which accounts for Josephus's silence on an assessment not carried into effect). And this enrollment was made when Cyrenius the censor (afterwards better known under the title of Governor Cyrenius) was first sent into Judæa, (Joseph, de Bello Jud. lib. vii. p. 792). [Your first procurator in Judæa, says Justin Martyr, above quoted]; or, more exactly, this was the first assessment [or enrollment] of Cyrenius, governor of Syria. And all went to be enrolled, each to his own city; and as the emperor's order was urgent, and Cyrenius was known to be a man for dispatching business, even Mary, though far advanced in her pregnancy, went with Joseph; [but I rather think Mary had some small landed estate, or houses, perhaps, of inheritance, for which her personal appearance was necessary, to justify its value, under this enrollment] and while they waited for their turn, to be enrolled, Mary was delivered of Jesus; and Jesus was enrolled, with Mary and Joseph, as Julian says expressly, in the quotation given above.

I. We ought, on this subject, to reflect, (1) that the circumstance of an officer being sent from Rome, with an extraordinary commission, to enroll and assess the subjects of a king, implied, most determinately, that such king was dependent on the Roman emperor; and demonstrates beyond denial, in this case, that the sceptre was departed from Judah. (2) Add this occurrence to the alarm of Herod on the enquiry of the Magi respecting the place where the Messiah should be born; for surely Herod was now in a temper, sufficiently exasperated, not merely to slay the infants of Bethlehem, but for cruelties of every kind. (3) After such an occurrence, well might all Jerusalem be alarmed with Herod, (Matt. ii. 3) and the priests, &c. study caution in their answers to him. (4) This occurrence would quicken the attention of all who looked for temporal redemption in Israel, &c. as it could not but be extremely mortifying to every Jewish national feeling. Compare FRAGMENTS, Nos. CXXIII. CCCXXXIV. "On the Departure of the Shebeth from Judah."

II. We see the over-ruling providence of God, which appointed, that, at the time of Christ's birth, there should be a public, authentic, and general production of titles, pedigrees, &c. which, throughout the Jewish nation, and its dependencies, should fix beyond a doubt the descent of Jesus from the house and direct family line of David; and that this should be fixed and admitted judicially, on such a scrutinizing occasion. (2.) This occurrence brought about the birth of the Messiah, at the very place appointed by prophecy, long before; notwithstanding the usual residence of Joseph and Mary was at Nazareth, which is called THEIR OWN CITY (Luke ii. 39) i. e. where Joseph's property was settled, and his connections in business, &c. were formed.

III. Among so much confusion, and such heart-burning as this enrollment must of necessity occasion, the slaughter of the infants might be passed over without much noise. Query, Did Herod represent publicly (whatever he knew privately) that Bethlehem was a turbulent disaffected place, and must be punished for disloyalty, &c. &c. shown by it on occasion of this enrollment? See the PLATES, MEDALS of ANTIOCH, No. 13.

CYRUS, כורש; as miserable; from the adverb כי, as, and כרש jarash, miserable, or heir; otherwise, belly; from כרש kereesh. This is a Persian name, whose etymology cannot be derived from the Hebrew. We are assured, that in Persian, the word coresah signifies the sun. Ctesias, Plut. in Artaxerx. & alii.

CYRUS, son of Cambyses, the Persian, and of Mandane, daughter of Astyages, king of the Medes. Astyages dreamed (says Justin, lib. i. Herodotus, lib. i. cap. 107) that a vine issued from his daughter's womb, whose branches covered all Asia. The soothsayers told him, that this signified the future power and greatness of a child who should be born of his daughter; and and that the same child should deprive him of his kingdom. Astyages, to prevent the effects of this prediction, instead of marrying his daughter to some powerful prince, gave her to Cambyzes, a person of mean condition. Moreover, so soon as he understood that his daughter was pregnant, he commanded Harpagus, one of his officers, to kill the infant the moment it was born. Harpagus, fearing the resentment of Mandane, preserved the child, and gave it to the king's chief shepherd, to be exposed to wild beasts. This man's wife, touched with the beauty of young Cyrus, persuaded her husband to preserve the infant prince, and thus Cyrus was brought up among the king's shepherds.

One day as the young shepherds were playing together, Cyrus was chosen king, and having treated with too much authority one of his little play-fellows, the child's parents complained to Astyages. This prince sent for Cyrus, and seeing him, observed something great in his air, and some features of his daughter Mandane. After particular enquiry into the matter, he discovered, that in reality he was his grandson. Harpagus, who had preserved him, was punished with the death of his own son; and Astyages concluded, that the royalty which the sooth-sayers had promised to young Cyrus, was that which he had lately exercised among the shepherds' children. When Cyrus, was grown up, Harpagus discovered to him the secret of his birth: encouraged him to come into Media, and promised him forces, in order to depose Astyages. Cyrus engaged the Persians to take arms against the Medes, marched at their head against Astyages, defeated him, and possessed himself of Media. After many other wars, he sat down before Babylon, and took it, after a long siege. This is a summary account of Cyrus, from Herodotus and Justin: but, the learned own, that this recital is so blended with fables, that it is very hard to distinguish truth from falsehood.

Xenophon has given us a very different history of Cyrus: but there is no more certainty in this history of Xenophon, according to the judgment of several critics, than in those of Herodotus, Ctesias, and Trogus.

[It is possible that these different histories may refer to different persons, though of the same name: which might originally occasion a confusion among the native historians; and this confusion has been greatly augmented by the misunderstanding of foreigners, the Greeks, through whom we have received our information on these points of history.]

Xenophon says, Astyages married his daughter Mandane to Cambyzes, king of Persia, son to Achæmenes, king of that nation. Cyrus was born in the king his father's court, and was educated with every care. When he was about twelve years old, his grandfather Astyages sent for him to court, with his mother Mandane. Some time after, the king of Assyria's son invading Media, Astyages, with his son Cyaxares and his grandson Cyrus, marched against him. Cyrus distinguished himself in this war, and defeated the Assyrians. Cambyzes afterwards recalled him that he might have him near his own person; and Astyages dying, his son Cyaxares, uncle by the mother's side to Cyrus, succeeded him in the kingdom of Media.

Cyrus, at the age of thirty, was made general of the Persian troops, by his father Cambyzes, and was sent, at the head of 30,000 men, to assist his uncle Cyaxares, whom the king of Babylon, with his allies, were preparing to attack: Cyaxares and Cyrus prevented them, attacked them, and dispersed them.

After this, Cyrus carried the war into the countries beyond the river Halys, subdued Cappadocia, marched against Croesus, king of Lydia, beat him, and besieged him in Sardis, his capital; after fourteen days, Croesus was obliged to surrender.

Cyrus, having reduced almost all Asia, re-passed the Euphrates, and made war against the Assyrians; he marched to Babylon, and laid siege to that city, which the inhabitants were little concerned at, because Babylon was a place of great strength, and stored with provisions for twenty years. Cyrus encompassed the whole city with a ditch, and towers and redoubts; but after lying long before it, observing no progress made in the siege, he drained the Euphrates in many places, directing its waters into large marshes, near Babylon: so that the river being much diminished, Cyrus entered by night into the city with his army, through the gates which were inlets for the water. Thus Babylon was taken without much trouble.

Cyrus prepared a palace there for his uncle Cyaxares, and returned to his father and mother in Persia; some time after, he married his cousin, the only daughter and heiress of Cyaxares's dominions, and went with her to Babylon; he engaged again in several wars, and subdued all the nations between Syria and the Red Sea.

He died at seventy years of age, after a reign of thirty years. Authors differ concerning his death. Herodotus, lib. i. cap. 224; Justin, lib. i. cap. 8; and Valerius Maximus, lib. ix. cap. 10; relate, that he died in war against the Scythians; that falling into an ambush which the Scythian queen Thomyris had laid for him, she ordered his head to be cut off, and cast into a vessel full of blood, with this expression: "Thou that hast always thirsted after human blood, now glut thyself with it." Diodorus Siculus (lib. ii.) says, that he was taken in an engagement, and hanged. Ctesias says, that he died of a wound received in his thigh. John Malala, of Antioch, cites a spurious piece of Pythagoras the Samian, which declares, that he was killed in fight with the people of Samos. In Xenophon's account, he is said to die peaceably on his bed, amidst his friends and servants. This is certain, that in Alexander's time, his monument was shown at Pasargarda in Persia, as is witnessed by Plutarch, Quintus Curtius, Arrian, and, lastly, by Aristobulus, an eye-witness, cited in Strabo.

It seems, then, that we are but imperfectly acquainted with the history of this great prince, the founder of the Persian, and destroyer of the Chaldæan empire. We learn few particulars respecting him from Scripture; but they are more certain than any others. Daniel, in the famous vision (chap. viii. 3, 20) wherein God showed him the ruin of several great empires, which preceded the birth of the Messiah, represents Cyrus as "a ram which had two horns, both high, but one rose higher than the other, and the higher came up last. This ram pushed westward, and northward, and southward, so that no beasts might stand before him, neither was there any that could deliver out of his hand; but he did according to his will, and became great;"—the two horns signify the two empires which Cyrus united in his person: that of the Medes, and that of the Persians. See the PLATES, COINS OF PERSIA. In another place, Daniel compares Cyrus to a bear, with three ribs in its mouth, to which it was said, "Arise, devour much flesh."

Cyrus succeeded Cambyses in the kingdom of Persia, and Darius the Mede (by Xenophon called Cyaxares, and Astyages in the Greek of Daniel, xiii. 65,) also in the kingdom of the Medes, and the empire of Babylon. He was monarch, as he speaks, of all the world (Ezra, i. 1, 2; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 22, 23) when he permitted the Jews to return into their own country, A. M. 3466, ante A. D. 538. He always had a particular regard for Daniel, and kept him in his great employments.

The prophets foretold the coming of Cyrus: Isaiah, xlv. 28, particularly declares his name, above a century before he was born. Josephus says, (Antiq. lib. ii. cap. 2) that the Jews of Babylon showed this passage to Cyrus; and that, in the edict which he granted for their return, Cyrus acknowledged, that he received the empire of the world from the God of Israel; and the same God had described him by name, in the writings of the prophets; and foretold that he should build a temple to him at Jerusalem.

Cyrus was a Persian by his father, Cambyses, and a Mede by his mother, Mandane: for which reason, in an oracle, cited by Herodotus (lib. i. cap. 33, 91) he is called a mule: "Be afraid," said the oracle to Croesus, "when the Medes shall be commanded by a mule." And Nebuchadnezzar, some time before his death, said to the Babylonians, "I foretell a misfortune, which none of your gods will be able to avert: a Persian mule shall come against you, who, with the help of their gods, shall bring you into bondage." Megasthenes, apud Euseb. Præpar. lib. ix. cap. 41. It seems as if Isaiah intended to describe the same thing, when foretelling Cyrus's march against Babylon, he says, that he saw a man riding in a chariot, drawn by a camel and an ass, Isaiah, xxi. 7, 9. See the PLATES, CHARIOTS, &c.

The taking of Babylon, by Cyrus, is clearly told in the prophets, 1 Chron. xiii. xiv. xxi. xli. xlii. xlv.; Jeremiah, i. li.; Dan. vii. viii. We fix the birth of Cyrus to A. M. 3405.

The eastern people call Cyrus, Kiresch; and say, one of his wives was a Jewess, whence they account for his favour to the Jews. D'Herbelot, Bib. Orient. p. 170 & 1008.

DABBASHETH, דבש, flowing with honey; from דבש, dabash: otherwise, causing infamy from דבבא, dibbah, infamy, ill reputation, and שוה, skuth to impose, to put. A town of Zebulun, Josh. xix. 2.

[Simon refers this to the hunch of a camel, and supposes that it denotes a town situated in a place (or on a hill) called "camel's hump." This is possible, no doubt; but the derivation from honey seems at least equally appropriate.

N. B. This is to be understood of vegetable honey, made, or dropping from, the palin tree; not of that made by bees; as appears from those places, where we read that the Israelites brought the first fruits of honey; 2 Chron. xxxi. 5: whereas the honey of bees was not allowed to be offered as first fruits, or as tythes. I suppose that this word Dabesh imports a bunch, whether of dates, or the bunch (more properly, perhaps, in English, hunch) of a camel: and this is taken from the form of these subjects respectively.]

DABERATH, דברת, Δαβραθ, word, thing; from דבר debir; otherwise, a bee, or submissive and obedient; from דברה diberah, or Deborah, [called Dobreth, 1 Chron. vi. 57.

Perhaps, a leader, (a female leader, Syriac) or guide: or, rather, the thing led, or drawn; whence some have thought it might denote that kind of go-cart which is appended to the rump of a sheep of that species which has large and unwieldy tails: and consequently is drawn after the animal. This name appears to be related to Dabir, or Debir, which see.]

DABERATH, Joshua (xix. 12) mentions Daberath, a town of Zebulun, or on its borders, but (see chap. xxi. 28) in the tribe of Issachar; which tribe ceded this town to the Levites. Josephus (de Bello, lib. ii. cap. 26. & de vita sua) calls it Dabaritta, or Darabitta, in the great plain at the extremity of Galilee and Samaria; perhaps it is Dabira, which St. Jerome places toward mount Tabor, in the district of Diocæsarea. Maudrel speaks of Debora at the foot of Mount Tabor.

DAGON, דגון, corn, or a fish; from דג dag, a fish.

DAGON, god of the Philistines. It is our opinion that Dagon was represented like a woman, with the lower parts of a fish, like a Triton or Syren. The Magnum Etymologicum says, that Dagon was Saturn; others say, he was Jupiter, others say Venus, whom the Egyptians worshipped under the form of a fish; because in Typhon's war against the gods, Venus concealed herself under this shape. Ovid, Met. lib. v. fab. 5. Diodorus Siculus says, (lib. ii.) that at Askelon the goddess Derecto, or Atergatis, was worshipped under the figure of a woman, with the lower parts of a fish: and Lucian, de Dea Syr. describes that goddess, or Venus, as being adored under this form.

There is an ancient fable, says an eminent author, that Ωάνης, Oannes, a creature half man and half fish, rose out of the Red Sea, and came to Babylon; where he taught men several arts, and then returned again to the sea. Apollodorus reports, that four such Oannes, in several ages, had arisen out of the Red Sea, and that the name of one of them was Ωδάκων, Odacon: whence the learned Selden derives Dagon: whom see at large on this matter, De Syris, Syntag. ii. cap. 3. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CLX. with the Dissertation wherein this question is further treated on; and the PLATES.

Scripture shews pretty clearly, that the statue of Dagon was human, at least the upper part of it, 1 Sam. v. 4, 5. A temple of Dagon at Gaza was pulled down by Samson, Judg. xvi. 23, & seq. In another at Azoth the Philistines deposited the ark of God, 1 Sam. v. 1, 2, 3. A city in Judah was called Beth-Dagon, i. e. the house [or temple] of Dagon, Josh. xv. 41. and another on the frontiers of Asher, Josh. xix. 27. Eusebius speaks of a town called Caphar Dagon, the Field of Dagon, between Jamnia and Diospolis. Philo-Biblius in his translation of Sanchoniathon, apud Euseb. Præpar. Evan. lib. i. says, that Dagon means Siton, the god of wheat. Dagon does indeed signify wheat, in the Hebrew; but, who is this god of wheat? probably Ceres, the goddess of plenty; the Hebrews have no feminine names to signify goddesses: and Elian informs us, that among the name of Ceres, Sito was one. Ceres was "the goddess of wheat," in her character of the inventress and protectress of agriculture.

W

We find her likewise delineated with fish around her on some medals, as those of Syracuse. See Montfaucon's Antiquité expliquée. tom. i. tab. xlv. In Philo Biblius, Dagon is brother to Saturn, as in Greek authors Ceres is sister to Saturn. Ceres submitted to the embraces of her brother, according to the Greeks; Atergatis is sister to Saturn, according to Philo Biblius.

Lastly, Ceres is sometimes described with the attributes of Isis, the goddess of fertility among the Egyptians. Berosus, speaking of Oannes, says, he had the body and head of a fish; and above the head of the fish he had a human head, and below the tail of the fish, he had human feet. This, say they, is the true figure of Dagon; who had different names in different countries. An Egyptian medal represents half the body of a woman with a Cornucopia in her hands, the tail of a fish bent behind, and feet like those of a crocodile, or a sea calf. Vaillant, Appendic. hist. Ptolemaeorum. The Rabbins speak only by conjecture on this subject and figure.

There was a very deep pond near Askelon filled with fish, consecrated to Derceto, from which the inhabitants of the town abstained, through superstitious belief that Venus having cast herself into this pond, was there metamorphosed into a fish. Diodor. Sic. Bibl. lib. ii.

Salmasius, in Solinus, is of opinion, that Dagon is the same as Ceto, a great fish. Ceto the sea-monster, to which Andromeda was exposed at Joppa, and Derceto the goddess of the Askelonites, are the same deity. Selden, de Diis, Syntagm. ii. cap. 3. thinks Atergatis to be the same as Dagon, and derived from the Hebrew Adir-Dagan, "magnificent fish." Diana, the Persian, or Venus, was, they say, changed into a fish by throwing herself into the waters of Babylon, as Manilius says, Cum Babylonias submersa profugit in undas.

DAGON, Dog, or Docus, a fortress in the plain of Jericho, where Ptolemy, son of Abubus, dwelt, and where he treacherously killed his father-in-law Simon Maccabæus, with Mattathias and Judas his two sons, 1 Macc. xvi. 11. John Hircanus, son of Simon, besieged Ptolemy his brother-in-law in Dagon; but Josephus (Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 15.) relates, that when Hircanus assaulted the fortress, Ptolemy placed his mother and two brothers on the walls, and ordered them to be scourged cruelly; threatening to put them to death, if he continued his attack. His compassion for his mother's sufferings prolonged the siege; and the sabbatical year coming on, Hircanus was obliged to raise it. Ptolemy fled to Zeno, tyrant of Philadelphia, having first slain the mother and two brothers of Hircanus. This seems to contradict the Maccabees, which declares, that Ptolemy murdered Mattathias and Judas, with their father Simon, in the room of entertainment, where they supped.

DALETH ד, the fourth letter in the Hebrew alphabet, from which the Greek Δ delta is derived.

DALMANUTHA, Δαλμανυθα, a bucket; from דלי dali, a bucket; or, exhaustion, leanness, branch.

DALMANUTHA. St. Mark says, chap. viii. 10, that Jesus Christ came to Dalmanutha. St. Matthew says, chap. xv. 39, that our Saviour went to Mageda, and many MSS. of Mark read thus: but the Greek of St. Matthew is Magdala. The Syriac, Arabic, and several old Greek copies, read Magdan. The question is where Magedan and Dalmanutha were situated? Brocard (Descriptio Terræ Sanctæ) thought Magedan or Medan was a source of the Jordan called Dan, at the foot of Mount Libanus. About the lake Phiala, which is the true source of the Jordan, great numbers of Saracens, Arabians, and Parthians, kept a fair, and dwelt there, invited by the beauty of the situation, and the conveniency of trade: for which reason it was called Medan; in Arabic, the fair. Vide Reland, Palæst. tom. i. cap. 41. Hegesippus, p. 108, calls this place Melda or Meldan, which he interprets the fair, or market. Of Meldan may be made Delmana, or Delmanata, or Delmanutha. Thus Medan, Magedan, Delmana, and Delmanutha, will be the same: Eusebius and St. Jerom place Magedan about Gerasa, beyond Jordan, saying, this district was called Magedene. Cellarius and Lightfoot prefer reading Magdala instead of Magedan: placing Magdala in the neighbourhood of Gadara and Tiberias, east of the lake Genezareth; and supposing Dalmanutha to be near the city of Magdala. Since what we have found relating to Medan, or the fair held near Phiala, we prefer the opinion which places Dalmanutha in that situation.

DALMATIA, Δαλματια, deceitful lamps, or vain brightness; from δαλός, a lamp, &c. and ματαια, vain. Part of Illyria, on the Gulf of Venice, to which Titus went. 2 Tim. iv. 10.

DALPHON, דלפון; a drip, or water that falls from a house-top; from דלף dalaph: he that regards the poor; from דלף dalal, poor, afflicted, and פנה panah, to behold, or regard. Arabic, active. Son of Haman, Esth. ix. 7.

DAMA, דמה, Heb. tezebi, an antelope, or gazelle. DAMARIS, Δάμαρις, little woman; from δάμαρ.

DAMARIS has been thought by some to be of Damascus are modern, except those where St. Paul was let down in a basket: those, he says, are the same which were there anciently, and much stronger than the others.—The external appearance of the houses in Damascus is mean; the internal is magnificent.—There are many covered markets, built of hewn stone, and well vaulted, with openings from space to space.—The footways in the streets are raised. Many Khans for lodging merchants and travellers.—The Straight Street is at present a covered Bazar, Exchange, or Market. The fountain of St. Paul adjoins a great pillar, called The Ancient Column. They say that the keeper of the gate of Damascus, in the time of St. Paul, was a Christian, and his friend; and shewed the window from whence he might escape. His tomb is opposite to this window, now walled up. He was, it is said, martyred; and the Christians maintain a lamp always burning at his tomb.

The village called Cocab is at the extremity of the plain on the road to Jerusalem. It is very agreeably situated between two little hills.

About two leagues from Damascus, towards Baalbeck, is a district extraordinary dry: no dew ever falls upon it: yet it yields grapes large and sweet, and capable of being preserved a long time, as they contain but little moisture. Comp. 2 Sam. i. 21.

Damascus is one of the most commercial cities in the Ottoman Empire, and has many rich manufactures. The inhabitants are witty, cunning, and sharpers; they are, however, polite, and less oppressed by the Pacha than many others. The Christians are mostly of the Greek Church; with a few Maronites, and formerly a few Europeans, when the residence of the French Consul was established here.

Mocquet says, Damascus is five days' journey from Jerusalem. He says that a caravan of pilgrims goes yearly from Damascus to visit the mosque of Solomon at Jerusalem: that it sometimes amounts to five or six thousand people: and that he accompanied one of these.

Volney gives the following account of this city. "Damascus is the capital, and residence of the Pacha; the Arabs call it El Shams, agreeable to their custom of bestowing the name of the country on its capital. The ancient oriental name of Dameshk is known only to geographers. This city is situated in a vast plain, open to the south and east, and shut in, towards the west and north, by mountains which render the territory of Damascus the best watered and most delicious province of all Syria: the Arabs speak of it with enthusiasm, and think they can never sufficiently extol the freshness and verdure of its fruits, its numerous streams, and the clearness of its rills and fountains. This is also the only part of Syria where there are detached pleasure houses in the open country. The natives must set a higher value on these advantages, as they are the more rare in the adjacent provinces. In other respects the soil is poor, generally, and of a reddish colour, and ill adapted for corn; but is, on that account, more suitable to fruits, which are there excellently flavoured. No city contains so many canals and fountains; each house has one; and all these waters are furnished by three rivulets, or branches of the same river, which, after fertilizing the gardens for a course of three leagues, flow into a hollow of the desert to the south-east, where they form a morass, called Behairat-el-Mardj, or The Lake of the Meadow.—With such a situation, it cannot be disputed that Damascus is one of the most agreeable cities in Turkey; but it is still deficient in point of salubrity: the inhabitants complain, with reason, that the white waters of the Barrada are cold and hard; and it is observed that the natives are subject to obstructions; that the whiteness of their skin is rather the paleness of sickness than the colour of health; and that the too great use of fruits, particularly of apricots, occasions there, every summer and autumn, intermittent fevers and dysenteries."

Damascus was, as we have seen, highly complimented by Julian. It was a metropolis and a colony; it is so called on the medals of Gordian and Philip; and it appears that the latter gave his veteran soldiers establishments in this city and its neighbourhood. The legion stationed here was one of the legions called Ferrata: the other was in Britain. Dio. lib. v. p. 560.

The female stag, being called in Greek dama, some of the ancients supposed that Damascus took its name from this animal; and on its coins we have a child sucking a dama; as it is said Romulus and Remus were suckled by a she wolf. Others have said that Damascus was named after a giant called Ascus: and others have referred it to a king named Damascus; at the tomb of whose wife Arathis, the Syrians worshipped, as at a temple. These derivations are of no further use than to shew that no dependance can be placed on Grecian etymology, on a subject which refers to an oriental language. Josephus says that Uz was its builder.

Damascus is described by Strabo, lib. xvi. p. 756, as a very considerable city, and the most noble of those which are on the confines of the Persian territories.

Damascus, though described as a metropolis on its medals, yet was not a metropolis in the ecclesiastical sense; but was a bishopric under Emesa, which was the metropolitan see.

Damascus, being situated under Mount Hermon, received a stream or streams from thence. I think this is included in the exclamation of Naaman, 2 Kings, iv. 12. "Are not Amana and Pharphar, waters of Damascus, which issue from the north side of Mount Hermon, as good as the water of the Jordan, which issues from the south side of that mountain, and which is considered by the Jewish doctors as unfit for cleansing?" Vide Amana. We have seen, under the article ABILENE, that the river Chrysorrhoas flowed in that district. Strabo says that it was wholly consumed in those small canals which water the gardens. Mr. Maundrell says the same of the waters of the Barrady, which appear to issue further north, and to run with an eastern course into Damascus. I would query, Whether the two streams, one running from the south, the other from the west, were not the Abana and Pharphar of Naaman? Mr. Maundrell, indeed, informs us, that he saw but one stream: yet another might exist in the way to Judea, without his knowledge of it, as he entered the district by another route. Benjamin of Tudela, in his Itinerary, p. 96, 97, mentions two rivers: but he says, that they both flowed from Mount Hermon; and that Amana continued its course in the midst of the city: whence it was conveyed by pipes to all the great houses, gardens, &c.

Damascus was, by the kings of Syria, surrounded with three walls; whence the inhabitants, in the pride of their hearts, boasted, that it was impregnable. Tiglath-Pileser took Damascus, and carried its inhabitants captive to Kir, 2 Kings xvi. Nebuchadnezzar ruined this city, five years after the destruction of Jerusalem. Parmenio, general of Alexander the Great, found here immense treasures, after the defeat of Darius; with many captives of high quality: he was invited by the Persian governor to seize the city.

Pompey, when warring in Armenia against Tigranes, sent Metellus and Lollius to seize Damascus; which from that time was united to the Roman dominions, and became a government. The Saracens conquered it, A. D. 713, and miserably devastated it. In 1147 it was besieged by the Crusaders; but escaped being taken, by reason of discords which broke out in the Christian camp. It was, however, obliged to yield to the Christian forces, 125 years afterwards. Tamerlane, in 1396, besieged it with an immense army; some say, a million of men. After a desperate and prolonged resistance, it fell into his power; and, irritated at its obstinate defence, he desolated it without mercy. Sultan Selim took it, A. D. 1517, under whose successors, the Ottoman emperors, it still continues.

The principal mention of Damascus in Gospel times, is in the History of St. Paul; who narrowly escaped being seized by the governor of this city, under Aretas the king.

Aretas was a name common to many of the Kings of Damascus; at least from the second century before Christ; and it appears to have been retained by them after that period. The following are the principal occasions, and times, of these princes being mentioned in history:

Ante A. D.

170. Aretas, King of Arabia, in the reign of Antiochus IV. King of Syria, 2 Macc. v. 8.

99. The inhabitants of Gaza, having rebelled against Alexander Jannæus, sovereign of Judea, Aretas, a minor King of Arabia, under pretence of assisting him, did him more harm than good. Joseph. Ant. lib. xiii. cap. 13.

84. The inhabitants of Damascus, becoming weary of the government of the King of Syria, delivered their own city, and Cœle Syria, to Aretas, King of Arabia. Joseph. Ant. lib. xiii. cap. 15.

64. Damascus was taken from Aretas, the King, by Metellus and Lollius. Aretas, whose proper name was Obodas, was vanquished by Emilius Scaurus, whom Pompey had sent into these parts, and obliged to sue for peace. From the same Scaurus, Bacchius Judæus, a chief in the vicinity of Arabia, also solicited peace.

A. D. cir. 33. Aretas the King is mentioned by St. Paul; Acts ix. 25. 2 Cor. xi. 33.

It will be observed, that Aretas, being King of Arabia, and, at the same time, of Damascus, we are led to look for that Arabia to which St. Paul retired from Damascus, as a district not far from this city. Perhaps it might be so near it, that preaching in this Arabia, might be almost equivalent to preaching in Damascus.]

DAMMIM, דַּמִּיִּם, or Ephes-dammim, which is of blood, or bloody; from דָּם dam: otherwise, that keeps silence; from דָּמָה dum.

[DAMNATION. This word is used among us in a theological sense, to express a total loss of the soul; or a state of suffering under spiritual punishment: but this is not its proper import in all places where it occurs in Scripture; and the use of this word is in some passages of our translation extremely unfortunate. We read, John v. 29, of the "resurrection to damnation." Mark iii. 29, of "eternal damnation." Matt. xxiii. 33, of "the damnation of hell." In these instances the stronger sense of the word is exacted by the import and tenor of the context: but Matt. xxiii. 14, we read of the "greater damnation," which evidently implies a lesser damnation: and Rom. xiii. 2, "Whosoever resisteth . . . shall receive damnation"—read condemnation. 1 Cor. xi. 19, "He who eateth and drinketh . . . in receiving the holy sacrament unworthily, eateth and drinketh damnation"—read condemnation, or judgment; this conduct is highly reprehensible, and shall issue in his personal correction. 1 Tim. v. 12, "Younger widows will marry: having damnation"—read condemnation, or judgment, because they cast off their first faith. Rom. xiv. 23, "He that doubteth is damned"—read self-condemned, if he eat" flesh, or any thing else which may offend a weak brother:—but eternal damnation cannot be the penalty of doing an action, which is lawful in itself, though it may offend an un instructed fellow Christian; who, in fact, has no right to be offended, but who rather should seek instruction, and practice that charity, which one Christian should should bear to another; in respect to his sentiments, his words, and his actions.]

DAN, דַּן, judgment, or the judge; from דָּן dajan, or דִּן dun, to judge.

DAN, fifth son of Jacob, being his eldest by Bilhah, Rachel's handmaid, Gen. xxx. 4, 5, 6.

Dan had but one son, named Hushim, Gen. xlv. 23, notwithstanding which, when the Israelites came out of Egypt, this tribe contained 62,700 men, Numb. i. 38. Jacob blessed Dan in these words: (Gen. xlix. 16, 17.) Dan shall judge his people as one of the tribes of Israel. Dan shall be a serpent by the way, an adder in the path, that biteth the horse's heels, so that his rider shall fall backward: meaning, that though this tribe was not the most powerful, or the most celebrated in Israel, it would, notwithstanding, produce one, who should be the prince of his people; which prediction was accomplished in Samson, who was of Dan.

The tribe of Dan possessed a very fat and fertile soil, between the tribe of Judah east, and the country of the Philistines west: but the limits of their land were narrow, because it was only part of the territories of Judah divided from the rest. For their success in enlarging their territories, see Judges, xviii.

DAN, a town at the northern extremity of Israel, in the tribe of Naphtali. "From Dan to Beersheba," denotes the two extremities of the land of promise. Dan was the northern city, and Beersheba was the southern. Dan was seated at the foot of Mount Libanus, on the spring of Dan, or Jordan. Several authors have thought, that the river Jordan took its name from the Hebrew, Jor, a spring, and Dan, a town near its source. Euseb. in Δαν & Βηθσαμυ. Hieronym. in Ezek. xlviii. Philostorg. hist. lib. vii. cap. 3. xliii. See JORDAN. Dan lay four miles from Paneas, towards Tyre. Some have confounded it with Paneas, because Dan was near that city. Jeroboam, son of Nebat, set up one of his golden calves in Dan. 1 Kings, xii. 29.

[1. A place, Gen. xiv. 14.

2. A city, in the valley of Beth Rehob, not far from the towns of Gilgal and Masaloth.

3. A region in the tribe of Asher; acquired by the Danites. Josh. xix. 47. Judg. xviii. 29. Vide LAISH, and CÆSAREA PHILIPPI.

4. Dan-Jaan. 2 Sam. xxiv. 6.

Probably this name Dan should be understood to import "the director," or determinator; or a thing that is directed, determined, or assigned to any one; which, in the case of judgment, is, till justice be satisfied or fulfilled: and possibly to complete, or to fulfil, may be the import of Dan in some places; as some think it signifies a vase, or cup; and therefore is analogous to Phiala; which was the name given, says Josephus, to the lake in the grotto, whence issued the fountains, whose streams contributed to form the Jordan. Vide DANNAH.

Dan-Jaan, Simon thinks, derives its name from a man named Jaan. Vide 2 Chron. v. 12.

I suspect some relation between this Jaan and Ijon, mentioned with Dan, 1 Kings xv. 20.]

DANIEL, דַּנְיֵאל, judgment of God; from dan, and אֵל el, God: or God is my judge.

DANIEL, a prophet, descended from the royal family of David; he was carried captive to Babylon, when very young, in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, king of Judah, A. M. 3398, ante A. D. 606. He was chosen with his three companions, Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah, to continue in Nebuchadnezzar's court; and he received a suitable education, making great progress in all the sciences of the Chaldeans, but declining to pollute himself, by eating provisions from the king's table.

If we may believe the Apocrypha, the first occasion on which Daniel discovered his wisdom, was the deliverance of Susanna, Dan. xiii. Apoc. See SUSANNA. Not long after, Nebuchadnezzar having dreamed of a large statue, composed of several metals, which was beat to pieces by a stone, believing this dream to be prophetic, he was very solicitous to have it explained; but having lost the recollection of it, he insisted that the Magi should not only interpret, but should recall it; this being impossible, they were condemned to death. Daniel recovered and explained the dream; and was thereupon established governor of the province of Babylon, and chief of the Magi.

Another time, Nebuchadnezzar having dreamed of a large tree, cut down, yet so that its root remained in the earth, Daniel explained it of the king himself, whose fate it prefigured.

Nebuchadnezzar was succeeded by Evilmerodach, in whose reign Daniel maintained his credit.

Belshazzar succeeded Evilmerodach. In the reign of this prince Daniel had a vision of four beasts, which represented the four great empires of—the Chaldeans—the Persians—the Greeks—and the Romans, or rather, the Seleucidæ and Lagidæ. Dan. vii. He foresaw also the persecutions of the Jews under Antiochus Epiphanes; the vengeance of God upon him; and the victories of the Maccabees. In the following chapter, Daniel saw in vision a ram and a he-goat—the ram denoted Darius Codomannus, the last king of Persia—and the he-goat denoted Alexander the Great) the ram was overcome; and the he-goat became irresistibly powerful. The prophet describes also the successors of Alexander.

Belshazzar being killed, that very night wherein he had profaned the sacred vessels of God's temple, Darius the Mede, his great-uncle by the mother's side, succeeded him. Dan. v. A. M. 3445, ante A. D. 559. This prince promoted Daniel above all his governors, and designed to give him the general administration of his kingdom; this state of favour exciting envy in the grandees, they engaged the king to issue an edict, forbidding every man, during a time, to solicit any thing from God or man, except from the king. Nevertheless, Daniel continued his prayers to God regularly three times a day, setting his face towards Jerusalem; his enemies, glad of this disobedience, informed the king; who was obliged to order him to be thrown into the lions' den. The next day early, Darius went thither, and finding Daniel safe, commanded him to be taken out; and his accusers, with their wives and families, to be thrown to the lions.

Daniel having read in Jeremiah, that seventy years would be accomplished in the desolation of Jerusalem, he prayed and fasted, to receive the explanation of this period of time: after his devotion, the angel Gabriel appeared to him, and revealed something of much greater importance, even the death and sacrifice of the Messiah; which was to happen after seventy weeks of years.

In the third year of Cyrus's reign in Persia, which coincides with the first year of Darius at Babylon, Daniel had another remarkable vision, wherein the angel Gabriel discovered to him in a manner almost as clear as if he had related a history, what was to happen in Persia, after Cyrus: A. M. 3448, ante A. D. 556. Dan. x.—

viz. The coming of Alexander the Great, the overthrow of the Persian empire, the Greek dominion in Asia, the continued wars between the kingdoms of Syria and Egypt, the persecutions by Antiochus Epiphanes, the destruction of that persecuting prince, and the victory and happiness of the saints.

After the death of Darius the Mede, Cyrus ascended the throne of the Persians and Medes: and Daniel continued to enjoy great authority.

The reputation of Daniel was so great, even in his life-time, that it became a proverb: Thou art wiser than Daniel, says Ezekiel, chap. xxviii. 3, ironically to the king of Tyre; and in chap. xiv. 14, 20. God says, Though these three men, Noah, Daniel, and Job were in it, they should deliver but their own souls by their righteousness. Josephus tells us, Antiq. lib. x. cap. 12, that God bestowed many favours on Daniel, and advanced him to the rank of the most considerable prophets. He enjoyed the good graces of the princes whom he served, with the affection of the people, to his death; and his reputation was immortal. Formerly, some of the Jews shewed an inclination to exclude Daniel from among the prophets; but their dislike to this prophet proceeded from hence, only, viz. that his predictions were too clear and too express for Jesus Christ, and that he fixes the time of his coming too precisely.

It is believed that Daniel died in Chaldæa, being probably detained there by his great employments in the Persian empire. Epiphanus says he died at Babylon; and this sentiment is followed by the generality of historians. Others think he died at Shushan, or Susa. Benjamin of Tudela relates, that his monument was shewn at Chuzestan, which is the ancient Susa. Josephus says, Antiq. lib. x. cap. ult. that in his time there was at Ecbatane, the capital of Media, a tower of admirable structure, said to have been built by Daniel. (Vide BARIS.) The kings of Persia and Media were buried in it, and the guard of it was committed to a priest of Jewish extraction.

Among Daniel's writings, some have at all times been esteemed canonical; others have been contested. Whatever is written in Hebrew, or Chaldee, (for some parts of his works are in Chaldee mixed with Hebrew) is generally acknowledged as canonical both by Jews and Christians. But there has been constant opposition to those parts which are extant in Greek only. In St. Jerom's time, the Jews were divided; some admitted the whole history of Susanna, others rejected it; some received one part, and rejected another. Josephus has said nothing concerning the story of Susanna, nor that of Bel and the Dragon.

The

The first twelve chapters of Daniel are written partly in Hebrew, partly in Chaldee; the Apocryphal Daniel is in Greek. He writes Hebrew, where he delivers a simple narrative; but he relates in Chaldee, his conversations with the Magi, also Nebuchadnezzar's edict, published after Daniel had interpreted his dream of the golden image. This shews the extreme accuracy of this prophet, who relates the very words of those persons whom he introduces as speaking. The Greek which we have of Daniel, is Theodotion's; that of the LXX. has been long lost. Vide Hieronym. Præfat. in Dan.

Porphyry pretended, that the prophecies which we receive as Daniel's were falsely ascribed to him. That celebrated enemy of our religion observed so much clearness in these prophecies, that he insisted on considering them as histories of past events. But, that Daniel lived at Bâbylon long before Antiochus Epiphanes, and there wrote the prophecies which go under his name, cannot reasonably be contested.

The Rabbins, who are out of humour with Daniel, because his prophecies are too evident proofs that Jesus Christ is the Messiah, and that the time of his coming, who is the desire of all nations, is passed; maintain, that Daniel ought not to be ranked among the prophets for two reasons; first, because he did not live in the Holy Land, out of which the spirit of prophecy, say they, does not reside: secondly, because he spent his life in a court, in honour and pleasure; very differently from the customary modes of life of the other prophets. Some add, that he was, personally, a eunuch, for which opinion they quote the words of Isaiah to Hezekiah: 2 Kings xx. 18. And of thy sons, shall they take away, and they shall be eunuchs, in the palace of the king of Babylon. Now the law excludes eunuchs from the congregation of the Lord, Deut. xxiii. 1.

Abenezra, and most of the Rabbins, clear him from this last defect, but the others remain; and many of them place his writings among the Hagiographa, as of much less authority than the canonical scriptures. They add another spiteful remark against this prophet: that while Shadrach, Meshech, and Abednego, resisted the impious orders of the king of Babylon, and were thrown into the fiery furnace, Daniel went into Egypt; what to do? to look for hogs, which he conveyed by stealth out of the country, [i. e. he might conduct an Egyptian caravan of Gentiles; by the Rabbins called hogs:—or, he might be employed in the service of his prince, in that, or in some other very distant province of his empire.]

Some have believed that Daniel accompanied Ezra into Judæa; and the eastern people declare, that he was sent back thither by Bahaman, son of Asfendias, king of Persia. They add, that he returned to Persia, and died at Susa.

Others are of opinion, that he dwelt at Babylon or Susa, and never returned to Judæa: his great age, his employments, and the necessity of his protection to his brethren in their captivity, might probably excuse him: a very great proportion of the Jewish nation did not think it convenient to leave Chaldæa, where they had long lived in repose.

II. DANIEL, son of David and Abigail,—1 Chron. iii. 1. See ABIGAIL.

III. DANIEL, of Ithamar's family, returned from Babylon, Ezra viii. 2.

DANNAH, דַּנְיָהּ, Penna, judgment, or the judge; from dan. The LXX. read Renna, רַנָּה. A town in Judah, Josh. xv. 49.

[Simon thinks this is derived from the Arabic and Ethiopic root, to be depressed, to bow down. It is possible this town might lie in what we call a bottom. If it lay in a circular bottom, it comes near to the sense of a phia, or cup, for containing water, attributed to Dan above: and, it is certain, that a derivative from the same root imports the sockets, which, being hollow, received and held the boards of the tabernacle, Exod. xxvi. 19, 21. Their form was that of a shallow kind of pan, which was capable of holding water, had it been applied to that purpose. Or, if it could be determined, we might derive the name from the circular arrangement of the elders, who were the ancient judges: the court sitting in a semi-circle, to the right and left of the president.]

DAPHNE,

DAPHNE, Δάφνη, a laurel.

DAPHNE. Josephus speaks of a fountain Daphne, which increased the waters of Jordan. St. Jerom and the Chaldees read likewise the fountain of Daphne, Numb. xxxiv. 11. the Hebrew reads only the fountain.

II. DAPHNE, a grove, or suburb, near Antioch, the capital of Syria; about forty furlongs, or a league and a half distant from it. This grove was celebrated for its fine water, its wood, and its temple, which was a sanctuary: the high-priest Onias III. retired to this place of refuge; but was prevailed on to quit it; and was massacred, 2 Macc. iv. 33. A. M. 3834, ante A. D. 170.

The oracle of Daphne, as Sozomen, Theodoret, and St. John Chrysostom tell us, was silent in the reign of the emperor Julian; moreover, his brother Gallus, a Christian, resolving to purge this place of superstition, ordered the body of St. Babylas, who had been bishop of this city, and suffered martyrdom there a hundred years before, under the emperor Decius, to be removed from Antioch to Daphne; from which time, the demon, as had been expected, ceased to deliver oracles in this place. But Julian designing to make war against the Persians, some time afterward came to Daphne, to consult the oracle; he sacrificed a great number of victims, but all the answer he received from the oracle, was, that the presence of Babylas made it impossible to utter any thing. The emperor, in great passion, commanded the body of this holy bishop to be removed elsewhere; but the lightning fell upon the temple of Apollo, reduced the altar and statue to ashes, and ruined almost the whole edifice. The churches of St. Michael and St. Euphemius were afterwards built at Daphne, by direction of the emperor Zeno. [It was a place of great profligacy.]

DARA, דָּרָא, Δαράδῃ, generation, or house of the shepherd, or of the companion; from דָּרִי dor, or dur, generation, or house, and רוּחַ rohe, a companion, or shepherd; otherwise, race of wickedness; from רָע rah. Son of Zerah, of Judah, 1 Chron. ii. 6.

DARCOONIM, דִּרְכוּנִים. Ezra ii. 69. Nehemiah vii. 70, 71, 72. This word is generally translated drachms; which was a coin current among the Greeks, worth about seven pence. Vide ADARCONIM, A Hebrew drachm, in the opinion of Dr. Prideaux, is nine-pence. The Attic drachm, he supposes, might be equivalent in value to the Hebrew in Judæa; what it wanted in weight being made up in fineness, and in its ready currency in all countries. See Prideaux's Connection, &c. Vol. I. Preface.

DARDA, דָּרַד, generation, or habitation of knowledge; from דָּר dur, or dor, to dwell, or beget, and יָדָה jadah, knowledge. An eminent musician, a Levite, son of Mahol, famous for his wisdom. 1 Kings iv. 31.

DARIUS, דָּרִיּוּשׁ, he that inquires and informs himself; from דָּרַשׁ darash.

I. DARIUS. There are several princes of this name in history: we shall confine ourselves to four, who are noticed in Scripture.

DARIUS the Mede, spoken of in Daniel (chap. v. 31. ix. xi.) son of Astyages, king of the Medes, and brother to Mandane, mother of Cyrus, and Amyit the mother of Evilmerodach, and grandmother to Belshazzar: thus Darius the Mede was uncle by the mother's side to Evilmerodach and to Cyrus. The Hebrew generally calls him Dariavesh, or Darius. The LXX. call him Artaxerxes, Dan. vii. but, in chap. xiii. 65, they call him Astyages. Xenophon throughout speaks of him under the name of Cyaxares. He succeeded Belshazzar, king of Babylon, his nephew's son, his sister's grandson, A. M. 3442, ante A. D. 554. Daniel does not acquaint us of any previous war between them; but the prophets Isaiah and Jeremiah supply this deficiency; whether they mean the wars between Darius the Mede and the Babylonians, or that which Cyrus declared against them. Isa. xiii. xiv. xlv. xlv. xlvii. Jer. l. li.

Darius, having acquired the throne of Babylon, appointed a hundred and twenty of the principal lords in his kingdom to govern the different provinces of his dominions, Dan. vi. 1, 2. Over these he set three, whereof Daniel was one, to whom they were to be accountable. By this Darius, Daniel was exposed in the lion's den. Vide DANIEL.

Darius the Mede died at Babylon about A. M. 3456, ante A. D. 541. He was succeeded by Cyrus.

II. DARIUS the Mede. See CYAXARES II.

III. DARIUS, son of Hystaspes, was one of the seven who killed the impostor Smerdis, and the Magi, who had usurped the kingdom of Persia. After that action, these conspirators agreed among themselves, that he should be acknowledged king, whose horse first saluted the rising sun with his neighing. Being informed of this, the groom of Darius, the evening before they were to meet for this purpose, carried his master's horse with a mare for his paramour, to the place of rendezvous. The next morning the seven conspirators met there, at sun-rise. Darius's horse, recollecting what had lately passed there, began to neigh: whereupon the six lords, his competitors, dismounted, and prostrating themselves, invested him with the royal authority: Justin, lib. iii. Herodotus lib. iii. A. M. 3488, ante A. D. 521.

Darius married first, Atossa daughter of Cyrus.

Cyrus. Herodotus (lib. vii. cap. 3.) says, he had four sons by her, and that for a long time she had a great share in the government; for which reason it is thought she was not Vashti, who was soon divorced by this prince. He married besides, Aristone, for whom he had a particular tenderness, and to whom he erected a statue of hammered gold, says Herodotus. lib. vii. cap. 69. She has been thought to be the same as Esther. He married likewise the princess Parmis, daughter to Smerdis, son of Cyrus; also Phædima, daughter of Othanes; and Phralagune, the only daughter of Atarnes, brother to Darius. One of these was probably the Vashti of the book of Esther. Esther became his wife, about A. M. 3383, ante A. D. 514.

In the second year of this prince's reign, A. M. 3385, the Jews, encouraged by the exhortations of Haggai and Zechariah, resumed the rebuilding of the temple, which had been suspended since the time of Cyrus. Their enemies informed Darius, who permitted them to complete it, Ezra vi. 12, 14. Haman, son of Hamedatha, desiring the death of the Jews, Darius at first consented; but afterwards understanding the injustice of his request, he ordered Haman to be hanged upon the gallows which he had prepared for Mordecai, A. M. 3496.

This prince recovered Babylon after a siege of twenty months. That city, which had been formerly the capital of the East, revolted from Persia, taking advantage of the revolutions there, first at the death of Cambyzes, afterwards on the massacre of the Magi. The Babylonians employed four years in preparations, and when they thought their city furnished with provisions for several years, they raised the standard of rebellion: Herodotus, lib. iii. Justin, lib. i. cap. 10. Polyæn. lib. vii.

Darius levied an army in great haste, and besieged Babylon. The Babylonians shut themselves up within their walls, the height and thickness of which secured them from assault; and as they had nothing to fear but famine, they assembled the women and children, and strangled them, each reserving only his most beloved wife, and one servant. Thus the words of Isaiah were verified, (chap. xlvii. 7, 8, 9.) Thou saidst, O Babylon, I shall be always mistress; and thou hast considered carefully what was to befall thee in the end. Hear now, O delicious city, thou that dwellest without fear, and sayest in thine heart; I am, and no other is like me: I shall not be a widow, nor shall I experience any loss of children; these two evils shall fall suddenly upon thee in one day, both widowhood, and loss of children, &c.

Some believe, that the Jews were either expelled by the Babylonians, as being too much in the interest of king Darius; or that they quitted that city, when they saw the people determined to rebel; in obedience to what the prophets had frequently admonished them. Go forth from Babylon, said Isaiah, (xlviii. 20.) flee from the Chaldeans. Jeremiah says, (chap. l. 8) Remove out of the midst of Babylon, and go forth out of the land of the Chaldeans;—for lo, I will raise and cause to come up against Babylon, an assembly of great nations from the north country, who shall take it, and Chaldeæ shall be a spoil. Also, (chap. li. 6) Flee out of the midst of Babylon, and deliver every man his soul; be not cut off in her iniquity: for this is the time of the Lord's vengeance. Babylon hath been a golden cup in the Lord's hand, that made all the earth drunken; the nations have drunken of her wine, therefore the nations are mad; she is suddenly fallen and destroyed, &c. Lastly, Zechariah almost at the same time, i. e. about the fifth year of Darius, says, Flee from the land of the north; deliver thyself, O Sion, that dwellest with the daughter of Babylon: Zech. ii. 6, 7.

Darius, son of Hystaspes, lay twenty months before Babylon, without making any considerable progress. Zopyrus, one of Darius's generals, got possession of it by stratagem.

Darius ordered the hundred gates of brass to be taken away, according to Jeremiah's prediction, (chap. li. 58.) Thus saith the Lord, the broad walls of Babylon shall be utterly broken, and her high gates shall be burnt with fire, and the people shall labour in vain. This is related in Herodotus, (lib. iii.) Darius pulled down the walls of Babylon from two hundred cubits in height to fifty, and carried off all the gates, which Cyrus, when he took the city, had not done. He commanded three thousand of the most mutinous to be crucified; but pardoned the rest: and to prevent Babylon from continuing a desert, he brought fifty thousand women from neighbouring provinces to supply the place of those who had been massacred.

This prince, who favoured the Jews, had married Esther, had advanced Mordecai, and who consequently must have had some knowledge of the true God, towards the end of his life patronized the errors of the Magi, who were worshippers of fire. Zoroaster coming to his court at Susa, so effectually insinuated himself and his opinions, that Darius embraced them, with his courtiers and nobility: and this continued the prevailing religion in Persia, till the establishment of Mahometism. Hyde, Relig. vet. Persarum, cap. 24, 25, 26.

Zoroaster attempted afterwards to engage Argasp, king of the oriental Scythians, a zealous Sabian, Sabian, to embrace his religion, by Darius's authority. That king, enraged at the design of imposing arbitrarily on him, in a matter of this nature, invaded Bactria, beat the troops of Darius, killed Zoroaster, with his priests, to the number of fourscore, and demolished his temples. Darius attacked the Scythians before they could retreat, made a great slaughter of them, drove them out of the country, and rebuilt the temples, particularly that of Balch, which was, as it were, the metropolis of the Magian religion. Darius restored it with extraordinary grandeur and magnificence, and out of gratitude it was called afterwards, The Temple of Darius Hystaspes. He is said to have assumed the title of Master of the Magians, and to have required that this title should be engraven on his tomb. Porphyry, de Abstinencia. Vide ESTHER.

IV. DARIUS CODOMANNUS was of the royal family of Persia, but very remote from the crown, and in a low condition, when Bagoas the eunuch, who had procured the destruction of two kings, Ochus and Arses, placed him on the throne. His true name was Codoman, he did not take that of Darius till he was king. He was descended from Darius Nothus, whose son Ostanes, was father to Arsames, who begat Codomannus. He was at first no more than astande, courier, or at best postmaster-general, to the emperor Ochus: (says Plutarch, de fortuna Alexand. & in vita ejusdem.) But one day when he was at this prince's army, one of their enemies challenged the bravest of the Persians. Codomannus offered himself for the combat, overcame the challenger, and was made governor of Armenia. From hence Bagoas placed him on the throne of Persia. Diodor. Sic. lib. xvii. Justin, lib. x. cap. 3.

Bagoas soon perceived, that Darius was not disposed to leave the government to him, and be content with the bare title of king: he resolved therefore to get rid of him by poison. But Darius, having intelligence of his design, obliged him to drink it off himself, and thereby secured the quiet possession of the crown. History represents Darius as one of the handsomest, best made men, in the Persian empire; and at the same time the bravest, most generous, most gentle, and most merciful.

Alexander the Great being chosen by Greece to command the army marching against the Persians, he entered Asia at the head of 30,000 foot, and 5000 horse and engaging Darius at the passage of the Granicus, whose army was five times more numerous than his, he obtained a signal victory over him. He defeated him a second time at Issus. Darius three several times made proposals of peace to him: but seeing there were no hopes of it, he levied a new army (200,000), which he led toward Nineveh. Thither Alexander followed him; the battle between them was fought near a little village called Gangamales; Darius was beat; and fled towards Media, in hopes of raising another army.

At Ecbatane, the capital of Media, he gathered the broken remains of his forces, and some new levies. Alexander having wintered at Babylon and Persepolis, took the field in search of Darius, who quitted Ecbatane, designing to retreat into Bactria; but he changed his resolution, stopt short, and determined to hazard a battle, though his army at this time consisted only of 40,000 men. While preparing for this conflict, Bessus, governor of Bactria, and Nabazanes, a grandee of Persia, seized Darius, loaded him with chains, forced him into a covered chariot, and fled, carrying him with them towards Bactria; purposing, if Alexander pursued them, to purchase their peace by delivering him up; if not, to kill him, seize the crown, and renew the war.

Eight days after their departure, Alexander arrived at Ecbatane, and set out in pursuit of them, which he continued for eleven days; at last he stopt at Rages in Media, despairing to overtake Darius: from thence he went into Parthia, where he learned what had happened to that unfortunate prince. After a precipitate march of many days, he at length overtook the traitors, who seeing themselves pressed, endeavoured to compel Darius to get on horseback, and save himself with them; but he refusing, they stabbed him in several places, and left him expiring in his chariot. He was dead when Alexander came up, who could not forbear weeping at so sad a spectacle. He covered Darius with his own cloke, and sent him to Sisymbambis, his wife, that she might bury him in the tombs of the kings of Persia.

Thus were verified the prophecies of Daniel, chap. viii. who had foretold the enlargement of the Persian monarchy, under the idea of a ram, butting with its horns westward, northward, and southward; nothing could resist him: but its destruction by a goat having a very large horn between his eyes, (i. e. Alexander the Great) coming from the west, overrun the world without touching the earth; springing forward with impetuosity, he ran against the ram with all his force, attacked him with fury, broke his two horns, and trampled him under foot, without any one's being able to rescue the ram. Nothing can be added to the clearness of these prophecies. See the PLATES: PERSIA and MACEDON.

Darius reigned but six years, from A. M. 3668 to 3674, ante A. D. 300.

DARKNESS,

DARKNESS, Obscurity. Darkness was upon the face of the deep, Gen. i. i. e. chaos was immersed in thick darkness, because light was withheld from it. The most terrible darkness was that brought on Egypt as a plague; it was so thick as to be, as it were, palpable; so horrible, that no one durst stir out of his place; and so lasting, that it endured three days and three nights, Exod. x. 21, 22. Wisd. xvii. 1, 3, 4, &c.

The darkness at our Saviour's death began at the sixth hour, i. e. noon; and ended at the third hour, i. e. three o'clock in the afternoon. Thus it lasted almost the whole time of our Saviour's being on the cross; compare Matthew xxvii. 45, with John xix. 14, and Mark xv. 25. Origen, Maldonatus, Erasmus, Vatablus, and others, were of opinion, that this darkness covered Judæa only; which is sometimes expressed by the whole earth; i. e. land, or country. Chrysostom, Euthymius, Theophylact, &c. thought it extended over a hemisphere. Origen says, it was caused by a thick mist, which precluded the sight of the sun. N. B. The moon being at full, a natural eclipse of the sun was impossible. Some have thought it was occasioned by a comet, which might be the fact; and is far from incredible.

Julius Africanus, Eusebius, and Jerom, in their several chronicles, refer that eclipse of the sun which Phlegon mentions, to our Saviour's death. That author says, it was the greatest eclipse ever seen, since at noon-day the stars were discernible in the heavens. It happened in the fourth year of the 102d Olympiad, which is that of Jesus Christ's death. Tertullian, Apolog. cap. 21. refers the Heathen to their public archives for an account of that darkness which happened at noon on the day of Jesus Christ's death. The author called Dionysius the Areopagite, says, (Ep. 7. ad Polycarp.) that being in Egypt, and seeing the eclipse at that time, against all the rules of astronomy, Allophanes, who then studied with him, cried out, These, my dear Dionysius, are supernatural and divine changes. Suidas (in Dionys.) makes Dionysius himself say on this occasion: God either suffers, or compassionates one who is suffering.

[Nevertheless, the remarks made by Dr. Lardner, in opposition to the application of what has been adduced from Phlegon, have great force. That ancient writer speaks of what passed in Bithynia, not in Judæa; the references he makes to the year are uncertain, and do not specify the time of the year; his language, so far as appears, may be referred to a natural eclipse of the sun; and, lastly, the quotations made from his work, or the allusions to it by Christian writers, are very loose, imperfect, and unsatisfactory. On the whole, it does not appear that Phlegon intended a reference to the period of Christ's Passion. The new edition of the Chronicon of Eusebius, now publishing from an Armenian MS. may possibly afford additional information on this subject.]

DARKNESS is sometimes put for death: Job x. 22. Psalm cvii. 10. The land of darkness—the grave.

II. DARKNESS denotes misfortunes and calamities. A day of darkness, Esth. xi. 8. an unhappy day. Let that day be darkness, let darkness stain it, Job iii. 4, 5. let it be reckoned among the unfortunate days. I am encompassed with darkness. I will cover the heavens with darkness. The sun shall be turned into darkness, and the moon into blood, &c. These expressions signify very great calamities: personal and political.

III. DARKNESS, in a moral sense, denotes sin. The children of light, in opposition to the children of darkness. The righteous in opposition to the wicked. Ye were once darkness, but now are ye light, Ephes. v. 8, 11. God hath called us out of darkness, &c. 1 Pet. ii. 9. from idolatry, [ignorance] &c. to Christianity.

IV. DARKNESS, the kingdom of Satan, the angel of darkness, 2 Cor. xi. 14. The works of darkness, works of the devil, sin, infamous actions.

DARKON, דַּרְקוֹן, purchase of generation, or of habitation; from קָנָה kanah, to buy, to possess, and דּוֹר dor, or dur, generation, or habitation: according to the Syriac, a dragon. A Jew, who returned from Babylon, Nehem. vii. 58.

DAROMA, Darom, Heb. דָּרוֹם, the south. Eusebius and Jerom frequently use this word to denote the south of Judah. The district of Daroma from north to south extended from the city of Eleutheropolis, towards Arabia Petræa about twenty miles; and from east to west from the Dead Sea to Gerara and Beersheba. See RELAND. Palest. lib. i. cap. 32. [Michaelis thinks it also ought to be so taken, Deut. xxxiii. 23, for a district south of the lake of Gennesareth; as Naphtali had no possession in the west or in the south of the Holy Land, taken at large, but in the north only.]

DATHAN, דָּתָן, laws or rites; from דָּת dath.

DATHAN, son of Eliab, one who conspired with Korah, Abiram, and On, against Moses and Aaron. Dathan and his accomplices were swallowed up in an earthquake, Numb. xvi. 1—31. Psalm cv. 17. About A. M. 2552, ante A. D. 1452.

DATHEMA, Δάθημα, or Διάθημα, preparation of the law; from דָּת dath, a law, and מָנָה manah, preparation; otherwise, present, or gift of the law; from מָנַח manach, or mincha, a present.

DATHEMA, or Dathman, a fortress in the land of Gilead, whither the Jews beyond Jordan retired, and maintained themselves against Timotheus, till Judas Maccabæus came to their relief. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xii. cap. 11. See the history, 1 Macc. v. 9. The true situation of this fortress is not known.

[DAUGHTER. This word has no less extent of signification than other names of relation employed in Scripture, as mother, sister, &c. of the female sex; and son, father, brother, &c. of the male sex. In fact, being a noun expressing similitude no less than kindred, it is used in reference to many subjects, which are not properly the offspring of that person, or that thing, of which they are said to be daughters. Vide FATHER, BROTHER, CHILDREN, &c. The following are senses in which the word daughter is used in Scripture.

1. Female offspring, by natural birth, Gen. vi. 1. xxiv. 23. et al. freq.

2. Grand-daughter; so the servant of Abraham calls Rebekah "my master's brother's daughter;" whereas she was daughter of Bethuel, son of Nahor, as appears from verse 24. consequently grand-daughter to Nahor, brother of Abraham, the master of the speaker, Gen. xxiv. 48.

3. Remote descendants, of the same family, or tribe, but separated by many ages: "daughter of Heth," of his posterity: daughters of Canaan, of Moab, of Ammon; and Luke, i. 5. says Elizabeth was of the "daughters of Aaron," i. e. of his descendants, though many generations had intervened.

4. Daughter by nation. Dinah went out to see the young women of Shechem, called the "daughters of the land," Gen. xxxiv. 1. vide Deut. xxiii. 17. Numb. xxv. 1. Judg. xix. 1.

5. Daughter, by reference to the human species; young women, of whatever nation: Gen. xxx. 13. the daughters—young women—the sex—shall congratulate me—call me blessed. Vide Prov. xxxi. 29. Cant. ii. 2.

6. Daughter, by personification, of a people, or city, &c. whence daughter of Jerusalem, of Zion; of Babylon, Isaiah xlvii. 1, 5, 8. of Edom, Lam. iv. 21. of Egypt, Jer. xlvi. 11, 14.

7. Daughter by law; so Naomi calls Ruth her daughter, Ruth iii. 1. and this is common in all nations, to call a son's wife daughter; but Boáz calls Ruth "daughter" by courtesy, as expressing kindness, affability, affection, from a senior to a junior in age, from a superior to an inferior by station, Ruth iii. 10, 11.

8. Daughter by adoption, as Esther was to Mordecai, Esther ii. 7. and as God promises his people by his grace, 2 Cor. vi. 18.

9. Daughter, in reference to disposition and conduct: as we have "sons of Belial," so we have "daughter of Belial," i. e. a woman of an unrestrainable conduct, uncontrollable,—1 Sam. i. 16. Vide BELIAL, and SONS.

10. Daughter, in reference to age: as we have "a son of so many years," so we have "a daughter of ninety years," i. e. a woman of that age, Gen. xvii. 17. and the same is said of a female beast, Lev. xiv. 10.

11. The female offspring of a bird, Isaiah xiii. 21. "daughter of the owl"—the hiana, the ostrich, vide FRAGMENT, No. CXLIV.

12. The branches, which are, as it were, the offspring of a tree, Gen. xlv. 22. the branches—daughters—of Joseph, compared to a tree, spread over a wall.

13. Towns, or villages, around a mother city, i. e. probably originating from it, or supported by it: So Tyre is called the daughter of Zidon, Isaiah xxiii. 12. So we read of Gath-AMMAN, i. e. Gath the mother-town; of a town being a mother in Israel, &c. Vide Numb. xxi. 25, 32. Josh. xv. 45. 2 Chron. xiii. 19. Psalm xlviii. 12. 2 Sam. xx. 19. and many cities in ancient medals, &c. are qualified as metropolis's, i. e. mother-towns, implying no doubt, lesser towns, and towns not equally ancient, as being included in their jurisdiction. Query, whether "the daughter of Tyre," Psalm xlv. be a person, the king's daughter, or a town, offering a present by its deputies?

The state of daughters, i. e. young women, in the East, their employments, duties, &c. may be gathered from various parts of Scripture; and seems to have borne but little resemblance to the state of young women of respectable parentage among ourselves. Rebekah drew and fetched water, Rachel kept sheep, as did the daughters of Jethro, though Jethro was a priest, or a prince, of Midian. They superintended and performed domestic services for the family; Tamar, though a king's daughter, baked bread; and the same of others. We have the same occupations for the daughters of princes in the ancient poets, of which Homer is an unquestionable evidence, Odys. vi.]

DAVID, דָּוִד, well beloved, dear; from דָּוָד dud, to love, to cherish.

DAVID, son of Jesse, of Judah, and of the town of Bethlehem. After the rejection of Saul, the first king of Israel, as to the descent of the crown in his family, the Lord sent Samuel to Bethlehem, to anoint a son of Jesse to be the future king. Samuel coming to Jesse, Jesse produced his seven sons one after another; but the intended sovereign was not among them. David therefore was sent for, who was about fifteen years of age, and Samuel conferred on him an unction in the midst of his brethren. After

After which, David returned to his ordinary occupation, of feeding his father's flocks. We fix the birth of David to A. M. 2919, and his anointing by Samuel to 2934, ante A. D. 1066. 1 Sam. xvi. 15, 16.

Some time after, Saul falling into a lamentable state of melancholy, was advised to send for a proficient, who, by playing on some musical instrument, might relieve him. David was chosen to that office; he was characterised as a mighty valiant man, and a man of war, and prudent in matters, and a comely person, and the Lord was with him. David therefore must have acquired this reputation between the age of fifteen, when he was anointed, and two or three and twenty, his age at this time. David acquitted himself so well before Saul, that the king appointed him his armour-bearer: [an office perhaps somewhat like our aid-du-camp to the king, but probably of no great advantage, except, when in actual service: probably Saul had several such honorary officers.] David returned to his father's house, when Saul grew better. Some years after, the Philistines encamped at Azekah and Shocoh. Goliath, a giant in their army, of extraordinary strength, insulted Israel by a challenge. In the year A. M. 3942, ante A. D. 1062. David was then two or three and twenty.

At this time, Jesse sent David to the camp, where he had three sons, to enquire after their welfare. David, hearing how this giant had defied Israel, declared he would encounter him. This declaration being reported to king Saul, he sent for him, and told him, he was too young to attack such a man. But David answered, by relating instances of his success against wild beasts: and as such he regarded this giant.

Saul, admiring David's courage, would have accounted him in his own armour: but David declined it as too heavy, and impeding his free motion. [See the PLATES: ARMOUR, Plate II.] But with his sling and five well chosen stones, he advanced against Goliath, who coming forward and observing him to be a youth of a beautiful and fresh complexion, despised him. David, undismayed, slung a stone at him, which struck him in the middle of his forehead so violently, that he fell on the ground: David ran immediately upon him, drew Goliath's sword, and cut off his head. The Philistines, seeing their hero killed, fled; and were pursued by the Hebrews.

When Saul saw David coming against this Philistine, he enquired of Abner who he was? Abner answered, "He did not know." This appears very strange, considering that Saul had seen David in his own house, where he played before him on his harp, and had appointed him armour-bearer. Either David's face, voice, and air, must have been changed since that time; or Saul, during his gloomy insanity, had acquired false ideas of David's person: or, after his recovery he had forgot him. [We are not certain that David had ever been a regular attendant on the person of Saul: whether he had often played before Saul: nor under what circumstances of dress and place, &c. Was Saul like insane persons among us, kept private in some dark apartment? Did David play in a separate apartment, &c.? Any of these ideas answer this difficulty. It does not appear that even Jonathan had seen David, at least not familiarly, before, and this is the greater difficulty: Abner, as general, might be absent; but Jonathan was, no doubt, more or less, about his father.] Abner presented David to the king, with the head and sword of Goliath in his hands. From this instant, Jonathan, son of Saul, conceived a great affection for David, which continued ever after.

When Saul and David returned from this expedition, the women of Israel met them, singing, 'Saul has killed his thousands, and David his ten thousands;' which so enraged Saul against David, that from this time he looked on him with an evil eye: yet he kept him about his person, and gave him the command of some troops; but refused to give him his daughter in marriage, though he had promised her to the man who should kill Goliath, 1 Sam. xvii. 25.

The next day Saul being returned home, his distemper seized him, and David played on the harp before him. Saul had a spear in his hand, with which he twice attempted to kill David, but he avoided the blows: which increased Saul's jealousy and malice.

Michal, Saul's second daughter, entertaining kind thoughts of David; her father, pleased at this information, caused it to be hinted to him, that to merit the honour of becoming the king's son-in-law, he required no great gifts, dowry, or presents, but a hundred foreskins of the Philistines: his design in this was, to have David fall by their hands. David, with his people, killed two hundred Philistines, and brought their foreskins to the king. Saul therefore could no longer refuse him his daughter; but he did not lay aside the intention of his destruction. His distemper again possessing Saul, David again played on the harp before him; the king endeavoured to pierce him with his lance; but he fled, 1 Sam. xix. A. M. 2944, ante A. D. 1060.

David, having thus repeatedly escaped from Saul's malice, went to Samuel at Ramah, and related what had passed; and they went together to Naioth. David, not thinking himself secure at Naioth, secretly visited Jonathan, who encouraged him, and promised to discover Saul's real disposition towards him, distinct from his disease. This proving to be altogether inimical to David, the two friends renewed protestations of perpetual friendship; and David retired to the high priest Abimelech at Nob, to whom he pretended, that the king had sent him off in haste, 1 Sam. xxi. Abimelech gave him Goliath's sword, which was deposited in the tabernacle, and some of the shew-bread, taken the day before from the golden table.

David, believing himself not safe in Saul's territories, retired to Achish king of Gath; but being there soon known, he was preserved, either by counterfeiting madness, as some think; or by a real epilepsy, as others suppose. From hence he went to Adullam, where his relations and others resorted to him, so that he was at the head of about four hundred men. The prophet Gad advised his return into the land of Judah; where Abiathar the priest joined him, bringing the priestly ornaments. The Philistines having invaded the threshing floors of Keilah, David speedily dispersed them. Saul understanding that David was at Keilah, marched against him; but David retreated to the desert of Maon: Saul pursued him; but, receiving information at this moment, that the Philistines had invaded the land, he desisted from his pursuit.

David, being delivered from this danger, retired to the wilderness of En-gedi, whither Saul soon followed him with 3000 men: but going into a cave on some natural necessity, David, who lay there concealed with his people, cut off the skirt of his robe, without his perceiving it, and suffered him to go out without injury. When Saul was got to some distance, David went out, cried after him, remonstrated his innocence, and shewed the skirt of Saul's robe. Saul, touched with what he said, shed tears, acknowledged David's integrity: and made him swear not to exterminate his family, when he should be advanced to the throne: 1 Sam. xxiv. A. M. 2946, ante A. D. 1058.

David, in the wilderness of Maon, protected the flocks of Nabal, not only from his own people, but from the thievish tribes of wandering Arabs, who seize as prey all they can find: for this service he solicited a present from Nabal; but meeting a denial, his anger prompted him to destroy him and his family. With this resolution he set forward; but Abigail, Nabal's wife, made David presents, and stopt his indignation; for which David was very thankful to God. Nabal died, and David married Abigail.

The Ziphites knowing that David lay concealed in the hill of Hachilah, informed Saul, who marched with 3000 men against him: 1 Sam. xxvi. But David by night getting into Saul's tent, took his spear, and cruse of water, and went away, without discovery. When on the other side of the hill, he called to Abner, and reprimanded him as a bad centinel; but told him the king was safe.

After this, Achish, king of Gath, (1 Sam. xxvii.) gave David Ziklag for a habitation; whence he made several excursions on the Amalekites, and on the people of Geshur and Gezri; killing all which opposed him, to prevent any discovery where he had been: but he brought all the cattle to Achish, reporting that they were from the south of Judah, &c. Achish made no scruple of carrying David with him to war against Saul: but the other princes of the Philistines prevailed with Achish to dismiss him, a dismissal very agreeable to David. A. M. 2949, ante A. D. 1055. 1 Sam. xxviii.

David returning to Ziklag, after a march of three days, discovered that the Amalekites in revenge of his incursions, during his absence, had pillaged it, burned it, and carried off all the property and all the persons. David and his people pursued them, attacked them, destroyed them, and recovered all their booty.

In the battle fought by the Philistines and Hebrews, on mount Gilboa, Saul was overpowered, and slain in the engagement, with Jonathan his son: 1 Sam. xxxi. Three days after, an Amalekite brought the news to David, boasted that he had assisted Saul in dispatching himself, and presented him Saul's diadem and bracelet. David and all his people lamented the death of Saul, and the defeat of Israel. David composed a mournful song in honour of Saul and Jonathan; and ordered this Amalekite to be slain, who boasted that he had laid hands on the Lord's anointed.

David by Divine direction advanced to Hebron, where the tribe of Judah acknowledged him as their king, 2 Sam. ii. Ishbosheth son of Saul reigned at Mahanaim beyond Jordan, over the other tribes. Ishbosheth having reprimanded Abner, his general, he visited David, and promised to make him master of all Israel; but was treacherously killed by Joab, at the gate of Hebron. David was extremely displeased with this action, but Joab had so much influence over the soldiers, that he could not avenge it; but contented himself with declaring publicly his detestation of it, and with making a magnificent funeral for Abner, A. M. 2956, ante A. D. 1048.

Ishbosheth being assassinated soon after, David punished the murderers, and was proclaimed king king over all Israel. He expelled the Jebusites from Jerusalem, and there settled his residence. The Philistines came twice and encamped near Jerusalem; but were defeated by him. Some years after, he removed the ark of the Lord from Kirjath-jearim to Jerusalem; on the death of Uzzah, David left it near the city in the house of Obed-edom: but he brought it soon after to his own palace. Michal rallied him for dancing, as she thought, in an indecent manner before it, but David reproved her with equal humility and zeal.

David, enjoying peace, formed the design of building a temple to the Lord: the prophet Nathan applauded his intention: but the night following, God discovered to this prophet, that this honour was reserved for David's son; because David had shed blood. Nevertheless, David prepared gold, silver, copper, iron, and wood, for that edifice.

After this, David fought the Philistines,—2 Sam. viii. and freed Israel from these enemies; also from the Moabites, whom he treated with a severity, for which we are not well acquainted with the motives, nor indeed with all the circumstances. He subdued likewise all Syria; made an expedition as far as the Euphrates, and conquered the eastern Edomites in the valley of Salt.

Nahash king of the Ammonites being dead, David sent compliments of condolence to his son and successor. But the great men about that king, persuaded him, that David sent them as spies to observe his forces, designing war against him. The credulous young prince affronted the ambassadors; and David sent Joab his general, against Nahash, by whom the Ammonites were routed, together with the Syrians. The next year, A. M. 2968, ante A. D. 1037, David marched in person against the Ammonites, who had received succours from the Syrians beyond the Euphrates: these were entirely dispersed: but David the year following resolved to subdue Rabbah, the capital of the Ammonites. He sent Joab with the army while he continued at Jerusalem.

David rising one day after reposing at noon, and walking on his terrace, saw Bathsheba bathing herself: she was the wife of Uriah the Hittite, then with Joab, 2 Sam. xi. David procured her company, and lay with her. Shortly after she communicated information of her pregnancy: to conceal his crime, and secure her honour, he sent for Uriah, and persuaded him to pass the night at home with his wife; but he not complying, David returned him with letters to Joab, commanding him so to manage, that Uriah might be killed by the Ammonites. These orders were executed. When David was informed of this, he married Bathsheba, and took her home.

This misdeed was extremely displeasing to God: all Israel was scandalized at it; and the very strangers took occasion of blaspheming the name of the Lord, 2 Sam. xii. 14.

Nathan, by God's command, visited David, and under a parable of a rich man, who had taken from a poor man the only ewe-lamb he had, obliged David to condemn himself. 2 Sam. xii. Nathan foretold that his house should be filled with blood, and his wives abused in the sight of the world, as a punishment for his crime: and that the child born of this adultery should die: as it did accordingly within a few days, A. M. 2971, ante A. D. 1033.

Joab having reduced Rabbah to extremities, invited David to come and take it: David went, took the city and plundered it; ordering the people to be subjected to the most cruel labours. This was probably before he was brought to repentance on account of his criminal connection with Bathsheba.

As the beginning of his predicted punishment in his own family, his son Amnon, having ravished David's daughter, Tamar, was slain by her brother Absalom. Absalom fled, but was brought back by Joab's management; nevertheless, he soon abused his father's indulgence, and aspired to the royal dignity, A. M. 2980, ante A. D. 1024. He went to Hebron with a company of people, and there was acknowledged king. David fled from Jerusalem, designing to go beyond Jordan. He had scarcely passed Mount Olivet, when Ziba, the servant of Mephibosheth, a son of Jonathan, met him with a couple of asses loaded with provisions, which he presented to the king, 2 Sam. xvi. David asked, why Mephibosheth did not come? Ziba replied, that he continued at Jerusalem, saying, To-day shall the house of Israel restore to me the kingdom of my father. David too credulously, in his confusion of mind, gave the crafty Ziba the whole inheritance of his master.

David being arrived near Bahurim, Shimei loaded him with curses; but David endured all with a patience analogous to his remorse for his past iniquity. Absalom followed David to Mahanaim, and a battle ensued, wherein Absalom's army was defeated; and he, hanging by his hair on a tree, was slain by Joab.

The news of his death overwhelmed the king with sorrow; but Joab representing to him how much his interests would suffer by it, he shewed himself publicly to the people, and began his return to Jerusalem. The tribe of Judah met him; but Sheba, son of Bicri, sounded the trumpet, saying, We have no part in David, nor inheritance in the son of Jesse, 2 Sam. xx. Israel followed Sheba, but Judah adhered to David; and Sheba was afterwards slain in Abila.

The

The land being afflicted by a famine of three years' continuance, the oracle reminded David of the blood of the Gibeonites unjustly shed by Saul. David therefore asked the Gibeonites, what satisfaction they required? They demanded seven of Saul's sons, to be hanged up in Gibeah. With this David complied, A. M. 2983, ante A. D. 1021. 2 Sam. xxi.

Some time after, David having proudly and obstinately commanded the people to be numbered, the Lord sent the prophet Gad to offer him the choice of three scourges; either—that the land should be afflicted by famine during seven [three additional] years, or—that he should fly three months before his enemies, or—that a pestilence should rage during three days. David chose the latter: 70,000 persons died; yet the sentence was not executed with full rigour. David, as an act of thanksgiving, erected an altar in the threshing-floor of Araunah, where, some are of opinion, that the temple was afterwards built, A. M. 2987, ante A. D. 1017, 2 Sam. xxiv.

The king, being old, could scarcely receive any warmth: a young woman, therefore, named Abishag, was brought to him, lay with him, and attended him; but continued a virgin. At this time, Adonijah, his fourth son, set up the equipage of a king, and formed a party. Nathan, who knew the promises of David in favour of Solomon, acquainted Bathsheba with it, who claiming those promises, David gave orders that Solomon should be mounted on his own mule, conducted to Gihon, and there anointed king.

David, now near his end, sent for Solomon, committed to him the plans and models of the temple, with the gold and silver prepared for it; charged him to be constantly faithful to God, not to let Joab die in peace; and to punish Shimei. He died, aged 71, A. M. 2990, ante A. D. 1014. He reigned seven years and a half at Hebron, and thirty-three at Jerusalem, in all forty years.

Josephus, Antiq. lib. vii. cap. ult. relates, that Solomon deposited abundance of riches in David's monument; and that, 1300 years after, the high-priest Hircanus, being besieged in Jerusalem by Antiochus Pius, opened David's monument, took out 3000 talents, and gave Antiochus part of them. He adds, that many years after, Herod the Great searched this monument, and took great sums out of it.

In the Memoirs published in Arabic by M. le Jay, in his Polyglot, we read of a report, that Hircanus, when besieged by king Antiochus Sidetes, opened a treasure chamber, which belonged to some of David's descendants, and that after he had taken a large sum out of it, he still left a great deal in it, and sealed it up again. This is very different from Josephus's account: but is probably the foundation of it.

David's monument was much respected by the Jews. St. Peter, Acts ii. 29, tells them, it was still with them. Dio, in Vita Adriani, informs us, that part of this mausoleum fell down in the emperor Adrian's reign. St. Jerom relates, that he often went to pray at this holy prophet's sepulchre, Ep. ad Marcellam. Modern travellers describe monuments, dug in the rock, said to be those made for the kings of Judah. They are doubtless ancient, but it would be difficult to distinguish David's from the rest; [and these are, certainly, not David's]. Maundrell describes particularly these famous grottos, called the Sepulchres of the Kings: but for what reason they go by that name, is, he says, hard to resolve; for it is certain, none of the kings either of Jerusalem or Judah were buried there. Vide the MAP of JERUSALEM among the PLATES.

DAY. The day is distinguished into natural, astronomical, civil, and artificial. There is another distinction of the day, which may be termed prophetical; the prophets being the only persons who call years days; whereof there is an example in the explanation which is given of Daniel's seventy weeks.

The natural day, is one revolution of the sun. The astronomical day, is one revolution of the equator, added to that portion of it through which the sun has passed in one natural day. The civil day is that, whose beginning and end is determined by the custom of any nation.

The Hebrews began their day in the evening. From even unto even shall ye celebrate your Sabbath, Lev. xxiii. 32. The Roman church does the same in ecclesiastical offices; but not in regard to the rest from labour, observed on festivals. The Babylonians reckoned their days from sun-rising; as do the inhabitants of Nuremberg at this day: the Italians from sun-set; astronomers from noon; Roman catholics from midnight.

The artificial day is the time of the sun's continuance above the horizon, which is unequal according to different seasons; by reason of the obliquity of the sphere. The sacred writers generally divide the day and night into twelve unequal hours. The sixth hour is always noon throughout the year; and the twelfth hour is the last hour of the day. But in summer, the twelfth hour, as all the others were, was longer than in winter. See HOURS. Also the PLATES, WATCHES and HOURS, with their Explanations.

To-DAY, does not only signify the particular day on which we are speaking, but any indefinite time: as we say, the people of the present day, or of that day, or time, &c.

DEACON, Διακονος, Diaconos, Minister, Servant, [ATTENDANT.] This word is used in church language to denote an officer who assists either the bishop or priest, or, in the service of the poor. For the institution of deacons, see Acts vi. 1. The first seven deacons, were Stephen, Philip, Prochorus, Nicanor, Timon, Parmenas, and Nicolas: they were selected by the people from among themselves, were then presented to the apostles, and ordained by prayer and imposition of hands.

St. Paul, 1 Tim. iii. 8, 12, requires that a deacon be chaste, sincere, and blameless; not a drinker, nor given to filthy lucre; that he should hold the mystery of the faith in a pure conscience; should be well approved before admission; should be the husband of one wife; should rule well his own house, his family, &c.

DEACONESS, such women were called deaconesses, [ATTENDANTS] who served the church in those offices, which the deacons could not with propriety exercise themselves; such as keeping the doors of that part of the church where the women sat; for they were not seated promiscuously with the men, but had separate places in the church. Deaconesses assisted the women to undress and dress at baptism. They privately instructed those of their own sex, and visited others imprisoned for the faith. They were of mature and advanced age when chosen; of good manners and reputation. They were in the primitive times appointed to this office, with the imposition of hands. Concil. Laodic. cap. xi. St. Paul, Rom. xvi. speaks of Phœbe, deaconess of the church at the port of Cenchrea, the eastern haven to Corinth.

[These persons appear to be the same as those whom Pliny, in his famous letter to Trajan, (Epist. 97) styles "Ancillis, quæ ministræ dicebantur"—female attendants called assistants, ministers, or servants. It appears, then, that these were customary officers throughout the churches; and when the fury of persecution fell on Christians, these were among the first to suffer: the most cruel of tortures were inflicted on them, not sparing even extreme old age. Vide SUICER, Thesaurus, Deaconess: Lardner, Test. vol. ii. p. 42. Is it not rather strange that this office, which is perfectly well adapted to the matronly character of the female sex, should be wholly excluded from our list of assistants in the church?]

[This female church-officer continued long to be useful and popular among the faithful; but is gradually more rarely adverted to by ecclesiastical writers; and ceases to be mentioned in connection with church-services, after A. D. 1000. Deaconesses are most particularly mentioned by Epiphanius, (Hæres. lxxix.) who says, "There are also Deaconesses in the church; but this office was not instituted as a priestly function, nor has it any interference with priestly administrations; but it was instituted for the purpose of preserving a due regard to the modesty of the female sex; especially at the time of baptismal washing, and while the person [body] of the woman is naked; that she may not be seen by the men performing the sacred service, but by her only who, by order of the priest, had charge of the woman, during the time that her person [body] was naked."

It is usually understood that at first, Deaconesses were widows, who had lived with one husband only; not less than sixty years of age; which, by the fifteenth canon of the council of Chalcedon, was reduced to forty years. In later times they wore a distinguishing dress. They visited women, in the name of the Church, when sick, or in poverty: (they also, it is supposed, visited prisoners, suffering as Christians). The Apostle Paul says, that Phœbe had been his patroness, as well as of many others. This implies a dignity which is seldom considered: and it shews, at least, that great respectability of station in life was the reverse of inconsistent with the office of Deaconess. Afterwards (Ignatius, Epist. Smyr. ad. fin.) we read of "virgins who were called widows," i. e. Deaconesses: and it should seem that maiden ladies of a certain age were invested with this office. We have the sepulchral inscription of "Daciana, a Deaconess, who lived forty-five years and three months; in the time when F. Palmatus was consul: she was sister to Victorinus the Presbyter; and had INSTRUCTED (in religion) many of her sex." Muratori. p. 1537. Considering that in the East men had scarcely any access to the younger women at home, there can be little doubt, but what they received the major part of their religious instruction from the Deaconesses; and so much of this as was previous to baptism, became a very convenient preparation for that rite.

The practice of anointing after baptism is extremely ancient, and was, in a manner, universal. In this the Deaconess performed the principal part: for the Presbyter anointed the woman's head only. The Deaconess anointed the parts of the woman's body, the joints, &c.]

DEAD. It is our opinion, that the Hebrews by this name sometimes understood Adonis: Deut. xiv. 1. Vide ADONIS: BAAL-PEOR.

DEAD. It was natural that the Hebrews should have great consideration for the dead, since they believed the soul's immortality, and a resurrection of the body. They esteemed it the greatest misfortune to be deprived of burial, and made it a point of duty to bury the dead, (Tob. i. 20. ii. 3, 9. iv. 17.) and to leave something on their graves to be eaten by the poor. When an Israelite died in any house or tent, all persons, and and all the furniture in it, contracted a pollution, which continued seven days, Numb. xix. 14—16. All who touched the body of one who died, or was killed, in the open fields; all who touched mens' bones, or a grave, were unclean seven days. To cleanse this pollution, they formerly took the ashes of the red heifer sacrificed by the high-priest on the day of solemn expiation (Numb. xix.) on these they poured water in a vessel; a person who was clean dipt a bunch of hyssop in this water, and sprinkled with it the furniture, the chamber, and the persons, on the third day and on the seventh day. It was required that the polluted person should previously bathe his whole body, and wash his clothes; after which he was clean.

The Rabbins tell us, that no uncleanness was contracted at funerals, unless the dead person were an Israelite; for the Gentiles, say they, pollute those who come near them while living, but after death, their carcases communicate no impurity; whereas the Israelites, while living, exhale a pure smell, which sanctifies those who come near them; but after death, their souls and the Holy Spirit having forsaken them, they communicate pollution. Since the destruction of the temple, and since the sacrifice of the red heifer has ceased, the Jews no longer look on themselves as polluted by a dead body. See Leo of Modena, of the Ceremonies of the Jews, P. i. cap. 8.

[Nevertheless, I am assured by a Jew-priest, (who derives his descent from Aaron) that himself and family constantly observe the prohibition; and always quit the house in which a death is expected; or avoid entering one where a death has recently happened.]

All present where any person has just expired, tear their clothes, according to the ancient custom of the Hebrews; but only their extremities about the breadth of their hand, and this more out of ceremony, than sorrow. It is an old custom with them to pour all the water in the house, &c. into the street. The Rabbins say, that the destroying angel washes in this water the sword with which he killed the sick person, whereby the water becomes poisonous: after this they put the body on a sheet spread out; turn the thumb inward to the hand, and light a wax taper at the feet, or head; they wash the body, put a shirt on it, and over the shirt a garment of fine linen, which he wore on the day of solemn expiation; then his taled, which is a piece of square cloth with tufts. Lastly, they put a white cap on his head, and close up the coffin.

[It appears to have been a custom anciently in Palestine, to embalm the bodies of persons of distinction and fortune: but this was never general. St. John remarks, that our Saviour was wrapped in linen clothes, and whelmed with perfumes, as the manner of the Jews is to bury, John xix. 29. We read, that either with, or near, the bodies of some kings of Judah, abundance of spices was burnt, 2 Chron. xxi. 19. but we cannot affirm that this was customary. Jer. xxxiv. 5.]

After the body has been exposed, the relations meet to accompany it to the ground. They carry it feet foremost, according to the prescription of the Rabbins. Anciently they had women hired to lament, and persons who played on doleful instruments, and who walked in procession. The Rabbins say, that an Israelite was enjoined to have two of these musicians at his wife's obsequies, besides the women hired to weep. Persons who met the funeral procession, in civility joined the company, and mingled their groans. To this our Saviour seems to allude, Luke vii. 32: We have mourned to you, and ye have not wept. And St. Paul—weep with those that weep, and rejoice with those who rejoice, Rom. xii. 15.

At the place of burial, the coffin is set down on the ground; then if the deceased be of rank, some one makes his encomium: after which, they walk ten times about the grave, repeating a long prayer, beginning God is the rock, his way is perfect, &c. Deut. xxxii. 4. Then the body is let down into the grave, its face turned toward heaven; the nearest relations throw the earth upon it, and the grave is filled. When they depart from the spot, they walk backward, and pulling up some grass three several times, they throw it behind their backs, repeating, They shall flourish like the grass of the earth. They believe that the bodies of the Jews are conveyed through subterraneous passages to Palestine; this they call the rolling of the dead, or the rolling of the caves. They hope to rise again and enjoy a state of bliss in that country. They do not believe the soul to be received into the place of rest, before the body is reduced to dust; but that for a year after decease, it often visits its body in the grave.

[“The corruption of dead bodies has the most destructive effects on health in hot countries; more so than in more temperate climates. It was therefore necessary to secure the inhabitants from its noxious influence, by increasing, through religious motives, their natural aversion to dead carcases. Mahomet, and some other founders of sects, have for this reason affixed ideas of spiritual impurity to the act of touching a dead body. Some Mussulmans require great purification to cleanse a man thus defiled; and they separate him for some time from society. The Arabians are less rigid; when a person of this nation has had the misfortune fortune to touch a carcase, he washes himself carefully, and, when no mark of external impurities remains, he then returns to the ordinary intercourse of life." NIEBUHR'S TRAVELS, Vol. II. p. 251, Eng. Edit.]

DEATH. Adam having eaten of the forbidden fruit, incurred the penalty of death, for himself and his posterity. Had he continued obedient, in all likelihood he had not died, and the fruit of the tree of life was probably meant to have preserved him in a happy state of constant health; perhaps too, after a long life, God might have translated him, by some easy mutation, into a life absolutely immortal.

Death was brought into the world by the envy and malice of the devil: Wisd. iii. 24. and the sin of Adam introduced the death of all his descendants. By one man, sin came into the world, and death by sin, Rom. v. 12. St. Austin distinguishes two sorts of immortality, a greater and a lesser: the greater and more perfect immortality consists in an impossibility of dying, which is the happy state of God and of angels; the lesser immortality consists in a possibility of not dying; such Adam enjoyed in innocence; and from this lesser degree of immortality he might have arrived at the greater degree, which is that of the blessed after the resurrection. He was therefore driven out of Paradise after his guilt, lest he should eat the fruit of the tree of life.

The Socinians pretend, that Adam was created mortal, and that sin produced no change in his condition, in this particular; and for this they affirm, that they have the authority of the Rabbins. But the Rabbins evidently maintain, that if our first parents had persevered in innocence, they had lived always. Manasseh Ben Israel, in the seventeenth century, asserted, that the immortality of the first man is founded on Scripture; and that many famous Rabbins who are cited by him, are of this opinion. He shews that this immortality of Adam agrees with reason; since there was no internal cause in him which might produce death, and that he had nothing to fear from external causes, living in a delicious and agreeable place, where every thing was subject to him; while the fruit allotted him for food increased his strength, and preserved his health.

Jesus Christ by his death subdued the power of death, and merited for us a blest immortality. Not that the soul, mortal before, has been by him made immortal; or that he has merited for us the favour of not dying; for he has not changed the nature of the soul, nor exempted us from the necessity of dying; but he has given us the life of grace in this world, and hath merited a happy immortality for us in the future world; provided the merits of his death are received by faith.

Death is taken in Scripture, (1.) for the separation of body, and soul, the first death; (2.) for the second death, that of eternal damnation. (3.) For any great danger, or imminent risque of death; [as persecution, &c.] (4.) For the plague and contagious diseases. (5.) For poison, and great calamity. The gates of death, signify the grave; instruments of death, dangerous and deadly weapons; bonds or snares of death, snares intended to produce death; a son of death, one who deserves death, or one condemned to death; the dust of death, the state of the body in the grave, &c.

DEBIR, דביר, Ḍaḇar, oracle, discourse, word, thing; from the Syriac, a leader.

[This name, probably, signifies, "THE ORACLE," or rather that separated part of a temple, called the adytum; the most retired or secret part, from which the oracle was understood to issue.

As in ancient times those who consulted the oracle, were persuaded of a divine impulse there resident, and also were impelled to do many things, by way of fulfilling the prophetic prediction received from such oracles, so it should seem, that an impulse, or the impelling principle, was radically intended by this appellation. But in another acceptance, not inconsistent with this, it may denote the guide, conductor, or director: as the advice of an oracle was asked in difficult cases, so, when it was obtained, the oracular decision became the guide, or director, as well as the influential motive, of those who had obtained it. Vide DABERETH.]

I. DEBIR, or Kirjath-sepher, (the city of letters) or Kirjath-arba, a city of Judah, near Hebron. Its first inhabitants were giants of the race of Anak. Joshua took it, and slew its king, Josh. x. 39. xj. 13. Debir fell by lot to Caleb; Othniel first entering the place, Caleb gave him his daughter Achsah, Josh. xv. 15, 16. Debir belonged to the Levites, Josh. xxi. 15. 1 Chron. vi. 58.

II. DEBIR, a town of Gad, beyond Jordan, Josh. xiii. 26.

III. DEBIR, king of Eglon, slain by Joshua. chap. x. 3.

IV. DEBIR, a city of Benjamin, which had belonged to Judah, Josh. xv. 17.

[DEBIRA, דבירה, the oratory, or word; otherwise, the thing, or a bee, or subjection. A city in Judah, Josh. x. 39. xv. 16. Judges i. 11, 12.

This name appears to be that of Debir with an emphasis, THE ORACLE; and as it should seem that this city is called also Kirjath-sepher, the "city of the book," or learning; and Kirjath- seua, the "city of purity," from the Chaldean and Arabic roots to cleanse, we may safely conclude that it was a priestly university of the ancient inhabitants: to which the ideas of holiness, learning, and oracular information, were attached: together with that of retirement. Other conjectures may be seen in Bochart, Canaan, p. 855. Masius on Joshua, cap. 15. Schmidius on Judg. i. 11. Gusset. Comment. Loc. Heb. p. 567. Reland's Palest. p. 726. and *Dissert. DEBORAH, דְּבוֹרָה, word, thing; otherwise, bee; from דְּבוֹרָה deborat.

I. DEBORAH, a prophetess, wife of Lapidoth, who judged the Israelites, and dwelt under a palm-tree between Rama and Bethel: Judg. iv. 4, 5. She sent for Barak, directed him to attack Sisera, and promised him victory; but Barak refused to go, unless Deborah went with him. She went, but told him, that the success of this expedition would be imputed to a woman, and not to him. See BARAK. After the victory, Deborah and Barak composed a fine thanksgiving song, which is preserved; Judges, chap. iv. A. M. 2719, ante A. D. 1285.

II. DEBORAH, Rebecca's nurse, who accompanied Jacob, and was buried at the foot of Bethel, under an oak, for this reason called the oak of weeping, Gen. xxxv. 8. A. M. 2266, ante A. D. 1738.

[DEBT, DEBTOR, an obligation which must be discharged by the party bound so to do. This may be either special, or general: special obligations are where the party has contracted to do something in return for a service received: general obligations are those to which a man is bound by his situation as a man, as a member of civil society, as a member of Christian society; or, &c. Matt. xxiii. 16, whoso shall swear by the gold of the temple—by the gift on the altar—is a debtor; is bound by his oath; is obliged to fulfil his vow, or &c. Rom. i. 14. I am debtor to the Greeks and barbarians; under obligations to persons of all nations, &c. Gal. v. 3. he is a debtor—is bound—to do the whole law. Men may be debtors to human justice, or to divine justice: bound to obedience, and if that he not complied with, bound to suffer the penalties annexed to transgression.]

DECALOGUE, the ten principal commandments, Exod. xx. 1, &c. from the Greek deca, logos, word; by a similar name, q. d. the ten words, the Jews call these ten precepts.

DECAPOLIS, Δεκάπολις, from the Greek, δέκα, ten, and πόλις, a city.

DECAPOLIS, a country in Palestine, which contained ten principal cities, some on this, some on the other, side of Jordan. According to Pliny, they were, 1. Scythopolis; 2. Philadelphia; 3. Raphana; 4. Gadara; 5. Hippus; 6. Dion. 7. Pella; 8. Gerasa; 9. Cana-tha; 10. Damascus. Others reckon them otherwise, as Pliny observes, in loc.

[Decapolis, though within the limits of Israel, yet, probably, was inhabited by foreigners; as Beth-shan was. Hence it retained a foreign appellation. This may contribute to account for the numerous herds of swine kept in this district, a practice which was forbid by the Mosaic law. Matt. iv. 25. viii. 30. Mark. v. 20. vii. 31.]

[DECREE, a determination, or appointment, judicial, civil, ecclesiastical, or divine. Judicial decrees should determine litigation and controversy between man and man; civil decrees refer to the purposes of society; ecclesiastical decrees are appointments for the promotion of piety: all these may be well intended, but may err; the Divine appointments never err, being founded on truth, judgment, perfect wisdom and perfect knowledge, united with perfect goodness, kindness, and grace.]

DEDAN, דִּדָּן, their breasts, or their friendship, or their uncle, &c. from דָּד dad, or דִּד dud; or, a judge; from דִּן din.

[Simon thinks this is from the root Dadeh, and imports "a great increase," i. e. of the family: and to this root he also refers Dodanim, Gen. x. 4. which being called (1 Chron. i. 7.) Rodanim, he thinks the latter word has the same sense in the Syriac and Arabic, as the former has in the Hebrew; so that the import of both names is much the same.

It is likely that Dedanah, Ezek. xxv. 19. is the same as Dedan.

Beside the first mention of this name, Gen. x. 7. it occurs four times in SS. Jer. xxv. 23. xlix. 8. Ezek. xxv. 13. xxvii. 15.

Also, we find two persons named Dedan.

1. A son of Cush. Gen. x. 7.

2. A descendant of Abraham, Gen. xxv. 5. where he is associated with the Edomites. It is probable that Ezek. xxv. 13. and Jer. xlix. 8. refer to this Dedan.

Ezek. xxvii. 15. appears to refer to Dedan son of Cush. This Dedan is enumerated among the merchant towns which dealt with Tyre.

There is a town called Dadan, situated on the Persian Gulf; it is placed by D'Anville not far from the Indian Ocean, and rather out of the gulf. This name is written Daran, or Daram, by some; Dadan, or Dedan, by others.

The Dedan of Ezek. xxvii. 15. is distinguished by furnishing Tyre with ivory, (or great tooth) which in all probability it procured from India; much as the city of Ormus on the Persian Gulf did, in later ages. Dedan also furnished nished ebony; which it equally received from India. Virgil says—

sola India nigrum Fert hebenum.

The mention of these articles agrees perfectly with the notion of a town on the Persian Gulf; where, in fact, we know a very extensive commerce flourished many ages after Tyre: and of which these very articles formed a part.

Misled by the conformity of the Hebrew דָּדָן and דָּדָן, the Syriac generally reads Doron; the LXX. read Radan: and interpret of the Rhodians; Jerom remarks and corrects this error. The Arabic Polyglotts by Dedan understand India.]

DEDAN, second son of Raamah, Gen. x. 7. The LXX. Vulgate, Hebrew, here read Dadan; but Gen. x. 4. instead of Dodanim, the LXX. read Rhodanim; and Ezek. xvii. 15. instead of Dedan they read sons of the Rhodians. Josephus did not read Dodanim, nor does he mention this name. In that chapter, instead of Dedan he reads Judah, whom he describes as father of certain Jews in the west of Ethiopia: nevertheless the true reading, Gen. x. 7. is Dedan. I cannot well tell whether Dedan and Dedanim (Isaiah xxi. 13. Jeremiah xxv. 23. xlix. 8. Ezekiel xxv. 19. xxvii. 15, 20. xxxviii. 13.) is the Dodanim of Gen. x. 4. descendants of Japheth; or the Dadan of ver. 7. descendant of Ham; or whether Dedan be not rather a descendant of Dadan, son of Jochshan, and grandson of Abraham and Keturah. Arias Montanus places the descendants of Dadan in the Palmyrene, where we find the mountain Aladan, or Alladadan. Bochart places Dadan in Arabia Felix, west of Raamah. This country is still called Dadana, and the capital of it is called Dadan.

DEDAN II. son of Jochshan, and grandson of Abraham and Keturah. Dadan was father of the Letushites, Ashurites, and Leummities, Gen. xxv. 3. He dwelt in Edom, where Jeremiah, xxv. 23. places the city of Dedan. Ezekiel, xxvii. 20. speaks of Dedan, whose natives traded at Tyre, with those of Shebah, Eden, Ashur, and Chilmad; whence we conclude, that one or both of the Dadans dwelt near the people of Ashur and Eden.

DEDICATION, a religious ceremony, whereby any place, temple, altar, or vessel, is declared to be consecrated to the worship of God. Moses dedicated the tabernacle built in the wilderness, (Exod. xl. Numb. vii.) also, the vessels set apart for divine service. Solomon dedicated the temple which he erected, 1 Kings viii. The Israelites returned from the Babylonish captivity, dedicated their new temple, and on the day of this dedication sacrificed a great number of victims, Ezra vi. 16, 17. The Macabees having cleansed the temple, which had been polluted by Antiochus Epiphanes, again dedicated the altar, 1 Macc. iv. 52, &c. This is believed to be the dedication which the Jews celebrated in winter, at which our Lord was present, John x. 22. The temple rebuilt by Herod was dedicated with great solemnity; and in order to make this festival more august, Herod appointed it on the anniversary of his accession to the crown. Now this was towards the end of A. M. 3964, ante A. D. 40; and the temple which he built was dedicated at the end of his 32d year, four years before the true birth of Jesus Christ. Some think it probable this was the dedication mentioned John x. 22. Vide ENCENIA.

Not only sacred places were thus dedicated, but also cities, their walls, and their gates, and even the houses of private persons. When Nehemiah had finished the walls and gates of Jerusalem, he dedicated them, Nehem. xii. 27. The title of Psalm xix. implies, that it was sung at the dedication of David's house. Moses ordered proclamation to be made on the day of battle at the head of the army, What man is there that hath built a new house, and hath not dedicated it? let him return, &c. Deut. xx. 5. This dedication was performed, principally, according to the Rabbins, by pronouncing a certain blessing, while some particular words of the law written on parchment, rolled up in a cane, or hollow stick, were fastened on the doorpost. Vide MEZULLOTH.

Hence the custom of dedicating churches, oratories, chapels, &c. at their opening, &c.

DEEP. See ABYSS.

DEER, fallow, a wild quadruped, of a middle size between the stag and the roe-buck; its horns turn inward; the main horn and branches are large and flat, not round. The deer is naturally very timorous: it was reputed clean, and good for food; young deer were particularly esteemed for their delicacy, &c. They are noticed in the Canticles, Proverbs, and Isaiah, as beautiful, lovely creatures, and very swift. The Hebrew Tzeb, or Tzebi, צֵבִי or צִבְי, is taken for the roe-buck or deer. [GAZELLE, or ANTELOPE. See the ARRANGEMENT OF NATURAL HISTORY.]

[DEFILE, DEFILEMENT. Many were those blemishes of person and conduct which, under the law, were esteemed defilements: some were voluntary, some involuntary; some originated with the party, others were received by him; some were inevitable, being defects of nature, others the consequences of personal transgression; but under the gospel, defilements are those of the heart, of the mind, the temper, the conduct:

conduct: moral uncleannesses are as numerous, and as much prohibited as ever, but ceremonial uncleannesses are superseded, as requiring religious rites; though many of them claim attention as usages of health, decency, and civility. Vide Matt. xv. 18. Gen. xlix. 4. Rom. i. 24. James iii. 6. Ezek. xliii. 8. See also many passages in Leviticus and Numbers. Vide BLEMISH, PURIFICATION.]

[DEGREES, as measures, or marks, of time. Vide DIAL, and FRAGMENTS, No. II. CII. CCLXIII.

DEGREES, Psalms of, vide PSALM, ad fin. The reader has seen many opinions on this title. —Is there room for another? Were these psalms sung during the time of service, while the flesh, &c. of a sacrifice was consuming on the altar, and while the smoke and fume of it ascended towards heaven?

Their title as Psalms of Ascent, seems not inimical to this supposition; especially when we recollect that sacrifices in Hebrew are called by this word עָלוּ OLEH, an ascent, עָלוּ OLUT, burnt sacrifices; מַעֲלוֹת M-OLUT, of degrees. It is, at least, certain, that during the consumption of an offering by the fire of the altar, pieces of music were performed; not among the Hebrews only, but among all nations, in their public rites; that the poetry which expressed the sentiments of the worshipper, should be appointed, and be short, (as these Songs of Degrees are), seems not improbable, from the nature of the service.]

DEHAVE, דַּחַו, דַּחַוֹּיֹּת, Syriac, of the country of the Havites.

DEHAVITES, a people mentioned Ezra, iv. 9. The people of Ava; perhaps inhabitants of that part of Assyria which was watered by the river Diaba. See 2 Kings xvii. 24.

DELAIAH, דָּלִיָּה, Δαλία, the poor, or the exhausting of the Lord; from דָּלַל dalal, and יָה jah, the Lord; otherwise, the branch of the vine; from דָּלִיּוֹת daliioth: or who is made lean; from דָּל dal, made lean.

I. DELAIAH, son of Eliænai, of David's family, 1 Chr. iii. 24.

II. DELAIAH, a counsellor of king Jehoiakim, who opposed his burning Jeremiah's book, which Baruch had written. Jer. xxxvi. 25.

III. DELAIAH, of the race of the priests. 1 Chron. xxix. 18.

DELILAH, or DALILAH, דָּלִילָה, poor, small, or head of hair; from דָּלַל dalal: or bucket.

DELILAH, a prostitute who dwelt in the valley of Sorek, belonging to Dan, near the land of the Philistines. Samson doating on her, abandoned himself to her; and, as some say, married her. Judg. xvi. 4. The princes of the Philistines by bribes prevailed on her to betray Samson: he eluded her first demands; but at length she succeeded, and reduced his strength to weakness, by cutting off his hair. Vide SAMSON, and FRAGMENT, No. XXV.

DELOS, Δῆλος, shown and manifested; Greek δηλώω, I demonstrate. An island, 1 Macc. xv.

DELUGE. Not only that terrible inundation whereby God destroyed mankind, and animals, is in Scripture called diluvium, or deluge, but likewise all inundations, or collections of extraordinary waters. The Psalmist, speaking of a violent tempest, denotes it by the word deluge, or flood; Psalm xxix. 10. And, Psalm xxxii. 6, he says, that a deluge of water shall not come near the righteous.

But we understand principally by the word Deluge,—that universal flood which happened in the time of Noah, wherein, as St. Peter says, there were but eight persons saved. Moses's account of this event may be seen Gen. vi. Vide ARK, NOAH.

We confine ourselves here to the Deluge, its causes, circumstances, universality, and effects. The sins of mankind were the causes of the Deluge; but, why was this punishment chosen rather than any other? This we know not; but if God had employed any other means of extirpating sinners, human curiosity would have formed other questions as little reasonable.

Commentators agree to place the year of the Deluge, A. M. 1656; but they find difficulties as to the month wherein it began. Several of the Fathers were of opinion, that it began and ended in the spring of the year; understanding the second month mentioned by Moses, of the second in the ecclesiastical year, beginning at Nisan, (March, O. S.) about the vernal equinox. Among other proofs, they borrow one from the dove's bringing back an olive-leaf to Noah, which was, they say, a tender shoot of that year. We believe, however, with the most learned chronologists, that the sacred author designed the second month in the civil year, which answered partly to October and partly to November: so that the Deluge began in autumn.

CALENDAR OF THE MELANCHOLY YEAR, A. M. 1656.

According to M. BASNAGE: Ant. Jud. tom. ii. p. 399.

MONTH.

- I. September. Methuselah died, aged 969 years.
- II. October. Noah and his family entered the ark.
- III. November. The fountains of the great deep broken up.
- IV. December 26. The rain began; and continued forty days and nights.
- V. January. The earth buried under the waters.
- VI. February. Rain continued.
- VII. March. The waters at their height till the 27th, when they began to abate.

VIII.

VIII. April 17. The ark rested on Mount Ararat, in Armenia.

IX. May. Waiting the retiring of the waters.

X. June 1. The tops of the mountains appeared.

XI. July 11. Noah let go a raven, which did not return.

18. He let go a dove, which returned.

25. The dove being sent a second time, brought back the olive-branch.

XII. August 2. The dove sent out a third time, returned no more.

A. M. 1657.

I. September 1. The dry land appeared.

II. October 27. Noah went out of the ark.

The question concerning the UNIVERSALITY of the Deluge, is very serious and important. Some learned men have denied it, and have pretended that to maintain it, is an absurdity; that the universality of the Deluge is contrary both to the Divine power and the Divine goodness; that it may be geometrically demonstrated, that were all the clouds in the air reduced to water, that water would not cover the superficies of the earth to the height of a foot and a half; and that all the water in the rivers and the sea, if spread over the earth, would never reach the tops of the mountains, unless rarefied in an extraordinary manner, and then it could not support the weight of the ark; that all the air which encompasses the earth, if condensed into water, would not make above thirty-one feet of water, which would be very far from enough to cover the surface of the earth and the mountains to fifty cubits above their tops.

All this, say they, seems contrary to reason, as what follows is contrary to nature. Rain does not fall upon eminences above 600 paces high: it does not descend from a greater height, and rain, if formed higher, would immediately be frozen by the cold that prevails in those upper regions: whence then came the water to cover the tops of those mountains that rise above this region? Will any one say that the rain found a way back again? How could the plants be preserved so long under water? How could the animals that came out of the ark, disperse themselves throughout the whole world? Besides, all the earth was not peopled at that time; why then should the Deluge be universal? Was it not sufficient if it reached those countries which were inhabited? How were beasts brought from the extremities of the world, and collected into the ark?

These are the principal objections against the universality of the Deluge. Isaac Vossius proposed them in his dissertation de Etate Mundi, &c. This opinion was examined while F. John Mabillon was at Rome, A. D. 1685. And the counsellors of the congregation de l'Indice having done him the honour to advise with him concerning it, he offered reasons against Vossius, and others, in his excuse.

The universality of the Deluge, says Vossius, is impossible and unnecessary; was it not sufficient to deluge those countries where there were men?—But, who told Vossius that the world was not then fully peopled? For, according to the LXX. whose chronology is supported by him, the world was above 2200 years old. Supposing a partial Deluge only, what necessity was there to build, at a great expence, a prodigious ark? to bring all sorts of animals into it for preservation? to oblige eight persons to enter into it, &c. Was it not more easy to have directed these people, &c. to travel into those countries which the Deluge was not to reach?

How could the waters continue above the mountains of Armenia without spreading into the neighbouring countries? How should the ark float many months on a mountain of water, without sliding down the declivity of it? Now, Vossius himself confesses, that supposing a partial Deluge, this would be the situation of the ark.

He says, that if the Deluge extended throughout the world, the plants and trees would have died: but that, according to his own system, they did not die, since Noah, and the animals, when they quitted the ark, settled in those very countries, which, by his confession, the Deluge overflowed. Now if the plants and trees in this country did not die, why should they die elsewhere? And if Noah stored this country afresh with them, supposing they did die, why might not the same be done elsewhere? If the waters of the Deluge destroyed the trees and plants where they reached, whence came the shoot of the olive-tree, which the dove brought to Noah? There is an infinite fertility of nature in the production and reproduction of plants; we know of many wonderful preservations of seeds, not only under the water, but in the earth, and out of the earth, for many years; we know that water, with respect to plants, is a principle infinitely more proper to preserve them, than to destroy them: that many plants grow under water, and that all vegetables require moisture to enable them to germinate; trunks of trees have been known to grow green again, and become fruitful, after having been ten or eleven years plucked up by the roots.

Add to this, that the waters of the Deluge covered the whole surface of the earth, not more than about an hundred and ten days: so that the length of time during which the seeds and plants continued under water, was far short of a year: [in fact, was not half a year.]

to Noah, is not so great as may be imagined. The number of beasts created in the beginning might not be very many. If the various tribes of mankind proceeded from one man and one woman, why may not the various kinds of animals proceed from one pair of each kind? The differences between the most unlike sorts of dogs and horses, is not greater than between the different nations of men, of whom some are white, and others black; some are of an olive colour, others red.

Besides, of every species of animals some individuals might inhabit the country about Paradise; where Noah [most probably] resided, perhaps not far from Armenia, and there is little doubt, but that Noah's ark was built in Mesopotamia, towards Chaldæa. If there be any animals, that through long habit, which becomes a second nature, cannot now live in this part of the world, (which however I think very difficult to prove) it does not follow that there were such in Noah's time. If men or beasts were suddenly conveyed from the extremely heated regions of Africa, to the coldest parts of the North, it is credible, they would perish; but the case is greatly altered, if they remove by insensible degrees to those places, or if they were bred there; and if now some creatures are found only in particular countries, we are not to infer, that there never were any of the same kind elsewhere. We know well, that formerly beasts of several species were numerous in countries where at present none of the kind inhabits, as the hippopotami in Egypt; [wolves and beavers in England; and even several kinds of birds, as the crane, stork, &c. which formerly bred in England, where they are now unknown; though they still breed in Holland.]

But the strongest objection against the universality of the Deluge is, the quantity of water requisite to cover the whole earth, to the height of fifteen cubits above the mountains.

It has been believed, that if all the air in the atmosphere around our globe, were condensed into water, it would not yield above two and thirty feet depth of water over all the earth; this calculation is founded on experiments made to prove the gravity of the air. Nevertheless, these experiments are contradicted by other experiments, which allow us to question, at least, the precision of this inference, because, there is a prodigious extent of atmosphere above that which can reasonably be supposed to have any influence on the barometer, or on any instrument which we can construct for the purpose of ascertaining the weight of the air.

At the creation the terrestrial globe was surrounded with water, the whole of which might not be exhaled into the atmosphere, but of which a part might run into reservoirs below the surface of the globe.

But wherever these primitive waters might be deposited, and whatever might become of them, certainly they were not annihilated; and it was as easy for God to restore these into the state and action of fluidity at the Deluge, as in the beginning to rarefy the other portions of water into air or vapours; or to appoint them other (inferior, or superior) situations.

Moses relates, Gen. vii. 11, 12. That the fountains of the great deep were broken up, as well as that the windows of heaven were opened;—evidently meaning to describe a rising of waters from beneath the earth, no less than a falling of waters from above upon it.

But, supposing the ark to be raised fifteen cubits above the highest mountains, how could the men and creatures in it live and breathe amidst the cold, and the extreme tenuity of the air, in that middle region? We offer two things in reply to this:

First, it is indeed colder, and the air is sharper on the tops of the highest mountains, than in the plains; but people do not die there from those causes.

Secondly, the middle region of the air in respect to temperature, is more or less elevated, according to the greater or lesser heat of the sun. During winter it is much nearer the earth than in summer; or, to speak more properly, the cold which rises into the middle region of the air during summer, descends to the lower region during winter. Thus, supposing the Deluge to be universal, it is evident, that the middle region of the air must have risen higher above the earth and waters, during the long winter of that calamity; consequently, the men and beasts enclosed in the ark, breathed nearly, or altogether, the same air as they would have ordinarily breathed a thousand or twelve hundred paces lower, i. e. on the surface of the earth.

We do not pretend by these arguments to prove, that the universal Deluge was produced without a miracle; in what manner soever it might be effected: and we confess this terrible event does involve, whether considered as universal, or as partial, very great difficulties. For, if we design, by allowing a particular Deluge only, to silence libertines, we offer violence to the text, since Moses and all the sacred authors, who mention it, express so distinctly the universality of it.

Dr. Thomas Burnet, in his Telluris Theoria Sacra, London, 1681, pretended to explain physically, how the Deluge was produced. He supposed the earth was, in its beginning, round, smooth, and even, throughout; without mountains tains or valleys; that the centre of the earth contained a great abyss of water; that the earth, by sinking in many places, and by rising in others, in consequence of different shocks and of divers earthquakes, opened a passage for the internal waters, which issued impetuously from the centre where they had been enclosed, and spread over all the earth; that, in the beginning, the axis of the earth was parallel with the axis of the world, moving directly under the equator, and producing a perpetual equinox; and that in the first world there were neither seas, nor rain, nor rainbow.

[Dr. Burnet's system is undoubtedly liable to great objections, but they rise rather from the extremes to which he pushed his suppositions, than from the general idea itself; if instead of saying the earth was uniformly level, he had admitted hills and valleys, though not such high mountains as at present; if he had admitted lakes or small seas, yet not such oceans as at present; much might have been said in support of it. For it is every way credible, that the state of the globe before the Deluge was very different from what it is at present; but to shew in what those differences might consist, requires, besides a lively fancy, a correct judgment, and much scientific information.]

Dr. Woodward thought that the whole mass of the earth being dissolved by the waters of the Deluge, a new earth was afterwards formed, composed of different beds, or layers of terrestrial matter which had floated in this fluid: that these layers were disposed one over the other, almost according to their different gravities; so that plants or animals, and particularly shell-fish, which were not dissolved like others, remained inclosed by mineral and fossile materials, which have preserved them entire, or at least have retained impressions of them: and these are what we now call fossils.

By this hypothesis he explains the shells found in places very remote from the sea, the elephants' teeth, the bones of animals, the petrified fishes, and other things found on the tops of mountains, &c. In his work are many very curious facts and observations relating to the Deluge; [and this author ranks among the first who, by inquiring into the actual appearances of nature, produced proofs of this great event still remaining in sufficient abundance. He opened those memorials of evidence which have since been enlarged by others. MR. WHITEHURST has lately trod in the same path: and MR. PARKINSON, in his "ORGANIC REMAINS OF a Former World."]

The Mussulmen, Pagans, Chinese, and Americans, have traditions of the Deluge: but each nation relates it after its own manner. Josephus, contra Appion. lib. i. cites Berosus, who on the testimony of ancient documents, describes the Deluge, much like Moses: and gives also the history of Noah, of the ark, and of the mountains where it rested. Abydenus, apud Euseb. Præpar. lib. ix. cap. 12. relates, that one Sesis-trus was informed by Saturn of a Deluge approaching to drown all the earth; that Sesis-trus, having embarked in a covered vessel, sent forth birds to learn in what condition the earth was; and that these birds returned three times. Alexander Polyhistor, relates the same story with Abydenus, adding, that the four-footed beasts, the creeping things, and birds of the air, were preserved in this vessel. Lucian, in his book de Dea Syria, says, that mankind, having given themselves up to vices, the earth was drowned by a Deluge, so that none but Deucalion remained upon it, he having taken shelter in a vessel, with his family, and the animals. Apollodorus, Ovid, and many others, have discoursed of Deucalion's deluge; but have intermixed many circumstances, which agree only with that of Noah. Apollodor. Bib. lib. i. cap. 1. Ovid. Metam. lib. i. v. 270, &c. For the Indian history of the Deluge, vide FRAGMENTS, No. XX. See also the various Articles which treat on DAGON, &c. among the PLATES.

DEMAS, Δημας, popular; from the Greek, δῆμος: otherwise, corpulent.

DEMAS, mentioned by St. Paul, was of Thessalonica: he was at first a most zealous disciple of the apostle, and very serviceable to him at Rome during his imprisonment. But some years afterwards, (about A. D. 65.) he forsook him to follow a more secular life, and withdrew to Thessalonica, his native city, 2 Tim. iv. 10. Epiphanius, Hæres. 51. informs us, that he renounced the faith, and embraced the heresy of Cerinthus, who held Jesus Christ to be a mere man. Dorotheus, in his Synopsis, says, that he became a priest to idols at Thessalonica. Others affirm, that he recovered after his fall; Estius conjectures, that St. Ignatius to the Magnesians, speaks of him, as their bishop worthy of God. But this is grounded only on a false supposition, that the second epistle to Timothy was written during Paul's first imprisonment at Rome, and before the epistle to the Colossians, and that to Philemon.

DEMETRIUS, Δημήτριος, belonging to Ceres; from δημήτηρ.

DEMETRIUS SOTER, king of Syria, reigned twelve years, from A. M. 3842 to 3854. ante A. D. 150. He was son of Seleucus IV. surnamed Philopater; but, being a hostage at Rome when his father died, his uncle Antiochus Epiphanes, who in the interim arrived in Syria, Syria, procured himself to be acknowledged king, and reigned eleven years; after him his son Antiochus Eupator, reigned two years. At length Demetrius Soter regained his father's throne. He is often mentioned in the books of the Maccabees.

II. DEMETRIUS NICANOR, or Nicator, son of Demetrius Soter. In the beginning of the war against Balas, he was sent by his father into the isle of Cnidus, to secure him against accidents, says Justin, lib. xxxv. cap. 2. After the death of his father, he continued waiting for an opportunity to recover his kingdom. Five years after the death of Demetrius, A. M. 3856, ante A. D. 148, young Nicanor passed into Cilicia with troops. Soon afterwards Apollonius, governor of Coele-Syria, joined him; and as Jonathan Maccabæus persisted in his alliance with Balas, Apollonius made war against him, but with little success. 1. Macc. x. 76—89. In the mean time Balas's affairs became worse and worse, and Nicanor strengthened himself more and more in Syria: till at length (by the assistance of Ptolemy Philometor, his father-in-law) he recovered the throne of his ancestors. When seated in security he became voluptuous and contemptible. Diodorus or Tryphon expelled him, settled Antiochus, son of Alexander Balas, on the throne in his stead; at length murdered Antiochus, and seized the throne himself; but he became odious to the soldiery, who eventually abandoned him.

Jonathan Maccabæus, solicited by Tryphon, abandoned the party of Demetrius, and espoused that of young Antiochus Theos, who permitted him to attack those cities of Phœnicia and Syria, which held out for Demetrius. Tryphon had a little before treacherously killed Judas Maccabæus, who was one of the most powerful supports of that young prince. Simon, Jonathan's brother and successor, abhorring his cruelty, sent a crown to Demetrius Nicanor, acknowledged him for king, and intreated him to exempt the Jews from tribute. This prince, banished, as it were, to Seleucia, in a corner of his dominions, readily consented; so that A. M. 3861, ante A. D. 142, the Jews were intirely freed from subjection to the Gentiles.

Demetrius resolved to make war against the Parthians; but was treacherously taken, and delivered to the king of Parthia, who treated him with honour, and gave him his own daughter in marriage. Cleopatra his first wife, whom he had left at Seleucia with his children, seeing him engaged in another marriage, offered the kingdom of Syria to Antiochus Sidetes, brother to Demetrius, if he would make her his wife. Antiochus consented, and coming into Syria, assumed the title of king, and wrote to Simon Maccabæus desiring his friendship. He reigned nine years, from A. M. 3865 to 3874. To get his brother Demetrius from the Parthians, he declared war against them; but after much success, he at last perished; Demetrius returned into Syria, and was again placed on the throne. He reigned four years after this, and was killed, A. M. 3878, ante A. D. 126. He was succeeded by his eldest son Seleucus, to whom he left a dangerous rival in the person of Alexander, surnamed Zebina.

III. DEMETRIUS, surnamed Eucærus or Eukairus, son of Antiochus Gryphus, is not mentioned in the sacred writings; but Josephus says, he made war against Alexander Jannæus, king of the Jews, at the desire of his own subjects, with 4000 foot and 3000 horse, and encamped at Sichem. Alexander marched against him at the head of 2000 Jews, and 6000 foreign soldiers. Alexander was conquered, and obliged to fly to the neighbouring mountains. The Jews, compassionating the misfortunes of their king, resorted to him from all parts, so that he soon had a body of 6000 men: and Demetrius retired. Eucærus was established in the kingdom by Ptolemy Lathyrus, A. M. 3912. He was taken and delivered some years afterwards to Mithridates, king of Parthia, who treated him honourably. Demetrius died at his court. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 22. See III. ALEXANDER JANNÆUS.

IV. DEMETRIUS, a goldsmith of Ephesus, who made niches, or little chapels, [or portable models of the famous temple] for Diana of Ephesus, which he sold to foreigners, Acts xix. 24. This man observing the progress of the gospel, not in Ephesus only, but in all Asia, assembled his fellow craftsmen; and represented that, by this new doctrine, not only their trade would suffer, but the worship of the great Diana of Ephesus was in danger of being intirely forsaken. This produced an uproar and confusion in the city; till at length the town-clerk appeased the tumult by firmness and persuasion. Vide FRAGMENT, No. CXXVII.

V. DEMETRIUS, mentioned by St. John as a virtuous Christian. Some believe him to be the Demetrius of the former article, who had renounced Heathenism to embrace Christianity. But this opinion wants proof. 3 John 12.

DEMON, or Dæmon, Δαίμων, knowing, learned. Good and bad angels, but generally bad angels, are called in Greek and Latin, Dæmons or Dæmones. The Hebrews express Demon by Serpent; Satan, or Tempter; Scheddim, or destroyers; Shirim, goats, or hairy [satyrs]; and in Greek authors we find Dæmones, or Diabolus, i. e. Calumniators, or impure spirits, &c.

The apocryphal book of Enoch, and some passages of the LXX. wherein it is said, "the sons of God saw the daughters of men, and took them wives, from whom the giants descended;" misled several of the ancient Fathers, to assert that angels and demons had certain subtle bodies, and particular passions which consist only with material substance: but the opinion commonly followed is, that angels good and bad, are immaterial spirits, created at the same time, and with the same excellencies; that some of them kept not their first state, but left their own habitation, and were precipitated into hell; but the rest, continuing faithful, were confirmed in grace and glory. Jude 6.

The Rabbins are divided in their opinions concerning demons. Some maintain, that they are spiritual, that God had not leisure to give them bodies, because the Sabbath began at that very instant when he was going to form such for them. Others pretend that they are corporeal, of different sexes, capable of generation, and subject to death.

Lactantius, lib. ii. cap. 14. believed there were two sorts of demons, celestial and terrestrial: the celestial are the fallen angels, who engaged in impure amours. The terrestrial are their issue, and these are authors of all the evils committed on earth.

The Greeks in the Council of Florence, maintained, that angels who before their fall were spiritual, became afterwards, in some degree, material and carnal; whence proceeded their inclination for bodies, as instanced in those whom they possessed, and in the legion of devils who entered the herd of swine. Matth. viii. 28, 30.

There are three opinions remarkable in authors who have written on the fall of angels; some attribute the cause of it—1. to their pride and presumption: others—2. to their envy of man: others—3. to their irregular love of women. Many join the two first causes, 1. the pride of Lucifer in his own perfections, the glory whereof he did not refer to God; and, 2. his envy of man, whom he saw like a little god stationed over the works of the Lord. This last opinion is almost the only one received at present.

Many of the ancients allotted to every man an evil angel, continually tempting him to evil, and a good angel continually inclining him to good. The Jews have the same sentiment at this day; and the same may be remarked in the ancient philosophers. Origen thinks that every vice has its presiding evil angel, the demon of avarice, the demon of fornication, the demon of pride, &c. Hómil. in Luc.

We commonly hold that the devils are in hell, where they suffer the punishment of their rebellion. But the ancient Fathers placed (vide also Ephes. vi. 12.) the devils in the air; and St. Jerom says, it was the common opinion of the doctors in the church, that the air between heaven and earth is filled with evil spirits. St. Augustin, and others of the Fathers, believed that the demons fell from the highest and purest region of the air into that near the earth, which is but darkness in comparison to the serenity and clearness of the other.

The request of the devils to our Saviour, not to send them into the deep, but to permit them to enter the herd of swine, intimates that these evil spirits found some enjoyment while on earth; and their fear of torment before the time, shews, that the time of their extreme punishment was not yet come. Matth. viii. 29. Luke viii. 31. When our Saviour pronounces sentence against the wicked, Matth. xxv. 14. he says, Depart ye cursed into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels. This fire, therefore, was only prepared for the devil, who did not as yet suffer the pain of it. But we are not to suppose that devils suffer anything at present; grief, despair, and rage, to see themselves fallen from happiness, banished to infinite and eternal misery, must be a very great punishment. Venerable Bede (in Jacob. iii.) compares the present state of devils to that of one sick of a fever, who, however he may change his place, or his posture, carries his fever with him: and this is the common opinion of divines.

That the devil formerly affected divine honours, and that whole nations were so far blinded as to pay them, cannot be questioned. They sacrificed to devils, not to God, whom they knew not. Deut. xxxii. 17. And again, They sacrificed their sons and their daughters unto devils. Psalm cvi. 17. And Baruch, Ye provoked him that made you, by sacrificing to devils, and not to God. Baruch iv. 7. I confess, notwithstanding, that the Hebrews never, that I know, paid any worship to the devil, in our sense of this word, as understanding by it Satan, the fallen angel: or the head of the fallen angels.

The heathens worshipped Pluto, or Hades, the god of hell, and other infernal deities, manes, furies, &c. But the Greeks and Romans had not the same idea of the devil (or Satan) as we have.

The Persians, who acknowledged two principles, one good, Oromazes, the other bad, Ari-manes, offered to the first sacrifices of thanksgiving.

giving, and to the second, sacrifices to avert misfortunes. They took an herb, called omoni, which they bruised in a mortar, invoking the god of hell and darkness: they mingled with it the blood of a wolf, and carried this composition to a place where the rays of the sun never entered; here they threw it down. Plutarch, de Iside & Osiride. It is said, that certain people of America [and Africa] pay superstitious worship to the devil, i. e. the evil principle, under whose government they suppose this earth to be.

Josephus, de Bello, lib. vii. cap. 25. tells us, that the demons which possess certain persons, and sometimes kill them, are the souls of the wicked.

DENARIUS, a Roman coin, worth four sesterces, generally valued at seven pence three farthings English. In the New Testament, it is taken for a piece of money, in general; or a shekel, which was the common coin among the Hebrews, before they were subjected to the Romans. Mark, xii. 15, and Luke, xx. 24. calls that denarius, which Matthew, xxi. 19. calls numisma census, the piece of money paid in Judæa to the Romans as a capitation. The Rabbins by the word denarius generally understand a quarter of a shekel, about seven pence English. See Dr. Arbuthnot on the Denarius, who discourses of it at large with his usual accuracy and learning. Tables of Ancient Coins, &c. p. 15.

DERBE, Δερβη, Hebrew דרבן darban, a sting. [Walled round, or surrounded by a fosse. A city in Lycaonia; or Isauria, as Strabo says, lib. xii.]

DERBE, hither St. Paul and Barnabas retreated, after having been expelled from Iconium, Acts xiv. 6. A. D. 41. Gaius, host to St. Paul, and to St. John the Evangelist, was a native of Derbe, Acts xx. 4.

DESART, 'Ερημος. The Hebrews, by מדרב, Midbar, "desart," mean an uncultivated place, particularly if mountainous. Some desarts were entirely dry and barren; others were beautiful, and had good pastures; Scripture speaks of the beauty of the desart, Psalm lxiv. 13. Jer. ix. 10. Joel i. 20. Scripture names several desarts in the Holy Land; and there was scarcely a town without a desart belonging to it, [i. e. uncultivated places, for woods and pastures; like our English commons: Common lands.] Reland: Palæst. cap. i.

ARABIA, Desart of, wherein the Israelites sojourned forty years after leaving Egypt, is particularly called the Desart. The Mahometans reduce these forty years to forty days. One of their poets, ridiculing the Jews, says, they are always wandering in the Desart.

ANNON, or AMON, desart of, in the wilderness,

Numb. xxi. 13. Arnon is a brook which runs along the desart of Gilead, or the frontiers of Arabia Deserta.

DIBLAH, desart of, in the land of Moab. Jerem. xlviii. 22.

EDOM, desart of. We cannot determine its limits; as Edom extended far into Arabia.

EGYPT, desart of, Ezekiel, xx. 36. seems to denote the desart wherein the Hebrews sojourned after quitting Egypt. Tobit (viii. 3.) speaks of the desarts of Upper Egypt, probably of the Thebais.

JUDÆA, desart of, where John the Baptist preached, about Jericho: Matth. iii. 1.

KADESH, desart of, about Kadesh Barnea, in the south of Judah, and in Arabia Petræa.

MAON, desart of, 1 Kings xxiii. 24. in the country, and perhaps near the capital, of the Maonians, or Meonians, in Arabia Petræa, at the extremity of Judah.

PALMYRA, desart of. Solomon built Palmyra, in the desart, between the Euphrates and the rivers Orontes and Chrysorroas. See TADMOR.

PARAN, desart of, was in Arabia Petræa, near the city of Paran. Ishmael dwelt in this wilderness, Gen. xxi. 11. Habakkuk says (iii. 3.) that the Lord appeared to his people in the mountains of Paran. The Hebrews remained long in this desart. See PARAN.

SHUR, desart of, lies north [E.] of the Red Sea. Hagar wandered in this wilderness. Israel, after passing the Red Sea, came into the desart of Shur. Here was, probably, a city named Shur.

SIN, desart of. There are two desarts of this name in Scripture; the first, written with a Samech, סן, Exod. xvi. 1. lies between Elim and Mount Sinai. The second, written with a Tzade, צן, Tzin, Exod. ix. 2. is near Kadesh Barnea; this town was in the desart of Sin, or Tzin, Numb. xxi. 1; xxxiii. 12.

SINAI, desart of, adjacent to Mount Sinai. The people encamped here a long time, and received most of their laws here.

TEKOA, desart of, BOSOR, desart of, GIBRON, desart of, i. e. the uncultivated places, or commons, near those cities. See their articles.

ZIPH, desart of, whither David fled from Saul. See ZIPH.

The DESART, absolutely speaking, signifies frequently, the desarts of Arabia, between Jordan, or the mountains of Gilead, and the river Euphrates: Exod. xxiii. 31. God promised the children of Israel all the land between the wilderness and the river, i. e. all the country from the mountains of Gilead to the Euphrates. In Deut. xi. 24. he promises them all between Libanus, the desart, the Euphrates, and the Mediterranean.

DESSAU, Δεσάυ, fat; from the Greek δασύς; or or ashes, from the Hebrew dasha. The Hebrew dasha, signifies to bud, to put forth.

DESSAU, a town, or castle, near to which the Israelites lodged themselves under Judas Maccabæus: 2 Macc. xiv. 16. The situation of it we know not.

DEUEL, or duel, ἡγάκη, Ἐπιστήμη. Knowledge, or science of God; from יָדַע jadah, to know, and אֱל el, God. The LXX. read Raguel, ῥαῆλ, instead of ῥαδελ.

DEUEL, of Gad, father of Eliasaph, Numb. vii. 47.

DEVIL. See DEMON, DIABOLUS, and ANGEL.
DEVOTING. The most ancient instance, and indeed the only instance, of devoting, strictly speaking, in SS. is that which Balak king of Moab would have had Balaam use against Israel, Numb. xxii. 6.

Josephus has furnished us with another, Antiq. lib. xiv. cap. 4. & de Bello. lib. i. cap. 5. During the disputes in Judæa between the two brothers Hircanus and Aristobulus, for the high-priesthood and dominion over the Jews, Aristobulus, with his people, being shut up in the temple by Hircanus, who occupied Jerusalem with his party; the latter sent for one Onias, who was reputed a great saint, and was reported to have obtained rain in a time of drought by his prayers; and they imagined that his curses would draw down the vengeance of heaven upon Aristobulus.

Onias long resisted their importunities; at length, finding they incessantly tormented him, he lifted up his hands to heaven in the midst of the army, saying, O Lord God, who art governor of the universe, since they who are with us are thy people, and they who are besieged are thy priests, hearken not unto the prayers of either the one or the other against the opposite party. They who invited him, enraged at finding their expectation frustrated, stoned him on the spot, and cruelly murdered him.

Several devotings of another sort are noticed in sacred history; as, when any people, city, country, or family was devoted, for instance, the Canaanites and Amalekites; the town of Horemah, the family of Achan, the city of Jericho. On these occasions they generally destroyed every thing contained in these provinces and cities.

The heathen who admitted a plurality of gods, and who believed them to be subordinate in power one to another, used enchantments and devotings to bring mischief on their enemies. They sometimes called forth the tutelary deities of cities, to deprive their enemies of their protection and defence. It is said, that for fear of this, the Tyrians chained the statue of Apollo to the altar of Hercules, the tutelary deity of their city, lest he should forsake them, Q. Curt. lib. iv. [i. e. they combined intellect, genius—Apollo, with strength, activity—Hercules, for their cities' defence.]

The Romans, says Macrobius Saturnal. lib. iii. cap. 9. being persuaded that every city had its tutelary deities, when attacking a city, used certain verses to call forth its gods, believing it impossible otherwise to take the town; and even when they might take a place, they thought it would be a great crime to take the gods captive with it; for this reason the Romans concealed the real names of their cities very closely, they being different from what they generally called them; they concealed likewise the names of the tutelary gods of their cities. Pliny informs us, that the secret name of Rome, was Valentia, and that Valerius Soranus was severely punished for revealing it. Lib. iii. cap. 5. Solin. cap. 2. Plutarch, Problem 2.

The form used by the Romans in calling forth the tutelary god of a city was as follows: "If it be god or goddess under whose guard are the city and people of Carthage, I beseech thee, O great god, who hast taken this town and people under thy tuition, I conjure and entreat thee, graciously to abandon the city and people of Carthage, to forsake all their dwellings, temples, and sacred places, to cast them off, to inspire them with fear, terror, and forgetfulness, and to retire to Rome among our people; let our habitations, our temples, our sacred things, and our city, be more agreeable to thee; demonstrate to us that thou art my protector, the protector of the Roman people, and of my soldiers. If thou dost this, I engage myself by a solemn vow to found temples and institute games in honour of thee." Macrobius. Sat. lib. iii. cap. 9. We see the evocation of the gods of Veia, in Livy, Decad. i. lib. v.

Of the devoting hostile armies, or besieged places, we have an example in Macrobius, Saturn. lib. iii. cap. 9. "Dis-Pater, (this was Pluto) Jupiter, ye Manes, or by what other name ye will be called, I earnestly beseech you to spread fear and terror in the army I shall mention to you, and throughout the city of Carthage. May ye look upon all as devoted and accursed, may ye deprive them of light, and remove at a distance from this country all those who shall bear arms against us, and shall attack our legions and our armies; may all their armies, fields, cities, heads, and lives, be comprised within this wish, as far as they may be comprised in it by the most solemn devoting. Wherefore I devote them, I charge them with all the mischief that may happen to myself, to our magistrates, to the Roman people, to our armies, and our legions; that ye may preserve me myself, and those who employ me, the empire's legions, and our army, which is concerned in this war. If you please to do these things, as I know and understand them, I promise you, O Earth, mother of all things, and you, great Jupiter, a sacrifice of three black sheep."

DEUTERONOMY, Δευτερονόμιον, the second law, or repetition of the law.

DEUTERONOMY. The fifth book of the Pentateuch. The Greeks gave it this name, because Moses herein recapitulates what he had ordained in the preceding books. The Hebrews call it elle haddebarim, which are the first words of this book. Some Rabbins call it Mishnah, the second law; others, the book of reprehensions, by reason of the reproaches which occur in chap. i. viii. ix. xxviii. xxx. xxxii. This book contains the history of what passed in the wilderness from the beginning of the eleventh month, to the seventh day of the twelfth month, in the fortieth year after their departure from Egypt; i. e. about six weeks.

Some have questioned whether this book were written by Moses, because it mentions his death, and the author speaks of the land beyond Jordan, like one who writes on this side, west of that river. (Vide AARON IX.) We allow that the relation of Moses's death was added to this book; but the word עבר Heber, translated beyond Jordan, may likewise be translated on this side. [Rather along-side of the place to which it refers.]

In the book of Deuteronomy, Moses addresses the people, reciting what had passed since their coming out of Egypt. He states to them the laws of God which he had received at Sinai, which he explains, and adds some others; he also exhorts the people to obedience; and declares, that Joshua was appointed by God to succeed him. He wrote down this transaction, committed the writing to the Levites and elders, and charged them to read it every seven years, in a general assembly of the people, at the feast of tabernacles, Deut. xxxi. 9, 10—14. It includes also his last song; to which is added the history of his death, &c.

DEW. Dews in Palestine are very plentiful; like a small shower of rain every morning. Gideon filled a bowl with the dew which fell on a fleece of wool, Judg. vi. 38. Isaac blessing Jacob, wished him the dew of heaven which fattens the fields, Gen. xxvii. 28. In those warm countries, and where it rains but seldom, the night-dews supply the want of showers.

Isaiah (xviii. 4.) speaks of rain as if it were a dew, like a cloud of dew in the heat of harvest. He says also, chap. xxvi. 19. that the dew which God causes to fall on his people, is a bright dew; ros lucis ros tuus; a dew which revives, enlightens, i. e. restores liberty to thy captives. Speaking of the captivity of Babylon, he compares his captive people to withered and dying grass, which the dew refreshes and strengthens. Others [with Eng. Tr.] translate, "thy dew is as the dew of herbs." See Hosea vi. 4. xiii. 8. xiv. 5. Micah. v. 7.

DIABOLUS. We rarely meet with this word in the Old Testament. Sometimes it answers to the Hebrew Belial: sometimes to Satan. The first signifies a libertine; the second, an adversary, or an accuser. [The Satan of Job i. 6, is rendered ὁ διαβολος, by the LXX.]

We have spoken, in the article DEMONS, of the fall of Lucifer. The Eblis of the Mahometans is the same with our Lucifer. The name Eblis comes pretty near that of Diabolus. The Mussulmen call him likewise Azazel, which is the Scripture name for the scape-goat; and is probably the Azazel of the book of Enoch. They maintain, that Eblis was called by this name, signifying [perdition, or] refractory, [which is pretty near the meaning of Belial, to which it seems to be related] because, having received orders to prostrate himself before Adam, he would not comply, under pretence that being of the superior nature of fire, he ought not to bend the knee to Adam, who was formed only of earth. They say the angels were created many thousand years before Adam, and that the fire whereof they were composed, is of a much greater activity than ordinary fire; and of the nature of lightning.

Diabolus signifies sometimes the devil, as Wisd. ii. 24. "Through envy of the devil, came death into the world." Sometimes an accuser, an adversary who prosecutes before the judges; as Psalm cix. 6. "Let his accuser [Satan] be at his right hand, and when he is judged, let him be condemned." Ecclus. xxi. 30. "When the wicked curseth his adversary, he curseth himself." He drew this enemy upon himself by his own bad conduct; had he been wise, he would have had no enemy. Others understand it of the devil: he who curseth the devil who tempts him, and seduces him into sin, should complain only of himself; of his own will, and wickedness, his own promptitude to transgress.

DIADEM, Διαδῆμα, a diadem; from the Greek preposition δια, and the verb δέω, ligo, to bind. See CROWN.

DIAL, is not mentioned in Scripture before the reign of Ahaz, A. M. 3262, ante A: D. 726, and we do not clearly ascertain, that, even after his reign, the Jews generally divided their time by hours; but continued to reckon it after their their former manner. The word hour occurs first in Tobit; Tobit and Tobias continued prostrate three hours, says the Vulgate, which likewise is the reading of the Chaldee. This may confirm the opinion of those who maintain, that the invention of dials came from beyond the Euphrates, Herod. lib. ii. cap. 109. But others believe, that this invention came from the Phœnicians, and that the first traces of it are discoverable in what Homer says of an island called Syria, lying above Ortygia, where the revolutions of the sun are observed: i. e. in this island they see the returns of the sun; the solstices. As the Phœnicians are thought to have inhabited this island of Syria, it is presumed, that they left there this monument of their skill in astronomy. Vide Hours.

Νῆσος τίς Συρίη κυκλίσσεται (ἵππῳ ἀνδρῶν)

Ὀρτυγίης καθυπερβείη, ἴδῃ τρώσῃσι Χαλδαίοι.

ODYSSEY, XV. v. 402.

About three hundred years after Homer, Pherecydes, in the same island, set up a sun-dial to distinguish the hours, Laert. in Pherecyd. The Greeks confess that Anaximander first divided time by hours, and introduced sun-dials, among them, Laert. lib. ii. vide & Suidam, & Euseb. Præpar. lib. x. Usher fixes the death of Anaximander to A. M. 3457, ante A. D. 547, under the reign of Cyrus, and during the captivity of Babylon. As this philosopher travelled into Chaldæa, he might bring with him from thence the dial and the needle, which were both in use there. Pliny gives the honour of this invention to Anaximenes, by mistake confounding the disciple with the master: for, as M. Basnage observes, it is more reasonable to think Pliny was mistaken than Diogenes Laertius; or [rather] that this name is an erroneous reading.

For the dial of Ahaz, see 2 Kings xx. 1, 2, &c. This was about twelve years after the death of Ahaz, A. M. 3291.

Interpreters differ concerning the form of this dial of Ahaz: St. Cyril of Alexandria, and St. Jerom believed, (Cyrrill. in Isai. lib. iii. t. 4. Hieron. in Isai. xxviii.) it was a stair-case so disposed, that the sun shewed the hours upon it by the shadow: the generality of expositors have followed this notion. Others, as Pagn. Munst. Sanct. Vatab. believe it was a pillar erected in the middle of a very level and smooth pavement, upon which the hours were engraved. The lines marked on this pavement are, according to these authors, what the Scripture calls degrees. Grotius describes it thus, after Rabbi Elias Chomer: It was a concave hemisphere, in the midst whereof was a globe, the shadow of which fell upon several lines, engraved in the concavity of the hemisphere:

these lines, say they, were eight-and-twenty in number. This description comes pretty near to that kind of dial which the Greeks called Scapha, a boat, or hemispherion; the invention whereof Vitruvius attributes to a Chaldæan, named Berosus, Vitruv. lib. ix. cap. 9.

As to the retrogradation of the shadow on this dial, and the manner of it, whether the sun did really go backwards, or whether the reflection of his rays was occasioned by some cloud formed suddenly, which produced this effect supernaturally, is what opinions are very much divided about. [Most probably the latter: or, a peculiar refraction in the atmosphere, pro tempore.]

The RETROGRADATION of the Sun on the Dial of Ahaz requires a serious examination. Some authors, as Pereira and Spinosa, believe this retrogradation was not real, but apparent only; that the change was only in the shadow, which fell on Ahaz's dial, and not in the motion of the sun, which luminary continued in progressive motion as usual; but the solar rays being deflected in an extraordinary manner by the interposition of a cloud, or some other means, they produced the change, or retrogradatory motion, of the place of the shadow in Ahaz's dial.

Whether the ten degrees denoted so many hours, we are not able to decide: there might be many degrees for one hour. Scripture does not say, that this day was longer than any other. If the miracle consisted in changing the determination of the sun's rays to a particular point, and for a short time, the day was not longer than ordinary; even supposing the sun to have stopped in its course: it does not follow that the day was ten hours longer than other days, because it is not certain, that every degree denoted an hour. The reader may likewise, if he pleases, consult M. Basnage's History of the Jews, tom. vi. p. 213, and M. Benoit's Letters at the end of the same volume, wherein he shows, that the retrogradation of the sun prolonged the day not above two thirds of an hour. Vide the PLATES, and FRAGMENTS, No. II. CII. Also WATCHES, No. CCLXIII.

DIANA, Ἀρτεμις; this, as a Latin word, may signify luminous. The Greek ἄρτεμις, imports perfect.

DIANA, a celebrated goddess of the Heathen, honoured especially at Ephesus. She was one of the twelve superior Deities; called likewise Hebe, Trivia, and Hecate. In the heavens she was the moon, on earth Diana, in hell Hecate. She was invoked by women in child-birth under the name of Lucina. She was painted with a crescent on her head, a bow in her hand, and dressed in a hunting habit. She passed for a virgin. Bees were consecrated to her.

Diana

Diana of Ephesus was otherwise represented. Her statue was covered with breasts, sometimes from head to foot; sometimes her bosom only and her belly, all below was a kind of pedestal, adorned with heads of stags, dogs, oxen, &c. The breasts were an emblem of her fertility, as sustaining men and beasts. Vide PLATES, and FRAGMENT, No. CXXVII.

Diana was said to be daughter of Jupiter and Latona, and twin sister to Apollo. She was worshipped in Palestine in the times of Isaiah and Jeremiah, under the name of Meni, the goddess of months, the moon. Likewise as queen of heaven; cakes were offered to her on terraces on the tops of houses, at the corners of the streets, or at the doors of houses. The children gather wood, and the fathers kindle the fire, and the women knead their dough to make cakes to the queen of heaven, says Jeremiah, vii. 18. xi. 13. xlv. 17, 18. Ezek. xvi. 24. Vide MENI, MOON, ASTARTE, ASHTAROTH.

DIBLAIM, דבלים, Δεβλημ, heaps, or frails, of figs. Father of Gomer, wife of the prophet Hosea. Hos. i. 3.

DIBLATHA, דבלתה, a frail of figs; [a mass or lump of dried figs]. A city mentioned by Ezekiel, which Stephens thinks should be read Riblatha, the ד ר and ר ר being much alike in the Hebrew. Hiller thinks, that dried figs were made in the town of Dibla, a city of the Moabites, abounding in that fruit; whence Diblatha, Ezek. vi. 14, imports "towards Diblath." The same is called Diblathaim [or, Almondiblathaim; vide ALMON.] in the dual form, Numb. xxxiii. 46. so that, probably, it was a double city; and we read of Beth Diblathaim, Jerem. xlviii. 22, which imports either the "temple of the double town of Diblathaim;" or, the "the temple of the repositories of lumps of dried figs;" or "the temple of Almon," the hidden Aun "of Diblathaim,"]

DIBON, דבן, understanding, abundance of knowledge, or of building; from בנה banah, to build, or בנה binah, to understand: according to the Syriac, gliding away.

[Son of abundance; otherwise, abundance of intelligence, or edification: from the Syriac, a flow. Some derive it from Daba, whose root in Arabic signifies quiet, tranquillity, security: or, rest in safety.

A city of Moab, so called from softly flowing waters; thought to be the Dimon of Isaiah xv. 9.

The name Dibon importing, I presume, Dibaun, is written full, except in Numb. xxi. 30. It appears, to denote a deity; and this the rather, because, in Jer. xlviii. 18, where our translation reads "Thou daughter that dost inhabit Dibon;" the original is, simply, "Thou inhabitress of Beth-Dibaun," and as the towns, or rather the temples which gave names to the towns, of Beth-Gamul, Beth-Meon, are mentioned in the following verses, why should not Beth-Dibaun be of a like character with them? In verse 22. Dibaun is associated with Nebo; and, as we know that Nebo was an idol, it should seem that Dibaun was of the same class.

There is, however, some difficulty in determining the character of this deity. If the name be derived from Duba, then it imports "the Aun reposing;" not so much referring to Morpheus, the god of sleep, as to an Oriental divinity; for it accurately expresses the attitude and description of the Indian deity Vishnuh, who thus reposes on the mighty waters, under the protection of the serpent Ananta; referring, no doubt, to Noah, preserved in the ark by the miraculous exertion of Divine power. Vide FRAGMENT, No. XX. But, if this name be derived from the Hebrew Dub, to mutter, then it imports "the Aun of muttering;" and may refer to a mode used by the priests of this temple in giving answers to applicants; a kind of oracle; and so not wholly unlike DEBIR.

Perhaps, this name imports much the same as some others: "the Aun of complaint," lamentation, or mourning. Vide ADDON, AZMON, CABBON, et al.]

DIBON, דבון, Διβων, Hebrew, Dimon: full of blood; from דם dam: otherwise, dung: from דמן domen.

DIBON, a city given to the tribe of Gad by Moses, afterwards yielded to Reuben, Numb. xxii. 3, 33, 34. Josh. xiii. 9. Eusebius says, Dibon was a large town on the river Arnon. Probably Dibon-Gad, Numb. xxxiii. 45. an encampment of the Hebrews. St. Jerom says, it was called indifferently Dibon or Dimon.

II. DIBON, in Judah, the same perhaps as Debir or Kirjath-Sepher, Nehem. xi. 25. The LXX. call that place Dibon, which in Hebrew is Debir. Joshua xiii. 26.

DIBON-GAD, דיבון גאד, abundance of sons happy and powerful; from דד dad, abundance, or fortunate; and בן ben, a son, and from גאד gad, great, powerful: otherwise, happy, or great understanding, or edifice; from בנה binah to understand, or בנה banah, to build: otherwise, abundance of sons armed or dressed. [q. Dibon of Gad? Numb. xxxiii. 45, 46. "The Aun of good fortune reposing."] DIBRI, דברי, from דבר, Δαβρι my word. The father of Shelomith, of Dan. Levit. xxiv. 11—13.

DIDRACHMA, Διδραχμα, Matth. xvii. 23. A Greek word, signifying a piece of money in value two drachms; about fourteen pence English. The Jews were by law obliged, every person, to pay two drachms, i. e. half a shekel, to the temple. To pay this our Lord sent Peter to catch a fish, which probably had just swallowed such a coin. See CAPITATION.

DIDYMUS, i. e. a twin. This is the signification of the Hebrew, or Syriac, word Thomas. See THOMAS. John xi. 16. xx. 24.

DIGIT, אצבע, Etzbah, a measure containing $\frac{9}{16}$ of an inch. There are four digits in a palm, and six palms in a cubit: a cubit is twenty-one inches.

DIKLAH, דקלה, his diminution; from דק dek, ah, his: rather decla, a palm, or palm-tree.

DIKLAH, seventh son of Joktan. His descendants are placed either in Arabia Felix, which abounds in palm-trees, called Dikla in Chaldee and Syriac; or in Assyria, where is the town of Degla. [and the river Tigris, or Dikkel.]

DILEAN, דלען, Δαλλάν, poor, afflicted; from דלל datal; or of the poor; from דלל poor, and דנה onah, to answer, to sing, to afflict; [from the Hebrew and Syriac, a poor sheep. A city in Judah, Josh. xv. 38.

The Chaldee root for this word denotes a pumpkin, or gourd; and the name may express a town famous for that kind of vegetable: "Pumpkin-town." Otherwise, it might take its name from its situation, as being on a hill named the Pumpkin; whether from its shape, or from any other circumstance.]

DIMNAH, דמנה, murder, silence; from דם dam: otherwise, his resemblance; from דם dam, and נה na, his: otherwise, dung; from דמן domen. A city of Zebulun, Josh. xxi. 35. Given to the Levites of Merari's family.

[Perhaps the soil of this neighbourhood was very clayey, and adhered to the feet of travellers; somewhat like what we call greasy. The Arabic root imports excrementitious. Might any kind of marle, or fat earth, whether or not used as manure for land, abound in this neighbourhood? Comp. MADMENAH.]

[DIMON, Isaiah xv. 9.: where we read, "the waters of Dimon shall be full of blood;" this name is interpreted bloody, or excrementitious; but it seems better to refer it to the sense given in DIBON, as the root imports quiet, composure, or recumbency.]

DIMONA, a town in south Judah, Josh. xv. 22.

DIMONAH, דמנה, dung; from דמן domen: otherwise, present, or number abounding; from דאי dai, abounding, and מנה manah, to number, or מנח manach or mincha, a present, or gift.

DINAH, דינה, judgment, or who judges; from דין din.

DINAH, daughter of Jacob and Leah: Gen. xxx. 21. She was born after Zebulun, about A. M. 2250, ante A. D. 1754. When Jacob returned into Canaan, Dinah, then about the age of fifteen or sixteen, had the curiosity to attend a festival of the Shechemites, to see the women of the country, Gen. xiv. 1, 2. Shechem, son of Hamor the Hivite, prince of the city, having seen her, conceived a great desire for her, and ravished [seduced] her. Afterwards, he desired his father Hamor to procure this young woman for his wife. Dinah's brothers being informed of what had passed, were strongly exasperated at it: they made insidious proposals to Shechem, to his father Hamor, and to the inhabitants of their city; whom they afterwards slew and plundered; carried off Dinah, and thus revenged the affront offered to their sister: all this they did without the knowledge or consent of their father Jacob; who afterwards cursed them for it.

What became of Dinah after this affair we cannot tell. The Hebrews assert, that she was married to Job; whereof there is no proof. Certainly if Job and Jobab, the fourth son of Esau, Jacob's brother, be the same person, there is no probability that Dinah could live so long as to become his wife; [but, may not this notion suggest their idea of Dinah's inconsiderate character? See Job ii. 9.]

DINAITES, דינאי, judges or judgment; from דין din. A people who opposed the rebuilding of the temple, Ezra iv. 9.

DINHABAH, דינהבה, his judgment in her, or she gives judgment; from דין din, judgment, and ה ah, his or hers, and ב beth, in, and ה ah, her: otherwise, who gives judgment; from דין and יתב to give. A city of Edom, Gen. xxxvi. 32.

[The Chaldee root imports fatness; the Arabic, oil; and the form of the word appears to imply "the giver of abundant quantities of oil."]

DIOCESAREA. See SEPHORIS.

DIODOTUS, otherwise called TRYPHON, had been a captain in the troops of Alexander Balas. Observing that Nicanor, king of Syria, had incurred the hatred of his soldiers, he undertook to place Antiochus upon the throne, who was son to his master Balas, and a child, then living in the court of Elmachuel, king of the Arabians. He succeeded in this attempt, and governed absolutely in the young prince's name: but he grew weary of having only the title of deputy, so he procured the death of Antiochus, and seized the throne.

Being desirous to secure the protection of the Romans, he sent a golden statue of Fortune to the senate, which weighed ten thousand pieces of gold. The senate received the golden image; but recorded in the inscription, that it was given by young Antiochus, who had been killed by Tryphon. Diodor. Sicul. Legat. 81.

Simon Maccabæus seeing robberies every where committed by Tryphon embraced the party of Demetrius Nicanor, 1 Macc. xiii. 34, 37. Even Tryphon's own soldiers deserted him, and went over to Cleopatra, wife of Demetrius, who was beyond the Euphrates, making war against the Parthians. Tryphon fled to Apamea, the place of his birth, where he was put to death. Josephus, Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 12. and Strabo, lib. xiv. say, he was pressed so closely in a castle, where he had shut himself up, that he was obliged to kill himself. George Syncellus relates, that he threw himself into a fire. Syncell. in Chronico.

DIONYSIUS, Διονύσιος, divinely touched; from διος, divine, and νύω, to strike; or rather, child of Jupiter.

DIONYSIUS, the Areopagite. Acts xvii. 34. The auditors of St. Paul, when speaking in the Areopagus at Athens, he mentioned the resurrection of the dead, mocked at the supposition; but, some said they would hear him some other time: nevertheless a few embraced the faith; among whom was Dionysius, a senator of the Areopagus. A. D. 56. This is almost all we know of Dionysius the Areopagite. Some have been of opinion that Damaris was his wife; but, of this we have no proof. St. Chrysostom, de Sacerdoti, lib. iv. cap. 7. declares Dionysius to have been a citizen of Athens; which is credible, because the judges of the Areopagus generally were so. An author (Cæsar, Dialog. qu. 112.) tells us, he was of Thrace; but for this one witness only is cited; and he is not very capable of persuading us. After his conversion, Dionysius was made the first bishop of Athens: having laboured, and suffered much in the gospel, he is said to have been burnt at Athens, A. D. 95. The Greeks keep his festival October 3. The Latins, since the time of Louis le Debonnaire, have been persuaded, that Dionysius the Areopagite, first bishop of Athens, is the same with Denis, first bishop of Paris. But that these saints are two different persons is now acknowledged. I say nothing of the works of Dionysius the Areopagite. Those attributed to him are generally reputed spurious.

DIOSCORUS, Δίσκορος, son of Jupiter. Castor and Pollux were so called. Vide CASTOR.

DIOSPOLIS, Διοσπολις, the city of Jupiter.

DIOSPOLIS, vide LYDDA.

II. DIOSPOLIS. We do not meet with this name in the sacred writings; but Nahum, in all probability, intended this city under the name of No Ammon. Vide AMMON I.

DIOTREPHEs, Διοτρεφής, nourished by Jupiter, or Jupiter's foster-child; from the Greek διος, of Jupiter, and τρέφω, a foster-child.

DIOTREPHEs. Who Diotrephes was, we cannot tell, nor whether he were in any church office, as bishop, or of what church. Grotius believes that Gaius, to whom St. John wrote his third epistle, and who lived in the same place as Diotrephes, was of one of the seven churches named in the Revelations. Lightfoot is of opinion, that he lived at Corinth. Diotrephes did not receive with hospitality those whom St. John had sent to him, nor would he suffer others to do so. Oecumenius, Bede, and some modern commentators, think Diotrephes was a heretic: others think he was a judatizing Christian, who would not admit gentile converts to his table: others affirm quite the contrary, that Diotrephes would not receive those converted to Judaism. See 3 John, 9.

DIPONDIIUM, Διπόνδιον, two Oboli; from the Greek δις, twice, and pondus, weight.

DIPSAS, Διψάς, from ἐδίψαω, I thirst.

DIPSAS, a serpent, whose biting produces such a thirst as proves mortal; whence it is called in Greek, dipsas, thirsty: in Latin, situla, a pail: as if so great thirst could drink pails of water. Moses mentions, Deut. viii. 15. "that desert in which were fiery serpents;" יָמֵי טְרִימָאֵן. The Hebrew answers well to the Greek, dipsas, and expresses the thirst occasioned by the biting of this serpent. Some understand by it a desert and dry place.

DISCERNING of spirits. A divine gift, mentioned 1 Cor. xii. 10. It consisted in discerning among those who professed to be inspired by God, whether they were inspired by a good or an evil spirit; whether truly or falsely: [and whether they were sincere in their profession of Christianity; I suppose, sometimes.] This gift was of very great importance both under the Old Testament, wherein we find that false prophets often rose up, and seduced the people; and under the New Testament, in the primitive ages of the church, when supernatural gifts were frequent; when the messenger of Satan was sometimes transformed into an angel of light; and false apostles, under the meek appearance of sheep, concealed the disposition of ravening wolves.

DISCIPLE. The proper signification of this word is well known. Absolutely taken, it signifies, in the New Testament, a believer, a Christian, a follower of Jesus Christ.

Disciple is often used instead of apostle, in the gospels; but, subsequently, apostles were distinguished from disciples.

The seventy-two, who followed our Saviour from the beginning, are called disciples; as are others who were simple professors and bore no office: [and some who professed to follow him, for a time only, and then fell away.]

DISEASES. Many kinds of diseases are mentioned in Scripture. The Hebrews attributed buted sundry diseases to the devil. Concerning the diseases observable in Scripture, consult Francis Valesius, de Sacra Philosophia; Thomas Bartolinius, de Morbus Biblicis; and William Adenus; Christianus Warlitzius, on the same subject. See PHYSICIANS.

Diseases and death are consequences of sin; this idea of them we receive from Scripture. The ancient Hebrews, not much accustomed to recur to physical causes, often imputed them to evil spirits. If their infirmities appeared unusual, and especially if the cause were unknown to them, they concluded it was a stroke from the avenging hand of God; to him the wisest and most religious had recourse for cure; and king Asa is blamed (2 Chron. xvi. 12.) for placing his confidence in physicians, under a very painful fit of the gout in his feet; and not applying to the Lord. Job's friends ascribed all his distempers to God's justice. Leprosies were treated as sacred diseases; the priests judged of their nature and qualities; shut up the diseased, declared the disorder healed, or still existing in the patient, &c. Miriam, Gehazi, and king Uzziah, were smitten suddenly with a leprosy; the first as a punishment for detraction; the second for avarice; and the third for presumption.

In the gospel many diseases are attributed to the devil. Luke xiii. 16. Ought not this woman, a daughter of Abraham, whom Satan hath bound, lo these eighteen years, to be loosed from this bond on the sabbath-day? The same person is mentioned as having a spirit of infirmity, in verse 11. We read of a dumb devil; of another that could scarcely speak; i. e. of demons who caused these infirmities; and whenever Jesus Christ or his apostles restored such persons to health, they began with driving out the devil; and the cure of the person was quickly accomplished.

In other cases our Saviour began with forgiving the sins of the patient, and then proceeded to cure the disease: Datur nobis intelligentia propter peccata pleraque corporum debilitates; & idcirco forsitan dimituntur prius peccata, ut causis debilitatis ablatis, sanitas restituatur, says St. Jerom, in Matth. ix. 4. St. Paul delivers the incestuous Corinthian to Satan "for the destruction of his flesh," that the evil spirit might afflict him with diseases, 1 Cor. v. 5. [Vide FRAGMENT, No. CLIII.] The same apostle attributes the death and diseases of many Corinthians to their communicating unworthily: 1 Cor. xi. 30. For this cause many are weak and sickly among you, and many sleep. He also, elsewhere, ascribes the infirmities wherewith he was afflicted to an evil angel:—"a thorn in the flesh—an angel of Satan to buffet me," 2 Cor. xii. 7. An angel of death slew the first-born of the Egyptians; a destroying angel wasted Sennacherib's army; an avenging angel smote the people of Israel with a pestilence, after David's sin. Saul fell into a fit of deep melancholy, [hypocondriacal depression] and it is said "an evil spirit seized him." Vide ANGELS II. 2. Abimelech, king of Gerar, for taking Sarah, the wife of Abraham, was threatened with death, Gen. xx. 3, 4. The Philistines were smitten with an ignominious disease, for not treating the ark with adequate respect. These diseases, and others that we read of, were evident interpositions of Providence, by whatever agency they were produced.

DISHAN, דִּישָׁן, fat; from דָּשָׁן dashen: otherwise, ashes: from the same. LXX. Rishon.

DISHAN, and DISHON, sons of Seir, the Horite. [Gen. xxxvi. 21, 30. 1 Chron. i. 38: also 26, 42. Perhaps a species of the wild goat, or the antelope kind: the pygargus, dama.]

DISHON, דִּישָׁן, ashes, or trituration.

DISPERSION. St. Peter and St. James wrote to the Jews of the dispersion, 1 Pet. i. Jam. i. 1. St. Peter directs his letter to those who were dispersed in the countries of Pontus, Galatia, Bithynia, Asia, Cappadocia; St. James still more uncertainly addresses the twelve tribes scattered abroad. Not that all the tribes were then dispersed; for Judæa was yet filled with Jews; (these epistles being written before the war between the Jews and Romans) but, after the captivities into Assyria and Chaldæa, there were many Jews of all the tribes constantly resident in various places throughout the East. This was called, The Dispersion. Nehemiah prays God to collect the dispersion of his people. And the Jews said of Jesus Christ, John vii. 35, Will he go unto the dispersed among the Gentiles?

DIVINATION. The Easterns were always fond of divination, magic, the curious art of interpreting dreams, and of acquiring the prescience of futurity. When Moses published the law, this disposition had long been common in Egypt, and the neighbouring countries. To correct the Israelites' inclination to consult diviners, fortune tellers, and interpreters of dreams, &c. he forbade them, under very severe penalties, from consulting persons of that description, and promised the true spirit of prophecy to them, as infinitely superior. He commanded those to be stoned who pretended to have a familiar spirit, or the spirit of divination, Deut. xviii. 9, 10, 15. The prophets are full of invectives against the Israelites who consulted diviners; and against false prophets, who by such means seduced the people.

DIVINATION was of several kinds: by water, fire, earth, air; by the flight of birds, and their singing; by lots, by dreams, by the wand, &c.

DIVINATION by the earth, or geomancy, is common among the Persians. They impute the invention of it to Edris (Enoch), or to Daniel. It consists in making several points on a table prepared for this purpose, which they call Raml. These points, disposed in a certain number, on many unequal lines, are likewise described with a pen on paper: he who divines by this art, is called Rummal. He derives his pretended knowledge of futurity from the combination of these points and lines. Bibl. Orient. p. 709.

DIVINATION by the wand, Ezekiel xxi. 21. Vide WAND: also FRAGMENT, No. CLXXIX.

DIVINATION by the flight, singing, or eating of birds, is sufficiently known; I cannot tell whether this were in use among the Hebrews.

It appears that they drew omens from serpents. The Hebrew נחש nachash, taken for divining, and drawing omens, signifies a serpent. Bochart has collected examples of this divination. Hieroic. Part i. lib. i. cap. 3. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. XXI.

DIVORCE, or repudiation. Moses tolerated divorce for very good reasons. Deut. xxiv. 1, 2, 3, &c. "When a man hath taken a wife and he hath found some uncleanness in her; then let him write her a bill of divorcement, and give it into her hand, and send her out of his house." Commentators are much divided on the sense of these words, because he hath found some uncleanness, or as the Hebrew דבר ערוה LXX. Ἀσχημον χόρημα, matter of nakedness in her.

The school of Shammah, who lived a little before our Saviour, taught, that it imported some action really infamous, and inconsistent with virtue. The school of Hillel, Shammah's disciple, taught, on the contrary, that small reasons authorized divorce, e. gr. if the wife did not dress meat well, or if the husband found any other woman whom he liked better. Akiba, another famous Rabbin, was still more indulgent that Hillel: he explained the text of Moses thus,—If she find no favour in his eyes; this was the first reason: the second was, If he find any uncleanness in her. Josephus and Philo shew sufficiently, that in their time the Jews practiced divorce on very trivial causes. The Hebrews at this day hold the same principles. Although a woman, says Leo of Modena, were to give her husband no occasion of complaint, he may put her away, if he be ever so little displeased with her. Joseph. Antig. lib. iv. cap. 8. & lib. de vita sua, ad finem, Philo de Specul. Legib. præcept. 6 & 7, Leo Modena, Cerem. Jud. P. iv. cap. 6.

But our Lord Jesus Christ has limited divorce to the single case of adultery. Matth. v. 31, 32, I say unto you, that whosoever shall put away his wife, saving for the cause of fornication, causeth her to commit adultery; and whosoever shall marry her that is divorced, committeth adultery. These words have been interpreted different ways. Some by adultery or fornication have understood any kind of great crime, idolatry, infidelity, &c. which are sometimes in scripture called fornication. Others have restricted the meaning of this word to connubial adultery and personal infidelity.

Origen, Homil. 7. in Matth. is of opinion, that the Son of God named fornication, not as the only cause of lawful divorce, but as an example of crimes and instances wherein divorce may be used. But almost all the Fathers and interpreters have taken our Saviour's words in their literal meaning, and the practice of the church, has always been agreeable to this opinion. As to the crime of infidelity, see St. Paul's explanation of it, 1 Cor. vii. 12, 13, 15.

Another difficulty on the subject of divorce is, whether persons separated by divorce are at liberty to marry again? The law of Moses did not forbid this, and the laws of the first Christian emperors expressly allowed it. Tertullian believed the bond of marriage to be dissolved by adultery, and that the woman may marry another man. Origen says, that in his time some bishops gave such permission to their people. And several councils, particularly of the Gallican churches, are cited, which suppose, or which authorize, the same custom.

But, though these things have occasionally been practised, they have been almost always condemned. The canons ascribed to the apostles expressly enjoin, Canon 48, that no man who had put away his wife, should marry another in the former wife's life-time. Several popes, as Siricius, Innocent I. Leo, Stephen, and Zachary, in their decretal epistles plainly proscribed these marriages as adulteries. The Latin church hath always taught, that the bond of marriage subsists, notwithstanding divorce.

There is great probability that divorces were used among the Hebrews before the law, since the Son of God says, that Moses permitted them by reason only of the hardness of their hearts; that is to say, because they were accustomed to this abuse, and to prevent greater evils. Abraham dismissed Hagar on account of her insolence, at the request of Sarah, Onkelos, the Jerusalem paraphrast, and several Rabbins, believe the cause of Aaron and Miriam's murmuring against Moses, Numb. xii. 1. was, his divorcing Zipporah, or, as others say, Tharbis, daughter to the king of Ethiopia. Others are of of opinion, that their murmuring was occasioned by his receiving her again after having been divorced from her. But the truth is, that he had only sent her to Jethro, his father-in-law, for a time, and without design of separating from her: and when he received her again they murmured.

We find no instance of a divorce in the books of the Old Testament written since Moses. The Jews themselves tell us, that David did not divorce any of his wives to marry Abishag; but took her under the title of concubine, or wife of the second rank, because he had already eighteen wives, the number which custom allowed. It is certain, however, that they separated from their wives on too trifling occasions. Samson's father-in-law, understood that, by his absence from her, his daughter was divorced by him, since he gave her to another, Judges xv. 2. The Levite's wife, who was dishonoured at Gibeah, had forsaken her husband, and would not have returned, had he not gone in pursuit of her, Judges xix. 2, 3. Solomon speaks of a libertine woman, who had quitted her husband the director of her youth, and had forgot the covenant of her God, Prov. ii. 16, 17. The prophet Malachi, ii. 15. commends Abraham for not divorcing Sarah, though barren; and inveighs against the Jews, who had abandoned the wives of their youth. Micah also, chap. ii. 9. reproaches them with having cast out their wives from their pleasant houses, and taken away the glory of God from their children for ever. Ezra and Nehemiah obliged many of the Jews to dismiss the foreign women whom they had married contrary to the law; all which proves that divorces were not uncommon.

Josephus was of opinion, Antiq. lib. xv. cap. 11. that the law did not permit women to divorce themselves from their husbands, and that it prohibited those who had separated themselves from marrying others, without first receiving letters of divorce from their former husbands. He believes Salome, sister to Herod the Great, to be the first wife who put away her husband. Herodias, mentioned Matth. xiv. 3. Mark vi. 17. did likewise dismiss her husband, as is inferred from the relation of Josephus, Antiq. lib. xviii. cap. 7. The three sisters of the younger Agrippa, king of Chalcis, afterwards of the Trachonitis and Batanæa, divorced their husbands. Berenice the eldest put away Polemo king of Pontus, some time after she had married him. Mariamne, her sister, quitted Archelaus her first husband, to marry Demetrius, alabarch of the Jews in Alexandria. Drusilla, the third sister, forsook Aziz king of Emesa, to marry Felix, governor of Judæa. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xx. cap. 15.

It has been questioned in the Christian church, whether women are permitted to put away their husbands in cases of adultery. St. Basil in his canonical letter to Amphilochus, lib. ix. owns, that the law which permits men to put away their wives for adultery, is observed; but that custom required women to continue with their husbands, though they were guilty of the same crime. The Greeks, who have explained the Apostolical Canons, in canonem viii. assert, that it is a custom which has always been observed among them, that the wife cannot leave her husband on account of his adultery. We have already taken notice, that Josephus the historian did not believe women to have any liberty from the law of Moses to forsake their husbands. Some of the primitive Christians allowed a man who had put away his wife to marry another; but they did not grant the woman the same privilege.

Others indulge the same liberty to both the man and the woman of divorcing, and of second marriage. Justin Martyr speaks of a Christian woman who sent letters of divorce to her husband, who lived disorderly. St. Jerom mentions Fabiola, a Roman lady, who forsook her husband because of his irregularities. The Greeks at this day have a custom of divorcing in the particular case intimated in the gospel, Matth. v. 32. and after this they marry; as if the bond of marriage had been dissolved by adultery.

The wise man seems to make a precept of divorce, saying, He who lives with an adulteress, i. e. who does not procure a divorce from her, is a fool and a mad man, Prov. xviii. 22. The Council of Neocæsarea enjoins a priest to put away his wife, if she be guilty of adultery after her husband's ordination. St. Paul, in advising the wife to be reconciled to her husband, 2 Cor. vii. 10, 11, shews what the intention of our Saviour was; and the generality of the Fathers have always dissuaded from divorcing.

Among the Jews, divorces have become less common since their dispersion among nations which do not permit the dissolution of marriage on light occasions: nevertheless, some divorces obtain among the Jews. The woman is at liberty to marry again as she shall think proper; but not with the person who gave occasion for the divorce. Basnage, Hist. de Juifs, lib. vii. cap. 22. Leo of Modena, Part iv. cap. 4, 6.

A girl who was betrothed when under ten years of age, whether she has or has not a father, if her husband be not agreeable to her, may be unmarried, at any time previous to her reaching the age of twelve years and a day, at which age she is reputed a woman; she then declares, that she is not willing to have such an one for her husband, and takes two witnesses of this declaration, who authenticate it in writing; after which, she may marry whom she pleases.

To prevent the abuse which the Jewish men might make of their liberty of divorcing, the Rabbins appoint many formalities, which consume much time, and give the married couple leisure to be reconciled. Where there is no hope of accommodation, a woman, a deaf man, or a notary, draws the letter of divorce. He writes it in the presence of one or more Rabbins; on vellum ruled, containing only twelve lines, in square letters; and abundance of little trifling particulars are observed, as well in the characters as in the manner of writing, and in the names and surnames of the husband and wife. Besides, neither he who pens it, nor the Rabbins, nor the witnesses, ought to be relations either to the husband or to the wife, or to one another.

The substance of this letter, which they call Gheth, is as follows: On such a day, month, year, and place, I, N. divorce you voluntarily, put you away, restore you to your liberty, even you, N. who were heretofore my wife, and I permit you to marry whom you please. The letter being written, the Rabbi examines the husband closely, in order to learn whether he acts of voluntary inclination in doing what he has done. They endeavour to have at least ten persons present at this action, without reckoning the two witnesses who sign, and two other witnesses to the date. After which, the Rabbi commands the wife to open her hands, and bring them close to one another, in order to receive this deed, lest it fall to the ground; and he examines her over again: the husband gives her the parchment, and says to her, "Here is thy divorce; I put thee away from me, and leave thee at liberty to marry whom thou pleasest." The wife takes it, and gives it to the Rabbi, who reads it once more, after which she is free. We omit many little circumstances, invented only to increase difficulty. Afterwards the Rabbi cautions the woman against marrying again within three months, lest she should be with child. From this time the man and woman are not to continue alone in private together in any place, and either of them may marry again.

[DOCTOR—or TEACHER, of the law; may, perhaps, be distinguished from scribe, as rather teaching viva voce, than giving written opinions. It is not easy when the expression, "counsel learned in the law" is used among us to divest ourselves of the idea of the political law of our country, and its administration; but if we could waive that idea, and restrict the phrase to learned in the divine law, I apprehend, we should be not far from a tolerably accurate conception of what the doctors of the law were in Judæa: i. e. having studied the law of Moses, in its various branches, and the numerous comments which had arisen from it, or had been grafted on it, in latter times, and on various occasions, they gave their opinion on cases referred to them for advice.

It deserves notice, that Nicodemus, himself a doctor (διδάσκαλος, teacher) of the law, yet comes to consult Jesus, whom he compliments in the same terms as he was accustomed to receive from his clients: "RABBI, we know that thou art didascalos, a competent teacher—from God:"—and most probably, adding, "Pray, what is your opinion of such and such matters?" q. d. "our glosses have been too far-fetched, too overstrained; they have never satisfied my mind:—pray let me hear your sentiments."

So our Lord among the doctors, Luke ii. 46. not only heard their opinions, but asked them questions,—proposing his queries in turn, and examining their answers; whether they were consonant to the law of God: and the doctors, we find, were in extasies at the intelligence of his mind, and the propriety of his language and replies.

DOCTORS of the law were mostly of the sect of the Pharisees; but are distinguished from that sect, Luke v. 17. where it appears that the novelty of our Lord's doctrine drew together a great company of law-doctors, (νομοδιδασκαλοι) who, no doubt, questioned him as well as they were able.

DOCTORS, or teachers, are mentioned among divine gifts, Ephes. iv. 11. It is credible, that the apostle here, does not mean such ordinary teachers (or pastors) as the church now enjoys; but, as he seems to reckon them among the extraordinary donations of God, and uses no mark of distinction, or separation, between apostles, with which he begins, and doctors, with which he ends, his list: but rather unites them by the same conjunction "and some"—it may be, that he refers to the nature of the office of the Jewish doctors, as stated above; meaning, well-informed persons, to whom enquiring Christian converts might have recourse for clearing their doubts and difficulties, concerning Christian observances, the sacraments, and other rituals, and for receiving from Scripture the demonstration that "this is the very Christ;" and that the things relating to the Messiah were accomplished in Jesus. Such a gift could not but be very serviceable in that infant state of the church (and the service though private was important); which, indeed, without it would have seemed, in this particular, inferior to the Jewish institutions. To this agrees the distinction, Rom. xii. 7. between doctors, (teaching, διδάσκων) and exhorters, q. d. "he who gives advice privately, and resolves doubts, &c. let him attend tend to that duty; he who exhorts with a loud voice, (παράκλησις) let him exhort" with proper piety. The same appears, 1 Cor. xii. 28. where the apostle ranges, first, apostles, public instructors; secondly, prophets, occasional instructors; thirdly, didascalous, i. e. doctors, or teachers, private instructors.]

DOCUS, Δωκ, to urge, pound, bray; from the Hebrew דוך duc. If we read dog, it may be translated fish. Vide DAGON.

DODANIM, דודנים, the sleep of the friend, or uncle, or breast of her that sleeps; from דד dad, or דד dud, and נום num, to sleep: or the loves, the breasts. [AFFECTIONS: FRIENDSHIPS.]

DODANIM, דודנים, Δωδανειμ, sleep of him that descends, or commands; from נום num, to sleep; and ירד jarad, to descend; or from רדד radach, to command.

DODANIM, the youngest son of Javan. Several Hebrew MSS. read Rhodanim, and believe that he peopled the island of Rhodes: vide RHODES. Possibly the Dodonians, inhabitants of Dodona. See DEDAN.

DODAVAH, דודאו, Δοδία, his friendship, his uncle, or her breast; from דד dud, a breast, or דד dod, an uncle, or friendship; and דו hu, his. Father of the prophet Eliezer, 2 Chron. xx. 37.

DOEG, דוג, who acts with uneasiness; from דוג daag: otherwise, a fisherman; from דוג dog, to fish. Vide DAGON.

DOEG, an Edomite, Saul's chief herdsman. Being at Nob, a city of the priests, when David came thither, and received provision from Abimelech, he reported this to Saul, and thereby was the cause of his sending for the priests who resided at Nob, and of their massacre, to the number of fourscore and five, 1 Sam. xxii. 16. When none of the king's guards would slay these sacred persons, Doeg executed the order without scruple or reluctance.

DOG, a domestic animal well known. By the law the dog was unclean, and this animal was despised among the Jews. To compare a person to a dog, living or dead, was a most degrading expression; so David uses it, 1 Sam. xxiv. 14. After whom is the king of Israel come out? after a dead dog? So Mephibosheth, 2 Sam. ix. 8. What is thy servant, that thou shouldst look upon such a dead dog as I am?

The name of dog sometimes expresses one who has lost all modesty; one who prostitutes himself to abominable actions; for so several understand the injunction, Deut. xxiii. 18. of not offering the hire of a whore; or the price of a dog; and Eccles. xiii. 8. What fellowship is there between a pure and sanctified person, and a dog? Jesus Christ, in Rev. xxii. 15. excludes dogs, sorcerers, whoremongers, murderers, and idolaters, &c. In Philip. iii. 2, St. Paul says,

DOG

"Beware of dogs!"—of impudent, sordid, greedy professors. Solomon, Prov. xxvi. 1. and St. Peter, 1 Epist. ii. 21. compares sinners, who continually relapse into sins, to dogs returning to their vomit.

I do not observe that the Hebrews made use of hounds. Game killed by dogs would have been unclean, and not lawful for use. Levit. xvii. 15. I do not find any mention of dogs, when hunting is spoke of; nor of hunting, when dogs are mentioned.

The Arabians as well as Jews hold dogs to be unclean; they speak kindly to them, and feed them well, but do not touch them: particularly if they should happen to be wet, they would not suffer them to come near them, lest a sprinkling of water should fall upon their clothes, which would incapacitate them from saying their prayers. Nevertheless, those who love sports, do, notwithstanding, keep grey-hounds and setting dogs: alleging, that these dogs being always tied up, and eating nothing that is unclean, are exempted from the common rule. The same they plead for little lap-dogs. No one among them does any harm to dogs, and if any person were to kill one of them deliberately and with design, he would be punished. D'Arvieux, Mœurs des Arabes, cap. 8.

[Dog is put for persecutor; Psalm xxii. 20. The Jews were fond of giving degrading epithets to other nations; hence they called aliens hogs, (vide DANIEL ad fin.) and dogs: our Lord, to a certain degree, and to answer a certain purpose, adopts their language, Matth. vii. 6. where he must be understood, not as using his own private and personal phraseology, but the current language of his nation and country, to the Syrophœnician woman; calling the Jews, children, and the Gentiles dogs.

The state of dogs among the Jews was probably pretty much the same as it is now in the East; where, having no owners, they run about the streets in troops, and are fed by charity, or by caprice; or they live on such offal as they can pick up. That they were numerous in Jezreel, when directed to fulfil the prophecy of Elijah, vide FRAGMENTS, No. LIII.

In Prov. vii. 22, we have a passage which perhaps admits of a sense very different from what it conveys, as it stands in our translation. Solomon, illustrating by several comparisons the conduct of the unwary youth who follows a lewd woman, says,

"As an ox goeth to the slaughter;
As a fool to the correction of the stocks;
Till a dart strike through his liver,
As a bird hasteth to the snare,
And knoweth not that it is for his life."

Observe,

1. The words in the Hebrew are transposed, "as the stocks to the correction of a fool."

2. Whose liver does the dart strike through? the fool's, when going to the stocks? or when already in them? or,

3. Is the connection thus? "he goeth after her . . . till a dart strike him."

4. The word ocēs does not properly signify the stocks, as a place of punishment; but a tinkling ornament for the legs (vide PERISCYLIDES) as in Isaiah iii. 18. Hence Symmachus translates, Σχιρῶν ἐπὶ δεσμών ἀφρων. The LXX. (with whom agree Chald. Syr. and Arab.) Καὶ ὡσπερ κύων ἐπὶ δεσμός, ἢ ὡς ἔλαφος τοξενίῳ περλήγῃς εἰς τὴν ἡπαρ—As a dog goes to bonds; or as a stag, till a dart strike through his liver.

Without entering into any conjectural consideration of how the LXX. read, in their copies, which appear to have had a letter or two different from our present copies, I think it clear that we ought to have here four similes drawn from the actions of animals, every one of which is fatal in its issue: but, "the correction of the stocks" is not fatal; and the fool going to the stocks, is very like making the unwise youth a simile to himself. The passage, I think, requires this arrangement.

He goeth after her—directly—straightway, as,

1. An ox goes to the slaughter—house, or slaughter-place:

2. As a dog goes to the tying up—halter-place:

3. As a stag goes to (where the hunters await his coming that they may shoot arrows, &c. at him)—the place of shooting though his liver:

4. As a bird hasteth to the snare placed for him:

5. But no one of these creatures is aware that the place to which it is going, is destruction to its life.

Observe, the progress of this motion. "With her much fair speech she caused the youth to yield assent; with her flattery she forced him"—he goes after her at first, slowly,

1. As the heavy ox goes to the slaughter-house; he is even reluctant, but he goes:—then she seduces him to quicken his pace, and he proceeds more briskly; As, 2. a dog which is going to be hanged, and is already tied with the cord about his neck, yet is led by that cord to the place of hanging; [the reader perceives the Hebrew word (ocēs) is taken generally, for shackles, manacles, bonds of any kind] As, 3. a stag bounds swiftly toward the place where he is to be surrounded by the toils, and exposed as a mark to the darts, &c. of the hunters; 4. As a bird flies with rapidity, swifter even than the boundings of a stag.

This introduction of the dog produces an arrangement, and a climax in the passage: and shews its sense and beauty clearly. It removes also the fool, who is the subject of these comparisons, in whom they all terminate, and who seems to have no business where he is now placed; and having the authority of the LXX. the Chaldee, Syriac, and Arabic versions, it is, I think, intitled to attention, as being very probably the true assimilation of the passage: and very much in the manner of the writer of this book of Proverbs.

N. B. All the creatures alluded to expect gratification—but find death in that very place to which they are going.]

DOMITIAN, the Roman emperor, son of Vespasian, and brother to Titus, was the last of the twelve Cæsars; he succeeded Titus, A. D. 81, Sept. 13, and was abhorred for his debaucheries and his cruelty. He persecuted the Christian church. The apostle John being at Rome, was put into a cauldron of boiling oil, near the Latin gate, but suffered no harm by it. Tertull. prescrip. cap. 36. Hieronym. de Scriptorib. In this persecution, Domitian knowing there were Christians who claimed to be of the race of David, and related to Jesus Christ, he was apprehensive of their sedition. They were grandsons to Judas, brother to our Lord, and probably son to Joseph by a former wife, before his marriage with the Virgin Mary, Being carried to Domitian, he asked them, if they were of David's family? they confessed they were. He farther enquired, how much land they possessed? and what money? They answered, that they were two in number, they had to the value of 9,000 sesterces in lands, containing thirty-nine plethra, (about seven acres, and four perches) that for these they paid taxes, cultivated them themselves, and subsisted on their produce; at the same time they shewed him their hands, which were callous, and their bodies, which were hardened with labour.

The emperor asked them, what the kingdom of Jesus Christ was? when, and where, he was to reign? They answered, that his kingdom was not earthly, but heavenly and angelical; that it would appear at the end of the world, when he would come with celestial glory to judge both quick and dead. Domitian, despising them, sent them away without injury. He also suspended the persecution; at least in Judæa. These two confessors lived to the time of Trajan. Hegeſip. apud Euseb. lib. iii. cap. 20. Hist. Eccles. Domitian died A. D. 96, Sept 17.

DOORS. See GATES.

DOPHKAH, דֹּפְקָה, Paḥakā, impulse; from דָּפַח daphac. The LXX. read Raphaca, רֶשֶׁח, instead of דָּ דֹּלֶת.

[This impulse implies to go forward; whence to rush as a stream; and the Arabic root imports ports an effusion of water: it is probable, therefore, that at this station of the Israelites, there was either a flow, or rill, of water; or, the people were in haste to rush forward on their journey. It might, however, be of the same nature as what our sailors term a ripple, occasioned, perhaps, by a current, or bank of sand, in the Red Sea; or other obstruction to the course of the tide, ebbing or flowing.]

DOPHKAH, the ninth or tenth encampment of the Israelites, Numb. xxxiii. 12.

DOR, דור, or דור, a city, Josh. xi. 2. This word is differently writ in Josh. xvii. 11. Generation, or habitation; from דור dor, or dur.

DOR, or DORA, the capital of a district in Canaan; in Hebrew, Nepht-Dor. Joshua conquered it, and killed its king, Josh. xii. 23. He gave it to the half tribe of Manasseh, on this side Jordan, xvii. 11. Dor is situated on the Mediterranean, and has a bad port, between Cæsarea Palestine, and mount Carmel, nine miles from Cæsarea. This city is often reckoned to Phœnicia. Antiochus Sidetes besieged it in Tryphon, the usurper of the kingdom of Syria, 1 Macc. xv. 11.

[The root of this name is understood to imply, a round habitation, or dwelling; and with this agree both the Hebrew and Arabic. This city is called Dora, in the Greek; by Stephens Doros, and Dora; by Pliny Dorum. It is written Dar, 1 Kings iv. 11.

From this is derived En-dor, or Oin-dor, the fountain of Dor, Josh. xvii. 11. 1 Sam. xxviii. 7. written Oin-dar, Psalm lxxxiii. 10. also Hamath Dor, or the hot baths of Dor, in the tribe of Naphtali. Josh. xix. 35. written Hamath Dar, chap. xxi. 32. and Hamon, the hot baths of Aun, 1 Chron. vi. 76.

It is probable, that the root Dor does not only mean a single round habitation, as a tent; but also a circle of tents, or what the Arabs call a Dowar: it may also, in the case of this city in Manasseh, mean a head-land, or projecting peninsula, of a round form; whence the town which stood on it assumed a round form of course. See PLATES: MEDALS OF DOR.

Dor was situated on a peninsula, which projecting into the Mediterranean Sea, rendered the city extremely strong, and very difficult of attack; especially on the land side. It pretended to be founded by Dor, or Dorus, son of Neptune. It assumed the title of Sacred, and Navarchida. It enjoyed the right of Asylum, and of being "governed by its own laws."

"The modern name of Dor is Tartoura. It is about four leagues distant from Cæsarea Palestina. It consists of a single street opposite to the sea. A market is held here, to which the Arabs bring their booty, and the neighbouring peasants their cattle and fruits: these they barter for rice, and linens, brought from Egypt, in small craft, because the port, which is before this town, has not depth of water for large vessels. There is no mosque in the place. The inhabitants assemble on a platform, raised about two feet, and walled round; where they perform their worship. The coffee house is the handsomest building, and the most frequented in the town. Water, that is drinkable, would be absolutely wanting in Tartoura, were there not a fountain ten or twelve feet in the sea, issuing from a rock; which, when the sea is high, is covered with waves. Not but that there are other springs in different places adjacent, but they are brackish; and none of them supplies this necessary article of life like the spring from the rock. The neighbourhood is bare and void of trees, but produces grain. D'Arvieux.

I suspect that the peculiarity of this fountain flowing from the rock, has some share in the name Dor, and in that of En-Dor. Perhaps, the latter was derived from a circular basin in the rock: "the round fountain."]

DORCAS, Δορκάς, טביתה, TABITHA in Syriac. Acts ix. 39. the female roe. See TABITHA.

DORYMINI, Δορυμίνης, generation, or habitation of the right hand; from דור dor, habitation, &c. (see Dor) and ימין imin, or jamin, the right-hand: or rather, according to the Greek, the violence of the dart or javelin.

DOSITHEUS, Δωσίθεος, given of God; from Θεός, God, and δῶς, a gift.

I. DOSITHEUS, who pretended to be a priest, and Levite, brought into Egypt the epistle named Purim, i. e. the book of Esther, in Greek. Apoc. Esth. xi. 1. We cannot tell who this Dositheus was. Usher believes him to be the same to whom Ptolemy Philometor gave the command of his troops, together with another Jew, named Onias. Joseph. contra Appion. lib. ii.

II. DOSITHEUS, an officer in Judas Macca-bæus's troops, 2 Macc. xii. 19, 20, 21, &c. sent to force the garrison of Characa, in the country of the Tubienians. We do not know whether he is the Dositheus named in the same chapter, and said to belong to Bacenor.

III. DOSITHEUS, Dositheans. The Jews pretend, that Dosthai, or Dositheus the son of Jannæus, was one of the priests sent by Sennacherib to instruct the Cuthæans, who had been planted by him in Samaria, and who were molested by lions, 2 Kings xvii. 24. Epiphanius, de Hæres. lib. i. says, the Dositheans were a fourth branch of heretics at Samaria; but he does not inform us, who they were, and whence they came. Photius, Cod. 130, relates, that after our Saviour's conversation with the Samaritan ritan woman of Sichem, there arose two parties in Samaria, one maintaining Jesus Christ to be the Messiah foretold by Moses, Deut. xviii. 15, 18. the other maintaining that Dositheus, a Samaritan, who was contemporary with Simon the Magician, was the Messiah.

Hegesippus, apud Euseb. lib. iv. cap. 22. Hist. Eccl. who lived in the second century, places Dositheus and his followers at the beginning of Christianity, with those of Simon Magus. A treatise against heresies, ascribed to St. Hippolytus, begins with the Dositheans. Origen sets Jesus Christ, whose gospel was preached over the whole earth, in opposition to Simon and Dositheus, whose sects were already vanquished, though they had boasted of performing miracles, and though Dositheus would have passed for the Messiah. The Apostolical Constitutions assert, lib. vi. cap. 8. that Cleobius and Simon the magician were disciples to Dositheus; but that they expelled him, and refused him the first rank in their confraternity, to which he aspired.

It seems to be certain, that this man lived in the time of Simon the magician, and that his party was formed in the country of Samaria, when our Saviour appeared. We are assured, that he was a Jew, who, being desirous to distinguish himself by new explanations among the doctors who studied the mystical interpretations of the law, and the traditions, and affecting the first rank among these Rabbins, was rejected by them; and that out of pique he formed a sect of Samaritans, which observed circumcision like the Jews, and the sabbath with so much rigour, that for the whole four and twenty hours they remained without stirring, in that place where they happened to be when the sabbath began; they likewise fasted very rigidly, and denied themselves every thing that had life in it.

They received only the five books of Moses, and held Dositheus to be the Messiah. He applied to himself those prophecies in the Pentateuch which we explain of Jesus Christ; while the Samaritans who opposed Dositheus, applied them to Joshua. It is affirmed, that Dositheus disappeared, and was found in a cave, gnawed by worms and insects. Some attribute his retreat to the foolish vanity of desiring to be thought immortal, as if he had been transported alive into heaven. But the discovery of his body manifested the imposture; yet that did not undeceive his disciples, who gave out that he had retired to pursue the study of philosophy with more liberty and leisure. Some of his disciples were remaining in the 6th century in Egypt.

DOTHAN, דוֹתָן, or דִּוְתָן, the law, or custom; from דָּוָה.

DOTHAN, or DOTHAIM, a town twelve miles north of Samaria. Joseph's brethren were at Dothan, when they sold him to the Ishmaelites, Gen. xxxvii. 17. Holofernes's camp extended from Dothaim to Belmain. Judith vii. 3.

[In Chaldee the root Duth signifies a pit, or cistern; whence the dual implies the double pit, or double cistern.

Travellers report, that wells and fountains abound in the neighbourhood of Dothan, at this day; and the cistern, or dry pit, in which Joseph was confined by his brethren, is still shewn. Vide Dapper's Descrip. Palest. p. 101. Furber Itin. p. 278. Brocard, Descrip. T. S. cap. 5. et. al. plur.

It is not contradictory to this idea, that the Chaldee Duth, should also signify grass; since where wells are there usually is grass, in the East: and as Joseph's brethren had driven their flocks to Dothan, no doubt but they had been attracted thither by an abundance of grass.]

DOUBLE has many significations in Scripture; Double money, double food; twice as much money or food.

A double garment may mean a lined habit, such as the high priest's peccetoral; or a complete habit, or suit of clothes, a cloak, and a tunic, &c. Vide LINING.

Double sometimes signifies multitude: She hath received of the Lord's hand, the double for all her sins, i. e. her transgression it was correspondently, answerably, punished, Jerem. xvii. 18. Destroy them with a double destruction; punish them severely. I will doubly punish their iniquities, or I will inflict adequate penalties upon them, penalties proportioned to their iniquities. Thou shalt receive twice as much evil, chastisements, the counterpart, the double to thy sins, Eccles. xii. 7.

Double heart, double tongue, double mind are opposed to a simple, honest, sincere heart, tongue, mind, &c.

[DOUBLE, the counterpart to a quantity, to a space, to a measure, &c. which is proposed as the exemplar. Double money—the same value as before, with an equal value added to it, Gen. xliii. 12, 15. If a stolen ox, or sheep be found—the thief shall restore double, i. e. two oxen, or two sheep. For the right understanding of Isaiah xl. 1. "She hath received from God double for all her sins"—read, the counterpart—that which fits, the commensurate quantity, extent, or number, &c. of her sins: that which is adequate, all things considered, as a dispensation of punishment. This passage does not mean—twice as much as had been deserved—double what was just; but, the fair, commensurate, adequate, retribution. The same is the meaning of this phrase in other places, Isaiah lxi. 7. Jer. xvi. 18. xvii. 18. Zech. ix. 8.]

DOVE,

DOVE, a tame bird, by the law declared pure. It is ordained, Levit. xii. 8. that when a woman went to the temple after child bearing, she should offer a lamb, and a dove or turtle; or else a young pigeon, or a young turtle (vide Numb. vi. 10.) The lamb was offered as a burnt-offering, the pigeon or dove as a sin-offering. Or, if she could not afford a lamb, then she might offer two pigeons, or two turtles: no matter of what sex. The blessed Virgin, to comply with this law, offered, two pigeons, or two turtles, Luke ii. 14. As it was difficult for all who came from distant places to bring doves with them, the priests permitted the sale of these birds in the courts of the temple. Jesus Christ one day entered the temple, and with a scourge of cords drove out those who traded there in pigeons. Matth. xxi. 12. Mark xi. 15.

There were also other occasions on which birds might be offered. The rich offered four-footed animals; but the poor offered only pigeons for the ceremonies. See Levit. i. 14, 15, 16, 17. The priest took the turtle-dove, and wrung its neck; some expositors think he plucked the head off entirely; others more truly conceive, that he only wrung the neck. See BIRDS.

Jeremiah, xxv. 38. xlv. 16. l. 16. speaking of ravages to be committed in Judæa by Nebuchadnezzar, says, The land is desolate because of the fierceness of the dove. And again, Let us go again to our own people to avoid the sword of the dove. [In the English translation, "the oppressing sword:" the radix of דב, a dove, being דב, which signifies to oppress.] And in another place, They shall flee every one for fear of the sword of the dove. Some by the word dove in this place understand the Lord, who of a dove was become an enemy; armed with the sword, and ready to lay waste the country. Others suppose Nebuchadnezzar, king of the Chaldeans, to be intended, who, it is said, bore a dove in his ensigns, in memory of Semiramis, who was reported to have been metamorphosed into a dove, or who was called dove in a way of antiphrasis. But it is more natural and simple to translate the Hebrew Jona, an enemy, destroyer, ravager. This epithet suits admirably well with Nebuchadnezzar. The land shall be made desolate by this ravager:—fly from the sword of this prince, who carries fire and terror into all places wheresoever he goes. We have no good proofs that the Chaldeans bore a dove in their standard. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CCLXIX. and PLATES: also MEDALS of ASKALON.

The dove is used as a symbol of simplicity and innocency. The Holy Spirit appeared at the baptism of Jesus, in the form of a dove, Matth. iii. 16. Jesus Christ recommends to his disciples the wisdom of the serpent, with the harmlessness of the dove, Matth. x. 16. The prophet Hosea, vii. 11. compares the Israelites to a silly dove, which hath no heart, or understanding.

The spouse in the Canticles is compared to a dove, by reason of her, innocence, gentleness, and fidelity. Noah sent the dove out of the ark, to discover whether the waters of the deluge were abated: Gen. viii. 8, 10. He chose the dove, as a tame bird, an enemy to carrion and ordure: it immediately returned to him, not finding a resting-place, because the waters were not retired. He sent it out a second time, and it returned with a young shoot of green olive tree in its beak, which had sprung out since the deluge. He sent it out a third time, and it returned no more, because the deluge was terminated.

DOVES' DUNG. It is said, 2 Kings, chap. vi. 25, that, during the siege of Samaria, the fourth part of a cab [little more than half a pint] of doves' dung was sold for five pieces of silver;—about twelve shillings. It is well known, doves' dung is not a nourishment for man, even in the most extreme famine. Josephus and Theodoret were of opinion, that this dove's dung was bought instead of salt, to serve as a kind of manure for the purpose of raising esculent plants of quick vegetation. The Rabbins think it was not the dung of pigeons, but the corn in their crops, which they brought back filled out of the fields whither, during the siege, they went to feed. Junius and Fuller suppose the dove's belly to be meant: but Bochart is of opinion, that we should understand a sort of moss growing on trees. It might be a kind of tare, or cicer, so called from its resemblance, when dried or parched, to the dung of pigeons, &c. Vide CICER. The Arabians call it chick-peas.

[DOWRY. Nothing distinguishes more the nature of marriage among us in Europe, from the same connection when forming in the East, than the different methods of proceeding between the father-in-law and the intended bridegroom. Among us, the father usually gives a portion to his daughter, which becomes the property of her husband; and which often makes a considerable part of his aggregate wealth: but in the East, the bridegroom offers to the father of his bride a sum of money, or value to his satisfaction, before he can expect to receive his daughter in marriage. Of this procedure we have scripture instances from the earliest times. Even when Jacob had nothing which he could immediately give, or pay down for a wife, as it would have been a disgrace to his intended spouse to suppose she was not worth purchasing, he purchases her, by his skill and his attention, in the service of her father Laban. So we find Shechem, when proposing to Jacob's family, notwithstanding what had happened, to treat for Dinah in an honourable manner, he offers to pay any value, as a dowry: "Ask me never so much dowry and gift," Gen. xxxiv. 12. In this passage is mentioned, a distinction still observed in the East: 1. A dowry to the family, as a token of honour, to engage their favourable interest in the desired alliance; 2. A gift to the bride herself, e. g. of jewels, and other decorations, a compliment of honour, as Abraham's servant gave to Rebecca. We find king Saul, (1 Sam. xviii. 25.) instead of wishing for a pecuniary dowry from David, which David was sensible he could not pay in proportion to the value of the bride—he required one hundred foreskins of the Philistines, thereby proposing his daughter in reward of valour, as Caleb had formerly done his daughter Achsah to whoever should take Kirjath-sepher; i. e. he gave her, as a reward of honour, without receiving the accustomed dowry.

The dowry was esteemed so essential, that Moses even orders it, in a case where it might otherwise, perhaps, have been dispensed with, Exod. xxii. 16. "If a man entice a maid, that is not betrothed, he shall endow her as his wife;" he shall make her the usual nuptial present; according to that rank which he holds in the world, and to that station which his wife might justly be expected to maintain; proportionate also to that honour which he would have put upon his wife, had he regularly solicited her family for her; i. e. jewels, &c. "If her father refuse his daughter," he shall pay money, "according to the dowry of virgins:" i. e. what the father of a virgin of that rank of life might justly expect should have been offered for his daughter when solicited in marriage. And this we find was the proposal made by Shechem, in reparation of the injury done to Dinah.]

DRACHMA. The value of a common drachm was seven-pence English, a didrachm, or double drachm, made very near half a shekel, and four drachms made nearly a shekel. See DIDRACHMA. The Attic drachm, says Dr. Arbuthnot, is commonly reputed equal in value to the Denarius; which he has stated in his tables, at seven-pence three farthings. See his chapter On the Grecian Coins, p. 25.

DRAGON. This word answers generally to the Hebrew תנין Thannim, or Tannin, which signifies a large fish: The LXX. generally translate Δράκονες Dracones; rarely great fishes; sometimes Sirens, or Ostriches. Jerom most frequently renders it dracones, but sometimes Sirenes, or Lamiae. The same variations almost are observable in Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion. By Sirenes they mean probably seamonsters, not the fabulous Sirens of the poets. By comparing the passages where this word occurs, it signifies sometimes a large river fish, or sea-fish; at other times venomous and land serpents: and, as I conjecture, more particularly the crocodile. [Perhaps it should generally be rendered reptile: AMPHIBIA: See FRAGMENTS, and PLATES, TANNIN.]

The dragons which are mentioned in books, are mostly old serpents grown to a prodigious size. The Babylonians adored a dragon, which Daniel is said to have killed. Nothing was more common in the heathen religion, than the worship of serpents: it spread almost all the world over, and still subsists in many places.

This word is sometimes taken in scripture for the devil: as in Rev. chap. xii.

In passages where there is mention of a ruined city, or province, or land, it is said to be a dwelling for dragons: because, serpents, dragons, and venomous reptiles, hide in uninhabited places, in ruins, in rubbish, old walls, &c.

DRAGON-WELL. The Dragon-well, mentioned Nehem. ii. 13. lay east of Jerusalem. This well is still shewn in a sort of subterraneous cave, having a descent of twenty steps. The Turks call it Mary's well, and believe that the blessed Virgin used the water of it for her house and family.

DREAM, חלום Chalom, ἑνύπνιον. Dreams which were prophetic, or significative of future events, are generally thus called. The Easterns, in particular the Jews, greatly regarded dreams; and applied for their interpretation to those who undertook to explain them. The ancient Greeks and Romans had the same opinion of them, as appears from their most eminent writers. We see the antiquity of this attention to dreams in the history of Pharaoh's butler and baker: Pharaoh himself, and Nebuchadnezzar, are instances of the same. God expressly forbid his people from observing dreams, and from consulting explainers of them. He condemned to death all who pretended to have prophetic dreams, and to foretell futurities, even though what they foretold came to pass, if they had any tendency to promote idolatry. But they were not forbid, when they thought they had a significative dream, to address the prophets of the Lord, or the high-priest in his ephod, to have it explained.

Saul, before the battle of Gilboa, consulted a woman who had a familiar spirit, because the Lord would not answer him by dreams, nor by prophets, &c. 1 Sam. xxviii. 6, 15.

The Lord did sometimes discover his will in dreams, and enable persons to explain them. He informed Abimelech in a dream, that Sarah was the wife of Abraham, Gen. xx. 3, 6. He shewed Jacob the mysterious ladder in a dream; Gen. xxviii. 2, 3, &c. and in a dream an angel suggested to him a way of multiplying his flocks. Gen. xxxi. 11, 12, &c. Joseph was favoured very early with prophetic dreams, whose signification was easily discovered by Jacob, Gen. xxxvii. 5. God said, that he spake to other prophets in dreams, but to Moses face to face. The Midianites gave credit to dreams, as appears from that which a Midianite related to his companion; and from whose interpretation Gideon took a happy omen. Judg. vii. 13, 15.

The prophet Jeremiah, xliii. 25, 28, 29. exclaims against impostors who pretended to have had dreams, and abused the credulity of the people. They prophesy lies in my name, saying, I have dreamed, I have dreamed. The prophet that hath a dream, let him tell a dream, and he that hath my word, let him tell it faithfully, saith the Lord. The prophet Joel, ii. 28. promises from God, that in the reign of the Messiah, the effusion of the holy spirit should be so copious, that the old men should have prophetic dreams, and the young men should receive visions.

This word signifies likewise those vain images, beheld in imagination while we sleep, which have no relation to prophecy. He shall fly away as a dream, and shall not be found; yea, he shall be chased away as a vision of the night, Job xx. 8. Isaiah, xxix. 7. The multitude of all the nations that fight against Ariel (Jerusalem) shall be as a dream of a night-vision. It shall be even as when a hungry man dreameth, and behold he eateth; but he awaketh, and his soul is empty: or as when a thirsty man dreameth, and behold he drinketh, but he awaketh, and behold he is faint, and his soul hath appetite: so shall the multitude of all the nations be, that fight against mount Zion. See Psalm lxxii. 20; Eccl. v. 2, 6.

[DREAMS, should be carefully distinguished from visions: the former happening during sleep, and therefore being liable to infinite ambiguity and uncertainty; the latter happening when the person being awake, retains possession of his natural powers and faculties. God spake to Abimelech in a dream—but to Abraham by vision: Jacob saw in a dream the method of producing certain effects on his cattle. God told Laban in a dream not to injure Jacob. Now in these, and other instances of dreams, the subjects dreamed of, appear to be the very matters which had occupied the minds of these persons while awake; and, when asleep, Providence over-ruled, or improved, their natural cogitations, to answer such and such purposes. But in the case of visions, the thing seen was unexpected; the mind was not prepared for it, nor could previously have imagined what was about to occur.

The subject of dreams is among the most curious which belong to human nature, and one which to understand thoroughly demands no mean skill in the affections, dispositions, sympathies, and agitations of the human mind. We shall not attempt to investigate the subject here: we shall simply state the conviction, that while the body rests, and is asleep, there is a somewhat distinct from the body which is extremely active, volatile, sensible; which sees without employing the organs of sight, hears without employing the organ of hearing, and performs a thousand actions with all the appearance of reality, without the intermediation of the bodily agents. What is this power? this somewhat controlled, yet uncontrollable, dependent yet independent, retained by the tenement of clay, yet winging its devious course to regions, to events, and to actions of which the tabernacle of the body is utterly unconscious?

But, to verify the distinction between visions and dreams, I do not recollect more appropriate instances than those furnished by the book of Job. The vision is thus described, chap. iv. "Now an occurrence was secretly—partially—brought to me, and mine ear received a little thereof.

"In thoughts from—(n) distinct from—visions of the night, when deep sleep falleth on man,

' Fear seiz'd my soul, the hand of horror strook
My shuddering flesh, and every member shook :
A rapid wind with rushing fury pass'd
So near, so loud, blast whirling after blast,
That my hairs started at each stiff'ning pore,
And stood erect.'

Scott.

Then a spirit passed before my face, it stood still, but I could not discern the form thereof: an image was before mine eyes, and I heard a voice," &c. i. e. his senses were in exercise, but the image was too fine, too ærial for his complete discernment of it—his bodily organs were not deficient, but the subject surpassed their powers; and I suppose the prophets had additional, or superior powers, bestowed on them, pro tempore, when they were enabled to behold visions: whereas, a dream is described, chap. xxxiii. 15. as happening "in (n) sleep, in a vision of the night, in deep sleep falling on man, in slumberings on the bed!"

Perhaps it is neither easy nor necessary, to distinguish always when the word dream is used, whether it may not denote a vision—but it should seem likely that when the interference of an angel is mentioned, as giving advice, or direction, that more than a mere dream is implied: as, to Jacob, Gen. xxxi. 11. to Joseph, Matthew i. 20. ii. 13, 19.]

[DREAMER, is used as a word of reproach; of Joseph by his brethren, Gen. xxxvii. 19. of Shemaiah, Jer. xxix. 24. vide chap. xxvii. 9. and Jude, verse 8. See also Isaiah lvi. 10.]

To DRINK. This word is used sometimes properly, sometimes figuratively. Its proper sense needs no explanation.

The wise man exhorts his disciple, Prov. v. 15. to drink water out of his own cistern; to content himself with the lawful pleasures of marriage, without wandering in his affections. To eat and drink is used Ecclesiastes, v. 18. to signify his people's enjoying themselves: and in the Gospel for living in a common and ordinary manner. John came neither eating nor drinking, and ye say he hath a devil; the Son of Man cometh eating and drinking, and ye say, he is a glutton and a wine-bibber. The apostles say, they ate and drank with Jesus Christ after his resurrection; they conversed, they lived freely with him. Acts x. 41.

Jeremiah reproaches the Jews with having had recourse to Egypt for muddy water to drink, and to Assyria, to drink the water of their river; i. e. the water of the Nile and of the Euphrates: meaning, soliciting the assistance of those people.

To DRINK blood, signifies to be satiated with slaughter: Ye shall drink the blood of the princes of the earth, Ezek. xxxix. 18. David refused to drink the water which three gallant men of his army had procured for him, saying, God forbid that I should drink the blood of these men, 2 Sam. xxiii. 16, 17. Jesus Christ commands us to drink his blood and to eat his flesh: We eat and drink both, figuratively, in the Eucharist. To drink water by measure, Ezek. iv. 11. and, to buy water to drink, Lam. v. 4. denotes extreme scarcity and desolation. On fast days the Jews abstained from eating and drinking during the whole day, believing it to be equally of the essence of a fast to suffer thirst, as to suffer hunger.

DROMEDARY, a species of camel so called: q. dromas, or dromedarius, by reason of its swift running; from δρόμω dromo, I run. Dromedaries are smaller, and more slender than common camels. On their backs they have a kind of natural saddle, composed of two great bunches. Persons of quality in the East generally use dromedaries for speed. We are assured that some of them can travel a hundred miles a day. Isaiah, xlv. 20. calls this creature, as Bochart believes, Biccuroth. Bichra, the feminine of bicher, is taken for a dromedary, Jerem. ii. 23. בקרה בִּכְרָה, by Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotus. Vide FRAGMENT, No. CXXII.

DRUMA, Gideon's concubine, mother of Abimelech. Judg. viii. 31.

DRUMOS, or Drymos, or Drymas, a plain near mount Carmel, toward Cæsarea Palestine. The LXX. sometimes translate Saron, Drymos. Strabo, lib. xvi. speaks of Drymos and mount Carmel, as of neighbouring places. Josephus says the same, and that the inhabitants of mount Carmel hoped to make themselves masters of the district called Drymos: Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiv. cap. 24. & de Bello, lib. i. cap. 11.

DRUNK, DRUNKENNESS. These words are not always taken in Scripture in an odious sense. They often signify simply to drink to satisfaction, to exhilarate the spirits, as we freely may, at an entertainment made by a friend, where there is no want of wine. So Gen. xliii. 34. Joseph's brethren were drunk with him, the second time they came into Egypt, and knew not as yet that he was their brother. It is not credible they should forget themselves so far on this occasion, as to be really drunken in the bad sense of the word, before so great a man as Joseph; or that Joseph should suffer such impropriety. So Cant. v. 1. Come, my friends, drink and be drunken; drink freely, abundantly, without sparing or restraint. So John xi. 10. Every man first bringeth forth good wine, and when the guests have drank freely—cum inebriati fuerint. Will any one believe, that Jesus Christ waited till the guests were drunk to perform the miracle at Cana? the thought is absurd, as well as ignorant. Vide ARCHITRICLINIUM.

One wants, and the other is drunken: i. e. abounds; enjoys plenty. This sense of the word is confirmed by those passages in which absolute drunkenness cannot be intended, as—"thou shalt be drunk, but not with wine," Isaiah li. 21. "I will make my arrows drunk with blood," Deut. xxxii. 42. They shall be drunk with their own blood." Isaiah. xlix. 26. Absumet ebria sitientem, says Moses, (Deut. xxix. 19.) in a sort of proverbial way: The drunken will devour the thirsty: the rich will consume the poor: the strong will overwhelm the weak. Thou shalt be filled with drunkenness and sorrow, Ezek. xxiii. 33.

DRUSILLA, Δρουσιλλα, watered by the dew; from δρόσος, the dew.

DRUSILLA, third daughter of Agrippa the Great by Cypros, was first promised in marriage to Epiphanes, son of Antiochus king of Comagena, upon an assurance from him, that he would be circumcised: but, he refusing to perform this condition, the marriage was broke off. Drusilla first married Azizus, king of the Emesæniens: whom, after a little time, she left, to marry Claudius Felix, governor of Judea, by whom she had a son, named Agrippa. Before this Drusilla and her husband Felix, St. Paul evidenced the truth of Christianity. Acts xxiv. 24, 25. Drusilla passed for one of the most beautiful beautiful persons of her age, but not for one of the most chaste. Vide the GENEALOGY OF HEROD THE GREAT, FRAGMENTS, No. CCXXVII.

DUDIA, דודא, my beloved, or my uncle; from דוד dod, and י my. Captain of 24,000 men, who served David and Solomon, in the second month. 1 Chr. xxvii. 4.

[DUKE], being a title of honour in use among ourselves, and signifying a higher order of nobility, is apt to mislead the reader, who in Gen. xxxvi. 15—40. finds a long list of dukes of Edom: but the word duke, from the Latin dux, merely signifies a leader, or chief, and the word chief ought rather to have been preferred in our translation: Exod. xv. 15. the dukes of Edom, (i. e. leaders, chiefs—much such chiefs as the judges, or champions, were afterwards in Israel) shall be amazed, the mighty men of Moab shall tremble, &c. See also 1 Chr. i. 51.]

[DULCIMER], Dan. iii. 5, 10. An instrument of music, as is usually thought. In the original the word is symphony, which being a Greek word, signifying sounding together, may perhaps render doubtful whether it really mean a musical instrument, or a musical strain, chorus, or accompaniment of many voices, or instruments, in concert and harmony.

It is a very great difficulty to account how this Greek word should get into the Chaldee language, unless we suppose that some musicians from Greece, or from western Asia, had been taken captive by Nebuchadnezzar, in his victories over the cities, &c. on the coast of the Mediterranean, who might have introduced certain of their own terms of art among the king's band of music; as we now use much of the language of Italy in our musical entertainments; and even our sacred anthems adopt many Italian expressions, &c.]

DUMAH, דומה, silence; from דומ dum: otherwise, resemblance; from דמה damah. The Vulgate reads Rumah, Josh. xv. 52. and the LXX. Peura, and in some copies Peua.

[Duma], may be a peculiar pronunciation of Idumea, Isaiah xxi. 11. FRAG. No. CLXXXVIII.

Perhaps this name should import repose, quiet, stillness, rather than silence, or taciturnity. And thus a city might be called “still-town”—Stillton; and we have the name Still, among our own cognomens. But it may also import level, or equale: and such might be the natural site of a town; such too, possibly, might be the character of a spot among the mountains of Edom; what we call “Table-land,” on the top of a mountain, or “the levels,” between several mountains.]

[DUMB]. One unable to speak by reason of natural infirmity, Exod. iv. 11. “Who maketh the dumb, or deaf, or blind? have not I the Lord?”

One unable to speak by reason of want of knowledge what to say, or how to say it: what proper mode of address to use, or what reasons to allege on his own behalf. Open thy mouth for the dumb—in the cause of all such as are appointed by unjust means, or by mistaken judgment, to destruction; explain the matter under judgment, urge what you can in vindication, endeavour to save life, and let it not be lost, because the party cannot plead his own cause powerfully: be his advocate;—open thy mouth, judge righteously, plead the cause of the poor and needy; do not suffer overbearing violence to condemn and destroy them. Prov. xxxi. 8.

One unwilling to speak: “I was dumb, I opened not my mouth,” out of respect to thy dispensations, “because thou didst it.” Psalm xxxix. 9.

We have a remarkable instance of this venerating dumbness, or silence, in the case of Aaron, Lev. x. 3. After Nadab and Abihu, sons of Aaron were consumed by fire, “Aaron held his peace,” did not exclaim against the justice of God, but saw the propriety of the Divine procedure, and humbly acquiesced in it. N. B. This acquiescence had been too much for flesh and blood to have manifested, had not Aaron been convinced that this dispensation was truly divine, and from God alone.]

A region, 1 Kings, xvii.

More probably “the levels” or plain of considerable extent, extremely level. Vide DAMASCUS.

DUNG, used for fuel in the East, vide FRAGMENTS, No. CVI.

[DUNGHILL]. We have been favoured with the following extract by the respectable writer of FRAGMENT, No. LXXXIII. This sitting on a dunghill, will remind the reader of Job's conduct under his malady; and we have several allusions in Scripture to rolling in dust, &c. as Micah i. 10. Lam. iii. 16, &c.

“We are informed by Plutarch, that the Syrians were affected with a particular disease characterized by violent pain of the bones, ulcers over the whole body, swelling of the feet and abdomen, and a wasting of the liver. This malady was in general referred to the anger of the gods: but was supposed to be more especially inflicted by the Syrian goddess, on those who had eaten some kinds of fish deemed sacred to her. [Vide ASKALON.]”

“In order to appease the offended divinity, the persons affected with the above disorder were taught by the priests to put on sackcloth, or old tattered garments, and to sit on a dunghill; or or to roll themselves naked in the dirt, as a sign of humiliation, and contrition for their offence. R. W." Menander apud Porphyrium.—Plut. de superstitione.—Persius. Sat. v.—Martial, Epigr. iv. 4.]

DURA, דורא, Δωρᾶ, generation, or habitation; from דור dur, or dor. Vide DORA.

DURA, a great plain near Babylon, where Nebuchadnezzar erected a colossal image of gold to be worshipped. Dan. iii. 1. [or the pyre; i. e. the burning pile.

It might be thought, that this extent took its name from its form, round, or circular; as the Arabic root imports: but possibly it was named from some round building, temple, or, &c. though, it must be confessed, that we do not meet with a circular temple among the Babylonians. Was there in this plain an observatory, so that this circle had reference to some instrument or convenience for making observations? Such an one we know was extant at a temple and palace in Egypt.]

DUST. The Hebrews in mourning strewed dust, or ashes, on their heads, Joshua vii. 6. In their afflictions they sat in dust; or threw themselves with their faces on the ground. Come down, sit in the dust, O virgin daughter of Babylon, Isaiah, xlvii. 1. Dust denotes likewise the grave, and death: Dust thou art, and to dust thou shalt return, Gen. iii. 19.

Dust signifies likewise multitude; I will make thy seed as the dust of the earth, Gen. xiii. 16. And Balaam, seeing the Israelites' camp, exclaims, Who can count the dust of Jacob? the multitude of Israel? Numb. xxiii. 10.

Our Saviour commands his disciples to shake the dust off their feet against those who would not hearken to them, nor receive them; to shew hereby, that they desire to have no commerce with them; that they abhor every thing belonging to them; that they give them up to their blindness, misery, and hardness of heart. Matth. x. 14. Mark vi. 11. Luke ix. 5.

EAGLE, נשר Nescher; Ἀετὶς, Aquila. This bird is frequently mentioned in Scripture. It is unclean, with all its species; including the vulture, the hawk, kite, and other birds of prey.

In Psalm ciii. 5. we read, that the Lord maketh a good man renew his youth as an eagle. The conjectures of interpreters have been various concerning the eagle's renewed youth. St. Austin, in loc. and Epiphanius, on Physiolog. tell us, that when the eagle is old, its beak becomes so hooked, as to prevent the bird from eating; but by striking it against a rock, and breaking off a part, the eagle grows young again by taking fresh nourishment. Others suppose, that in this state, the eagle is nourished by drinking only; whence the proverb, Aquila Senectus: but it is thought the eagle does not drink, no more than other birds with sharp claws. The eagle renews its youth like all birds, which cast their feathers yearly in the moulting season, and have others in their stead: this is the best and most simple interpretation. This sense the Hebrew favours.

Moses says, Exod. xix. 4. that God delivered his people out of Egypt, and bore them on eagles' wings; and Deut. xxxii. 11. that "the Lord bore them on his shoulders, as an eagle beareth her young; and set them at liberty, as an eagle takes its young out of the nest, to teach them how to fly, by gently fluttering about them." It is said, that when an eagle sees its young capable of flight, it hovers over their nest, flutters with its wings, and excites them to imitate her, and take their flight; also that when it sees them weary or fearful, she takes them upon her back, and carries them so, that the fowlers cannot hurt the young without piercing through the body of the old one. [It is likely the Racham, rendered eagle by translators, is by no means of this class of birds; it should seem to be a water-bird. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CCLXXXVII. and the NATURAL HISTORY.]

The prophet Micah, i. 16. seems to say that the eagle divests itself of feathers when it mourns, Enlarge thy baldness as the eagle; but unless this refers to the vulture (which I rather think) or to the bald eagle, it may refer to the time of moulting, when the eagle casts almost all its feathers, and falls into a languishing condition. See the NATURAL HISTORY.

Our Saviour in the gospel, alludes to Job xxxix. 29, 30. Wheresoever the carcass is, there will the eagles be gathered together. In common, eagles do not eat carrion, but vultures do, and prefer it: which is the literal meaning of Job: but Jesus Christ uses it figuratively, intimating mating that where the body of the Jewish people was assembled, i. e. at Jerusalem, there would the Roman eagles follow, and consume them.

The Romans, we know, bore the eagle in their standards, and paid divine honours to it, as they did to all their ensigns. Religio Romanorum tota castrensis signa veneratur, signa jurat, signa omnibus Diis præponit, says Tertullian. Several Fathers and interpreters refer the abomination of desolation, Matth. xxiv. 15. (vide ABOMINATION.) to the Roman eagles, and military ensigns, displayed in the holy place, i. e. the Holy Land, when Titus incamped there. But CALMET thinks, that it is the profanations of the temple, by the seditious Jews, the Zealots; who committed unlimited abominations, sacrileges, and murders, as described by Josephus.

EARS. I will uncover thine ear; by this Hebraism, is meant, I will reveal something to thee, 1 Sam. xx. 13. 2 Sam. vii. 27. The servant who renounced the privilege of freedom, in the sabbatical year, had his ear pierced with an awl, in the presence of the judges, at his master's door, Exod. xxi. 6. Deut. xv. 17.

— Molles quod in auro fenestras,
Arguerint, licet ipse negem?

SAT. I.]

The Psalmist says, in the person of the Messiah, Sacrifice and offering thou wouldest not, but mine ears hast thou opened. Heb. Thou hast dug my ears; Thou hast opened them, removed impediments, and made them attentive; or, thou hast pierced them, as those of such servants were pierced, who chose to remain with their masters: [or, thou hast dug my ears, in their form and structure, as they are sunk deep in the head. Query, whether to dig the ears by formation, is not equivalent in import to having prepared a body? Does one action imply the other?] St. Paul reads, Heb. x. 6. a body hast thou prepared for me; and thus the LXX. and the generality of the ancient Fathers read the passage.

To have heavy ears, is said of natural as well as of voluntary deafness. Make the ears of this people heavy; perhaps, repeat thy admonitions to them till their ears are tired of them: or, tell them that I will suffer them to harden their hearts, and stop their ears against my word. Scripture sometimes says the prophets do what they foretel only: but vide FRAGMENTS, No. CXC.

[EAR-RINGS. We have a passage, Gen. xxiv. 4. which has been supposed capable of different senses; Jacob ordered his household to give up the "strange gods which were in their hands, and all their ear-rings which were in their ears;"—i. e. say some, in the ears of the strange gods; while others, with more propriety say, in the ears of the persons of Jacob's family. To determine this question, I shall offer an instance of ear-rings, which I am sure the patriarch Jacob would have buried as deep underground, as he would any other instrument of superstition: it is from MONTFAUCON, Ant. Expl. Vol. III. Supp.

"There was discovered at Porto, when I was at Rome, in a vault under ground, which was made for the family Cæsennia, two large statues; one of a man, dressed like a senator, the other of a woman, in a Roman habit, with two gold pendants in her ears; one with the figure of Jupiter on it, the other with that of Juno: and also the statue of a little child, their son. Aulus Cæsennius Hermea caused these statues to be made for himself and his wife; as the inscription informs us, which was found near them."]

EARTH. This word is taken in various senses:

1. For that gross element, which sustains and nourishes us; which nourishes plants, and fruit; is barren, is watered; &c. for the continent, as distinguished from the sea. God called the dry land earth, Gen. i. 10.

2. For that rude matter which existed in the beginning. God created the heaven and the earth; the matter of all sensible beings, Gen. i. 1.

3. For the terraqueous globe, and its contents, men, animals, plants, metals, waters, &c. The earth is the Lord's, and all that therein is, Psalm xxiv. 1. "The heavens are the Lord's: the earth hath he given to the children of men," Psalm cxv. 16, to them he said, Go forth and make yourselves masters of the earth.

4. For inhabitants of the earth, or continent, The whole earth was of one language, Gen. xi. 1. The earth is filled with violence, Gen. vii. 13. Sing unto the Lord, all the earth, Psalm xcvi. 1.

5. For Judæa, or the whole empire of Chaldæa and Assyria. Thus Cyrus says, (Ezra i. 2.) The Lord God of heaven hath given me all the kingdoms of the earth. The Psalmist invites all the earth, i. e. all Israel, to praise and serve the Lord, Psalm xxxiii. 8.

[The restricted sense of this word to Judæa and the region around it, I apprehend to be more common in Scripture than is usually supposed; and this acceptance of it has great effect in elucidating many passages, where it ought to be so understood.]

To demand earth and water, was a custom of the ancient Persians, whereby they required a people to acknowledge their dominion; Nebuchodonosar, in the Greek of Judith, (chap. ii. 7.) commands Holofernes to march against the people of the West, who had refused submission, and and to declare to them, that they were to prepare earth and water. Darius, in like manner, ordered to demand earth and water of the Scythians, Herod. lib. iv. cap. 126. and Megabysus required the same of Amyntas king of Macedonia in the name of Darius, Idem. lib. v. cap. 17. Polybius and Plutarch notice this custom among the Persians. Some believe, that these symbolical demands denoted dominion of the earth and sea; others, that the earth represented the food received from it, corn and fruits; the water, drink, which is the second part of human nourishment.

Ecclesiasticus, xv. 16. in much the same sense, says, The Lord hath set fire and water before thee, stretch forth thine hand unto whether thou wilt; and, chap. xxxix. 31. "Fire and water are the most necessary things to life." Fire and water were considered by the ancients as the first principles of the generation, birth, and preservation of man. Proscribed persons were debarred from their use; as on the contrary, wives in their nuptial ceremonies were obliged to touch them:

An quod in his vite causa est, hæc perdidit exul?
His nova fit conjux, hæc duo magna putant.

OVID. Fast. lib. 4.

EARTH, in a moral sense, is opposed to heaven and spirit. He that is of the earth, speaketh of the earth: but he that cometh from heaven is above all, John iii. 31. If ye then be risen with Christ, set not your affections on things on the earth, Col. iii. 2.

EARTHQUAKE. Scripture speaks of several earthquakes. One of the most remarkable, is that which swallowed up Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, when the earth cleaving where their tents stood, engulfed them all: [this was, no doubt, a miraculous event: but whether the miracle consisted in the earthquake itself, or in the circumstances attending it, is not clear; possibly there would have been an earthquake had not Israel been encamped around that spot; or had not Korah rebelled; but then Korah and his associates would have escaped from it; i. e. the punishment might be miraculous, though the earthquake was natural.] Another earthquake, is that which happened in the 27th of Uzziah king of Judah, A. M. 3221, ante A. D. 788. This is mentioned Amos iv. 1. Zechariah xiv. 5. and in Josephus, who adds, that its violence divided a mountain, which lay west of Jerusalem, and drove one part of it four furlongs; when it was stopped by the wall on the east of the city, but not till the earth had closed up the highway, and covered the king's gardens,

A very memorable earthquake, is that which happened at our Saviour's death, Matth. xxvii. 15. Many have thought, that this was perceived throughout the world. Others think it was felt only in Judæa, or even in the temple at Jerusalem. St. Cyril of Jerusalem says, (Catheth. comac. 13.) that the rocks on mount Calvary were shewn in his time, which had been rent asunder by this earthquake. Sandys and Maundrell testify the same; and say that they examined the breaches in the rock, and were convinced that they were effects of an earthquake. It must have been terrible, since the centurion and those with him, were so affected by it, as to acknowledge the innocence of our Saviour. Luke xxiii. 47. Phlegon, Adrian's freedman, relates, that, together with the eclipse, which happened at noon-day in the fourth year of the 202d Olympiad, (A. D. 33.) there was likewise a very great earthquake; felt principally in Bithynia. See DARKNESS, ad fin.

II. EARTHQUAKE often alludes to prodigious agitations of mountains, shocks of the foundation of the universe, effects of God's power, wrath, and vengeance: figurative exaggerations, which represent the greatness, strength, and power of God, Psalm civ. 32. The earth shall tremble at his presence, Psalm xviii. 7. xlvii. 2. cxiv. 4.

[Earthquake, expresses dissolution of the powers of government in a country, state, &c. Rev. xvi. 18, 19.]

[EAST. It is remarked, that this word in the Greek of St. Matthew, gives us no certain idea of the country whence the Magi came, Matt. ii. 1. but it might not be so in the Syriac original. In that language, a certain country was most probably determined by this appellation. I do not know, whether the Talmudists may help us in this instance: but they thus speak: "from Rekam to the East, and Rekam itself is as the East"—i. e. excluded from the land of Israel, eastward, and consequently is heathen land; if then, Rekam adjoined the land of Israel, we need not go very far to seek the East, which adjoined Rekam. We may ask also as to the Magi: what was their Syriac title? In the Gemara we have a story of an Arabian informing a Jew that the Messiah was born;—if this were a memorial of Eastern Arabia, it may agree with the country east of Rekam: which would not greatly differ from the districts occupied by the sons of Abraham, and called the East. Gen. xxv. 6. Judges vi. 3. See the PLATES: MAPS, in which the country East of the Dead Sea is uniformly marked. Compare EPHEsus, for the character and title of Magi.]

EAST. The Hebrews express east, west, north, and south, by before, behind, left, and right, according to the situation of a man whose face is turned eastward. By the East they describe frequently not only Arabia Deserta, Moab, Moab, and Ammon, which are truly east of Palestine; but Assyria, likewise Mesopotamia, Babylonia, and Chaldæa, which lie north-east and north of Judæa. See KEDEM.

[EASTER, Acts xii. 4. It is little to the honour of our translation that this word occurs in it; it should have been Passover; which feast of the Jews we well know. Easter is a word of Saxon origin; and imports a goddess of the Saxons, (or rather of the East, and is no other than Astarte—Æstert) in honour of whom sacrifices being annually offered about the passover time of the year, [spring] the name became attached by association of ideas to the Christian festival of the resurrection, which happened at the time of the passover; hence we say Easter-day, Easter-Sunday, but very improperly; as we do by no means refer the festival then kept to the goddess Æster, of the ancient Saxons.]

EATING. The ancient Hebrews did not eat indifferently with all persons; they would have esteemed themselves polluted and dishonoured by eating with people of another religion, or of an odious profession. In Joseph's time, they neither ate with the Egyptians, nor the Egyptians with them, Gen. xliii. 32; nor in our Saviour's time with the Samaritans, John iv. 9. The Jews were scandalized at Jesus Christ's eating with publicans and sinners, Matth. ix. 11. As there were several sorts of meats the use of which was prohibited, they could not conveniently eat with those who partook of them, fearing to receive pollution by touching such food, or if by accident any particles of it should fall on them.

The ancient Hebrews at their meals had each his separate table. Joseph, entertaining his brethren in Egypt, seated them separately, each at his particular table, and he himself sat down separately from the Egyptians, who ate with him; but he sent to his brethren portions out of the provisions which were before him. Gen. xliii. 31, & seq. Elkanah, Samuel's father, who had two wives, distributed their portions to them separately, 1 Sam i. 4, 5. In Homer, each guest has his little table apart; and the master of the feast distributes meat to each, Odys. xiv. We are assured that this is still practised in China; and that many in India never eat out of the same dish, nor on the same table with another person, believing they cannot do so without sin; and this, not only in their own country, but when travelling, and in foreign lands. Renaudot, Notes sur le Voyage des deux Arabes a la Chine, p. 123, 124.

[This is notorious of the Brahmins; and of various castes in India; who will not even use a vessel after a European, though he has only drank from it fresh water recently drawn out of a well. The same strictness is observed by the more scrupulous among the Mahometans; instances have been known, of every plate and dish, and cup, that had been used by Christian guests, being broken immediately after their departure.]

The antique manners which we see in Homer, we see likewise in Scripture, with regard to eating, drinking, and entertainments: we find great plenty, but little delicacy; great respect and honour paid to the guests by serving them plentifully. Joseph sent his brother Benjamin a portion five times larger than those of his other brethren. Samuel set a whole quarter of a calf before Saul. The women did not appear at table in entertainments with the men. This would have been an indecency; as it is at this day throughout the East.

The Hebrews anciently sat at table as we do now; afterwards they imitated the Persians and Chaldæans, who lay down on table-beds while eating; some traces of these are nevertheless observed, as in Proverbs, xxiii. 1, in Amos, vi. 4, 7, in Ezekiel, xxiii. 47. and in Tobit, ii. 4; but this custom was not general. We find expressions in the sacred authors of those times, which prove, that they also sat at table. At Ahasuerus's banquet, Esth. i. 6, the company lay on beds; also, at that which Esther gave the king and Haman, chap. vii. 8. Our Saviour in like manner lay at table when Magdalen anointed his feet with perfume, (Matth. xxvi. 7.) also when John at the last supper, rested his head on his bosom. John xiii. 25. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CIV. and PLATE.

The present Jews before they sit down to table, carefully wash their hands; they speak of this ceremony as essential and obliging. After meals they wash them again. When they sit down to table, the master of the house, or the chief person in the company, taking bread, breaks it, but does not wholly separate it; then putting his hand on it, he recites this blessing: Blessed be thou, O Lord our God, the king of the world, who producest the bread of the earth. Those present answer, Amen. Having distributed the bread among the guests, he takes the vessel of wine in his right hand, saying, Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, king of the world, who hast produced the fruit of the vine. They then repeat the xxxiii Psalm. Buxtorf and Leo of Modena, who have given particular accounts of the Jewish ceremonies, differ in some circumstances; the reason is, Buxtorf wrote principally the ceremonies of the German Jews, and Leo those of the Italian Jews. See Buxtorf's Syn. and Leo of Modena, Part ii. cap. 10.

They take care, that after meals there shall be a piece of bread remaining on the table; the master of the house orders a glass to be washed, fills it with wine, and elevating it, says, Let us bless him of whose benefits we have been partaking; the rest answer, Blessed be he, who has heaped his favours on us, and by his goodness has now fed us. Then he recites a pretty long prayer, wherein he thanks God for his many benefits vouchsafed to Israel; beseeches him to pity Jerusalem and his temple, to restore the throne of David, to send Elias and the Messiah, to deliver them out of their long captivity, &c. All present, answer Amen. They recite Psalm xxiv. 9, 10. Fear the Lord, O ye his saints, &c. Then giving the glass with the little wine in it to be drunk round, he drinks what is left, and the table is cleared.

EBAL, עֵבֶל, Γεβήλ, heap, or collection of old age; from עָיָה hi, and בָּלָה balah, old: or a mass that runs away and disperses. Son of Shobal, descendant of Seir the Horite, Gen. xxvi. 23.

EBAL, a mountain in Ephraim, near Shechem, over against mount Gerizim. Jerom, Eusebius, and others, have thought that Gerizim and Ebal were opposite to Jericho, and distant from Shechem: but we shall demonstrate the contrary under Gerizim. These mountains are separated by a valley of about two hundred paces wide, wherein stands the town of Shechem. Both mountains are much alike in length, height, and form. Morizon. Voyage, lib. iii. cap. 10. They are at most half a league in length. But if they are alike in these particulars, in others they are very unlike; for Ebal is barren, but Gerizim is beautiful and fruitful. The Jews and Samaritans have great disputes about them. See GERIZIM.

Moses commanded Israel, that as soon as they had passed the Jordan they should go to Shechem, and divide into two bodies, each composed of six tribes, one placed on, i. e. adjacent to, Ebal; the other on, i. e. adjacent to, Gerizim. The six tribes on, or at, Gerizim were to pronounce blessings on those who should faithfully observe the law; and the six on mount Ebal, were to pronounce curses against those who should violate it. This Joshua executed, (Josh. viii. 30, 31.) A. M. 2553, ante A. D. 1451. Moses enjoined them to erect an altar of unhewn stones on mount Ebal, and to plaster them over, that the law might be written on the altar; but the Samaritan Pentateuch, instead of Ebal reads Gerizim; because the altar, sanctuary, &c. of the Samaritans were, and are at this day, on mount Gerizim.

The ceremony of consecrating the commonwealth of the Hebrews, is thought to have been performed in this manner. The chiefs of the first six tribes went up mount Gerizim, and those of the other six tribes went up mount Ebal.

The priests with the ark, and Joshua at the head of the elders of Israel, stood in the middle of the valley, between the two mountains. The Levites formed a circle about the ark, and the elders were with the people at the foot of each mountain, six tribes on a side. Thus disposed, the priests faced towards mount Gerizim, and pronounced a blessing, as, Blessed be the man that maketh not any graven image. The six princes upon the mountain, and the six tribes at the foot of it, answered, Amen. Afterwards, the priest, turning towards mount Ebal, proclaimed, Cursed be the man who maketh any graven image. To which the six princes, who were upon the mountain, and the six tribes below, answered, Amen.

Scripture seems at first to intimate, that there were six intire tribes on one mountain, and six on the other; but, besides that the tribes were too numerous to stand upon these two mountains, it was not possible for them to see the ceremony, nor to hear the blessings and curses, in order to answer to them. The Hebrew particle signifies near, over-against, as well as at the top of. Joshua viii. 33.

As to the great stones set up and plastered over, to receive the law, expositors are not agreed, whether this monument was the altar on which the peace-offerings were sacrificed. Yet by comparing verses 2, 3, with Deut. chap. xxvii. 3. it will appear, that the altar is well distinguished from the pile formed by the stones in question.

EBED, son of Jonathan, of Adin's family, returned with fifty men from Babylon, Ezra viii. 6.

II. EBED, father of Gaal. Judg. ix. 26.

EBED-MELECH, עֲבֵד־מֶלֶךְ, the king's servant; from עָבַד ebed, a servant, and מֶלֶךְ melech, a king.

EBED-MELECH, a eunuch or servant of king Zedekiah. Being informed that Jeremiah was imprisoned in a place full of dirt and infection, he informed the king of it, and was the mean of his restoration to safety, but not to liberty: for this humanity he was promised divine protection. Accordingly, after the city was taken by Nabuzaradan, Ebed-melech was preserved. A. M. 3416, ante A. D. 588. Jer. xxxviii. 8.

EBEN-EZER, אֲבֵן־עֶזֶר, stone of help; from עָזַר hazar, help, and אֲבֵן aben, or eben, a stone, 1 Sam. vii. 12. A witness-stone erected by Samuel, of Divine assistance obtained, &c.

EBIASAPH, אֲבִיאָסָף, father that gathers together, or adds, or my father who has added; from יָסַף jasaph, to add. A Levite, son of Elkanah, and father of Assir. 1 Chron. vi. 23.

EBODA, a town in Arabia Petrea. Probably Oboda, or Oboth. Numb. xxi. 10. xxxiii. 43, 44.

ECBATANA, אֶחְבָּרָנָה, Ecbarana, brother of death; death; from אחא achah, brother, and מוּת muth, death. This word is Medish, its true etymology cannot be found in the Hebrew.

ECBATANA, a city of Media, built by Dejoces king of the Medes, and encompassed with seven walls, of unequal heights; the largest, according to Herodotus, (lib. i. cap. 98.) was equal in extent with those of Athens, i. e. 178 furlongs, or nearly eight leagues. Thucyd. lib. i. The battlements of these walls were of different colours. The first white, the second black, the third red, the fourth blue, the fifth a deep red, the sixth overlaid with silver, the seventh gilded. Herodotus attributes this work to Dejoces: but Judith, chap. i. 1. says Arphaxad, whom we take to be Phraortes, the successor of Dejoces, built Ecbatana.

Ecbatana was in Old Media, and is often made a part of Persia. The kings of Persia used to pass the summer there, because of the freshness of the air.

We read, Ezra vi. 2, that at Ecbatana in Media, was found a copy of Cyrus's edict, which permitted the Jews to return to their own country. But several interpreters translate בארמית in Achmeta, a strong box, a press; i. e. this edict was found in a press, among the old records of Media. [but this might be an office for records.]

II. EGBATANA, or rather Gabbatha, a city at the foot of mount Carmel, toward Ptolemais, Pliny, lib. v. cap. 9. Vide CAMBYSES.

ECCLESIASTES, Ἐκκλησιαστής, ἑλπ, Coheleth. He that assembles and preaches.

ECCLESIASTES. This word is feminine in the Hebrew, and literally signifies, she who speaks in public; or, she who convenes the assembly. The Greeks and Latins, not regarding the gender, render it Ecclesiastes, an orator, one who speaks in public. Solomon describes himself in the first verse, The words of Koheleth, the son of David, king of Jerusalem. He mentions his works, his riches, his buildings, and his proverbs, or parables, and that he was the wisest and happiest of all kings in Jerusalem; which description plainly characterises Solomon.

Notwithstanding, critics have disputed, whether this book were written by Solomon. Grotius thought it was composed long after Solomon; and that Zerubbabel procured the regulation of it for his son Abihud. Several have thought, because it contains some passages which oppose others, that Ecclesiastes is a dialogue, wherein a pious man disputes against a libertine, who maintains opinions of the Sadducees. But, there is no proof of Zerubbabel's having this book digested into order; nor any traces in it of a dialogue: the contradictory sentiments proceed from Solomon's disputing pro and con, proposing, and answering, Sadducean objections.

The Hebrews, St. Jerom, and the generality of commentators, believe this book to be the production of Solomon's repentance, toward the latter end of his life. We find several marks of repentance in it. He tells us, that he had studied every gratification, had denied himself no pleasure, but had found only vanity.

The Rabbins inform us, and St. Jerom confirms it, that they who after the captivity collected the sacred writings into the Canon, at first made a difficulty of admitting Ecclesiastes, by reason of some dangerous opinions, and some particular expressions in it, which might suggest doubts concerning the immortality of the soul; but after long deliberation, it was concluded to receive it, in consideration of expressions toward the close, exhorting to the fear of God, and observation of his laws, (Ecc. xii. 13.) ever since that time this book has been esteemed canonical. Theodorus of Mopsuesta was of opinion, that Solomon composed it without particular inspiration; Philastrius observes, that some heretics rejected it, as favouring Epicurism.

Solomon in this book proposes the sentiments of the Sadducees and Epicureans in their full force. He proves excellently the vanity of all things, the little benefit of men's restless and busy cares, and the uncertainty of their knowledge; but concludes, Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter: Fear God, and keep his commandments, for this is the whole of man. In this all his obligations terminate; this is his only means to happiness, present and future.

ECCLESIASTICUS. This book is so called in Latin, perhaps to distinguish it from Ecclesiastes, or to shew that it contains, as well as the former, precepts and exhortations to wisdom and virtue. The Greeks call it The Wisdom of Jesus the son of Sirach; or, The Panaretos of Jesus the son of Sirach. Panaretos signifies a book that treats of all sorts of virtues. It contains maxims and instructions, useful in all states and conditions of life.

Some of the ancients ascribed this work to Solomon, but the author is much more modern than Solomon; and speaks of several persons who lived after that prince. He mentions himself, chap. i. 29, I, Jesus the son of Sirach, have written in this book the instruction of understanding and knowledge. Chap. li. is inscribed, A prayer of Jesus the son of Sirach. The interpreter of it out of Syriac or Hebrew into Greek, says, that his grandfather Jesus composed it in Hebrew.

As to the translator, Athanasius, Epiphanius, and Joan. Damascenus, were of opinion, that Jesus the son of Sirach had a son of the same name, and a grandson too, called Jesus, and surnamed the son of Sirach, who translated this book. But we have no authentic information who he was, for the preface, which calls him Jesus, has not this name in the Greek of the Roman edition.

Some Rabbins think, Ben-sira, a Jewish writer, from whom we have two alphabets of Proverbs, is this Jesus the son of Sirach: this opinion has been adopted by several Christian authors; and there is indeed great conformity in the sentences of these two writers. A parallel of them is drawn up by Cornelius a Lapide, and prefixed to his comment on Ecclesiasticus. But, if it be true, as the Jews insist, that Ben-sira was Jeremiah's nephew, and father of one Uziel, he cannot be this Jesus the son of Sirach, who lived long after the captivity, and since the monarchy of the Ptolemies in Egypt.

We do not know exactly when the author of this book lived. He praises the high-priest Simon, and speaks of him as not then living: but there were more high-priests than one of this name. Nevertheless, it is probable, he means Simon II. after whose death those calamities befel the Jews, which might induce the son of Sirach to speak as he does, chap. xxxvi. and l. The translator of it into Greek, came into Egypt in the thirty-eighth year of Ptolemy VII. surnamed Euergetes, the second of that name; as he says in his preface. The author of the Latin translation from the Greek, is unknown. St. Jerom did not translate this book, and we have it as the old Fathers cited it, in very barbarous Latin.

The admittance of this book into the canon, and whether it ever had been placed there, has been disputed. In several old catalogues of canonical books, we do not find this. Jerom says, the church receives it for edification, but not to authorize any point of doctrine.

ECDIPPA, otherwise Achziß. Vide ACHZIB.

ECLIPSE. We do not find this word in Scripture. The Hebrews seem not to have philosophized much on eclipses. They considered them as sensible marks of God's anger. Vide Joel ii. 10, 31. and iii. 15. Job seems to say, that an eclipse is caused by the interposition of the hand of God between us, and the star eclipsed. Job xxxvi. 32. In manibus abscondit lucem, & præcipit ei ut rursus adveniat. Job ix. 7. God commandeth the sun, and it riseth not, and sealeth up the stars. Ezekiel, xxxii. 7. speaks more particularly, that God covers the sun with clouds, when he deprives the earth of its light, by eclipses. For the eclipses which happened at our Saviour's death, vide DARKNESS. [Yet, when we read "the sun shall be turned into darkness; and the moon into blood;" we can hardly avoid discerning an acquaintance with the appearance of those luminaries while under eclipses. The interruption of the sun's light causes him to appear black; and the moon during a total eclipse exhibits a copper colour; or, what Scripture intends by a blood colour.]

[ED, Witness. The name given to the altar erected by the two tribes and half who were settled beyond Jordan: it was probably a copy, or repetition of that which was used among the Hebrews their brethren, and it was built to witness to posterity the interest of these tribes in the altar common to the descendants of the patriarch Israel.]

EDEN, עֵדֶן, Eden, pleasure, or delight.

EDEN, a province in Asia, wherein was Paradise. The Lord planted east-ward a garden of delights; גֶּן בְּעֶדֶן a garden in Eden. The country of Eden, or Aden, is mentioned in several places of Scripture. Isaiah, xxxvii. 12. speaks of the children of Eden, who were at Telassar. In 2 Kings xix. 12, 13. the children of Eden are joined with Gozan, Haran, and Rezeeph. Ezekiel, xxvii. 23. associates the merchants of Eden with those of Haran, Cannah, Ashur, and Chilmad; Haran is Charre in Mesopotamia on the river Chaboras; Canneh or Calneh, is perhaps Callinicum in Mesopotamia. We are of opinion, that the country of Eden included Armenia, with the sources of the Euphrates, Tigris, Phasis, and Araxes.

Some believe the garden of Eden was situated on the Jordan, which name they derive from יַרְדֵּן Jor-Aden, the stream of Aden: and the lake Gennesareth, which is some miles down this river, גֶּן־זֶרַת, Genna-Sarat, the prince's garden, or the principal garden.

II. EDEN, a town of Mount Libanus, delightfully situated; the river Adonis is not far from it; a little south of it are the cedars of Libanus. In our opinion, the prophet Amos speaks of this Eden or Aden, I will destroy him who holds the sceptre of the house of Eden; Vulgate, of the house of pleasure.

[Aden, in the eastern dialects, is precisely the same word as Eden, which we apply to the garden of Paradise: it has two senses according to a slight difference in its pronunciation; its first meaning is a settled abode; its second is delight, softness, or tranquillity: the word Eden had, probably, one of these senses in the sacred text, though we use it as a proper name." Sir Wm. Jones's Works, p. 528. Vol. IV.

This import of the name justifies the translation of the Vulgate: so that, probably, it had this double acceptation in western Asia also;

but the idea of "settled abode" i. e. for Adam, ought by no means to be excluded from Eden.]

III. EDEN son of Joah, 2 Chr. xxix. 12.

EDER, עֵדֶר, flock: or, to take away, to cut off.

I. EDER, a town of Judah, Josh. xv. 21.

II. EDER, son of Mushi, 1 Chr. xxiii. 23.

EDESSA, אֶדְסָס, or Edissa, i. e. Esther, myrtle; from אֶדָּס hadass: according to the Syriac, joy. See ESTHER.

EDESSA, a city of Mesopotamia, built about 400 years before A. D. by Seleucus king of Syria, in that part of Mesopotamia called Osrhoene, Hieron. in Chronico. It is remarkable in church history for a supposed letter of Jesus Christ to king Abagarus, (Vide ABAGARUS) who reigned at Edessa. Count Darius in St. Austin, Ep. 230. says, our Saviour promised Abagarus, that the city of Edessa should be impregnable; and Evagrius, Hist. Eccles. lib. iv. cap. 27. remarks, that although this was not in our Lord's letter, it was a common belief; which was much confirmed, when Cosroes king of Persia, having sat down before it, was forced to raise the siege.

[Osrhoene subsisted 843 years as an independent kingdom; but was reduced to the form of a Roman province by Caracalla, who led Abgarus, the last of its kings, in chains to Rome. It was taken from the Emperor Heraclius, by Yezid, a Saracen general. It was wrested from the Saracens by the crusaders, in the first crusade, under Baldwin, brother to Godfrey of Bouillon, and was erected into a Christian principality, under a branch of the house of Courteney; who were expelled by Zingi, the Attabek, A. D. 1145. It afterwards formed part of the empire of the famous Saladin, and with the countries around it, fell under the power of the Turks, who still hold it. Edessa was esteemed by the Romans one of the bulwarks of Mesopotamia against the Parthians. It was sacked by the Moguls in the thirteenth century, and by Timur in 804 of the Hegira. The country around it is not fertile: the fortifications are cut out of the rock; and the ditch can be filled with water from the river Scirtus. The inhabitants are about 20,000. There are interesting antiquities in the neighbouring mountain. It is now called Orfu.]

EDNA, wife of Raguel, cousin to Tobit, carried captive with Raguel to Rages, in Media.

EDOM, אֶדוֹם, Adam, 'Eḏōm. Vulgate Adom, red, earthy, or of blood.

EDOM, otherwise Esau, son of Isaac, and brother of Jacob. The name Edom, which signifies red, was given him, either because he sold his birthright to Jacob for a mess of red pottage, or by reason of the colour of his hair and complexion. Gen. xxv. 25, 30. See ESAU. Idu- mæa is named from Edom, and is often called the land of Edom; [and some have thought that the Red Sea was named after Edom.] See IDUMÆA.

EDREI, אֶדְרֵי, 'Aḏrai, a very great mass; from אֶדָּר ador, great, strong, and יָהִי, a heap, or mass: otherwise, cloud, death of the wicked; from אֶד ed, cloud or death, and רוּחַ ruah, or רָע rah, wicked: otherwise, death of the companion, or of the shepherd; from רוּחַ roah.

I. EDREI, a town of Manasseh, beyond Jordan, Josh. xiii. 31. called likewise Edraea and Adraea, and perhaps Edera in Ptolemy, when speaking of the towns in the Batanaea. Eusebius places Edrei about twenty-five miles from Bostri, a town in Arabia, northward.

II. EDREI, a town of Naphthali, Josh. xix. 37.

EGLAI, עֵגְלָי heifer, chariot, round. (fem.)

EGLAI, sixth wife of David, and mother of Ithream, 2 Sam. iii. 5. Many are of opinion, that Eglah and Michal are the same, and that she died in labour of Ithream. But see 2 Sam. vi. 23. Michal had no children.

EGLAIM. See AGALLA.

EGLON, עֵגְלֹן, [caly], chariot, round. (masc.)

I. EGLON, king of Moab, Judges iii. 12, 13, 15. oppressed Israel eight years. In conjunction with the Ammonites and Amalekites, he advanced to the city of palm-trees, i. e. Jericho or Engedi, which he took, and where was his usual residence. The Lord raised up Ehud to deliver Israel from his oppression. Vide FRAGMENT, No. XXXIII. This servitude continued from A. M. 2591 to 2599, ante A. D. 1405.

II. EGLON, a city of Judah, Josh. x. 3, xv. 39.

EGYPT, מִצְרַיִם, Mizraim, 'Agyptia, that binds or straitens, or that troubles or oppresses; from מִצָּר metzar. EGYPTIAN, מִצְרִי, Mezri.

EGYPT, a country in Africa; in Greek, Aigyptos, whence the Latin Ægyptus, and the English, Egypt, and Copt. Mizraim was son of Ham; Ægyptus was, they say, an ancient king of this country, son of Belus, and brother of Armais. The sons of Mizraim were Ludim, Ananim, Sehabin, and Naphthuhim, Pathrusim, and Castubim, who peopled several districts of Egypt, or adjacent to it. The old geographers placed in Asia, that part of Egypt east of the Nile, and in Africa that part west of the Nile. That part of lower Egypt, east of the Nile, they considered as part of Arabia. In Scripture it is often made part of the land of Cush, and is frequently translated Ethiopia.

Egypt was divided into forty-two nomes, or districts, which were little provinces, or counties. Egypt was distinguished into Upper and Lower. Upper Egypt was called Thebais, because of the city Thebes, its capital. It extended south to the frontiers of Ethiopia. Lower

Egypt

Egypt contained principally the Delta, and the country on the coast of the Mediterranean. Egypt has properly but one river, the Nile, whose annual inundation produces all its fertility.

The Arabians call Lower Egypt, Rib, or Rif. Upper Egypt they call Sais, or Thebais, and the part between, Souf. The word Rib or Rif, occurs Psalm lxxxvii. 4. "I will mention Rahab," or Rib; also Psalm lxxxix. 11. Isaiah xxx. 7. li. 9. The word Souf occurs likewise; Moses calls the Red Sea, the sea of Souf. It is amazing that Sais, the name of Thebes, that famous capital of Upper Egypt, should not occur in Scripture. Some are of opinion, that Thebes is called No-Ammon. D'Herbelot, (Bibl. Orient.) says, that Said in Arabic signifies a high ground, and that they call Upper Egypt, Said Mesr.

The name of Mesr, Misor, or Misraim, son of Ham, is preserved in the city which has been successively called Misor, Memphis, Moph, Babylon, and Cairo. (Bibl. Orient.) It was called Moph or Memphis, till Alexander the Great; then Babylon, by reason of its situation, and its inhabitants' relation to Babylon of Chaldaea. This city was conquered by the Arabians in the 18th or 19th year of the Hegira, A. D. 614. Amrou-Ben-As, who took it, built another near it, which was called Fusthath, from the general's tent, which had long occupied that place. The Fatimite Caliphs becoming masters of Egypt, added another city, which they named Caherah, "the victorious," the present Grand Cairo.

Cairo is built on the eastern shore of the Nile, but the ancient Misor or Mesr, was on the western shore. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. XXXVIII. Also, the DISSERTATION on MEMPHIS.

The Turks call the Egyptian natives, who are not Mussulmen, Kibs. They boast of Egypt as of the most beautiful country in the world: one of them says, the soil is for three months in the year white and sparkling like pearl, for three months black like musk, for three more green like emeralds, and for three months more yellow as amber. He enumerates the particular rare productions of Egypt; as, a mine of Oriental emeralds, red barley, opium, balm of Mataraea, Joseph's wheat, the art of hatching chicken in ovens, honey of the bees of Baenza, the Egyptian bean, fine flax, cassia, the lizard called Scinc, singular woods and marbles, the plant Papyrus, &c. It is not therefore surprising, to find the Israelites in the wilderness regretting so excellent a country.

Homer calls the Nile, Egyptus. Odyss. xiv. v. 258. Several of the ancients assert, that Egypt was a tract of land produced by deposition of the mud of the Nile; and this the Ethiopians used as an argument to prove, that they were more ancient than the Egyptians. Bochart has confuted this opinion. Phaleg. lib. iv. cap. 24. [but see what follows.]

The Nile regularly overflows this country in the beginning of the summer solstice, continuing the whole time of the sun's passage through the sign Leo: it decreases when the sun enters Virgo, and when he is in Libra, the Nile sinks. The old Egyptians had two crops of corn yearly from the same ground; at present they get but one. After barley-harvest they sowed rice, melons, and cucumbers. Egypt is said to have furnished to Rome annually twenty millions of bushels of corn.

Pliny says, they sow early in November; that they begin their harvest in April, and end in May. Moses observes, that in the middle of March, when the Israelites departed out of Egypt, the barley and flax, being far advanced, were spoiled by the hail; but that the wheat, being not so forward, was preserved. The Egyptians sowed their barley and flax in the beginning of November, after the waters of the Nile had retired. The winter is very moderate. The wheat-harvest was ended by Pentecost in Palestine and Egypt; certainly before the Nile began to overflow.

The Egyptians boasted of being the most ancient people in the world: the inventors of arts and sciences: they communicated to the Greeks the names of the gods; and their theology: they exceeded in superstition and idolatry, worshipping stars, men, animals, and even plants. Moses informs us, that the Hebrews sacrificed beasts, whose slaughter was considered by the Egyptians as an abomination: Exod. viii. 26. likewise, that they would not eat with the Hebrews, because they abhorred all shepherds.

As to the motives of this aversion, opinions are divided. Some believe it was founded on the invasion of Egypt by the Shepherd kings, from Arabia, who reigned here a long time, according to Manetho. Others think, that the Egyptians, after their king Sesostris, being accustomed to a soft and idle life, detested shepherds, whose profession was more active and laborious. Others, that the Egyptians were so averse to shepherds, because of their killing and eating sheep, kids, and goats, which were objects of their national worship.

This country, properly speaking, was the cradle of the Hebrew nation. Joseph being carried thither and sold as a slave, was, by God's wisdom, and providence, established viceroy of Egypt. Hither he invited his father and family, in number about seventy persons; after dwelling dwelling here 215 years, the whole family and their people departed from hence, in number 603,550 men. The king of Egypt would not permit the Hebrews to leave his country till he was compelled by miracles and chastisements. And after he had dismissed, and expelled them, he repented, pursued them, and followed them into the Red Sea, where he perished.

The common name of the Egyptian kings was Pharaoh, which signified sovereign power. [Vide FRAGMENT, LXXXIII.] But each had another name personal to himself. History has preserved the names of several kings of Egypt, and a succession of their dynasties. But the inclination of the Egyptian historians to magnify the great antiquity of their nation, has injured their credibility. They assert, that Egypt was successively governed by gods, demi-gods, (or heroes) and by men, or kings. The reign of the gods and demi-gods lasted, say they, 34,201 years; that of their kings from Menes to Nectanebus, 2,324 years. Nectanebus was deposed by Artaxerxes Ochus, king of Persia: fifteen years before Alexander the Great: about 340 years ante A. D.

It is supposed that the mode of the ancient Egyptian computation of years, contributed to swell their chronology so immoderately. Palæphatus says, Frag. ex Chron. Alexand. that in remote ages they reckoned the duration of their princes' reigns by days, not by years. And who will warrant us, that they who came after, did not set down years instead of days? so that Helios, son of Vulcan, reigning 4477 days, was only twelve years three months and four days, instead of 4477 years.

Didorus Siculus, lib. i. says, that some have suggested that their year consisted only of one month, so that the 1200 years of every god's reign were reduced to 1200 months, or 100 years. Afterwards, says he, the Egyptian year consisted of four months: this reduces the excessive antiquity of the Egyptian dynasties to a reasonable duration. Censorinus, de die natali, cap. 19. assures us, that anciently the Egyptian year consisted only of two months, and that king Pison added to it two months, and at last fixed it at twelve.

It is farther certain, that the dynasties of Egypt, were not all successive, but many of them collateral, and the greater part of the kings, placed one after the other, were contemporary; one reigning in one part of Egypt, another in another. These lists also bear seven different names according to the seven districts wherein the dynasties subsisted: viz. at This, Memphis, Diospolis, Thamis, Sethron, Elephantina, and Sais. Now if these dynasties are placed successively, we may easily imagine that the duration of them may very much differ from the same placed collaterally.

Scripture has preserved the proper names of only four of the Pharaohs: Shishak, Necho, So, and Hophrah. Shishak is perhaps Sesonchis; Necho is Nechos in Herodotus; So is Sabacou, or Sethon; and Hophrah is Apries. Shishak lived in the time of Rehoboam son of Solomon; Necho, in the time of Josiah king of Judah; So, in the time of Hoshea king of Israel: and Hophrah, in the time of Zedekiah. Herodotus makes him the son of Psammis, and grandson of Necho. lib. ii. cap. 141, 161. After Apries we find Amasis, and Psammitichus, in whose reign Cambyses conquered Egypt, A. M. 3479, ante A. D. 525. After this, we find the following kings in Egypt, Inarus, Achoris, Tuchos, Nectanebus: this last was deprived of his kingdom by Artaxerxes Ochus, A. M. 3654, ante A. D. 350. Alexander the Great conquered Egypt, A. M. 3673, ante A. D. 331.

The Ptolemies succeeded Alexander, and we have a series of them in the order of succession.

KINGS OF EGYPT.

A. M.

- 3681 Ptolemy son of Lagus, surnamed Soter, from the death of Alexander, reigned 39 years.
- 3720 Ptolemy Philadelphus reigned 39 years.
- 3758 Ptolemy Euergetes reigned 25 years.
- 3783 Ptolemy Philopator reigned 17 years.
- 3800 Ptolemy Epiphanes reigned 24 years.
- 3824 Ptolemy Philometor reigned 37 years.
- 3861 Ptolemy Euergetes, or Physcon, reigned 53 years.
- 3888 Ptolemy Lathyrus reigned 36 years, 6 months.
- 3923 Cleopatra, daughter of Lathyrus, and wife of Alexander I. reigned six months.
- Alexander I. nephew of Lathyrus.
- Alexander II. son of Alexander I. banished by the Alexandrians in 3939.
- 3940 Ptolemy Nothus, or Auletes, reigned 13 years.
- 3953 Ptolemy Dionysius, or Bacchus, reigned three years and eight months.
- 3957 Cleopatra, Ptolemy's sister, to 3974, after which period the Romans established their government in this country.

ADDITION.

[EGYPT is a province of great importance in Holy Writ. We shall endeavour to add some particulars to those already given; and this we are enabled to do with more advantage, by having been favoured with the communication of a journal, kept by [the late Lieut. Col. then Major HOPE,] one of our military officers who accompanied the Turkish army, in their route to expel the French, 1801. The same journal was consulted by Dr. Wittman, when composing his Travels in Syria and Egypt; which may account for an occasional similarity of phraseology with some parts of the Dr.'s work.

We confine our information principally to such articles as may illustrate Scripture incidents.

"Egypt is above 200 leagues in length : and 68 its greatest breadth : that is from Tineh to the Arab's Tower." Maj. H. MS. Oct. 19. 1801.

It is usual to include in the name Egypt, from Syene, south, to the most northern point of the coast adjacent to the mouths of the Nile. At Syene, Ethiopia may be said to begin.

The southern part of this extent is extremely rocky, and arid. During this part of its course, the Nile, is a single stream. Where the Nile divides into two, or more streams, it embraces that part of Egypt which the Greeks named the Delta ; in the north of Egypt.

"The Delta appears to be a vast plain, yielding an abundance of corn, and other productions, and interspersed with numerous villages, built on eminences surrounded by date trees. On the banks of the Nile, the Arab inhabitants cultivate water-melons, gourds, tobacco, indigo, called nileh, a few fruits, and other vegetables ; also Indian corn." Dr. W. p. 306.

The water of the Nile not only fertilizes the lands included between its streams, but also those on each side of its external channels ; even where the inundation itself does not appear. The cause is, the imbibition of the water, by the earth, below its surface, which nourishes the roots of the plants growing in it, and striking down some depth into the ground. The level of these places, of course, determines the extent of this subterranean communication.

"Note. The Arab villages in Egypt are the most miserable and filthy habitations I have ever seen : they resemble plantations in the West India Islands, with date trees about them, and a few of the Pharaoh fig trees." Maj. H.

The inhabitants of Egypt may be considered as including three distinctions : 1. the Copths, or descendants of the ancient Egyptians. 2. The Fellahs, or husbandmen ; which I suspect represent the people called in Scripture Phul. 3. The Arabs, or conquerors of the country ; including the Turks, Mamelukes, &c.

The Copths, have seen so many revolutions in the governing powers, that they concern themselves very little about the successes, or misfortunes of those who aspire to dominion. The Fellahs suffer so much oppression, and are so despised by the Bedouins, or wandering Arabs, and by their despotic rulers, that they seldom acquire property, and very rarely enjoy it in security. The Arabs hate the Turks : yet the Turks enjoy most offices of government ; but hold their superiority by no very certain tenure.

The heat of Egypt is excessive : Volney says, "the Egyptians, who go almost naked, and are accustomed to perspire, shiver at the least coolness. The thermometer, which, at the lowest, in the month of February, stands at 8° or 9° of Reaumur, (50 or 52 of Fahrenheit,) above the freezing point, enables us to determine, with certainty, and we may pronounce that snow, and hail, are phenomena which no Egyptian has seen in fifty years."

He says also, "Two seasons only should be distinguished in Egypt ; the spring and summer ; that is to say, the cold season, and the hot. The latter continues from March to November ; and from the end of February the sun is not supportable for an European at nine o'clock in the morning. During the whole of this season the air is inflamed, the sky sparkling, and the heat oppressive to all unaccustomed to it. The body sweats profusely, even under the lightest dress, and in a state of the most profound repose." Volney's Trav. Vol. I. pp. 67, 68.

Dr. Wittman says, "In Egypt, in the month of August, the great heats were productive of prickly heat, painful pustular eruptions of the skin, boils, and other similar complaints. The bites of gnats, mosquitos, and other insects, became inflamed, and produced very troublesome suppurations. The heat was so insupportable, that it was necessary to keep as much as possible within doors." p. 329.

"In Egypt, the night setting in, the company retired to rest ; many of the men without doors, according to the usual practice of the Arabs in the summer season. They lie scattered over the plains, like flocks of sheep, with the clothes they have taken off, spread beneath them, and themselves covered from head to foot, by the large handkerchief, which they wear in the day time across the shoulders." p. 334.

This sleeping in the open air, and so lightly covered, is among those customs which appear most strange to Europeans : but it occurs frequently in Scripture ; and is adopted without hesitation throughout the East.

"The inhabitants of humid countries cannot conceive how it is possible for a country to subsist without rain ; but in Egypt, besides the quantity of water which the earth imbibes at the inundation, the dews which fall in the night suffice for vegetation. The water-melons afford a remarkable proof of this ; for though they have frequently nothing under them but a dry dust, yet their leaves are always fresh. These dews, as well as the rains, are more copious towards the sea, and less considerable in proportion to the distance from it ; but differ from the latter by being more abundant in summer than in winter. At Alexandria, after sun-set, in the month of April, the clothes exposed to the air, and the terraces are soaked with dew, as if it had had rained. Like the rains, again, these dews are more or less plentiful, according to the prevailing wind. The southerly and the south-westerly produce none; the north wind produces a great deal; and the westerly still more.

"When rain falls in Egypt and Palestine, there is a general joy; the people assemble in the streets, they sing, they are all in motion; and shout ye Allah! ye Mobarek! O God! O Blessed! &c." Volney's Trav. vol. i. p. 56.

On account of the scarcity of rain, "the best part of Egyptian agriculture, says Niebuhr, is the watering of their grounds. The water which the husbandman needs, is often in a canal much below the level of the land which he means to refresh. The water he must therefore raise to an equality with the surface of the grounds; and distribute it over them as it is wanted. The great art of Egyptian husbandry is thus reduced to the having proper machines for raising the water, and enough of small canals judiciously disposed to distribute it." Trav. vol. i. p. 88. See FRAGMENT, No. CCXXVI.

The great supply of water in Egypt, is from the Nile: which river obtains its increase from Ethiopia and Abyssinia. "The velocity of the current of the Nile into the ocean, is at least equal to four miles an hour." Dr. W. p. 124.

"The water at the nilometer is within a digit and half, 18 Coudees (cubits): nearly as high an inundation as last year." Maj. H. Sep. 27.

The fertility of Egypt depends on the rise of the Nile: the inhabitants suppose, that at 14 cubits rise they may have an inferior harvest; at 16 a very good one: but, should it rise much higher, there would not be time for the draining of the water off the lands, in order to their reception of the seed. These high risings do other mischief also; such as washing away villages, &c.

"About 3, A. M. we left Charlikan: and about sun-rise got into some difficulty in consequence of the overflowing of the Nile; which was so high as totally to hide the mouth of the Menouf canal: and from the violence of the torrent of water; which carried us with great violence against a small mound or two. Stopped at Menouf near an hour, at least. Perceived a great number of men, women, and children, &c. making towards Menouf: these, we understood were a set of unfortunate mortals, who were driven in distress from some villages that were destroyed by the extraordinary height of the Nile, this year. About 5 o'clock, at a village, saw the process of making indigo." Maj. H. Oct. 4.

This testimony may be added to those already collected in FRAGMENT, No. 322, relative to the lands abraded, or carried away by the stream of the Nile. It is the most northern incident of the kind, that has come under my notice: and, indeed, it is remarkable, that the Nile, after its division into several streams, should possess impetus sufficient to effect the removal of such considerable masses, and to produce such depositions.

"Took a walk in Cassim Bey's garden; where we found several Mamalouks, &c.—The old man rose when we came away; a compliment very unusually paid to Franks, by Turks, or Mamalouks." Major H. at Cairo, Aug. 20.

This important compliment paid by rising up, will remind the reader of the objection taken by Haman, (Esther v. 9.) against Mordecai the Jew, "in the king's gate," who "stood not up, nor moved for him." In the present instance, Maj. H. notices it as very unusual to persons of a different religion. I suppose, this also, was the case in the instance of Mordecai and Haman; and that religion was the cause of the offence given, and taken. This may be confirmed, from a history related in [Morgan's, I believe] Description of Oran, &c. Lond. 1735. "A new renegado, (at Algiers) who, before his defection, had received some civilities from Mr. Durand, the French Consul there, sitting in the porch of the King's House, (as they call it) seeing him coming, stood up, to receive, and compliment him. This being observed by a zealot, he came up to him, as soon as the Consul was come in, and said, "How came you to stand up, and bow to that Infidel? knowest thou not, that thou art now a Mussulman, and that it is beneath thee to stand up for even the Emperor of the Christians?" P. 99.

"Note. The streets of Cairo are very narrow, and winding; some so much so, that there is scarcely room for two horses to pass. The fronts of the houses, next the principal streets, have, on the ground floor, small recesses, that have no connection with the houses, which serve for shops: about two feet high from the ground; ten feet wide; eight or ten high; and about eight or ten deep."

"The houses in Cairo are, in general very spacious. The upper stories are built of bad bricks, never repaired, nor kept in order; which gives these houses a miserable and wretched appearance. The lower, or ground, story, is built of stone, without any thing like windows towards the streets. Most of the large houses have spacious court yards." Maj. H. Sept. 4.

The recesses of this observer appear to be precisely what is intended in Ezekiel xxxiii. 30. by "the walls and doors of the houses" of our version; for we cannot suppose, that the Jews assembled in the door ways or entrances of houses in order to "talk against" the prophet. We find, that these places "serve for shops," whereat the prophet's opposers might meet, and might prate, pro and con. about him, without any appearance of constraint, and whether by accident, or design. "They speak against thee by the walls of the houses," such walls adjoining the street, but "having no windows next the street;" and "by the doors of the houses," those openings which are formed in the lower stories of the houses, and do not communicate with the interior dwelling, but with the street; and serve for the reception and delivery of goods. This is certainly the meaning of the Hebrew term used in this passage: and the scope of the place agrees with this representation. Such shops, were, no doubt, the resort of newsmongers, and other curious individuals, who, from report and rumour, not devotion, were induced to attend the prophet's lectures.

In Egypt, "wood for burning appears to be the article most difficult to be procured; and his highness, the Vizir, informed us, it was ordinarily brought from Anatolia. He said, he would order some small wood, cut for building, and some dourra stems to be sent for the troops to burn." Maj. H. at Cairo. Aug. 13. "The Reis Effendi, in talking about the state of the works at Fort L'Esbic, yesterday acknowledged to General Baird, that it was impossible to restrain their people from tearing away the wood: that he imagined if he were to go round the lines here, he should not find a single piece. He related a circumstance of their having, within a day or two, stripped a saint's tomb of the wood which surrounded it: and when one of their saints complained to them about it, they answered 'the saint would remain very quiet in his tomb, without the wood, which they wanted to cook with.' Id. Aug. 18. "Visited the lines of Boulac; and several works. The Turks have almost completely stripped away the palisadoes, and gutted the block-houses. Aug. 23."

"Owing to the extreme scarcity of wood, we were at this time, under the necessity of resorting for fuel to dried cow-dung, which we purchased from the Arab women, who form it with chopped straw into cakes and dry it on the sides of their dwellings." Dr. W. p. 307.

This adds to FRAGMENT, No. CVI. in proof, that the prophet Ezekiel, though typically reduced to great straits, yet was not driven to those unheard of singularities, in regard to fuel, which the lively fancy of Voltaire imagined. Here we have Europeans using dried dung as fuel, and purchasing it, in the absence of other kinds, from those who made it their business to prepare it. Necessity has no law!

That the division of Egypt into east and west was retained in the time of Ibn Haukal, appears from Sir W. Ouseley's Trans. p. 36. "The left side of the Nile is called Khawf. The opposite division, on the right side of the river Nile, they call Zeif." It needs no proof that when the direction of a river is from south to north, the right and left sides of it must be east and west. This supports our statement adopted in reference to Ezek. xxix. 10.

The following allegorical characterisation of Egypt is from Major Wilford, Asiat. Res. vol. iii. p. 93. Lond. "The parts of Barbara, towards the mouths of the Nile, were inhabited by the children of Rahu;—Rahu is represented, on account of his tyranny, as an immense RIVER-DRAGON, or CROCODILE, or rather a fabulous monster with four talons, called Grâha, from a root implying violent seizure: the word is commonly interpreted hânger, or shark; but in some dictionaries, it is made synonymous to nacra, or crocodile; and in the Puranas, it seems to be the creature of poetical fancy."

This may be compared with at least, two passages of Scripture: first, Psal. lxxiv. 13, &c.

God is my king of old,
Working salvation in the midst of the earth.
Thou didst divide the sea by thy strength:
Thou brakest the heads of the DRAGONS in the waters.
Thou brakest the heads of LEVIATHAN in pieces.

The allusion is to the departure of Israel from Egypt, to the division of the Red Sea, anciently; and Egypt is symbolized under the notion of a leviathan with several heads. To a natural leviathan, the crocodile, one head had been sufficient: but a symbolical leviathan, may possess as many heads as comports with the original object which is figuratively alluded to.

There is another passage where the same imagery is adopted, Ezek. xxix. 3, 4. "I am against thee, Pharoah, King of Egypt, the great DRAGON that lieth in the midst of his streams, which hath said, 'my river is my own, I have made it for myself.' I will put a hook in thy jaws, and I will cause the fish of thy rivers to stick to thy scales, and I will bring thee up out of the midst of thy rivers."

In this prophecy Pharoah is expressly named, so that we have no difficulty in referring it to that prince. Undoubtedly these allegories, by their similitude, strengthen the idea of a connection between India and Egypt: and shew that in ancient times it was well understood, and adopted by the inspired writers. For, what is this dragon, but the Rahu of India?

SKETCH

SKETCH OF EGYPTIAN HISTORY.

The history of Egypt is of consequence to the proper understanding of events recorded in Scripture : but, the early part of it is uncommonly obscure. As we have no early Egyptian historians, nor any connected history of this people, we are under the necessity of trusting to those excerpts, and fragments, which may be deemed fortuitous, rather than intentional. Scripture calls Egypt "the land of Ham," Psalm cv. 27. but so was the whole of the African continent. Egypt is also called the land of Mizr, in the singular, in the opinion of some of the most learned commentators, 2 Kings xix. 24. Isaiah xix. 6. xxxvii. 25. Micah vii. 12. every where else it is written Mizraim, in the plural. This plural did not arise from its being the possession of two persons, each named Mizr; but from the division of the country into north and south; or east and west: which division appears to be of the earliest antiquity.

There can be no doubt but Egypt was peopled from the East; but, the tribes which first entered it, seem to have been under no regular guide. I conceive, that Ham was intent on establishing himself in Asia: and that he actually founded there several potent kingdoms.

Afterwards, Ham might visit Africa; and his son, Mizraim, might govern Egypt. However that was, we find Egypt peopled in the days of Abraham; and governed also by a Pharaoh. There is some reason to think that the Hamites who settled on the provinces allotted to the posterity of Shem, ejected the Shemites from thence; and were the cause of their transmigration into Egypt. At least, appearances indicate that the first Pharaohs of Egypt spoke the language of Abraham, Jacob, and Joseph: and that Jehovah, the God of those patriarchs, was not unknown to them. Between the periods of Joseph's elevation in Egypt, and the Exodus of Israel, I should place an invasion of Egypt by the Palli, from India, and refer to this race that new "king which knew not Joseph." We read little more of Egypt in Scripture, for many ages; indeed, till the kings of Israel had official intercourse with that country.

What we learn from ancient history in respect to Egypt, is narrated in a manner so fabulous, that, however it may be founded in truth, we are at a loss to separate the truth from the falsehood. The Egyptians claimed an antiquity of 10, 20, or even 50,000 years: they affirmed that their country was originally governed by gods: and that their first mortal king was Menes. We might better judge of the first assertion, if we knew what length of time answered to that termed a year. Of the second, if we knew whether the same word which is rendered gods, did not also signify judges; as it does in the Hebrew: and of the third, if we could distinguish whether Noah were the Menuueh, Menu, Menes, of Egypt; or whether this term does not import "son of Nueh;" and, by consequence, denote either Ham, or Mizraim. Opinion may most safely rest on the latter: and from him the Egyptians deduced a list of kings, comprising about 330 in 1400 years. Before the time of Menes, Lower Egypt was a marsh, not absolutely uninhabitable, and perhaps even fertile, yet unfit for the reception of a dense population. Menes controlled the course of the Nile, probably stopped up one of its branches: and so obtained a length of solid ground, and drained the lower levels of the country.

We learn, from Major Wilford's information concerning Egypt, extracted from the Indian Puranas, that those books relate several circumstances of the early history of this country. Asiatic Researches, vol. iii.—"Tamah, or Saturn, had two wives, age, and decrepitude"—i. e. he was an extremely old man. "Tamah was expelled from Egypt exactly at the time when Aramah, a grandson of Satyavrata, died;"

—If Tamah were Noah, as Saturn was, then Menes may be Noah also; and, therefore, the first king of Egypt, with whom Egyptian history begins. p. 93. "Lower Egypt is called by the Puranas, the Land of Mud; and they give a dreadful idea of it; and even assert, that no mortal durst approach it." p. 96. Mizr signifies in Sanscrit, "a naked people." Ib. Comp. Jer. xxv. 20. 1. 37. Ezek. xxx. 5. The Puranas say that the ocean anciently covered Egypt: but that the waters withdrew at the prayer of a holy man, or Rishi, "for the space of a hundred yójanas, or 492 miles." p. 104. The probability is, that this withdrawal of the waters alludes to the fact of the draining of the lower country, by restraining the Nile to a single channel, pretty far south. "The first inhabitants of Egypt found, on their arrival, that the whole country about the mouths of the Nile was an immense forest; part impervious, which they called Atavi, part uninhabited, but practicable, which received the name of Aranya." p. 97. These accounts agree perfectly with the primitive state of all uninhabited countries; and they contribute to support the opinion, that Egypt was peopled from India. Vide PHILISTINES, for other hints on the early settlement of Egypt.

The most prominent, and at the same time, the most embarrassed incident in the history of Egypt, is the intrusion of the shepherds, and the shepherd kings, into that country. The best consideration I have been able to give it, determines my opinion to admit of more than one irruption by these Palli; which is the Sanscrit name for Shepherd; so that I should arrange events according to the following order.

ANTE A. D.

- The settlement of Egypt by wandering tribes from Kedom, many of which migrated, by their colonies, at least, over Africa.
2300. Occasional visits and arrangements by Noah: the government administered in his name, whereby he is the first king.
2230. Various accessions of Hamites; principally in the north; of Shemites, principally in the south. Government of Ham, occasionally: of Mizraim more permanently; of the descendants of Mizraim: but possibly not universally.
1916. Abraham visits Egypt.
A considerable irruption of Palli, or Indian shepherds, which overran the country, and established themselves in various parts of it. The first shepherds. From these branched off the Philistim, which we meet with in the days of Abraham: also the Caphtorim, and others.
1700. These Palli expelled Egypt, and forced into Canaan, by the proper natives; before the departure of Jacob into Egypt: so that his family (shepherds by profession) might settle in the country formerly occupied by these Palli. (shepherds.)
1580. After the death of Joseph; another irruption of Palli; the second shepherds: of which race is the king who injuriously treated the Israelites; and he who is drowned in the Red Sea. The loss of this king, and his army, so weakens the Palli power, that probably it is ruined in Egypt: and another dynasty commences; though Scripture is silent on this particular. The expelled Palli strengthen their brethren in Canaan, &c. during the abode of Israel in the wilderness. The Philistines and others, enemies of Israel in the days of the judges and kings, descend principally from this second accession of Palli.

1250. The Mamelukes masters of Egypt.
1517. The Turks, under Selim, conquer the Mamelukes. Selim, however, establishes a constitution for Egypt, in which the Mamelukes have a considerable share of power. The same has lasted since that time to the present.

It is proper to be so far, at least, acquainted with the history of Egypt; in order to perceive the import and fulfilment of the prediction recorded by Ezekiel, chap. xxx. 13. where the prophet says, that there never any more shall be a reigning prince of the Egyptian nation over this country. Egypt was, indeed, to be a base kingdom: and what can be more base than a government composed of rulers who have been slaves, and the properties of others? Governors, not hereditary; nor elective by the people; nor promoted according to merit; but rising by intrigue from the lowest stations, and degraded by the vilest of crimes, as well political as personal.

This article closes with a reflection or two of Niebuhr.—“When we reflect on the revolutions which this country has undergone, and upon the length of time during which it has been under the dominion of strangers, we can no longer be surprised at the decline of its wealth and population. It has been successively subdued by the Persians, the Greeks, the Romans, the Arabians, and the Turks:—has enjoyed no interval of tranquillity and freedom, but has been constantly oppressed and pillaged by the lieutenants of a distant lord, who scarcely left the people bare means of subsistence. Agriculture was ruined by the miseries of the husbandman: and the cities decayed with its decline. Even at present, the population is decreasing: and the peasant, although in a fertile country, is miserably poor; for the exactions of government, and its officers, leave him nothing to lay out in the improvement and culture of his lands; while the cities are falling into ruins, because the same unhappy restraints render it impossible for the citizens to engage in any lucrative undertaking." Trav. vol. i. p. 51.

"The Copts are descended from the ancient Egyptians: and the Turks, on this account, call them, in derision, "the posterity of Pharaoh." But their uncouth figure, their stupidity, ignorance, and wretchedness, do little credit to the sovereigns of ancient Egypt.

"They have lived for 2000 years under the dominion of different foreign conquerors, and have experienced many vicissitudes of fortune. They have lost their manners, their language, their religion, and almost their existence. They are reduced to a small number in comparison of the Arabs, who have poured like a flood over this country. Of the diminution of the numbers of the Copts some idea may be formed from the reduction of the number of their bishops. There were seventy in number at the period of the Arabian conquest. There are now only twelve." Ib. p. 104. See the PLATES, MEDALS of EGYPT, &c.

EGYPT, BROOK, or RIVER OF. Scripture frequently mentions this brook, or river, as the southern limit of the Land of Promise, next to Egypt. Gen. xv. 18. Unto thy seed have I given this land from the river of Egypt unto the great river, the river Euphrates. Solomon convened a general assembly of his people, from the entering in of Hamath, to the river of Egypt. 2 Chron. vii. 8. Moses describes the southern boundaries of the land, as from Azmon unto the river of Egypt, Numb. xxxiv. 5. See Joshua xv. 4.

Several have taken this river to be the brook Besor, 1 Sam. xxx. 10. otherwise the brook of the wilderness, between Gaza and Rhinocorura. However, we do not question but that it was the Nile, the only river that flows through Egypt. Joshua xiii. 3. visibly describes it by the name of Sihor; which is the true name of the Nile; q. "the muddy river," because the waters of this river are frequently thick and muddy. Amos, vi. 14. calls it the river of the wilderness; because the eastern arm of the Nile, that nearest to Canaan, adjoined Arabia, or the wilderness, in Hebrew Araba, and watered the district, by the Egyptians called Arabian. The Hebrew Nahal, translated brook, signifies likewise a river.

[This stream was the limit of Judea toward Egypt: what in Isaiah xxvii. 2. is unto the river of Egypt, the LXX. render "to Rhinocolura;" a town certainly not adjacent to the proper river of Egypt, i. e. the Nile. In confirmation of this sentiment, we may remark that it is extremely dubious whether the power of the Hebrew nation extended, at any time, to the Nile: and if it did, it was over a mere sandy desert. But as this desert is unquestionably the natural boundary of the Syrian dominions, no reason can be given why the political boundary should exceed it. Such an anomaly is an error against both nature and geography.]

EHĪ, אָחִי, my brother; from אָחָא, brother, and י, my. Sixth son of Benjamin, Gen. xvi. 21. The LXX. make Ehi son of Bela, and grandson of Benjamin. Ehi and Ahiram are the same. Numb. xxvi. 38.

EHUD, אֹחֹד, or Ohad, [Eng. Tr.] he that praises; from יָדָה, to praise; [a part, or portion. Son of Simeon. Gen. xvi. 10.]

EHUD, אֹחֹד, the same. Son of Gera; a judge of Israel, who slew Eglon, king of Moab. Judg. iii. 15.

II. EHUD, a son of Bilhan, 1 Chron. vii. 10.

EHUD, אֹחֹד. Unit. [united. Son of Benjamin. 1 Chron. viii. 6.]

EKAR, עָקַר, Ikāp, barren: that tears up; or cut off, torn; [rather, a root, radicle. Son of Ram. 1 Chron. ii. 27.]

EKRON, עֲקָרָן, barren: tore away, from עָקַר, hacar; [sterility, or enervated, or unfruitful; or the mere trunk of a tree. Josh. xiii. 3. xv. 11. xix. 43. Judges, i. 18. 1 Sam. xvii. Jer. xxv.

Perhaps "the cut off Aun," or On, alluding to the story of Saturn's emasculation. The Hebrew word signifies to wound, or cut off, or to hack and hew, in plain English. But the Samaritan root implies a migration, or flight; whence this name may denote "the Aun who directed our migration from our native country;" and this town, being one of those belonging to the Philistines, who were foreigners in Canaan, gives much colour to this explanation.]

EKRON, a city and government of the Philistines, allotted to Judah by Joshua, xv. 45. but afterwards given to Dan, Josh. xix. 43. It was near the Mediterranean, between Ashdod and Jamnia. Ekron was a powerful city; and it does not appear, that the Jews ever peaceably possessed it: the Ekronites were the first, who proposed to send back the ark, in order to be delivered from those calamities which it brought on their country; 1 Sam. v. 10. Beelzebub was adored at Ekron, 2 Kings i. 2. Some have attempted very preposterously to confound Ekron with Strato's tower, where Herod the Great afterwards built the city of Cæsarea in Palestine. Cæsarea was much more north.

ELAH, אֵלָה, or אֵלָהָ, Olāc, an oak, a curse, perjury, oath, imprecation.

I. ELAH, Aholibamah's successor in the government of Edom. Gen. xxxvi. 41.

II. ELAH,

II. ELAH, son of Baasha king of Israel: assassinated by Zimri, after reigning two years. 1 Kings xvi. 6, 7, 8, 9. His son Hoshea, killed Pekah, the usurper: 2 Kings xv. 30.

III. ELAH, where the Israelites encamped when David fought Goliath. 1 Sam. xvii. 19.

ELADAH, אֱלָדָה assembly, congregation of God; from יָדָה jadah, to assemble, to unite: or יָדָה hedah, an assembly, and אֵל el, God: otherwise, the eternity, the witness, or the prey of God. Son of Tahath, and grandson of Ephraim, 1 Chron. vii. 20.

ELAI, 'ΕΛΑΐδα, strong; from אֵלִי eli: otherwise, my God; from אֵל el, God, and י i, my. Judith's grandfather. Judith viii. 1.

ELAM, עֵלָם or עֵלִי, a young man, a virgin: secret, or an age, from חֵלָם halam, or holam, contempt.

I. ELAM, his seventy children returned from the captivity with Zerubbabel; Ezra viii. 7.

II. ELAM, a city of Edom on the Elanitic gulf of the Red Sea. Eusebius places it at no more than ten miles east from Petra. David, having subdued the Edomites, took Elam. The Edomites recovered their liberty in the reign of Jehoram, and continued independent till Uzziah or Azariah retook Elam, 2 Kings xiv. 22. But he did not long preserve his conquest: Rezin, king of Syria, drove the Jews out of it. Elam is by the ancients named Elana, Elath, Elas, Aelan, or Elon. Strabo places it 1260 furlongs from Gaza. St. Jerom says, that Elam lay at the extreme of Palestine. Procopius also places it at the eastern [S.W.] extremity of Palestine. In the councils we find bishops of Elam among those of the third Palestine. Vide MAP of the JOURNEYS of the Israelites, and ELOTH.

ELANITE, or ELANITIC. The Elanitic gulf derives its name from the city of Ela, or Ailan, or Elam, mentioned above.

ELATH, עֵלָת, 'Ελαθ, or Ailath, the same as Elah, a kind, from אֵיל ail: otherwise, strength; otherwise, oak; from אֵלָה alah.

[EL-BETH-EL, the God of Bethel. The name given by Jacob to an altar which he built, Gen. xxxv. 7. It stood, probably, in the very spot where he had formerly seen the prophetic dream of the ladder, chap. xxviii. 22. I suppose we should understand it, "To the God of Bethel."]

ELDAAH, אֱלֹדָעָה, science, or knowledge of God; from יָדָה jadah, knowledge; and אֵל el, God. Son of Midian, and grandson of Keturah and Abraham, 1 Chron. i. 33.

ELDAD, אֱלֹדָד, love of God, or favoured of God; from דָּוָד dod, love, and אֵל el, God.

ELDAD and MEDAD, were appointed by Moses among the seventy elders of Israel, who were to assist in the government; though not present in the general assembly, they were, notwithstanding, filled with the Spirit of God, equally with those who were in that assembly, and they began to prophesy in the camp. Joshua would have had Moses forbid them, but Moses replied, Enviest thou for my sake? Would to God that all the people prophesied, and that God would pour forth his spirit upon them! Num. xi. 24, 25, &c.

ELDERS of Israel. By this name we understand the heads of tribes, or rather of the great families in Israel, who before the settlement of the Hebrew commonwealth, had a government and authority over their own families, and the people. When Moses was sent into Egypt to deliver Israel, he assembled the elders of Israel, and told them, that the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, had appeared to him. Exod. xii. 16, 21. iv. 29, &c. Moses and Aaron treat the elders of Israel as representatives of the nation.

When God gave the law to Moses, he said, Take Aaron, Nadab, and Abihu, his sons, and the seventy elders of Israel, and worship ye afar off. Exod. xxiv. 1, 9, 10. They advanced only to the foot of the mountain. On all occasions afterwards, we find this number of seventy elders. But, it is credible, that as there were twelve tribes, there were seventy-two elders, six from each tribe, and that seventy is set down, instead of seventy-two; or rather that, Moses and Aaron should be added to the number seventy, and that exclusive of them, there were but four elders from the tribe of Levi.

Some have been of opinion, as (Grotius, in Exod. iv. 29. Bertram, de Rep. Heb.) that these seventy elders formed a kind of senate in Egypt, for the better governing the people while in bondage; and that from hence the famous Sanhedrim was derived in later ages. But it is more credible, that in the beginning these elders exercised each over their respective tribe, and all together over the whole people, a jurisdiction only like that which fathers of families exercise over their children; founded on the respect and obedience due to parents. The commissioners appointed to inspect in what manner the children of Israel performed their tasks in Egypt, (called in Hebrew שֹׁרְטִים Soterim) were, say some, the elders of Israel, who judged and commanded the people. The LXX. translate Scribes, i. e. commissioners who had lists of those that worked, who appointed them their tasks, and saw that they performed them.

After Jethro's arrival in the camp of Israel, Moses made a considerable change in the governors of the people. He established over Israel heads of thousands, hundreds, fifties, and tens, that justice might be readily administered to applicants; only difficult cases were referred to Moses: Exod. xviii. 24, 25. &c. but this constitution constitution did not continue long; for on the murmuring of the people at the incampment called the Graves of Lust, Numb. xi. 24, 25. Moses appointed seventy elders of Israel, to whom God communicated part of that legislator's spirit; they began to prophesy, and ceased not afterwards. This, according to the generality of interpreters, was the beginning of the Sanhedrin; but, to support this opinion, many things must be supposed, whereby to infer, that this court of justice was constantly in being during the Scripture history.

We believe that the establishment of the seventy elders by Moses continued, not only during his life, but under Joshua likewise, and under the Judges. The elders of the people and Joshua swore to the treaty with the Gibeonites, Josh. ix. 15. Joshua a little before his death, renewed the covenant with the Lord, in company with the elders, the princes, the heads, and officers of Israel, Joshua xxiii. xxiv. 1, 32. After the death of Joshua and the elders who survived him, the people were several times brought into bondage, and were delivered by their judges. We do not see distinctly what authority the elders had during this time, and still less under the kings who succeeded the judges. Vide SANHEDRIM.

ELEAD, אֵלֶאָד, Elaád, eternity, testimony, or the prey of God: from אֵל el, eternity; and אָד el, God. Grandson of Ephraim, killed in Gath, while the Hebrews sojourned in Egypt, 1 Chron. vii. 21.

ELEALEH, אֵלֶעֱלֵה, ascension of God, or burnt offering of God; from אֵלֵךְ alah or halah, elevation, and אֵל el, God. A town of Reuben. Eusebius places it a mile from Heshbon.

ELEASA, or Laisa, the name of a place near Beroëa, or rather Berotho, a city of Benjamin. A battle was fought here between Judas Maccabæus, and Bacchides and Alcimus, high-priest of the Jews. 1 Macc. ix. 1, &c.

ELEASAH, אֵלֶעֱשָׂה, creature of God; from עָשָׂה hashah, to make, and אֵל el, God. Son of Helez, father of Sisamai. 1 Chron. ii. 39.

ELEAZAR, אֵלֶעֱזָר, help of God; or court of God; from עָזַר hazar, help, or court; and אֵל el, God.

I. ELEAZAR, third son of Aaron, Exod. vii. 23. his successor as high-priest. He entered the land of promise with Joshua, and is thought to have lived there about twenty-five years. The high-priesthood continued in his family to the time of Eli, who was of Ithamar's family. Eleazar was buried at Gabaath, [a hill] belonging to Phinehas, in the tribe of Ephraim. Josh. xxiv. 33.

II. ELEAZAR, son of Aminadab, to whose care the ark was committed, when sent back by the Philistines. 1 Sam. vii. 1. It is believed that Eleazar was a priest, or at least a Levite, though his name is not inserted among the Levites. He dwelt at Gibeah, in the city of Kirjath-jearim.—(Gibeah in Hebrew signifies an eminence.) Eleazar was consecrated to be guardian of the ark of the Lord; whether this consecration were a simple appointment to the office, or a sacerdotal unction, or he was obliged to purify himself, in order to receive this sacred depositum into his house.

III. ELEAZAR, son of Dodo, one of three gallant men, who broke through the camp of the Philistines, to bring David water from Beth-lehem. This Eleazar, alone checked an army of Philistines, and made great slaughter of them. 2 Sam. xxiii. 9. 1 Chron. xi. 12, 16, 17.

IV. ELEAZAR, surnamed Savaran, brother to Judas Maccabæus, 1 Macc. vi. 43. He is called Auran or Avran, by Josephus, Antiq. lib. xii. cap. 14. Eleazar perceiving an elephant in king Antiochus Eupator's army, more beautiful, and more richly harnessed than the rest, and imagining that the king, then besieging Bethsura, might be upon him, he made his way through the enemy, and getting under the animal pierced its belly with his sword; the elephant falling on him, crushed him to death.

V. ELEAZAR, a venerable old man of Jerusalem, who suffered death under the persecution, and in the presence, of Antiochus Epiphanes: it is questioned whether at Jerusalem or at Antioch. 2 Macc. vi. vii. 1, 2. The old translator of Josephus's book of the Empire of Reason, says this event occurred at Antioch; but the Greek of Josephus does not say so; but supposes that the seven brethren suffered at Jerusalem. Also Antiq. lib. xii. cap. 7. Others maintain, that the seven brethren were martyred at Antioch, where formerly their tombs were shewn. St. Austin speaks of a church there, dedicated by their name. The Martyrologies, Lyranus, Serrarius, Tirinus, and Josephus Gorionides, fix their martyrdom at Antioch. Now it seems certain, that Eleazar suffered at the same place as the seven Maccabees: and all the authors who mention him, join his martyrdom with theirs.

Eleazar was among the principal doctors of the law. Gregory Nazianzen and St. Ambrose believe, with Josephus, that he was of a sacerdotal family. He was presented to Antiochus Epiphanes, whose officers would have compelled him to eat swine's flesh, by forcing open his mouth; but he, preferring death to a life preserved by criminal compliance, chose rather to go voluntarily to execution. The people present, entreated he would eat other meat, but seem to eat swine's flesh: this dissimulation he refused, as a dishonourable blemish on his old age, and its integrity: he was then beaten to death. As he was expiring under the blows, he he uttered a great sigh, and said, "Lord thou knowest that having it in my power to avoid death, I suffer in my body the most exquisite pains, but my soul is overjoyed to die for thy religion."

Josephus in his book of the Empire of Reason, relates this history more at large.

VI. ELEAZAR, high-priest, son to Onias I. and brother to Simon surnamed the Just. Simon having left his son, Onias, too young to be high-priest, Eleazar exercised this charge nineteen years in his room; from A. M. 3727, to 3744, ante A. D. 260.

VII. ELEAZAR, son of Eliud, and father of Matthan, grandfather to Joseph. Matt. i. 15.

VIII. ELEAZAR, son of Mahali, and brother of Kish, 1 Chron. xiii. 24.

IX. ELEAZAR, son of Boethus, appointed high-priest by Archelaus Ethnarch of Judæa, A. M. 4004, A. D. 4.

X. ELEAZAR, son of Ananus, appointed high-priest by Valerius Gratus, A. M. 4027, A. D. 23.

XI. ELEAZAR, son of Dinæus, put to death by Cumanus.

XII. ELEAZAR, son of Ananias the high-priest, one of the incendiaries who stirred up the Jews to that rebellion, which ended in the destruction of their temple and nation. Joseph. de Bello, lib. ii. cap. 17. in Lat. κεφ. λ. in Gr.

ELECTA, was, as is generally believed, a lady of quality, who lived near Ephesus, to whom St. John addressed his second epistle. St. John cautions her and her children against heretics, who denied the divinity of Christ, and his incarnation. Some think Electa, which signifies chosen, is not a proper name, but an honourable epithet, her proper name not being expressed. Others think her proper name was Kyria. Others, that the epistle was directed to a church. Clement of Alexandria, in his comment on the canonical epistles, says, that Electa, to whom St. John wrote, was a lady of Babylon.

II. ELECTA. St. John salutes in the name of her sister Electa, and her children. The accounts of this Electa are as perplexed as those of the former.

[EL-ELOHE-ISRAEL, God the God of Israel; (or, I suppose, "To God the God of Israel.") The name of an altar built by Jacob, in a piece of ground which he bought of Hamor, Shechem's father. Gen. xxxiii. 20.]

ELEPH, ἑλέφ, Ελαφ, a thousand, doctrine, chief, or ox; from alah, or eleph. A town of Benjamin, Josh. xviii. 28.

ELEPHANT, the largest of all quadrupeds. Those who have studied the nature of the elephant, relate many extraordinary things of his sagacity, faithfulness, prudence, and even understanding. much above the capacity of other beasts.

[In FRAGMENT, No. LXV. we have given, as we think, sufficient proofs that the BEHEMOTH of Scripture is the Hippopotamos—nevertheless, we shall insert the strongest arguments of those who think the elephant is meant by that name.] The Greeks and Latins often denote elephants by the general name of beasts, which is nearly the signification of the Hebrew word Behemoth. Elephas may be derived from aleph, to instruct, by reason of the docility of this animal; or from eleph, a head, or captain, because the elephant is, as it were, the head of terrestrial animals.

You have here an account of the elephant, or Behemoth, from God's discourse to Job, xl. 10.

He eateth grass like an ox: the elephant feeds on leaves and branches of trees.

His strength is in his loins, and his force is in the navel of his belly. He is very strongly made: his testicles lie concealed in his loins. The virtue of begetting is often expressed in Scripture by terms very like these. Gen. xlix. 3. Deut. xxi. 17. Psalm lxxxii. 51. civ. 36, &c.

He moveth his tail like a cedar; the nerves of that part which serves for generation are interwoven together. His bones are as strong pieces of brass, and his small bones like bars of iron. These hyperbolical expressions shew the extraordinary strength of the elephant.

He is the chief of the ways of God; he that made him will make his sword approach unto him. The master-piece of God among quadrupeds: he exceeds in size, strength, fidelity, docility, address, modesty, pudicity, agility, and long life. He is industrious, sagacious, and grateful.

No animal comes nearer man: he understands the language of his guide. So many things are related of his docility, as would seem fabulous, were they not attested by many serious and grave authors.

God hath put his sword into his hands, hath trusted him with his arms; the elephant is terrible when provoked: nothing can stand against him. (See a very different rendering, FRAGMENT, No. LXV. verse 9.)

Surely the mountains bring him forth grass, where all the beasts of the field play. Elephants are the gentlest animals known; they never exert their strength but when compelled to it.

He lieth under the trees, in the covert of the reeds and fens. This agrees admirably well with the elephant. Elian says, lib. iv. cap. 24. xiii. 8. ix. 56. xvii. 7, that he may be called an animal of the marshes; he lives along the sides of great waters, and in moist places. He sometimes plunges into rivers, so that no more of him is to be seen than the end of his trunk; in summer-time he covers himself with mud, to avoid the heat.

He spoileth the river, and is frightened at nothing: he trusteth that he can draw up Jordan into his mouth. He drinks a great deal, and large draughts; Heb. He will drink a river, and make no haste: he will drink leisurely, and take time to disturb the water which he drinketh. He trusteth that he can draw up Jordan into his mouth, or, he fears nothing, though Jordan were to rush against his mouth. He boldly passes the greatest rivers, provided he may put the end of his trunk only out of the water.

He is taken by the eyes, as a fish is taken with a hook. Heb. he is taken by the eyes in snares, his nose is pierced. Wild elephants are caught by a female elephant, in a narrow place between barricades, where the elephant is inclosed, and taken. This is what is meant here by taking him by the eyes, as it is said of Holofernes, he was taken by the eyes, while he beheld Judith's beauty. Judith x. 17. They lay snares likewise for elephants: deep ditches dug on purpose, and covered with a little earth scattered over. I do not read that they pierce his nostrils, or trunk, as they do the nostrils of camels, buffaloes, and even horses, in the east: but probably in Job's time they might have a different method from that used at present.

In 1 Kings x. 22, ivory, or elephants' teeth, is mentioned; שנהב Schenhabbim: schén signifies a tooth; but we question whether habbim signifies an elephant. I should rather say, that habbim, or rather habenim, signifies ebony; and should prefer to separate these two words, which are improperly united.

There is frequent mention of elephants' in the Maccabees; because, after Alexander, these animals were much used in the armies of the kings of Syria and Egypt. It does not appear that any had been before seen in Judæa or Syria.

We read 1 Macc. vi. 34. that the elephants of Antiochus Eupator's army had the blood of grapes and mulberries shewn them, to animate them to the combat, to accustom them to the sight of blood: for naturally this animal is not sanguinary, or cruel. In 3 Macc. v. we see it was usual to intoxicate them by wine mixed with incense, or parcels of incense, dipped in wine, in order to render their fumes more powerful. This was done with design they should crush the Hebrews to death under their feet. This is a kind of punishment with which the ancients were unacquainted.

ELEUTHEROPOLIS, Ἐλευθερόπολις, free-city.

ELEUTHEROPOLIS, a city of Judea, not mentioned in the sacred writings; but it must have been very celebrated in the time of Eusebius and St. Jerom. It was an episcopal city. It is singular, that so many difficulties attend our attempts to fix this remarkable city in the map; a city which was the determinate point whence Eusebius and Jerom estimated the distances and positions of other cities. We know from Josephus, that it was twenty miles from Jerusalem. Antoninus, in his Itinerary, says it was twenty-four miles from Askelon, and eighteen miles from Lydda. Eusebius places it five miles from Gath, six from Lachish, twenty-five from Gerar, twenty from Jattir, and eight from Keilah. Reland. Palest. 1, lib. xii. cap. 5.

ELHANAN, אֶלְחָנָן, grace, gift, or mercy of God; from חָנַן, chanan, and אֵל, el, God.

ELHANAN, son of Dodo; the same probably with Elhanan, son of Jair, which St. Jerom translates, Adeodatus filius Saltús. 1 Chron. xi. 26. 2 Sam. xxi. 19.

ELI, אֵלִי, my God; from אֵל, el, God, and י, i, my.

ELI, (Luke iii. 23.) the last of our Saviour's ancestors according to the flesh, the same probably as the Joachim father of Mary, mentioned in several old writings, which are very much respected in the East.

ELI, Eliakim, Hilikiah, and Joachim, are almost the same name. We shall find the same high-priest called Hilikiah, Joachim, and Eliakim.

ELI, i. e. my God. Our Saviour on the cross, cried, Eli, Eli, lama sabachthani, or rather lama sabadetani; My God, my God, why [or unto what?] hast thou forsaken me? See Psal. xxii. 1. Matth. xxvii. 46.

ELI, אֵלִי, elevation, offering; from הָלַךְ halakh: otherwise, a pestle; from הָלוּחַ haloth. [But, some think, brought up, i. e. by God: so we have in Greek, Diotrephes, "nourished by Jupiter," &c.]

ELI, high priest, of the race of Ithamar, died A. M. 2888, ante A. D. 1116, having been forty years judge of Israel, 1 Sam. iv. 18. He succeeded Abdon, and was succeeded by Samuel in the government; but in the high-priesthood by his third son Ahitub. While Eli judged the people, Samson was the deliverer and defender of Israel.

How Eli came to possess the high-priesthood, and by what means that dignity was transferred from Eleazar's family to that of Ithamar, from which Eli was descended, we are not informed. Some believe, it was by reason of the negligence, the minority, or want of proper qualifications, of Eleazar's family. Others, that this dignity was bestowed on Eli as judge of Israel. That it was not done without an express declaration of God's will, we may gather from the language of the man of God, sent to reproach him with the ill conduct of his sons. 1 Sam. ii. 27, 28.

Eli's great fault was his negligence, and his indulgence of his sons. Instead of vigorously punishing them, and removing them from the sacred ministry, he was satisfied with reprimanding them.

God admonished him by Samuel, then a child. (See the history, 1 Sam. iii. 1, 2, 3.) Having heard those awful admonitions from the mouth of Samuel, he only replied, "It is the Lord, let him do what seemeth him good." God deferred the execution of his vengeance twenty-seven years, but at length Hophni and Phinehas, sons of Eli, were slain by the Philistines; the ark of the Lord was taken; and Eli himself, hearing this melancholy news, fell backward from his chair, and broke his neck, 1 Sam. iv. 12, 18. According to Josephus, (Antiq. lib. vi. cap. 7.) and the common opinion, he was succeeded by Ahitub his third son; but others say, by Abiah. Abiah was certainly high-priest in the beginning of Saul's reign. 1 Sam. xiv. 3.

ELIAB, אֱלִיָּאב, God is my father; from אֵל el, God, י i, my, and אב ab, father: otherwise, the God-of the father.

I. ELIAB, son of Helon, prince of Zebulun, Numb. i. 9.

II. ELIAB, son of Jesse, David's brother, 1 Sam. xvi. 6.

III. ELIAB, son of Elkanah, and father of Jeroham, of Levi, 1 Chron. vi. 27.

IV. ELIAB, a brave man, in David's army, who joined him at Ziklag, 1 Chron. xii. 9. Called Elihaba the Shaalbonite, 1 Chron. vi. 33.

ELIABA, אֱלִיָּאבָה, God, or the strong will hide it [him]; from אֵל el, God, or אֵל aul, the strong, and חָבַה chaba, to hide, to cover: or, God is my covering. A hero of David, 2 Sam. xxiii. 32.

ELIADAH, אֱלִיָּאדָה, knowledge of God; from יָדָה jadah, knowledge, and אֵל el, God.

I. ELIADAH, son of David, by a concubine, 2 Sam. v. 16. 1 Chron. iii. 8.

II. ELIADAH, father of Rezon, 1 Kings xi. 23.

III. ELIADAH, a general of Jehoshaphat's army, 2 Chron. xvii. 17.

ELIAH, אֱלִיָּהוּ, the Lord [my] God; from אֵל el, God, and jah, the Lord; otherwise, the strong Lord; from יָה jah, the Lord; and אֵל aul, strong. We find two men of this name, (Ezra x. 21, 26.) who, after the captivity, dismissed their foreign wives, whom they had married against the law.

ELIAKIM, אֱלִיאִקִּים, resurrection of God, or the God of the resurrection, or of strength; from אִקֵּם kum, to raise up, to strengthen, and אֵל el, God: otherwise, God the revenger: from אִקֵּם nakam, to revenge.

I. ELIAKIM, of the race of priests, returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel, Nehem. xii. 41.

II. ELIAKIM, son of Hilkiah, steward of the household to king Hezekiah. The Hebrew may be construed to signify, that he had the care of the temple, i. e. the house of God: for house, absolutely taken, often signifies the temple, 2 Kings xviii. 18. It is our opinion, that Eliakim was son of Hilkiah the high-priest, who lived in the reign of Hezekiah; that he succeeded his father, and was high-priest under Manasseh. He was high-priest during the siege of Bethulia. He is sometimes called Jehoiakim; and there is great probability, that he is the Hilkiah, in the reign of Josiah, and afterwards.

III. ELIAKIM, king of Judah, surnamed Jehoiakim. He succeeded his brother Jehoahaz, and did evil before the Lord. See JEHOIAKIM, 2 Kings xxiii. 34, 35.

IV. ELIAKIM, son of Abihud, and father of Azor, Matth. i. 13.

ELIAM, אֱלִיָּאם, the people of God, or the God of the people; from אֵל el, and אָם ham, people. [transposed Ammiel, 1 Chron. iii. 5.]

I. ELIAM, father of Bathsheba, wife of Uriah, 2 Sam. xi. 3.

II. ELIAM, son of Ahitophel of Gelon, one of the thirty gallant men in David's army. 2 Sam. xxiii. 34.

ELIAS. See ELIJAH.

ELIASAPH, אֱלִיָּאֶשֶׁף, God that adds, that finishes, or completes; from אֶשֶׁף jasaph, to add, to finish, and אֵל el, God: [added by God.] Son of Deuel, prince of Gad, Numb. i. 14.

ELIASIB, אֱלִישִׁיב, the God of conversion; otherwise, my God will bring back; from שִׁיב shub, to convert, to recall, and י i, my.

ELIASHIB, high-priest, of the race of Eleazar. He succeeded Joiakim, whom Josephus, Antiq. lib. ii. cap. 5. mentions as living in the reign of Xerxes. He was high-priest in the time of Nehemiah, and lived A. M. 3550. We neither know the year of his death, nor the duration of his priesthood. He was called likewise Joasib and Chasib. His successor was Joiada or Juda, Neh. xii. 10.

ELIATHAH, אֱלִיָּאֲתָהּ, thou art my God; from אָתָּה atha, thou, י i, my, and אֵל el, God: otherwise, my God comes; from אֵל el, God, י i, my, and אָתָּה athah, to come, to arrive.

ELIATHAH, eighth son of Heman. He sung before before the ark. He was in the twentieth class of Levites, 1 Chron. xxv. 27.

ELICIANS, Ἐλικῶν, or Ἐλικμαί, curled, twisted; from the Greek ἑλικός. Judith i. 6. mentions Arioch, king of the Elicians. The Greek and Syriac read, of the Elymæans, i. e. the ancient country of the Persians. We see in Genesis, Arioch king of Ellasar; this might be the city of the Elicians.

ELIDAD, אֵלִיד, favoured of God, or, the love of my God; see ELDAD. Son of Chislon, of Benjamin, a deputy appointed to divide the land of Canaan. Numb. xxxiv. 21.

ELIEL, אֵלִיֵּל, God, my God, or my God is God; from אֵל, el, God, and י, my: otherwise, the strength of God; from אֵל, aul, strength, and אֵל, el, God.

I. ELIEL, of Manasseh, a very valiant man, under Jotham king of Judah, and Jeroboam II. king of Israel. 1 Chron. v. 34.

II. ELIEL, a Levite of Kohath's family, 1 Chron. vi. 34.

III. ELIEL. We find two of this name, brave men who followed David. 1 Chron. xi. 46.

ELIEZER, אֵלִיעֶזֶר, help, or court of my God.

I. ELIEZER. The Mussulmen call him Dameschack, or Damascennis, and believe him to have been a black slave given to Abraham by Nimrod, at the time when he saw him, by virtue of the name of God, walking out of the midst of the flames, (Ur) into which he had been cast by his orders, vide ABRAHAM. Abraham conceived such regard for him, that he gave him the superintendence of his whole family; and, before the birth of his sons, designed him for his heir. Abraham on his arrival in Syria, say they, built a city there, which he called by the name of his slave, Dameschack: this is the celebrated Damascus. Others believe, with more probability, that Eliezer was a native of Damascus, and that he had a son whom Abraham intended for his heir. Vide FRAGMENT, No. XLIII.

When Abraham sent Eliezer into Mesopotamia, he said to him, "Put thy hand under my thigh, and promise with an oath not to take a Canaanite for a wife to my son. But go into the country, where my relations live, and there take a wife to my son Isaac." Eliezer departing with many camels, and rich presents, went to the city of Nahor in Mesopotamia; and from thence brought Rebecca for Isaac. See the History, Gen. xxiv.

II. ELIEZER, son of Moses and Zipporah, born in Midian while Moses abode in that country. He had a son named Rehabiah, Exod. ii. 18, 22. 1 Chron. xxiii. 17. Some have thought, that what is related, Exod. iv. 24, 25. of an angel's meeting Moses, when returning to Egypt, is to be understood, as if this angel intended to kill Eliezer, because he was not circumcised. The Scripture does not say clearly, whom the angel had a design to slay.

III. ELIEZER, a Levite, he blew the trumpet before the ark when David removed it to Jerusalem. 1 Chron. xv. 24.

IV. ELIEZER, son of Zichri, of Reuben; commanded 24,000 men of his tribe in the reign of Solomon. 1 Chron. xxvii. 16.

V. ELIEZER, son of Dodavah, a prophet, foretold to Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, that his ships, equipped in conjunction with the impious Ahaziah, king of Israel, should be disabled at the port of Ezion-geber. 2 Chron. xx. 37.

VI. ELIEZER, a Levite, who after the return from the captivity, dismissed his foreign wife married contrary to the law. Ezra x. 23.

VII. ELIEZER, son of Jorim, one of our Saviour's ancestors according to the flesh. Luke iii. 29.

ELIHOREPH, אֵלִיחֹרֶף, the God of the winter; from אֵל, el, God, and חֹרֶף, choreph, winter, and אֵל, el, God: otherwise, the God of youth; from horeph: otherwise, of shame or reproach; from חֹרֶף, charaph. Solomon's counsellor. 1 Kings iv. 3.

ELIHU, אֵלִיהוּ, he is my God himself; from אֵל, el, God, and י, my, and הוּא, hua, he, himself.

I. ELIHU, son of Shemaiah, a brave man of Manasseh, who followed David. 1 Chron. xii. 20.

II. ELIHU, one of the porters of the temple, appointed by David. 1 Chron. xxvi. 7.

III. ELIHU, David's brother, head of Judah. 1 Chron. xxvii. 18.

IV. ELIHU, one of Job's friends, descended from Nahor. Job xxxii. 2. xxxiv. 1. xxxvi. 1, &c.

[This name is written with the א final, Job xxxiii. 2, 5, 6; and without the א final in ver. 4. and in some copies, also chap. xxxv. 1.]

ADDITION.

[ELIHU is one of the most remarkable characters in Scripture. He is said to be of Buz; which, as the name of a place, occurs only once in Scripture, Jer. xxv. 23, where it stands in connection with Teman and Dedan, towns bordering on Idumea. The Chaldee paraphrase expressly describes him as a relation of Abraham. He enters the poem so late as chap. xxxii. He opens his discourse with great modesty: he does not enlarge on any supposable wickedness in Job, which had brought his present distresses on him; but he controverts his replies, his inferences, and his arguments: he observes on the mysterious dispensations of providence, which he insists, however they may appear to mortals, are full of wisdom and mercy; he insists, that the righteous have their share of prosperity in this life, no less than the wicked; that God is supreme, and that it becomes us to acknowledge and submit to that Supremacy; since "the Creator wisely rules the world he made;" and he draws instances of benignity from the constant wonders of creation, of the seasons, &c. His language is copious, glowing, and sublime; and it deserves notice, that Elihu does not appear to have offended God by his sentiments; nor is any sacrifice of atonement commanded for him as for the other speakers in the poem. It is more than possible, that the character of Elihu has been thought figurative of a personage interposed between God and man—a MEDIATOR—one speaking "without terrors," and not disposed to overcharge mankind: and, probably, this sentiment has had its influence on the acceptability of the book of Job, and its preservation among the pious.]

ELIJAH, אליהו, [my] God the Lord.

ELIJAH, or Elias, a prophet: native of Tishbe, beyond Jordan, in Gilead. Some think he was a priest descended from Aaron, and say, one Sabaca was his father: but this has no authority. Several of the Fathers were of opinion, that he lived a single life. He was raised up by God, to be set like a wall of brass, in opposition to idolatry, and particularly to the worship of Baal, which Jezebel and Ahab supported in Israel. Scripture introduces Elijah saying to Ahab, "As the Lord God of Israel liveth, before whom I stand, there shall not be dew nor rain these years, but according to my word." 1 Kings xvii. 1, 2. A. M. 3092, ante A. D. 912.

The Lord commanded him to conceal himself beyond Jordan, near the brook Cherith. He obeyed, and God sent ravens to him morning and evening, who brought him flesh and bread; but after a time the brook being dried up, God sent him to Zarephath, a city of the Sidonians. At the city-gate, he met with a widow woman gathering sticks, from whom he desired a little water: adding, as she was going to fetch it, "Bring me, I pray thee, also, a morsel of bread;" she answered, "As the Lord liveth I have no bread, but only a handful of meal, and a little oil in a cruse, and I am gathering some sticks, that I may dress it for me and my son, that we may eat it, and die." Elijah said, "Make me first a little cake, and bring it me, and afterwards make for thee and thy son: for thus saith the Lord, the barrel of meal shall not waste, neither shall the cruse of oil fail, until the day that the Lord sendeth rain upon the earth." His prediction was accomplished, and he dwelt at this widow's house.

Some time afterwards this woman's son fell sick and died. The mother, overwhelmed with grief, intreated the assistance and interposition of Elijah; who, taking him in his arms, cried to the Lord for the restitution of the child's life. The Lord heard the prophet, and restored the child.

After three years of drought, the Lord commanded Elijah to see Ahab king of Israel. Now the famine being extreme at Samaria, Ahab sent people throughout the country to enquire after places where they might find forage. Obadiah, an officer of the king's household, being thus employed, Elijah presented himself, and directed him to tell Ahab, "Behold, Elijah is here!" Ahab came to him and reproached him as the cause of this calamity; Elijah retorted the charge on himself, and on his iniquities; and staked his credit and innocence on the event of a miracle from heaven, on a sacrifice to be openly offered, in sight of Israel, who should determine between Jehovah and Baal. Ahab therefore convened the people of Israel, and 400 prophets of Baal.

Baal's prophets prepared their altar, sacrificed their bullock, placed it on the pile, and called on their god. They leaped upon the altar, and cut themselves after their manner, crying with all their force. Elijah insulted them, saying, "Cry louder; Baal is perhaps asleep, or on a journey," &c. Vide FRAGMENT, No. CVII.

Mid-day being past, Elijah repaired the altar of the Lord, and with twelve stones, in allusion to the twelve tribes of Israel, he built anew that altar. He made a trench, and, as it were, two ridges round about it, he prepared the wood, and the bullock, which he laid on the altar, he poured three several times abundance of water on the wood, and the burnt sacrifice, so that the water ran about the altar, and filled the trench. After this, he called on the Lord. In answer to his prayer the fire of the Lord fell on the altar, and consumed the wood, the burnt sacrifice, the stones, and the very dust of the place. Hereupon all the people fell on their faces, saying, "Jehovah is the true God." Elijah then incited the people to slay the prophets of Baal.

After this, Elijah said to Ahab, Go home, eat and drink, for I hear the noise of abundance of rain. Elijah went to the top of Carmel, and throwing himself on the earth, sent his servant to look toward the sea. He went six times without seeing any thing; but the seventh time reported, that he saw a cloud rising out of the sea, as large as a man's hand. Elijah said to his servant, "Go, and say unto Ahab, prepare thy chariot, and away, that the rain stop thee not." The king got into his chariot, and rode to Jezreel. Elijah girded up his loins, and ran before Ahab's chariot; and the rain fell in abundance.

Jezebel, wife of Ahab, threatened Elijah for having slain her prophets. The prophet hereupon hereupon fled to Beer-sheba, in the south of Judah, and from thence into Arabia Petræa. In the evening, being extremely fatigued, he laid himself down under a juniper-tree, and prayed God to take him out of the world. An angel touched him, and said, "Arise and eat." Looking around him, he saw a cake baked on the coals, with a cruse of water; he ate and drank, and again slept. The angel again awakened him, and said, "Rise and eat, the journey is too great for thee." He rose, ate and drank, and went in the strength of that meat forty days and forty nights, unto Horeb the mount of God.

There he lodged in a cave, and the Lord said unto him, "What doest thou here, Elijah?" And he said, "I have been very jealous for the Lord of Hosts; for the children of Israel have forsaken thy covenant, thrown down thine altars, and slain thy prophets with the sword, and I, even I only, am left, and they seek my life to take it away." The Lord said, Go forth, and stand at the entrance of the cave. While he stood there, a strong wind passed by, but the Lord was not in this impetuous wind; after this the earth trembled, but the Lord was not in this earthquake; after the earthquake was a fire, but the Lord was not in the fire; after this fire was the breathing of a gentle wind; that instant Elijah prostrated himself on the earth, and covered his face in his mantle. The Lord asked him as before, what dost thou here, Elijah? and he answered as before.

The Lord said to him, return to the wilderness of Damascus, anoint Hazael king over Syria, Jehu king over Israel; and Elisha to be prophet in thy room. Whosoever escapeth the sword of Hazael, shall Jehu slay; and him that escapeth the sword of Jehu, shall Elisha slay. Nor think, that thou only hast continued faithful to my covenant, for I have reserved seven thousand men in Israel, who have not bowed their knees to Baal, who have not adored him, by lifting up their hands to their mouths and kissing them."

Elijah, departing from mount Horeb, went into the tribe of Ephraim, and called Elisha to the prophetic office. 1 Kings xix. 19.

Some years after this, Ahab having seized Naboth's vineyard, and Jezebel having contrived to condemn that honest Israelite, the Lord commanded Elijah to reproach Ahab with his crime. Elijah met him going to Naboth's vineyard to take possession of it, and warned him, that "In the very place where dogs licked the blood of Naboth, shall they lick thy blood also. And dogs shall eat Jezebel by the wall of Jezreel." Fulfilled 1 Kings xxii. 38.

Ahaziah king of Israel, being hurt by a fall from the platform of this house, sent to consult Baal-zebub, the god of Ekron, whether he should recover. Elijah met these messengers, and said to them, "Is it because there is no God in Israel, that ye go to enquire of Baal-zebub the god of Ekron? Now therefore, saith the Lord, thou shalt die most certainly." They returned, and related what this stranger had told them. By their description of him, Ahaziah knew it was Elijah. 2 Kings i. 2—16.

He sent a captain to him, with his company of fifty men; the officer coming up to Elijah, who was sitting on a hill, said, "Thou man of God, the king commands thee to come down." Elijah answered, "If I am a man of God, let fire come down from heaven and consume thee and thy fifty men." The prophet's words were followed with the effect predicted. The king sent another captain, who was also consumed. A third captain going to Elijah, intreated him to respect his life and his people's lives. And him the prophet accompanied to the king.

Elijah understanding by revelation, that God would ere long translate him out of this world, was desirous to conceal it from Elisha, his inseparable companion, and said to him, "Tarry thou here, the Lord hath sent me to Bethel." Elisha answered, "I will not leave thee." At Bethel, "Tarry thou here, said Elijah, the Lord hath sent me to Jericho." Elisha replied, that he would not quit him. At Jericho, he desired Elisha to remain, saying, "the Lord hath sent me to Jordan;" Elisha would not. They went therefore together to Jordan. At the Jordan, Elijah took his mantle and struck the waters with it, which divided, and they passed over on dry ground.

Elijah then said to Elisha, "Ask what I shall do for thee before I be taken away from thee." "I pray thee," said Elisha, "let a double portion of thy spirit be upon me;" i. e. obtain the gift of prophecy from God for me, in the same measure that thou possessest it. Double may signify, like; or, give me a double share in thine inheritance, a double portion of thy spirit, the gift of prophecy, and of miracles, in a degree double to what I now possess: [the portion of the first-born.] Vide ELISHA.

Elijah answered, "Thou hast asked a very hard thing; nevertheless, if thou see me when I am taken from thee, it shall be so unto thee; but if not, it shall not be so." As they continued their journey, a chariot of fire, with horses of fire, suddenly separated them, and Elijah was carried in a whirlwind up to heaven. Elisha beheld this, and cried out, "My father! my father! the chariot of Israel, and the conductor of it!" 2 Kings ii. 12.

Eight years after the miraculous ascension of Elijah, a letter of reproof, admonition, and threatening, threatening, was brought to Jehoram king of Judah, from this prophet. Some believe, this letter was written from where Elijah is at present; or, that it was sent before the prophet's translation; others, that Jehoram dreamed this.

[Was it written prophetically by Elijah before his death, but laid by, with orders not to be produced till a certain time, or under certain events? We have instances of papers lodged in the British Museum with such orders; and of others left for publication, but not to be published till after such an interval of time, or till after such or such persons are dead. Or is the name of Elijah misplaced for Elisha ?]

There was a book extant formerly, The Prophecy, or Revelation, or Ascension of Elijah, from which St. Paul is thought to have quoted, 1 Cor. ii. 9. Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him. The Rabbins, in Seder olam, say, that Elijah is employed in writing the history of the world.

Some have believed Elijah and Enoch to be still living, and some, both Jews and Christians, imagine, that they are to come at the end of the world to encounter Antichrist: supposing them to be the two witnesses, who shall prophecy a thousand two hundred and threescore days, clothed in sackcloth. Rev. xi. 3.

Lastly, the Jews refer to one Elias or Elijah (whom some have taken for this prophet) a tradition from the house of Elijah,—that the world will last six thousand years, viz. two thousand years without the law; two thousand under it; and two thousand more under the Messiah. But so many years of the Messiah's period as are expired without his appearing, have so passed away by reason of our sins. There is great probability, that this tradition proceeds from an Elijah much more modern than the Tishbite; as well as the three books, 1. The greater Order of Elijah; 2. The lesser Order of Elijah; 3. The cave of Elijah.

The author of Ecclesiasticus has an encomium on the memory of Elijah, chap. xlviii.

Malachi has this passage: Behold, I will send you Elijah the prophet, before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord. And he shall turn the heart of the fathers to the children, and the heart of the children to their fathers, lest I come and smite the earth with a curse. Our Saviour informs us, (Matth. xi. 14. xvii. 10—12.) that Elijah the prophet came in spirit, in John the Baptist. The Evangelists tell us, that in the transfiguration of our Saviour, Elijah and Moses both appeared and conversed with him concerning his future passion. Matth. xvii. 3. Mark ix. 3. Luke ix. 30.

Lastly, many of the Jews in our Lord's time believed Elijah to be risen from the dead in his person, or that the soul of Elijah had passed into the body of Jesus Christ. Matth. xvi. 14. Mark vi. 15. Luke ix. 8.

The Mussulmen relate, that one Kheder, or Khizen, general of Alexander's troops (not Alexander the Great, but one more ancient, of the same name) had the good fortune to find the fountain of life, which Alexander had long sought in vain. Kheder drank large draughts of it, and so became immortal. He is called Kheder, which signifies verdant, because from that time he enjoyed a flourishing and immortal life. Kheder is, according to them, Elijah, who lives in a place of retirement, in a delicious garden, where is the tree of life, and where the fountain of life runs, by the help whereof his immortality is preserved: here he awaits the second coming of Jesus Christ, at which Elijah is to appear once more in the world.

The Magi of Persia pretended, that their master Zoroaster was one of the prophet Elijah's disciples; at least, that their ancestors were instructed by the disciples of the two prophets Elijah and Elisha. This fiction is founded on Elijah's procuring fire from heaven, and his being carried away in a fiery chariot; the disciples of Zoroaster making the element fire the principal object of their worship.

ELIJAH, FED BY RAVENS,

CONJECTURES ON THE HISTORY OF.

[Mr. PENNANT, in his British Zoology, p. 163, has the following remark in his account of the eagle. "Smith, in his History of Kerry, [in Ireland] relates, that a poor man in that country got a comfortable subsistence for his family, during a summer of famine, out of an eagle's nest, by robbing the eaglets of the food the old ones brought them, whose attendance he protracted beyond the natural time, by clipping the wings, and retarding the flight of the young."

Many have been the conjectures (some of them sufficiently wild) of writers on the subject of Elijah fed by ravens; or, as in the original, by OREBIM. "I have commanded the OREBIM to feed thee by the brook Cherith," says God. 1. These orebim were angels, metamorphosed into ravens, say some: 2. They were merchants, say others; who think they discover a similar term taken in this sense, Ezek. xxvii. 27. But Bochart sufficiently refutes this conjecture; as God would not then have said I have commanded the orebim, but the merchants of such a place, to feed thee. 3. They were Arabs, say some. 4. They were inhabitants of Araba, or Arabo, a town; or of Oreb, Judges vii. 25.

Isaiah

Isaiah x. 26. but Oreb was a rock only. And whence did the orebim get their flesh and bread? 1. From the table of king Ahab, say some; 2. from some of the 7000 who had not bowed to Baal; 3. from off the altar; 4. and M. Basnage thinks, the safest way is, to say that God created it on purpose: surely, if so, he might as well have placed it within reach of the prophet, and saved the ravens the trouble of portage.

We ought to consider, 1. that Ahab sought Elijah with avidity, and took an oath of EVERY people, no doubt also throughout his own dominions, that he was not concealed among the inhabitants; his situation therefore required the utmost privacy, even solitude. 2. That when the brook Cherith was dried up, the prophet was obliged to quit his asylum, which he needed not to have done, had a people been his suppliers, for they could have brought him water as well as food.

Let us now suppose for a moment, that Elijah was concealed in some (rocky or) mountainous spot, where passengers never strayed; and that here a number of voracious birds had built their nests on the trees which grew around it, or on projections of rocks, &c. These flying every day to procure food for their young, the prophet availed himself of a part of what they brought, and while they, obeying the dictates of nature, designed only to provide for their offspring, Divine Providence directed them to provide at the same time for the wants of Elijah: so that what he gathered, whether from their nests, from what they dropped, or brought to him, or occasionally from both means, was enough for his daily support. And the OREBIM furnished him bread, or flesh, in the morning, and bread, or flesh, in the evening. But, I rather think, there being a good many of them, some might furnish bread, and others flesh; and vice versa, at different times: so that a little from each made up his solitary, but satisfactory meal. To such straits was the exiled prophet driven! and such was the dependance of this zealous man of God!

Observe, these birds were not eagles: eagles do not eat bread, though they eat raw flesh; eagles would have torn his eyes out, or would have killed him, naturally speaking: neither were they vultures; but they were birds who fed their young with bread, or with flesh, or with both; whence arose the necessity for their bringing it home to the nest, and the certainty of the prophet's finding it thereabouts; they might supply their own hunger abroad, but their nestlings demanded their care at home: moreover, if a poor man—in a summer of famine—the very case of Elijah—could get a comfortable subsistence for his family from a single nest of eaglets, the prophet, being alone, might pick up an ample supply from a numerous colony of orebim; and yet leave enough for his caterers and their broods.

If I recollect rightly, the poor man who robbed the eaglets, used to hide himself among the trees, till he saw the old eagles had deposited their prey, and were departed in search of more; then he advanced to the nest, and made free with what he found there; whether Elijah acted in the same manner, does not appear; but, evidently, he is not the only one who has been nourished by birds, and that too according to their nature; for which purpose birds of prey, not domestic fowl, were the most proper.

As to God's commanding the ravens—it is a mode of speech used where vocal commands were not employed.

How long did Elijah continue at the brook Cherith? the original signifies only “to the end of days:” six months, say the most considerate interpreters; which perhaps, though too long for a breeding season, yet is not inconsistent with our statement.

After all, perhaps, these orebim were not strictly ravens, but rooks, which are birds of a kind not distant, and at first sight of the same form, nature, and manners, but on closer examination they manifest considerable differences. 1. The rook is the corvus (vulgarly understood to be the crow) of Virgil, says Mr. PENNANT—

Corvorum increpuit densis exercitus alis.

A very natural description of the return of these birds to their nests in the evening. 2. The rook only, of this genus of birds, is gregarious; the true raven flies only in pairs; and one pair has been known to keep a whole island as a territory; but rookeries, we know, among ourselves, contain sometimes a great number of families. 3. The rook is a harmless bird, lives on insects, not on carrion, as does the raven, and the crow: but in a time of scarcity would naturally prey where it could, and be not only more active, but much more bold than usual: however, this renders it less of an unclean bird than the others are. N.B. The Talmud distinguishes three sorts of ravens, but I do not know that either is the rook.

Among us rooks begin to build in March. Query, 1. Was the time of their young being ready for flight delayed by the famine, &c. in the days of Elijah? 2. What birds in the East are best known as most likely to have been employed on this occasion?—that are 1. gregarious; 2. not carrion eaters; but, 3. feed on bread, bread, or on flesh; or on both: or on other clean food.

In Abyssinia, Mr. BRUCE mentions certain birds of the eagle kind as extremely bold: and one which he shot while taking a piece of meat out of a boiling pot.

Most probably, corvus and oreb also, expresses the whole class of ravens, rooks, crows, &c. for so we have in Horace—

Non pasces in cruce corvus,

"thou shalt not hang on a cross and feed ravens," or crows, which are carrion eaters: so we have a vulgar expression among ourselves, speaking of a person likely to die, "he will give the crow a pudding." That oreb denotes a class of birds appears from Levit. xi. 15. Dent. xiv. 14. where they are declared unclean, "EVERY oreb [raven, Eng. Tr.] after its kind."

ELIKA, אֵלִיקָא, pelican of God; from אֵלִי caah, a pelican, and אֵל el, God: otherwise, a strong vomit; from אֵל aul, strong, and כִּי kia, to vomit; [from the Chaldee, gathering together of my God.] The Harqrite, one of thirty brave officers in David's army. 2 Sam. xxiii. 25.

ELIM, אֵילִים, 'Ailim, the rams; from אֵיל ail: otherwise, the strong, or the stags, or the valleys.

ELIM, the seventh incampment of Israel in the wilderness, where they found twelve fountains, and seventy palm-trees. Exod. xv. 27.

ELIMELECH, אֱלִימֶלֶךְ, my God is king; from אֵל el, God, ו i, my, and מֶלֶךְ melek, a king.

ELIMELECH, of Bethlehem, husband to Naomi, by whom he had two sons, Mahlon and Chelion. During a great famine, Elimelech retired with his wife and children into the country of Moab, where he died after ten years. Ruth i. 1, &c.

ELIOENAI, אֱלִי־עֵנַי, 'Elionai, towards him [God] are my eyes; from עַי hal, signifying ad, apud, juxta, according to the Latin, and ו i, my, and עַי hen, an eye; otherwise, towards him are my fountains; from the same: otherwise, towards him is my poverty and my misery; from עַי honi. [Written also אֱלִי־עֵנַי.]

I. ELIOENAI, son of Neariah, 2 Sam. v. 16.

II. ELIOENAI, son of Asiel, of Simeon, 1 Chr. iv. 36.

III. ELIOENAI, son of Becher, of Benjamin, 1 Chron. vii. 8.

IV. ELIOENAI, son of Asaph, a porter of the temple. 1 Chron. xxvi. 3.

V. ELIOENAI, son of Zerabiah, who after the Jews returned from Babylon, separated from his foreign wife. Ezra viii. 4. x. 22.

ELIONEUS, high-priest of the Jews: he succeeded Matthias son of Ananus, A. M. 4047, and the next year was succeeded by Simon Cantharus.

ELIPHAL, אֱלִיפָאֵל, miracle, or judgment of God; from פָּאֵל phala, a miracle, or פָּלֵל pillel, judgment, and אֵל el, God. Son of Ur, a brave officer in David's army, 1 Chron. xi. 35.

ELIPHALEH, אֱלִיפָאֵל, 'Eliphal, my God is admirable, or the judgment of my God. A Levite who assisted at the removal of the ark. 1 Chron. xv. 18, 21.

ELIPHALETH, אֱלִיפָאֵת, 'Eliphalet, God of deliverance; from אֵל el, God, and פָּאֵת palat, to deliver: otherwise, my God who puts to flight; from ו i, my, and אֵל el, God.

I. ELIPHALETH, son of David, 2 Sam. v. 16. See another of the same name, 1 Chron. xiv. 7.

II. ELIPHALETH, son of Eshkek. 1 Chr. viii. 39.

I. ELIPHAZ, son of Esau and Adah, daughter of Elon. He had five sons, Teman, Omar, Zepho, Gatam, and Kenaz.

II. ELIPHAZ, one of Job's friends, probably a descendant of Eliphaz, son of Esau.

[Eliphaz was of Teman, a principal part of Idumea, (Jer. xlix. 7, 20. Ezek. xxv. 13. Amos i. 11, 12. Obad. v. 8, 9.) In the Greek versions of the poem, he is described as king of his city. His natural temper, as appears by his speeches, was mild and modest: he makes the first reply to the complaints of Job. He thinks that the truly good are never entirely forsaken by providence; but that exemplary punishments may justly be inflicted for secret sins. He denies that any man is innocent, and therefore censures Job for asserting his freedom from guilt: and he exhorts Job to confess his concealed iniquities, as a probable means of alleviating their punishment. His arguments are well supported; but he is declared, at the close of the poem, to have taken erroneous views of the Divine dispensations; and Job offers a sacrifice on his account.]

ELISABETH, אֱלִישַׁבֶּת, 'Elisabeth, God of the oath, or the oath of God, from שְׁבֻעַ shabua; otherwise, of fulness; from שְׁבַע shebah, and אֵל el, God.

ELISABETH, wife of Zachariah, and mother of John the Baptist. Of the daughters of Aaron, (Luke i. 5.) i. e. of the race of the priests. An angel having foretold to her husband Zachariah the birth of John the Baptist, and Zachariah returning home, Elisabeth conceived. The Greek church makes a festival of John's conception September 20; it is on the 24th, in the most ancient Latin calendars. Elisabeth during five months concealed the favour God had granted her; but the angel Gabriel discovered to the Virgin Mary this miraculous conception, as an assurance of the birth of the Messiah, by herself. Vide ANNUNCIATION.

Mary visited her cousin, Elisabeth, and when she saluted her, the child with which Elisabeth

was pregnant, leaped in her womb; and Elisabeth full of the Holy Ghost, said, "Blessed art thou among women! and blessed is the fruit of thy womb!" When her child was to be circumcised on the eighth day, his mother named him John: according to previous instructions from her husband.

The eastern people believe, that Herod having resolved on the death of Zachariah's son and the infants of Bethlehem, his mother Elisabeth carried him to the mountains, to conceal him; but finding herself not able to climb up, she addressed the mountain, and said, "Thou mountain of God receive me and my child!" whereupon it immediately opened, received them, and hid them. An angel of the Lord guarded them, and they were surrounded with light. Herod sent to Zachariah, enquiring where his son was: which Zachariah refusing to declare, that prince commanded him to be killed in the temple, between the altar of burnt-sacrifices and the porch of the temple. This we read at length in the Proto-evangelium, or "Preparatory Gospel."

The kindred between the Virgin and Elisabeth is no difficulty; for though Elisabeth was of the family of Aaron, and Mary was of the tribe of Judah, yet they might be near a-kin; for example, whether any relation of Mary had married Elisabeth, or Elisabeth's father had married any woman related to Mary. No law obliged the Jewish priests to marry only in their own tribe, nor forbade women of sacerdotal families from marrying men of other tribes than that of Levi. The only case wherein women were restricted to marry in their own tribe, was when for want of brothers they were heiresses in their respective families. Numb. xxvii. xxxvi.

ELISHA, אֵלִישָׁא, salvation of God, or God that saves; from יָשָׁא jasha, and אֵל el, God.

ELISHA, son of Shaphat, Elijah's disciple and successor in the prophetic ministry, was of Abel-meholah. Elijah having received God's command to anoint Elisha as a prophet, came to Abel-meholah; and finding Elisha ploughing with twelve pair of oxen, he threw his mantle over him. Elisha left his oxen, and accompanied Elijah. His history is related 2 Kings ii.—xiii.

We have observed in the article ELIJAH, that Elisha was accompanying his master, when the Lord took him up in a whirlwind; and that he inherited Elijah's mantle, with a double portion of his spirit. He smote the Jordan and divided the stream; he cured the water of a rivulet near Jericho: going afterwards to Bethel, the children of the place ridiculed him, saying, "Go up thou bald pate: go up thou bald pate." Elisha cursed them in the name of the Lord; and speedily two bears came out of a neighbouring forest, and slew two and forty of them.

[It is usually said, that the children from Bethel who mocked Elisha, were destroyed by two bears; and CALMET, with others, tells us, the "two bears devoured two and forty children." Is this credible? Surely one child had been meat enough for one bear; or forty-two children for a score of those animals. Happily our own translation keeps clear of this error, and renders "two she-bears TARE these children;" i. e. not limb from limb; not, "to death, with blood, and groans, and tears;" but scratched, clawed, wounded, tare them, as the Hebrew root (נָצַח) signifies, to cleave, to separate adjoining parts, to divide, in short, to tear more or less; for all these children might not be equally guilty.]

This instance may stand in proof of how far popular representation may mislead men of learning, when they are not very attentive; and of the necessity for constant watchfulness against failings, and constant candour towards them, even in the best intentioned, and most respectable writers.]

The kings of Israel, Judah, and Edom, having taken the field against the king of Moab, who had revolted from Israel, were in danger of perishing by want of water. Elisha was at that time in the camp. Elisha seeing Jehoram the king of Israel, "What have I to do with thee?" said he; "get thee to the prophets of thy father, and to the prophets of thy mother: were it not out of respect to Jehoshaphat the king of Judah, I would not so much as look on thee. But now send for one who plays upon the harp;" and while this man played, the spirit of God fell on Elisha, and he said, "Thus saith the Lord, make ditches all along this valley, for ye shall see neither wind nor rain, yet this valley shall be filled with water for you and your cattle."

The widow of one of the prophets lamented to Elisha, that a creditor of her husband was determined to take her two sons, and sell them for slaves. Elisha multiplied the oil in this widow's house, and thereby enabled her to discharge the debt.

Elisha went frequently to Shunem, a city in Manasseh, on this side Jordan, where a certain matron gave him entertainment. As she had no child, the prophet promised her a son. His prediction was accomplished. But some years afterwards, the child died. Elisha was then at mount Carmel; where the mother sought him, and solicited him to come to her house: which he did, and restored her child to life.

At Gilgal during a great famine, one of the sons of the prophets gathered wild gourds; having shred them into the pot, they were served up to Elisha and others, who soon found their food to be poisonous. Elisha ordered meal to be thrown into the pot, and corrected its virulence.

Naaman, general of the king of Syria's troops, suffering under a leprosy, was advised to seek a cure in Israel. Elisha directed him to wash himself seven times in the Jordan; which he did, and was perfectly healed. He returned to Elisha, and offered him great presents; which the man of God refused. Nevertheless,

Gehazi, Elisha's servant, did not imitate the disinterestedness of his master. He ran after Naaman, and in Elisha's name begged a talent, and two changes of garments. But Elisha, to whom God had discovered Gehazi's avarice, reproached him with it, telling him, that Naaman's leprosy should cleave to him and his family ever after.

The king of Syria being at war with the king of Israel, could not imagine how all his designs were discovered by the enemy. He was told that the prophet Elisha revealed every thing. He sent troops, therefore, to seize the prophet at Dothan: but Elisha struck them with a kind of blindness, and led them into the very city of Samaria: there, he prayed God to open their eyes; however, he did them no injury, but gave them meat and drink, and sent them back to their master.

Some time after, Benhadad king of Syria, besieged Samaria, and the famine became extreme. Jehoram, king of Israel, imputing these calamities to Elisha, sent a messenger to cut off his head. The prophet ordered the door to be shut against him, and the king's messenger was scarcely arrived, when the king himself followed, and made great complaints of the condition of the town. Elisha answered, "To-morrow at this hour shall a measure of fine flour be sold for a shekel, at the gate." One of the king's officers replied, "Should the Lord open windows in heaven, and rain down provisions, it might be so!" Elisha answered, "You shall see it with your own eyes, but shall not partake of it." Elisha's prediction was verified.

Elisha sent one of the sons of the prophets to anoint Jehu, son of Jehoshaphat, and grandson of Nimshi, to be king, in pursuance of an order given to Elijah some years before. See JEHU, AHAZ, JEZEBEL.

Elisha falling sick, Joash king of Israel came to visit him; and wept, saying, "O my father! my father! the chariot of Israel! and the horsemen thereof!" Elisha desired him to bring a bow and arrows; the king having brought them, he requested him to put his hands on the bow, at the same time the prophet put his own hand on the king's, and said, open the window which looks east, and let fly an arrow; which he having done, Elisha said, "this is the arrow of the Lord's deliverance; thou shalt be successful against Syria at Aphek." Elisha desired him again to shoot; which he did three times, and then stopped. The man of God with some emotion said, "If thou hadst smitten five or six times, then hadst thou consumed Syria; whereas, now thou shalt smite Syria but thrice." This sign was accomplished in the event.

After Elisha was dead, a band of Moabites invaded the land. It happened that some Israelites, going to bury a man in a field, saw these banditti; and, being terrified, threw the body hastily into Elisha's grave: the body having touched Elisha's remains, received life, and the man stood up. This is noted Ecclesiasticus xlviii. 13, in the encomium on Elisha. After his death his body prophesied: he did wonders in his life, and at his death were his works marvellous.

ELISHA, the fountain of, rises two bow shots from mount Quarantania. It runs through the plain of Jericho, passes south of Gilgal, and, dividing into several streams, falls into the Jordan. This is the fountain whose waters were sweetened by Elisha, 2 Kings ii. 19. Vide FRAGMENT, No. V.

ELISHAH, אֵלִישָׁה, it is my God; from אֵלֶּשׁ jesh, it is, he represents: otherwise, lamb of God; from אֵלֶּשׁ shek: otherwise, God that gives help; from אֵלֶּשׁ jasha, and אֵלֶּ el, God [strength.] These etymologies are not very certain, but no better are known. [Perhaps, bond of God: a divine bond; i. e. a very strong bond of the parents to each other. Son of Javan, Gen. x. 4. 1 Chron. i. 7. from whom the isles of Elisha are named. Ezek. xxvii. 7.

This name has not the feminine termination in the Samaritan copy, but is written Elish, or Elis; which approaches pretty near to the Hellas of the Greeks. The Chaldee reads Alas, which is also pretty near to Hellas. The merchants of this country are praised by Ezekiel for their dyed stuffs, chap. xxvii. 7.

Bochart has taken pains to prove the superiority of the Grecian purple, which was produced in many places; nevertheless, it is difficult to determine, why the purple of Elisha should be valued so highly at Tyre, since Tyre herself was in possession of the famous purple dye; and Tyrian purple is proverbial for its excellency.

Josephus says, Æolia was named from Ælisha; or at least the Ionian or Æolian islands.

Some suppose two Elishas; one the brother, the other a son, of Ion, or Javan.]

ELISHAH, son of Javan, Gen. x. 4, is believed to have peopled Elis in the Peloponnesus. We find there the province of Elis, and a country called Alisium, by Homer. Ezekiel, xxvii. 7. speaks speaks of the purple of Elishah, brought to Tyre. The fish used in dyeing purple, was caught at the mouth of the Eurotas, and the ancients frequently speak of the purple of Laconia. Horat. Pausan. Plin.

ELISHAMA, אֵלִישָׁמָה, God hearing; from שָׁמַע shama, and אֵל el, God.

I. ELISHAMA, son of Ammihud, prince of Ephraim. He presented solemn offerings to the tabernacle, Num. vii. 48.

II. ELISHAMA, son of Jekaniah, and father of Shallum. 1 Chron. ii. 14.

III. and IV. ELISHAMA. We find two of this name, sons of David. 1 Chron. iii. 6, 8.

V. ELISHAMA, father of Nethaniah, and grandfather of Ishmael. He killed Gedaliah, whom Nebuchadnezzar had left to govern the remains of the people after the destruction of Jerusalem, 2 Kings xxv. 25.

VI. ELISHAMA, of the sacerdotal race, sent with others by Jehoshaphat king of Judah to exhort the Israelites to renounce idolatry,—2 Chron. xvii. 8.

ELISHAPHAT, אֵלִישַׁפָּת, God that judges: from שָׁפַט shaphat, and אֵל el, God.

ELISHAPHAT, son of Zichri, assisted Jehoiada the high-priest to enthronise the young king Joash. 2 Chron. xxiii. 1, &c.

ELISHEBA, אֵלִישֶׁבָּע. See ELISABETH.

ELISHEBA, daughter of Aminadab, and wife of Aaron. Mother of Nadab, Abihu, Eleazar, and Ithamar. Exod. vi. 23.

ELISHUA, אֵלִישׁוּעַ, Ἐλισοῦε, God is my salvation. Son of David, born at Jerusalem,—2 Sam. v. 15.

ELIUD, Ἐλιδ, God is my praise, or the praise of my God; from אֵל el, God, and הוד hod, glory or praise. Son of Achim, and father of Eleazar. In the genealogy of Jesus, Matth. i. 14, 15.

ELIZAPHAN, אֵלִיעֶזֶר, God of the north; from צָפָן tzaphan; otherwise, my God is hidden; from תִּצְפֶּה tzaphan: otherwise, my God beholds; from צָפָה tzaphah, and אֵל el, God.

I. ELIZAPHAN, son of Uzziel, uncle to Aaron, and head of the family of Kohath, Num. iii. 30. Moses commanded Elizaphan to carry the corpses of Nadab and Abihu out of the camp, Lev. x. 4.

II. ELIZAPHAN, son of Parnach, of Zebulun, a deputy appointed to divide the land, Numb. xxxiv. 15.

ELIZUR, or ELISHUR, אֵלִיעִזֵּר, Ἐλίζουρ, God is my strength, my rock; from צוּר tsor, a rock, whence מַצְרֹר matzor, a fortress: otherwise, stone, or rock of God; from צוּר tsor.

ELIZUR, son of Shedeur, of Reuben, Num. i. 5. vii. 30.

ELKANAH, אֱלִקָּנָה, God the zealous: from אֵל el, God, קָנָה kina, to be zealous: otherwise, possession, or the reed of God, from קָנָה kanah. [Perhaps, redeemed by God, or obtained as a possession from God.]

[I. ELKANAH, second son of Korah, Exod. vi. 24. 1 Chron. vi. 26. The name of his elder brother was Assir, which imports, a close prisoner; this name, Elkanah, appears to have been given in contradistinction, alluding to the approaching deliverance of Israel.

II. ELKANAH, father of the prophet Samuel, 1 Sam. i. 1; perhaps so called in reference to one of the deliverances of Israel recorded in the book of Judges.

Several others of the same name are mentioned, 1 Chron. vi. et al.]

ELKOTH, or ELCESAI, אֶלְכֹתַי Ἐλκεσαίος.—Hardness of God; from קָשָׁה kashah, troublesome, uneasy, and אֵל el, God.

ELKOTH, a village in Galilee, illustrious for the birth of the prophet Nahum. (Nahum, i. 1.) This village was shewn in Jerom's time, but almost in ruins. Theophylact says it is beyond Jordan.

ELMODAM, Ἐλμοδάμ. Some ancient Greek copies have ELMADAD, the God of measure; from אֵל el, God, and מָדָד mad, to measure: otherwise, the God of the garment; from mad, or madad. Ancestor of our Saviour, Luke iii. 28.

ELNAAM, אֵלְנָעַם, Ἐλναὰμ, beauty of God; from אֵל el, God, and נָעַם naham: or God that moves them; from נָחַם nuah, to remove, and אָנֹכִי am, them. Father of some brave men in David's time. 1 Chron. xi. 46.

ELNATHAN, אֵלְנָתָן, Ἐλνᾶθάν, God has given, or the gift of God; from אֵל el, God, and נָתַן nathan, to give.

ELNATHAN, son of Achbor, and father of Nehusta, mother of Jehoikim king of Judah. He opposed the king's burning of Jeremiah's prophecies. He was sent into Egypt to bring back the prophet Uriah, Jer. xxvi. 22. xxxvi. 12.

ELOHI, or ELOI, ELOHIM, one of the names of God. Angels, princes, great men, judges, and even false gods, are sometimes called Elohim.

The connection of the discourse assists us in determining the proper meaning of this word where it occurs. It is the same as ELOHA: one is singular, the other plural. Nevertheless, ELOHIM is often construed in the singular, particularly when the true God is spoke of: but when false gods are spoken of, it is rather construed in the plural.

ADDITION.

[This word has been the subject of so much contention, and is, in fact, so important, that it may justify a few words in illustration of its general idea and application.

It should seem to be second in dignity only to the name JEHOVAH; as that name imports the essential being of the Divinity, so Elohim seems to import the power inherent in deity; or the manifestation of that power on its relative subjects. Elohim created the world: that is to say, on occasion of the creation the Deity exhibited his attribute of power; he manifested himself to be God ALL-mighty. Comp. Psal. c. 3. Isaiah xl. 28. xlii. 5. et al.

So, on occasion of miracles; "Thou art the \aleph God that dost wonders" by thy power, Psal. lxxvii. 15. "Who is like unto thee among the mighty?" implying superior power in the true God above all. Exod. xv. 11. And this appears to be attributed in a lower sense to ANGELS, spiritual beings possessing powers superior to those of man. Judges xiii. 22. Psalm viii. 5. xcvi. 7, 9. KINGS have greater power than their subjects; MAGISTRATES have greater power than those who come before them, to obtain decision of their suits, and application of the laws; and PRINCES, or men of rank, whether in office, or not, possess power and influence by their wealth, station, retinue, &c. Idols, also, represented the powers of heaven; i. e. celestial influences; or terrestrial influences, as procreative powers, &c. So the golden calf is called Elohim, Exod. xxxii. 31. i. e. the power that had brought Israel out of Egypt: so Dagon, Judg. xvi. 23, &c. so Astaroth, Chemosh, and Milcom, 1 Kings xi. 33.—the powers productive, whether masculine or feminine. So Moses was the depository of power in respect of God, or the source whence power emanated and influenced Aaron, Exod. iv. 16. vii. 1. and the ark was thus esteemed by the Philistines, 1 Sam. iv. 7. i. e. as the depository of power, or the sacred symbol whence power might emanate to their injury.

It is remarkable, that the names Jehovah and Elohim, though not interchangeable, are occasionally placed one before the other without scruple; but, perhaps, the critical would find, that according to the occasion, the essential being of God, or the manifestative power of God, is principal in such passages, according to the order of the words. It deserves notice, also, that the messages of the prophets, &c. are delivered in the name of either Jehovah or Elohim; the phrase, "Shaddai spake," or "El Sabaoth spake," does not occur. It should seem, therefore, that there is in this mode of address, an allusion to the power by which the speech of the prophet was influenced, when admonishing, or predicting, in the name of Elohim, the SUPREME POWER, in manifestation.

The Jewish critics find great mysteries in some of these words, Eloi, Elohi, Elohim, &c. which are always written full, while others are written deficient, as with the γ yod, or without it; with the γ vau, or without it: they observe, too, that some of the letters of the name Jehovah, are added to \aleph God, but not all at the same time: also, that Jehovah is sometimes pointed with the vowel points of Elohim, but not Elohim with the vowel points of Jehovah. But, whether this word Elohim be singular or plural, adjective or substantive; whether it have any root in the Hebrew language, or have no root at all, they are not agreed.]

ELON, \aleph oak, or grove: or strong; from \aleph ail.

I. ELON, a grove of oaks: Elon-Mamre, Elon-More, Elon-Beth-Chanan, the grove—or oak—of Mamre, &c.

II. ELON, a city of Dan. Josh. xix. 43.

III. ELON the Hittite, father of Bashemath, wife of Esau, Gen. xxvi. 34.

IV. ELON, of Zebulun, chief of a family, Num. xxi. 26.

V. ELON, of Zebulun, judge of Israel: succeeded Ibzan, was succeeded by Abdon. Judg. xii. 10. He judged Israel ten years; from A. M. 2830, to 2840: ante A. D. 1164.

VI. ELON. See ELAM.

[ELOTH, AILATH, or AILA, ilaxes, or oaks, or stays, or strengths. 1 Kings ix. 26. 2 Kings xvi. 6. 2 Chron. viii. 17. xxvi. 2.

This word, in its root, or some of its derivatives, occurs pretty frequently in sacred scripture. It is thought to signify a kind of oak tree, or the terebinthine. Perhaps it is hardly possible to ascertain this kind of tree without more accurate knowledge of the productions of Canaan and of Arabia than we at present possess.

Simon supposes that ELIM, a station of the Israelites, Exod. xv. 27. xvi. 1. was so named from oaks, or terebinthines; yet no other trees than palm trees are mentioned as growing in that place. The valley of ELAH, 1 Sam. xvii. 2, 19. xxi. 10, is called, he says, at this day, the valley of terebinthines, Vide Dapper, Descript. Palest. p. 421; and he supposes that ELATH, ELOEH, and ELAH, might be derived from the same circumstance: but Ursinus, Arbor. Bibl. p. 207, denies, that Eleh means a terebinthine tree; and Smidt, in Geog. Bibl. p. 507, thinks this town was named Eloth, from Ela, a duke of Edom, who built it. Vide Gen. xxvi. 41. The comparison of chiefs to oaks because of their stability, duration, shelter, &c. is a common compliment. Vide Lucan. lib. i. Homer, Iliad, iv. 482. xiii. 179. xvi. 482.

Eloth was singularly varied in the writing, and no doubt in the pronunciation, of its name: Ela, Elas, Elat, Elana, Aila, Ailana, Ailas, Ailath, Ailoth, Ele, Eliana, Eilat, Ela, Elath, Elana, Haila, Hailath, &c. Pliny says it was called called Leana, from the Leanites, a people that dwelt on the shores of the Elanitic Gulf, which gulf was between Eloth and Gaza. In later ages this city was commonly called Elana. According to Jerom, it was the first port from which to sail from India to Egypt. Vide OPHTH.

After the decease of Alexander, and the wars consequent on his death, Elana was subject to the kings of Egypt: afterwards, to those of Syria: then to the Romans; who in the days of Jerom stationed here the tenth legion.

Elana may, however, be taken for Ailah, or Eloth. In the acts of the Council of Chalcedon, A. D. 451, there is mention of Beryllus Bishop of Aila: and the name is usually written Ailah, by the Arabian geographers.

"Of the Roman provinces under the names of Arabia and the third Palestine, the principal cities were Bostra and Petra, which dated their era from the year 105, when they were subdued by Palma, a lieutenant of Trajan. Dion Cassius, lib. 68. Petra was the capital of the Nabatheans, whose name is derived from the eldest son of Ishmael, Gen. xxv. 12. Justinian relinquished a palm country of ten days' journey to the south of Elah, (Procop. de Bell. Persic. lib. i. cap. 19.) and the Romans maintained a centurion and a custom house, (Arrian, in Periplo Maris Erythræi, p. 11, in Hudson, tom. i.) at a place (Λευκη Κωμη, pagus albus, Hawara) in the territory of Medina. (D'Anville Memoires sur l'Egypte, p. 343.) These real possessions, and some naval inroads of Trajan, (Peripl. p. 14, 15.) are magnified by history and medals into the Roman conquest of Arabia." Gibbon's Notes to the Decline and Fall, &c. Vol. V. p. 179.

"Ailah was formerly a small town, with some fruitful lands about it: it is the city of those Jews who were turned into hogs and monks. It stands upon the coast of the Red Sea, pretty near the road of the Egyptian pilgrims that go to Mecca. It is now nothing but a tower, the residence of a governor who depends upon him of grand Cairo. There are now no longer any sown fields there. There was formerly a fort built in the sea, but it is all gone to ruin, and the commander lives in the tower we were just speaking of, which stands by the water-side."

This information is of consequence, as it shews that the character of the country here is changed: it had formerly, says this author, "fruitful lands;" it had "sown fields." It had also "a fort built in the sea;" but, there would have been no occasion for a fort, and still less for a fort in the sea, if this had not formerly been a sea-port, and a place worth defending.

It is likely, that what this writer terms a fort, was also a pier, which projected into the water: as we find the present tower stands "at the water-side."

This may be as proper a place as any, to insert what the same writer relates on the subject of the Gulf of Eloth: a subject so obscure, that some of our best geographers have inclined to reject it altogether. Describing the Red Sea, Ibn Haukal says, (Ibid. p. 353)—

"Leaving Madyan, it comes to Ailah, which is under the 55th degree of longitude, and 29th of latitude. Almostharc says, in the Kanun, that Ailah is in 56 degrees 40 minutes of longitude, and 28 degrees 50 minutes of latitude. From Ailah this sea bends southward as far as Al-tour, which is mount Sinai, that by a very high cape, jutting out into the sea, divides it into two arms—[literally, in Arabic, two tongues of the sea.] From thence, turning back again northward, it comes at last to Kolzum; the situation of which we have shewn. This town stands to the west of Ailah, both of them having almost the same latitude. Kolzum and Ailah are situate upon the two ends of the sea we have been speaking of, and so are we arrived at the northern Terra Firma. Among the turnings and windings which this sea makes, which we have just now been describing, the land juts out on the south; and the place where it parts the sea is Al-tour i. e. Mount Sinai, the longitude of which is almost the same as that of Ailah. Ailah stands upon the extremity of the eastern arm or channel, and Kolzum upon the extremity of the western one. Ailah is more easterly than Kolzum. What is between Kolzum and Ailah is Mount Al-tour, which is more southerly than Kolzum, and Ailah lies at the end of the cape that runs out into the sea. The sea flows between Al-tour and the coast of Egypt, and shuts up the channel or arm, upon the extremity of which Kolzum stands. Just so between Al-tour and the shore of Hegiaz there is another channel, upon the extremity of which the town of Ailah stands. To go from Al-tour to either of the opposite lands is a very short passage by sea, but it is abundantly a longer way by the desert of Fakiyah, because those who come from Al-tour to go into Egypt, must of necessity pass round Kolzum; or beyond Ailah, if they are going to Hegiaz. Al-tour is joined to the continent on the north side; but it is encompassed by the sea on the other three sides." See the MAPS.

This account is not precisely accurate; but it is clear to the point of proving an easterly gulf of the Red Sea. The author evidently takes pains to explain his meaning: and his testimony, as to the main fact, is decisive.

The

The following is Mr. Bruce's account of this gulf:

"The 12th we sailed from Cape Mahomet, just as the sun appeared. We passed the island of Tyrone in the mouth of the Elanitic Gulf, which it divides nearly equally into two; or, rather, the northwest side is the narrowest.—The direction of the gulf is nearly north and south. I judge it to be about six leagues over. Many of the Cairo ships are lost in mistaking the entry of the Elanitic Gulf for that of the Heropolitic Gulf, or Gulf of Suez; for, from the island of Tyrone, which is not above two leagues from the main, there runs a string of islands, which seem to make a semicircular bar across the entry from the point, where a ship, going with a south wind, would take its departure; and this range of islands ends in a shoal with sunken rocks, which reaches near five leagues from the main. It is probable, that upon these islands the fleet of Rehoboam perished when sailing for the expedition of Ophir. 2 Chron. xx. 37." Trav. Vol. I. p. 241.

ELPAAL, עֲלָאֵל, work of God; from עֲלָ, God, and עָלָא, to make. Son of Hushim, 1 Chron. viii. 11.

ELTEKETH, אֶלְתֶּכֶת, Ἐλθεκά, the ark, the armoury of God, according to the Syriac and Hebrew; called Elthecho by the Vulgate, Josh. xxi. 23. A city of Dan, given to the Levites of Kohath's family. Josh. xix. 44. xxi. 23.

ELTEKON, אֶלְתֶּכֶן, Ἐλθεκὶν, God has assured it. A town of Judah on the confines of Benjamin. Josh. xv. 59.

ELTOLAD, אֶלְתוֹלָאֵד, Ἐλθουλάδ, generation of God: from תָּלַד, to bring forth, and עָלָ, God. A town of Judah, Josh. xv. 30, given to Simeon, Josh. xix. 4.

ELUL, אֶלּוּל, Ἐλουλ, cry, outcry; from עָלָא, to cry, otherwise, watch. This word is Assyrian.

ELUL, one of the Hebrew months, Neh. vi. 15. answering nearly to August, O. S. having only twenty-nine days. It was the twelfth month of the civil year; the sixth of the ecclesiastical. On the seventh or ninth day of this month, the Jews fast, in memory of what happened after the return of those who went to view the promised land. Numb. xiii. xiv.

On the twenty-second day the festival of the Xylophoria was observed, when wood was carried to the temple, Joseph. de Bello, lib. ii. cap. 17. Selden says it was celebrated on the eighteenth of Ab. On the twenty-sixth day, the dedication of the walls of Jerusalem by Nehemiah was commemorated. Nehem. xii. 27, &c.

ELUZAI, אֶלּוּזַי, Ἐλουζι, God is my strength; from עָלָ, God, and עָלָז, force. A brave officer in David's army, 1 Chron. xii. 5.

ELYMAIS, Ἐλύμας, See ELAM.

ELYMAIS, capital of Elam, or the ancient country of the Persians. 1 Mac. vi. 1. informs us, that Antiochus Epiphanes, understanding there were very great treasures in the temple at Elymais, determined to plunder it; but the citizens of Elymais resisted him, and obliged him to fly. 2 Macc. ix. 2, calls this city Persepolis, probably because formerly it had been the capital of Persia; for Persepolis and Elymais were very different cities; the former situated on the Araxes, the latter on the Eulæus. The temple which Antiochus designed to pillage, was that of the goddess Nannæa, according to Maccabees; Aprian says a temple of Venus: Polybius, Diodorus, Josephus, and Jerom, say a temple of Diana.

ELYMAS, Ἐλύμας. In Arabic, a magician.

ELYMAS. See BAR-JESUS. Acts xiii. 7.

ELZABAD, אֶלְזָבָד, a present received from God, or given by God; from זָבַד, to endow, to give, and עָלָ, God.

I. ELZABAD, son of Shemaiah, a Levite, a porter of the temple, 1 Chron. xxvi. 7.

II. ELZABAD, one of the thirty gallant men in David's army, 1 Chron. xii. 12. This and the preceding are perhaps the same person.

To EMBALM. The ancient Egyptians, and the Hebrews also, embalmed the bodies of the dead. Joseph ordered the embalming of his father Jacob; and his physicians, employed in this work, were forty days about it: for it was the custom to spend so much time in embalming a dead body; and all Egypt lamented Jacob seventy days. The medical art was by the Egyptians ascribed to Isis, and in particular the remedy which procured immortality, which, in my opinion, was no other than that of embalming bodies, and rendering them incorruptible. Some affirm, that embalming became necessary in Egypt by reason of the inundation of the Nile, whose waters overflowing all the flat country near two months, people were obliged all this while to keep their dead in their houses, or to remove them to rocks and eminences, which were often very distant. To which we may add, that bodies buried before the inundation might be thrown up again by it; a sandy moist soil not being strong enough to retain them against the action of the water. Cassian. Collat. xv. cap. 3.

The process of embalming dead bodies among the Egyptians was as follows: When a man died, his body was carried to those artificers who made coffins; they made a coffin proportioned to its stature, to the dead person's quality, and to the price; for there was a great diversity in the prices. The upper exterior of the coffin represented the person who was to be enclosed in it. A man of condition was distinguished guished by the figure on the cover of the coffin, suitable paintings and embellishments were generally added.

The embalmers' prices were different; the highest was a talent, twenty minæ was moderate, the lowest price was small. The Egyptian talent is supposed to be worth about £300. A dissector, with a very sharp Ethiopian stone, made an incision on the left side, and hurried away instantly, because the relations of the deceased who were present, took up stones, and pursued him as a wicked wretch, who had disfigured the dead.

The embalmers, who were looked upon as sacred officers, drew the brains through the nostrils with a hooked piece of iron, and filled the skull with astringent drugs; they drew all the bowels, except the heart and kidneys, through the hole in the left side; the intestines were washed in palm wine, and in other strong and binding drugs. The body was anointed with oil of cedar, with myrrh, cinnamon, &c. about thirty days, so that it was preserved entire, without putrefaction, without losing its hair, and without contracting any ill scent.

After this the body was put into salt about forty days: wherefore, when Moses says that forty days were employed in embalming Jacob, we understand him of the forty days of his continuing in the salt of nitre; not including the thirty days engaged in the previous ceremonies, so that in the whole, they mourned seventy days for him in Egypt; as Moses observes.

Afterwards, the body was taken out of the salt, was washed, wrapped up in linen swaddling bands dipt in myrrh, and closed with a gum, which the Egyptians used instead of glue. Then the body was restored to the relations, who enclosed it in a coffin, and kept it in their houses, or deposited it in a tomb. Some are found at this day in Egypt in chambers, or subterraneous vaults.

Those who could not defray such expences, contented themselves with infusing, by a syringe, through the fundament, a liquor extracted from the cedar, and leaving it there, they wrapt up the body in salt of nitre. This oil preyed on the intestines, so that when they took it out, the intestines came along with it dried, but not putrified. The body being enclosed in nitre, became dry. The poor only cleansed the inside by injecting a liquor, which washed it; then they put the body into nitre for seventy days to dry it.

[Very recent discoveries in Egypt inform us, that the common people of that country were embalmed by means of bitumen, a cheap material, and easily managed. With this the corpse and its envelopes were smeared, with more or less care and diligence. Sepulchres have been opened, in which thousands of bodies have been deposited in rows, one on another, without coffins, preserved in this manner.

It is observed concerning Joseph, that he was embalmed, and put into a coffin, in Egypt, Gen. xl. 26; but the LXX. who lived in Egypt, by translating this coffin soros, seem to allude to a stone receptacle for the whole, including the mummy chest, or proper coffin; so that at the departure of the people from Egypt, they had only to take the mummy with its case, or coffin, out of this soros, stone receptacle, or tomb, in which it had been preserved, and by which it had been distinguished; and this being a public monument known to all, they were sure the body they carried with them was that of the patriarch Joseph, and no other person's.]

Scripture mentions the embalming of Joseph, of king Asa, and of Jesus Christ.

Joseph doubtless was embalmed after the Egyptian manner, since he died in Egypt.

Asa was embalmed, or rather burnt, in a particular manner. The Hebrew is literally, They laid him in the bed which they had filled with sweet odours, and divers kinds of spices; and they burnt odours for him with an exceeding great burning: as if these spices had been burnt near his body; but the generality of interpreters believe, that he was burnt with these spices in a bed of state, almost like the Roman emperors in later times.

It seems certain, that dead bodies, of kings particularly, were sometimes burnt; and I know not whether the custom were not derived from this instance of Asa. Scripture notices of Jehoram, that His people made no burning for him like the burning of his fathers. Jeremiah promises king Zedekiah: According to the burning of thy fathers, so shall they burn odours for thee. The body of Saul was burnt after it had been taken down from the walls of Bethsan, [probably, because of its state of corruption.]

As to the embalming of Jesus Christ, the evangelists inform us, that Joseph of Arimathea having begged his body, brought a white sheet to wrap it in; and that Nicodemus purchased a hundred pounds of myrrh and aloes, with which they embalmed him, and put him into Joseph's own unfinished sepulchre, cut in a rock. They could not use more ceremony, because the night came on, and they were just on beginning the sabbath. Nevertheless, the women who had followed him from Galilee, designed to embalm him more perfectly, at better opportunity and leisure: they remarked the place and manner of his sepulchre, and bought spices for their purpose. They rested all the sabbath-day, and on the first day of the week, early in the morning, morning, they took their spices, and went to the sepulchre, but could not execute their design, for Jesus about midnight had risen from the dead. He had been only rubbed with myrrh, and aloes, wrapped up in swaddling-bands, and buried in a great sheet, his face covered with a napkin. This is what we observe on comparing the passages of St. John. We see bandages of the same kind in the story of Lazarus's resurrection, with this difference, that there is no mention of spices. See John xix. 40. xx. 5.

EMERALD, a precious stone, of a green colour, in Latin Smaragdus; in our opinion, the סוהם sohem, Gen. ii. 12. Vulg. lapis onychinus. The emerald is placed, Exod. xxviii. 17. on the high priest's pectoral; but as the Hebrew ברקת baraketh, signifies a flash of lightning, or the glittering of a star; we conjecture, that the stone meant is that called Ceraunia, Astroïtes, or Iris, whereof Pliny mentions several species. In the histories of the East, we find several kings, named Soëm or Sohem, which, as we believe, signifies an emerald.

EMESA. We take this to be Hamath. Vide המאט. Emesa lay on the Orontes, eighteen miles from Laodicea, not far from Libanus.

EMIM, עמ"מ Ommim, fears of terrors; from עמ"מ am: otherwise formidable; from עמ"מ emah: otherwise people; from עמ"מ om.

EMIM, ancient inhabitants of Canaan beyond Jordan, who were defeated by Chedorlaomer at Shaveh Kiriathaim, or in the plain of Kiriathaim, Gen. xiv. 5. Kiriathaim was in the country which Sihon conquered from the Moabites. The Emin were warlike, and of gigantic stature: great, many, and tall, as the Anakim. See אנאח.

EMMANUEL. This Hebrew word signifies, God with us, Isaiah in his celebrated prophecy, chap. xi. wherein he foretels to Ahaz the birth of the Messiah from a virgin, says, this child shall be called, and really be, Emmanuel, God with us. He repeats this while speaking of the enemy's army, which, like a torrent, was to overflow Judea: The stretching out of his wings shall fill the breadth of thy land, O Emmanuel. St. Matthew informs us, that this prophecy was accomplished in Jesus Christ, born of the Virgin Mary, in whom the two natures, divine and human, united; so that he was really Emmanuel, or, God with us. Vide אלמאח.

EMMAUS, Εμμαύς, or Emmaum, people despised, or obscure; from עמ"מ am, people, and עמ"מ amam, secret, covered: or rather, hot; from עמ"מ chamath; [hot baths: such medicinal springs rose in this town, and were adapted for public use.]

I. EMMAUS, a village, sixty furlongs, or seven miles and a half, north of Jerusalem, celebrated for what happened to two disciples who went thither on the day of our Saviour's resurrection, when Jesus Christ joined them in the form of a traveller, demonstrated to them from Scripture, that Messiah was to suffer previous to his exaltation; and, while at supper, he discovered himself in the act of breaking bread, Luke xxiv. 13, 30, &c. One of these disciples was called Cleopas, and the other Emaus, according to St. Ambrose, and a very ancient MS. of Corbie. A church was built there in the very place where Cleopas's house stood. Josephus, (de Bello, lib. viii. cap. 27.) says, that Vespasian left 800 soldiers in Judæa, to whom he gave the village of Emmaus, which was sixty furlongs from Jerusalem.

[From Beth-horon to Emmaus was hilly. The Rabbins say, the inhabitants of Emmaus were Israelitish gentlemen. Josephus mentions one as a scribe of the council, de Bello, lib. v. 33.

D'Arvieux tells us, vol. vii. p. 259, that going from Jerusalem to Rama, he took the right from the high road to Rama, at some little distance from Jerusalem, and "travelled a good league over rocks and flint stones, to the end of the valley of terebinthine trees," till he reached Emmaus. "It seems, by the ruins which surround it," says he, "that it was formerly larger than it was in our Saviour's time. The Christians, while masters of the Holy Land, re-established it a little, and built several churches.—Emmaus was not worth the trouble of having come out of the way to see it. Ruins, indeed, we saw on all sides; and fables we heard from every quarter, though under the guise of traditions. Such is the notion of the house of Cleophas; on the site of which a great church was erected: of which a few masses of the thick walls remain, but nothing else."]

II. EMMAUS, a city of Judea, twenty-two miles from Lydda, as the old Itinerary of Palestine witnesses: it was afterwards called Nicopolis, and is different from the Emmaus spoken of by St. Luke and Josephus, which was not eight miles from Jerusalem. Reland proves the difference of these places from Josephus, St. Jerom, the Maccabees, and the Talmudists. Nevertheless, St. Jerom, in Paul's epitaph, has confounded Emmaus, sixty furlongs from Jerusalem, with the other, surnamed Nicopolis. In Emmaus, or Nicopolis, were hot baths, wherein, as tradition reported among the inhabitants, our Lord washed his feet, and communicated a healing virtue to them. Julian the apostate, out of hatred to Jesus Christ, gave orders to stop up this fountain. Some have thought that Zachary and Elisabeth dwelt here. These two Emmaus's are almost perpetually confounded by authors.

III. EMMAUS, a town near Tiberias, where also were were hot waters. Joseph. de Bello, lib. iv. cap. 1. [On the lake of Gennesareth; the "warm mineral baths" are still much frequented, says Dr. E. D. Clarke. Trav. Vol. II. p. 463.]

EN, עַן ain, or gnain, or ein, or ean, or ain, or in: signifies a fountain; for which reason we find it compounded with many names of towns and places; en-dor, en-gedi, en-eglaim, en-she-mesh, q. the fountain of dor—of gedi, &c.

ENABRIS, a place between Scythopolis and Tiberias. Joseph. de Bello, lib. vi. cap. 6.

ENAIM, עֵינַי 'Enaim, the two fountains, or the two eyes; from עַן hain, a fountain, or eye.

ENAIM, a town of Judah, Josh. xv. 34. perhaps mentioned, Gen. xxxviii. 14. where the Vulgate reads, that Tamar sat in a place where two ways met—sedit in bivio: Heb. she sat at Enaim; עֵינַי תָּשַׁב בְּפֶתַח עֵינַי: LXX. She sat at Enan by the way. English translation, She sat in an open place which is by the way. Others think Enan, or Enaim, signifies a fountain or well; which is most probable. [Perhaps even, this might be translated, "the two wells," or "the double well," a very likely place of rendezvous.]

ENAN, עָנָן, clouds, tricks, auguries; from עָנָן honen; or, their fountain, or eye; from עַן ain, and עַן an, their. [great fountain.]

I. ENAN, father of Ahira of Naphtali, Num. i. 15. Head of his tribe in the time of Moses.

II. ENAN, or Enon, the same probably as Enna, or Inna. Ezekiel speaks of Enan, chap. xlviii. 1. or Hazar-Enan, as of a town well known, the northern boundary of the land. Moses (Numb. xxxiv. 9.) speaks of Hazar-Enan. This may be Gaana, north of Damascus, or Ina, mentioned by Ptolemy, or Aennos in Peutinger's tables, south of Damascus. Possibly likewise the En-hazor of Naphtali. Josh. xix. 37.

ENCENAI, 'Εγκαίνα. A Greek word, renovation, or dedication; from κανός, new. This is translated, feast of dedication, John x. 22.

END. Several Psalms have this introduction, In finem, Psalmus David. See LAMNASEACH.

ENDOR, עֵין דּוֹר, fountain, or eye of generation, or of habitation: from עַן ain, fountain, or eye, and דּוֹר dor or dur, generation. [Fountain of Dor: i. e. of the town Dor; rather, the circular well, or fountain: written En-Dar, Psal. lxxxiii. 10.]

ENDOR, or ENDOR, a city of Manasseh, Josh. xvii. 11. Eusebius places it four miles south from mount Tabor, near Naïm, in the way to Scythopolis. Here the witch lived whom Saul consulted. 1 Sam. xxviii. 12.

ENEAS, Ἀνείας. See ÆNEAS.

ENEAS, a man of Lydda, who had lost the use of his limbs: cured by St. Peter, Acts ix. 34.

PART XL. Edit. IV.

EN-EGLAIM, עֵין עֵגְלַי 'En 'Aglaim, the fountain, or the eye of the calves, or of the chariots, or of roundness; from עַן ain, an eye, or fountain, and עֵגְלַי hagolim, round things, or wheels, or chariots; or from עֵגְלָה heglah, an ox.

EN-EGLAIM. Ezekiel, xlvii. 10. speaks of this place in opposition to En-gedi: The fishers shall stand upon it from En-gedi, even to En-eglaim: they shall be a place to spread forth nets. St. Jerom says, En-eglaim is at the beginning of the Dead Sea, where the Jordan enters it.

ENGANNA. St. Jerom mentions a town of this name towards Gerasa beyond Jordan.

ENGANNIM, עֵין גַּן, in the Vulgate Engannim. The fountain, or eye of the gardens; from עַן ain, an eye, or fountain, and גַּן, gan, a garden.

I. ENGANNIM, a city in the plain belonging to Judah, Josh. xv. 34.

II. ENGANNIM, a city of Issachar; given to the Levites of Gershom's family, Josh. xix. 21. xx. 29.

ENGASTRIMUTHI, Ἐγκαστρίμουθι, they that speak out of their belly; from the preposition ἐν, in, γαστήρ, a belly, and μῦθος, speech. Vide PYTHON.

EN-GEDI, עֵין גֵּדִי, fountain, or eye of the goat, or of happiness; from עַן ain, a fountain, or eye, and גֵּדִי gedi, a goat.

EN-GEDI, or Hazazon-Tamar, i. e. the palm-tree city, there being a great quantity of palm-trees around it. It abounded with Cyprus vines, and trees that bore palm: the vineyards of Engedi, Cant. i. 14. This city stood near the lake of Sodom, 300 furlongs from Jerusalem, not far from Jericho, and the mouth of the river Jordan. In some cave of the wilderness of Engedi, David had an opportunity of killing Saul, who was then in pursuit of him. 1 Sam. xxiv.

EN-HADDAH, עֵין חֲדָדָה 'Annadā fountain, or eye, sharp, fine, subtle; from עַן ain, an eye, or fountain, and חֲדָד, chadad, or חָדָד chad, sharpened, whetted; [swift?] or joyful; from חֲדָדָה chadah: otherwise, fountain, or eye of the point, or of joy. Eusebius mentions a place of this name between Eleutheropolis and Jerusalem, ten miles from Eleutheropolis. En-haddah of Issachar is mentioned, Josh. xix. 21.

EN-HAZOR, עֵין חֲצָרָה 'Asar, fountain, or eye of the court, or of the habitation; from עַן ain, an eye, or fountain, and חֲצָרָה chatzar, a court, or passage; or the hay or grass of the fountain; from חֲצָרָה chatzir. The LXX. read, the fountain of Asor.

EN-HAZOR, a city of Naphtali, Josh. xix. 37. Whether this is the Atrium Ennon, or Hazar-enan of Ezekiel, (xlvii. 17. xlviii. 1.) and of Moses, (Numb. xxiv. 9.) is a question not easily answered.

EN-MISHPAT, עֵינַן-מִשְׁפָּט, fountain of judgment. Moses says, (Gen. xiv. 7.) king Chedorlaomer, &c. having traversed the wilderness of Paran came to the fountain of Mishpat, otherwise Kadesh. Mishpat in this place is written differently from Mizpat, (which is noticed in its place) and signifies judgment. It had not this name till Moses drew from it the waters of strife; and till God had exercised his judgments on Moses and Aaron. Numb. xx. 13. xxvii. 14.

ENOCH, עֲנוֹךְ, dedicated, [i. e. to God] or disciplined and well regulated; from עָנָה chanah.

I. ENOCH, son of Cain, Gen. iv. 17. The first city noticed in Scripture was called by Cain Enoch, or Enochia, in honour of his eldest son. It was east of Eden. Its name is, perhaps, preserved in Hanuchta, which Ptolemy places in the Susiana. The spurious Berosus, and Adrichomius after him, place the city Enochia, built by Cain, east of Libanus, towards Damascus.

II. ENOCH, son of Jared, born A. M. 622, ante A. D. 3382. He begat Methuselah at the age of sixty-five. He walked with God; and after he had lived three hundred and sixty-five years, he was not, for God took him. Some construe these words as importing, that Enoch died a natural, but untimely death; because, in fact, he did not live near so long as other patriarchs of those times. But the generality of the Fathers and commentators assert, that God transported him beyond the sight of men; as he long afterwards took up Elijah in a fiery chariot. St. Paul says, (Heb. xi. 5.) By faith Enoch was translated, that he should not see death, and was not found because God had translated him. And Jesus the son of Sirach says, according to the Vulgate, that he was translated to Paradise, (Eccles. xlv. 16.) which we are to understand of the terrestrial Paradise. The word Paradise is not in the Greek. St. Jerom understands heaven by it.

Jude (14, 15.) cites a passage from the book of Enoch, which has very much exercised interpreters. The question is, whether the apostle took this passage from any book written by Enoch, which might be extant in his time? or, whether he received it by tradition, or by revelation? It is most probable, he read it in a book attributed to Enoch, which, though apocryphal, might contain several truths; among others, this might be one, which St. Jude, being favoured with a supernatural degree of discrimination, might use to purposes of instruction.

Justin, Athenagoras, Irenæus, Clemens Alexandrinus, Lactantius, and others, borrowed an opinion out of this book of Enoch, that the angels had commerce with the daughters of men, of whom they begat children. Tertullian speaks of this work in several places with esteem. He would persuade us, that it was preserved by Noah during the Deluge. Notwithstanding this, the Church has rejected this book; Origen, Jerom, and Austin, mention it as of no authority.

[Specimens of this book have been brought into Europe from Abyssinia by Mr. Bruce and others, and translations of parts of it have been published. It should seem to be founded, as to its historical tenor, on the Mosaic history of the antediluvians, and the judgments that might naturally be expected to follow such enormous wickednesses, violences, rapines, audacities, and gluttonies, as were then practiced by the giants, or people in power. The lower classes are represented in it, as being extremely oppressed and ill treated; and, perhaps, the intention of the author was to inculcate on the great, lessons of humanity towards their inferiors; enforced by the instance of punishment inflicted by the Deluge on criminals of the highest rank, and the greatest power.]

The Eastern people have preserved several very uncertain traditions relating to Enoch, whom they call Edris. As,—that Enoch received from God the gift of wisdom and knowledge in an eminent degree;—that God sent him thirty volumes from heaven, filled with secrets of the most mysterious sciences; for which reason, the books of Enoch are so celebrated in the East, though known only by their reputation. Beside these, he himself composed a good number, which are no more known than the former.

They attribute to him the invention of the pen and of the needle, i. e. of writing and sewing; of astronomy and arithmetic, and particularly of geomancy.

Moreover, it is said, that Edris, or Enoch, was the innocent cause, or occasion, of idolatry; one of his friends, afflicted at his removal from earth, having, at the instigation of the devil, formed a statue which represented him so naturally, that he conversed whole days with it, and paid particular honours to it, which gradually degenerated into superstition. Some say Enoch had a son named Sabi, whom the Sabians of the East maintain was the author of their sect.

The Heathen seem to have had some knowledge of Enoch, and of his prediction of the Deluge. Stephens, the geographer, calls him Anacus, and says, he lived in the city of Iconium in Phrygia. It had been foretold by some oracle, that the world should perish after the death of Anac. He died at above 100 years of age, and the Phrygians shewed such sorrow on occasion of his death, that it became a proverb; and to lament Anac, signified a more than common mourning: Deucalion's deluge followed very soon. Eusebius (Præp. lib. ix.) from Eupolemus, tells us, that the Babylonians acknowledged Enoch as the first inventor of astrology; that he is the Atlas of the Greeks; that Methuselah was his son, and that he received all his uncommon knowledge by the ministry of an angel.

III. ENOCH, son of Midian, and grandson of Abraham and Keturah, Gen. xxv. 4.

IV. ENOCH, eldest son of Reuben; founder of a family, Gen. xlv. 9.

ENON, עֵינוֹן, 'Awan, cloud or mass of darkness, or his fountain, or his eye.

ENON, where John baptized, because there was abundance of water there, (John iii. 23) was eight miles from Scythopolis, south, between Shalim and Jordan.

ENOS, אֵנוֹשׁ, mortal man, sick, despaired of, forgetful.

ENOS, son of Seth, and father of Cainan. Born A. M. 235, ante A. D. 3769. He died aged 905 years, A. M. 1140, ante A. D. 2864.

Moses tells us, That Enos began to call on the name of the Lord; i. e. he was the inventor of religious rites and ceremonies in worship. (Others translate, Then began men to call on the name of the Lord.) Enos formed the public and external manner of honouring God. This worship was preserved in the family of Enos, while the family of Cain involved itself in irregularities and impieties.

Several Jews translate thus, Then began men to profane the name of the Lord, q. by calling on creatures and idols. This passage may likewise be translated, Then began men to call themselves by the name of the Lord. Good men, to distinguish themselves from the wicked, began to take the name of sons, or servants, of God; for which reason Moses, (Gen. vi. 1, 2,) says, that the sons of God, i. e. the descendants of Enos, seeing the daughters of men, &c.

The Eastern people make the following additions to his history: That Seth his father declared him sovereign prince and high-priest of mankind, next after himself; that Enos was the first who ordained public alms for the poor, established public tribunals for the administration of justice, and planted, or rather cultivated, the palm-tree.

EN-ROGEL, עֵין רֹגֵל, the fuller's fountain; or the fountain of Rogel; the same as the fountain of Siloam, east of Jerusalem, at the foot of mount Sion. Vide the MAP of JERUSALEM.

EN-SHEMESH, עֵין שֶׁמֶשׁ, שֶׁמֶשׁ, fountain, or eye of the sun; from עַן, ain, a fountain, or eye, and שֶׁמֶשׁ, shemesh, the sun.

EN-SHEMESH, on the frontiers of Judah and Benjamin. Whether this be a town or a fountain, is a question, Josh. xv. 7.

The Arabians give this name to the ancient metropolis of Egypt, which the Hebrews called On, and the Greeks Helopolis.

[ENSIGN, a military token or signal to be followed, a standard. Vide ARMOUR, FRAGMENT, No. CCXVIII. PLATE I. The ancient Jewish ensigns were long poles, at the end of which were a kind of chaffing-dishes made of iron bars: these held a fire, the light, shape, &c. of which, denoted the party they belonged to. Vide A1, ad fin. God says he would lift up an ensign, Isaiah v. 26. Christ was an "ensign to the Gentiles; to him the Gentiles should repair," Isaiah, xi. 10. The brazen serpent was lifted up on an ensign pole, and to this Christ compares his own "lifting up," John iii. 14. in consequence of which, says he, "I will draw all men to me," as men follow an ensign, John xii. 32.]

[ENVY, a malignant disposition, or state of mind, which grudges at the welfare of others, and would willingly deprive them of their advantages. Rachel envied the fertility of Leah, Gen. xxx. 1. Joseph was envied by his brethren. Gen. xxxvii. 11. Envy slayeth the silly, Job v. 2. is rottenness to the bones, Prov. xiv. 30. in short, it defiles, destroys, pines away, consumes both soul and body; and is the very characteristic of Satan, through whose envy of human happiness death entered the world.]

EPAPHRAS, Ἐπαφρᾶς, covered with foam. [Some have supposed that Epaphras is an abridged form of writing Epaphroditus; and that these two names denote the same person. Are any marks of abridgment in the MSS. ?]

EPAPHRAS was, it is believed, the first bishop of Colosse. He was converted by St. Paul, and contributed much to convert his fellow-citizens. He came to Rome while St. Paul was there in bonds, and was imprisoned with that apostle. Having understood that false teachers, taking advantage of his absence, had sown tares among the wheat in his church, he engaged St. Paul, whose name and authority were revered throughout Phrygia, to write to the Colossians, to correct them. St. Paul calls Epaphras, his dear fellow-servant, and a faithful minister of Christ, Col. i. 7. The festival of Epaphras is set down in the calendars July 19, and they say he suffered martyrdom at Colosse.

EPAPHRODITUS, Ἐπαφροδίτης, agreeable, handsome; from Ἀφροδίτη, Venus.

EPAPHRODITUS, bishop, or, as St. Paul calls him, apostle, of Philippi; or, if we take the word apostolus literally, messenger of the Philippians, being sent by that church, in their name, to carry money to the apostle, then in bonds; and to do him service. A. D. 61. This commission he executed with zeal, and exposed himself to great risks, whereby he brought on himself a dangerous illness, which obliged him to remain long at Rome. The year following, A. D. 62, he returned with haste to Philippi, having heard that the Philippians, on receiving information of his sickness, were very much afflicted. St. Paul sent a letter to them by him. Philip. iv. 18.

The Greeks observe his festival, December 8 or 9; also March 29 and 30. They style him apostle, one of the seventy disciples, and bishop of Adriana or Andraca. A discourse, whereof Metaphrastes is said to be the author, informs us, that St. Peter ordained Epaphroditus bishop of Terracina, but does not say whether this be the Epaphroditus, whom St. Paul mentions. The Roman kalendar places the festival of Epaphroditus, bishop of Terracina, March 22.

EPENETUS, Ἐπεινός, laudable, worthy of praise. Rom. xvi. 5.

EPENETUS, St. Paul's disciple, probably one of the first he converted in Asia, the first fruits of Asia; in the Greek, first fruits of Achaia. Chrysostom, homil. 31, in Rom. p. 388. and Theodoret, in Rom. p. 115. read in the same manner; and the English version agrees with them. The Greeks observe his festival, July 30, with Crescens and Andronicus; and say, they all died in peace; having preached the faith in several places. Dorotheus makes Epenetus bishop of Carthage.

EPHAH, עֵפָה, weary, tired; from עָפָה aiaph: otherwise, to fly in the air as a bird; from עָפָה ouph, to fly.

I. EPHAH, eldest son of Midian; dwelt in Arabia Petræa. He gave name to the city Ephah, by the LXX. called Gapha, or Gephar, because they frequently pronounce the letter hain γ like a g γ. Ephah, and the small extent of land around it, made part of Midian on the eastern shore of the Dead Sea, very different from another country of this name on the Red Sea. Ptolemy speaks of a town called Ippos on the eastern coast of the Dead Sea, a little below Modian or Midian. The countries of Midian and Ephah abounded in dromedaries and camels. Judges vi. 5. Isaiah lx. 6.

II. EPHAH, son of Jahdia, 1 Chron. ii. 47.

III. EPHAH, Caleb's concubine, mother of Harar, Moza, and Gazez, 1 Chron. ii. 46.

EPHA, or EPHI, a measure of capacity used among the Hebrews: it contained three pecks and three pints.

Epha was a measure of things dry; as of barley, Ruth ii. 17, of meal, Numb. v. 15. Judg. vi. 19. and was of the same capacity with the bath in liquids. It contained three sata or seaks. The Chaldaic paraphrase renders the ephah three seaks; the ancient Italic version three modii, Ruth ii. 17. Josephus, Antiq. lib. ii. cap. 2, makes the seah equal to $1\frac{1}{2}$ of the Italic modius, the sesquimodius containing 24 sextarii, which multiplied by 3, makes 72, the measure of the ephah assigned by him. The LXX. render ephah variously: sometimes retaining the word itself, Οἶφει or Οἶφι, Levit. v. Numb. xv. xviii. Judg. vi. Ruth ii. 1 Sam. i. xxv. Sometimes using the word πέμμα, Ezek. xlv. The Latin version, also, has variously translated ephah: as by ephi, a corruption of ephah; and by modius, Lev. xix. and sometimes it is rendered three modii, Isa. v. Ruth ii. Sometimes it is confounded with satum or seah: it is rendered amphora by the old version, Zechar. v. Arbuthnot's Tables of ancient Coins, Weights and Measures, &c. p. 101.

EPHAI, עֵפָה אֵי, who is weary; from עָפָה jaaph: or that flies; from עָפָה ouph, a bird: according to the Syriac, that is plaited or interwoven: or a leaf. [The Ketib has עֵפָה]

EPHAI. Jeremiah xl. 10, speaks of his sons.

EPHER, עֶפֶר, Ἐφεῖρ, in the Vulgate Opher, dust: otherwise, a fawn, or lead; from עֶפֶר opheret.

I. EPHER, second son of Midian, a brother of Ephah, 1 Chron. i. 33. He dwelt beyond Jordan, 1 Kings iv. 10. Epher might people the isle of Upher in the Red Sea, or the city of Orpha, in the Diarbeecr. St. Jerom cites Alexander Polyhistor and Cleodemus, surnamed Malec, who affirm, that Ephir made an incursion into Libya, conquered it, and called it Africa. Hercules is said to have accompanied him.

II. EPHER, son of Ezra, 1 Chron. iv. 17.

III. EPHER, of Manasseh, 1 Chron. v. 24.

EPHESUS, Ἐφεσός, desire, desirable.

EPHESUS, a celebrated city of Ionia in Asia Minor: principally famous for its temple of Diana; the magnificence of which attracted an infinite resort of strangers. It was one of the seven wonders of the world; in length 425 feet, in breadth 220. It had a hundred and twenty-seven pillars, presented by so many kings. All the provinces of Asia contributed to the expences of this building, and two hundred years were employed on it.

The first time of St. Paul's coming to Ephesus, was A. D. 54. (Acts xviii. 19, 22.) He abode there but a few days, and went to Jerusalem. He promised the Jews of Ephesus to return thither; which he did some months after, and continued there three years, till A. D. 57, when he was obliged to leave the city on occasion of a sedition, raised by Demetrius the silversmith. From hence St. Paul wrote his first epistle to the Corinthians.

The Ephesians were addicted to the study of curious curious arts, to magic, sorcery, and judicial astrology. Ephesian letters, Ephesia grammata, became a proverbial expression for magic characters. Certain Jews who assumed authority to exorcise persons possessed with the devil, were ill treated by one of the possessed, which terrifying several persons addicted to curious arts, they publicly burnt their books relating to such subjects, although of very considerable value. Acts xix. 14, &c.

The apostle, in his last journey to Rome, took Ephesus in his way, A. D. 65. While he was prisoner at Rome, he wrote to the Ephesians a letter very pathetic, elevated, and sublime. He died the next year.

Aquila and Priscilla, with whom St. Paul had lodged at Corinth, came from thence with him to Ephesus, and made some stay there: Acts xviii. 2, 3, 18. Apollos, likewise, a Jew of Alexandria, came hither and preached. The apostle John passed a great part of his life here, and died here. The Blessed Virgin died also and was buried here, according to the council of Ephesus, who notice, that her tomb was to be seen here; and that the cathedral was dedicated by her name. Concil. lib. iii. p. 574, & p. 1525. We are assured, that Mary Magdalene, coming to this city, died here in peace. Photius, Cod. 275. p. 561.

Timothy, St. Paul's disciple, was made first bishop of Ephesus by the apostle, who laid his hands on him; which, however, did not hinder St. John from residing in the same city, and performing apostolic functions. If it be true that Timothy did not die till A. D. 97, it can scarcely be denied, that he was the angel of the church at Ephesus, to whom a reprimand is addressed. Rev. ii. 1—5. See TIMOTHY.

[Stephens the geographer, gives this city the title of Epiphanestate, or "most illustrious:" Pliny styles it the "ornament of Asia." Some suppose it derived its name from an Amazon, by whom it was built: others think it was built by Androcles, son of Codrus king of Athens, chief of the Ionians who settled in Asia.

In Roman times this city was the metropolis of Asia; and of the city then extant Lysimachus was the founder; he having contrived the ruin of the old city, after preparing a new one for the inhabitants. Ephesus was greatly damaged by an earthquake in the reign of Tiberius, who repaired and embellished the city. The posterity of Androcles were styled kings in the time of Strabo, although a new form of government had been long established. They were also allowed to assume the dress and distinctions of royalty. In the war between Mithridates and the Romans, Ephesus took part with the former, and massacred the Romans who dwelt in it. Sylla severely punished this cruelty; but, afterwards, Ephesus was treated with lenity, and enjoyed its own laws; with other privileges. Ephesus was but a ruinous place, when the emperor Justinian, A. D. 528—566, transported its statues to Constantinople, and employed its columns in the construction of Sancta Sophia. About the end of the eleventh century it was seized by a Turkish pirate, named Tangripermes; but he was routed by John Ducas, the Greek admiral, in a bloody battle. In 1306, it suffered from the exactions of the Grand Duke Roger, and two years afterwards it surrendered to Sultan Saysan, who removed the inhabitants to Tyroëum, where they were massacred. Tyroëum was a considerable town about twenty miles from Ephesus.

Ephesus was exposed to the ravages of the Mahometans, by whom it was taken more than once. Theodorus Lascarus, a Greek, made himself master of it in 1206. The Mahometans recovered it after 1283. Tamerlane, after the battle of Angora, A. D. 1401, commanded the lesser princes of Anatolia to join him at Ephesus; and employed a whole month in plundering the city and its adjacencies. Daccas says, that the gold, silver, jewels, and even the clothes of the inhabitants were carried off. Shortly after the city was set fire to, and mostly burnt, in a combat between the Turkish governor and the Tartars. Mahomet I. 1405—22, took Ephesus, since which it has continued in the possession of the Turks.

Dr. Chandler says, "the inhabitants are a few Greek peasants, living in extreme wretchedness, dependance, and insensibility; the representatives of an illustrious people, and inhabiting the wreck of their greatness; some, the substructions of the glorious edifices which they raised; some beneath the vaults of the stadium, once the crowded scene of their diversions; and some by the abrupt precipice, in the sepulchres which received their ashes. . . . Its streets are obscured and overgrown. A herd of goats was driven to it for shelter from the sun at noon; and a noisy flight of crows from the quarries seemed to insult its silence. We heard the partridge call in the area of the theatre and the stadium. The glorious pomp of its heathen worship is no longer remembered; and Christianity, which was here nursed by apostles, and fostered by general councils, until it increased to fulness of stature, barely lingers on in an existence hardly visible." Trav. p. 131. Oxford, 1775.

The river Cayster, which formerly received ships, is now small and shallow, hardly practicable for barks.

The ancient Ephesians could boast of little humanity humanity in their composition, as appears by their massacre of the Roman settlers. This might be, however, a mere flash of popular fury.

In the city of Ephesus, those studies which are usually called occult, or conjuration, were in vogue. Plutarch speaks of the Magi, or wise men, of Ephesus, in his life of Alexander: and in his Symposium, he tells us, that the students in the occult sciences, "bade them who were possessed with devils to read and recite the Ephesian letters." In short, the phrase, Ephesian letters, became proverbial for what we should call incantations. I believe we must make the same distinction here as between astronomy and astrology: the study of nature, the properties of plants, minerals, &c. is, when well directed, the basis of the art of healing; as, when ill directed, it becomes the art of poisoning. It is credible, that among the Ephesians, was a number of practitioners, whose arts were not merely delusive but injurious: or, at least, that, by the operations of potions, &c. on the body, they deranged the faculties of the mind, and led astray the fancy and imagination.

The Jews, says Josephus, contra Appion, lib. ii. were very numerous in Ephesus, and had obtained the privilege of citizenship; of course, the Christians, being considered as a sect of Jews, would be pretty secure in this city from persecution by the political powers: as Ephesus was autonomos, governed by its own laws.

The worship of the great goddess Diana was established at Ephesus in a remote age. It is related, that the Amazons sacrificed to her here, on their way to Attica; in the time of Theseus, says Pindar. Some writers affirm, that they first set up her image under an elm tree; or, in a niche, which they formed in the trunk of an elm, says Dionysius the geographer. The statue is said to have been but small; the work, says Pliny, of Canitia, an ancient artist, and witnessing its great antiquity by its attitude and form, having its feet closed together: much like many Egyptian statues still remaining. It was of wood, by some reported to be cedar, by others ebony. Mutianus, consul of Rome, A. D. 75, affirmed, from his own observation, that it was made of vine wood; and its crevices were filled with nard, to nourish and moisten the wood, and to preserve it. It was gorgeously appressed; the vest thrown over it being richly embroidered with symbolical devices. Each hand was supported by a bar; most likely of gold. A veil hanging from the ceiling of the temple concealed it, except when the service required its exposure. It is said, that this statue was never changed, though the temple had been restored seven times.

The populace believed that this idol descended from Jupiter; and if Jupiter were the divinity of Mount Cas, as I suspect, and this statue represented an eastern and southern power, which may be gathered from the darkness (in many remaining statues blackness) of its complexion, from the mode of its introduction, and from its great antiquity, then this notion was not without that kind of foundation which legendary tales assume for their support, and pervert into the character of true history, when favoured by length of time and auspicious incidents. It was, probably, an allegorical representation of the powers and productions of nature, generally; but especially as displayed in the country where the ark of deliverance discharged the creatures it had contained. The priests of this goddess were eunuchs; anciently assisted in their offices by virgins. There were also the sacred herald, the incenser, the flute player, and the trumpeter. The privilege of asylum was granted to this temple, first to the distance of one hundred and twenty-five feet; Mithridates enlarged this extent to a bow-shot; Mark Anthony doubled it. Tiberius abrogated the privilege; it having been grossly abused.

As I think that the following inscription not only confirms the general history, Acts xix. but even approaches to several sentiments and phrases used in it, I copy it verbatim, from Dr. Chandler, Trav. p. 135.

" TO THE EPHESIAN DIANA.

" Inasmuch as it is notorious, that, not only among the Ephesians, but also every where among the Greek nations, temples are consecrated to her, and sacred portions; and that she is set up, and has an altar dedicated to her, on account of her plain manifestations of herself; and that besides, as the greatest token of veneration paid her, a month is called by her name; by us Artemision, by the Macedonians, and other Greek nations, and in their cities, Artemision; in which, general assemblies and Hieromenia are celebrated, but not in the holy city, the nurse of its own, the Ephesian goddess: The people of Ephesus, deeming it proper, that the whole month called after her name be sacred and set apart to the goddess, have determined by this decree, that the observation of it by them be altered. Therefore it is enacted that in the whole month Artemision the days be holy, and that nothing be attended to on them, but the yearly feasting, and the Artemisiac Panegyris, and the Hieromenia; the entire month being sacred to the goddess; for, from this improvement in our worship, our city city shall receive additional lustre, and be permanent in its prosperity for ever.'—The person who obtained this decree, appointed games for the month, augmented the prizes of the contenders, and erected statues of those who conquered. His name is not preserved, but he probably was a Roman, as his kinsman, who provided this record, was named Lucius Phœnius Faustus. The feast of Diana was resorted to yearly by the Ionians, with their families."

This evidence proves, that the disposition to cry "Great is Diana of the Ephesians!" was by no means confined to Demetrius and his fellow-craftsmen: the whole city was guardian, neokoros, to the temple. See the PLATE, DIANA OF EPHEBUS, and FRAGMENT, No. CXXVII.

The phrase, "nurse of her own" goddess, in this decree, refers to a story of the birth of Diana in Ortygia, a beautiful grove of trees of various kinds, chiefly cypresses, near Ephesus, on the coast, a little way from the sea. This place was filled with shrines and images. A panegyris, or general assembly, was held there annually: splendid entertainments were provided, and mystic sacrifices solemnized. This place, with its embellishments, appears no more.

The extreme sanctity of the temple of Diana, inspired universal awe and reverence. It was, for many ages, a repository of treasures foreign and domestic. This property was deemed secure: the temple having been spared by Xerxes, who spared scarcely any other: but Nero removed many costly offerings and images, and an immense quantity of silver and gold. It was again plundered in the time of Gallienus, A. D. 262, by Goths from beyond the Danube, who carried off a prodigious booty. The temple was probably destroyed at the same time as other heathen temples were, by an edict of Constantine. But there is a possibility that the total ruin of it was effected by an earthquake; notwithstanding, by way of prevention, it was situated in a marsh. However that might be, "we now," says Dr. Chaudler, "seek in vain for the temple; the city is prostrate, and the goddess is gone."

De la Motraye mentions some circumstances concerning Ephesus, with which we close:

"This renowned city, with the finest temple that ever was, consecrated to Diana, is reduced by the changes it has met with in the wars, and under the different masters it has had, to five or six miserable houses inhabited by Greeks, and about as many by Turks, with a castle for some few of these, a poor church for the first, and a mosque tolerably handsome for the latter, which, as they say, was formerly a church consecrated to St. John; in short, it is nothing but a chaos of noble ruins, which, with some inscriptions and basso relievos, are the only marks of its ancient magnificence.

"I shall not add any thing to what Mr. Spon and so many other travellers have already said of these ruins, only that there are almost nothing remaining, but subterraneous vaults and foundations of hard stone, or (for the most part) of brick, well cemented, upon which the temple was built." Trav. Vol. I. p. 155.

[For the ASIARCHS, or chiefs of Asia, at Ephesus, see the article ASIARCHÆ.]

EPHEZ-DAMMIM. See APHEZ-DAMMIM.

EPHEZ-DAMMIM, DAMMIM, or PHEZ-DAMMIM, in Judah, between Shocoh and Azekah. Here the Philistines encamped, when Goliath insulted Israel. 1 Sam. xvii. 1, 2. Here they assembled another time, after David was acknowledged king: and here Eleazar and Shammah, two heroes in that prince's army, checked the enemies, in the midst of a field of barley, 1 Chr. xi. 13, 14. Some think the true name of this place was Dommim, or Dammim, which signifies blood. The Vulgate reads, in finibus Dommim, 1 Sam. xvii. 1. 1 Chron. xi. 18.

EPHLAI, אֶפְלַי, to judge, to pray; from פָּלַל pelel. Son of Zabab, 1 Chron. ii. 37.

EPHOD, אֶפֶד, Ἐφῶδ, covering the shoulders. Super-humeral, as the Vulgate translates; and the Greeks ἐπὶ ὤμων.

EPHOD, an ornamental part of dress worn by Hebrew priests. Ephod comes from aphad, to tie, to fasten, to gird; and the use of the ephod was suitable to this signification; being a kind of girdle, passing from behind over the neck and shoulders and hanging down before, crossing the stomach, then being carried round the waist, and used as a girdle to the tunic; something like the stole of catholic priests, with this difference, that they suffer the two ends of the stole to hang down, after they have crossed the stomach, whereas the ephod went twice round the body, girt about the tunic, and after this the extremities of it fell before, and hung to the ground.

There were two kinds of ephod, one plain for the priests, another embroidered for the high-priest. As there was nothing singular in that of the priests, Moses does not describe it; but, that belonging to the high-priest, Exod. xxviii. 6, which was composed of gold, blue, purple, crimson, and twisted cotton, was a very rich composition of different colours. On that part of the ephod, which came over the shoulders of the high priest, were two large precious stones, on which were engraven the names of the twelve tribes of Israel, six names on each stone.

Where the ephod crossed the high priest's breast was a square ornament called the pectoral, Heb. חֹשֶׁן choschen, wherein were set twelve twelve precious stones, with the names of the twelve tribes of Israel engraved on them, one on each stone. Lastly, the ephod was carried behind, girt the tunic, and was fastened in a knot before, after the manner of those great girdles worn by the Eastern people, the ends of which touch the ground.

The ephod was peculiar to priests, and St. Jerom observes, that we find no mention of it in the Scripture, but when priests are spoken of.

[In FRAGMENTS, No. CCXXXVI. we have stated some considerations which may render dubious the assertion, that the ephod was peculiar to priests, and worn only by them under that character: the reader will judge on their validity.]

The Jews held, that no worship, true or false, could subsist without the priesthood, or the ephod. Gideon made an ephod out of the spoils of the Midianites, and this became an offence in Israel. Micah having made an idol, did not fail to make an ephod, Judg. viii. 27. xvii. 5. God foretold, by the prophet Hosea, iii. 5. that Israel should long remain without kings, princes, sacrifices, altar, ephod, and teraphim.

The ephod is often taken for the pectoral; and for the Urim and Thummim, also; because these were united to the ephod.

Although the ephod was peculiar to priests, it was sometimes worn by laymen. David wore it at the removal of the ark from the house of Obed-edom to Jerusalem. Samuel, though a Levite only, and a child, yet wore the ephod, 1 Sam. ii. 18.

The Levites regularly did not wear the ephod: Moses appointed nothing particular with relation to their dress. Vide LEVITE. Nevertheless, at the dedication of Solomon's temple, the Levites and singing men, who were not of the priests' order, were clothed in fine linen. Josephus remarks, that in the time of king Agrippa, a little before the taking of Jerusalem by the Romans, the Levites desired that prince to convene the Sanhedrim, in order to allow them the privilege of wearing the linen stole, like the priests. They flattered Agrippa, that this would contribute to the glory of his reign. Agrippa complied; but the historian observes, that this innovation violated the laws of their country, which never had been violated with impunity.

Spencer and Cunæus both affirm, that the Jewish kings had a right to wear the ephod, and to consult the Lord by Urim and Thummim. Their opinion they ground principally on the behaviour of David at Ziklag, who said to Abiathar the high priest, Bring me hither the ephod; and Abiathar brought thither the ephod. (Applica ad me ephod, et applicavit Abiathar ephod ad David.) The sequel favours this opinion, ver. 8. And David enquired at the Lord, saying, Shall I pursue after this troop? shall I overtake them? And he answered him, Pursue; thou shalt recover all. We read likewise, (1 Sam. xxviii. 6.) that Saul consulted the Lord, and that the Lord answered him not, neither by dreams, nor prophets. He consulted God therefore by the Urim, consequently he put on the ephod.

But the generality of learned commentators are of opinion, that neither David, Saul, nor Joshua, dressed themselves in the high priest's ephod, to consult God in their own persons; but, that these passages signify only, "Put on the ephod, and consult the Lord for me;" literally, Bring the ephod to me, and Abiathar caused the ephod to be brought to David. Grotius believes, the high-priest turned the ephod, or pectoral, towards David, that he might see what God should answer to him by the stones on the breastplate. See URIM and THUMMIM.

[Was it the ephod of a high-priest, or of a common priest, which was used by Saul, or by David, on this occasion? Were there at this time two high priest's ephods, having the precious stones with the names of the tribes, &c. engraved on them? By what authority was the second ephod made?]

EPHATHA. A Hebrew, or rather a Syriac word, from פתח pathach, to open, be opened. Our Saviour pronounced this word, when he cured one deaf and dumb. Mark vii. 32, 33.

EPIRA, עפרא, ashes, dust, or lead. A city of Ephraim, Gideon's birth-place. Its true situation is unknown: but it is thought to be the same as Ophrah. Judg. vi. 11.

EPHRAIM, אפרים, *that brings fruit, or that grows; from פרה pharah, [a second fruit.]*

1. EPHRAIM, Joseph's second son, by Asenath, Potiphar's daughter: born in Egypt about A.M. 2294. Ephraim with his brother Manasseh was presented by Joseph his father to the patriarch Jacob on his death bed, Gen. xlviii. 8, &c. Jacob laid his right hand on Ephraim the youngest, and his left hand on Manasseh the eldest. Joseph was desirous to change this situation of his hands; but Jacob answered, "I know what I do, my son; Manasseh shall be multiplied, but Ephraim shall be much more numerous than his brother."

We read, (1 Chron. vii. 20, 21.) that the sons of Ephraim having made an inroad on Palestine, the inhabitants of Gath killed them; Ephraim their father mourned many days for them, and his brethren came to comfort him. Afterwards, he had a son named Beriah, and a daughter named Sherah. He had other sons also, Rephah, Resheph, and Tela. His posterity multiplied in Egypt to the number of 40,500 men men capable of bearing arms. Elishama, son of Ammihud was their captain, Numb. ii. 18, 19.

In the land of promise, Joshua, who was of this tribe, gave the Ephraimites their portion between the Mediterranean west, and the river Jordan east. The ark, and the tabernacle, remained long in this tribe, at Shiloh; and, after the separation of the ten tribes, the seat of the kingdom of Israel being in Ephraim, Ephraim is frequently used to signify that kingdom. Instead of Ephraim, Ephraim is sometimes used. The district belonging to this tribe is called Ephrata, Psalm cxxxii. 6. Lo, we heard of it at Ephratah: and Ephrataeus signifies a man of Ephraim, Judg. xii. 5. Numquid Ephrataeus es? and beside this, Elkanah, Samuel's father, is surnamed Ephrataeus, 1 Sam. i. 1.

Ephrata is used also for Bethlehem; and Ephrataeus denotes a man of Bethlehem. Ephraim was led captive beyond the Euphrates, with all Israel, by Salmaneser king of Assyria, A. M. 3283, ante A. D. 721.

II. EPHRAIM, or Ephraim, a city of Ephraim, towards Jordan; perhaps hither Jesus retired before his passion. John xi. 54.

[This Ephraim was a city in the confines of the land of Ephraim: 2 Chron. xiii. 19. It was famous for fine flour; and its corn was thought to be the second best: the land of Israel. Josephus calls Ephraim. and Bethel two small cities, de Bell. lib. iv. cap. 33. He places this Ephraim not in the tribe of that name, but in the land of Benjamin, near the wilderness of Judea in the way to Jericho.]

III. EPHRAIM, of Benjamin, eight miles from Jerusalem, according to Eusebius, near Bethel. I am afraid these two cities have been confounded; for instead of the eight miles in Eusebius, Jerom reckons twenty.

IV. EPHRAIM, The forest of, beyond Jordan, in which Absalom lost his life, 2 Sam. xviii. 6—8. It could not be far from Mahanaim, where David was at that time.

EPHRATAH, or EPHRATH, אפרתא, אפרת. Ephraim, abundance, or bearing fruit, or increasing. See its root under EPHRAIM.

EPHRATAH, Psalm cxxxii. 6, denotes, the lot of Ephraim. Behold we heard of it at Ephratah. Vide the latter part of the article EPHRAIM.

I. EPHRATH, Caleb's second wife, mother of Hur, 1 Chron. ii. 19. From her, it is believed, the city of Ephratah, otherwise Bethlehem, was named.

II. EPHRATH, otherwise Bethlehem, a city two leagues from Jerusalem; celebrated for the birth of David the king; infinitely more, for the birth of Jesus, the Son of God. Vide BETHLEHEM.

EPHRON, עפרון, or עפרון. See EPHER.

PART XI. Edit. IV.

I. EPHRON, son of Zohar; sold the cave of Machpelah to Abraham, Gen. xxiii. 6.

II. EPHRON, a city beyond Jordan, which Judas Maccabæus took and sacked. By some called Esdrin: but Esdrin, say others, is the name of a man; i. e. Esdras. 1 Macc. v. 46.

EPICUREANS, Ἐπικουρείοι, who give assistance; from ἐπικρέω, I help, I assist.

EPICUREANS, philosophers, who placed happiness in pleasure; not in voluptuousness, and ignominious pleasure, but in sensible pleasures under proper regulation and government. They denied a Divine Providence and the immortality of the soul. St. Paul, at Athens, had discussions with the Epicureans. Acts xvii. 18. They were so named after Epicurus, a philosopher whom they claimed as founder of their sect.

[Epicurus lived about 300 years before A. D. so that, whatever his doctrines were, the time that had elapsed since his death, was sufficient to allow of their debasement; and his later disciples adopted the sensual import of their master's expressions, rather than the spiritual power of his principles. It is well known, that they latterly were called "Epicurus's hogs;" so Horace says of himself, — Epicuri de grege porcum, EPIST. lib. i. 4.

"A hog of Epicurus's herd;"—implying the sloth and sensuality of the sect. Against these debauchees the apostle argues, that Providence governs all the affairs of men, as communities, and as individuals; that the resurrection of one person (Christ) is proof of a separate state; and that, a future judgment to be presided by him, evinces the notice taken by the Deity of virtue and vice, with the ultimate reward and punishment of characters so opposite.]

EPINICIUM, Ἐπινίκιον, the field of victory; 2 Mac. viii. 33. from ἐπὶ, and νίκη, victory.

EPIPHANES, Ἐπιφανής, eminent, conspicuous, or splendid; an epithet given to the gods, when appearing to men. Antiochus, brother of Seleucus, coming fortunately into Syria, a little after the death of his brother, was regarded as some propitious deity; and was called Epiphanes—the illustrious.

We call that festival Epiphany, on which the church celebrates the adoration of the Messiah by the Magi, or wise men, &c.

EPIPHANIA, Ἐπιφάνια, the manifestation.

EPIPHANIA, a city of Syria on the river Orontes, between Antioch and Apamea. Several of the ancients say, it was called Hamath, before Antiochus Epiphanes named it Epiphania. Jerom and others are of opinion, that it is Hamath the Great. He says, that even in his time, the Syrians called Epiphania, Emmas. But, that this was Emesa in Syria, see HAMATH.

[EPISTLE, a letter written from one party to another. This word is eminently applied to those letters in the New Testament which were written by the apostles, on various occasions, to direct the conduct of Christian churches.

It is not to be supposed that every note, or memorandum, written by the hands of the apostles, or by their direction, was divinely inspired, or proper for preservation to distant ages; but, those only have been preserved by the over-ruling hand of Providence, from which useful directions had been drawn, and might in after ages be drawn, by believers, as from a perpetual directory for faith and practice: always supposing that similar circumstances require similar directions.

In reading an epistle, we ought to consider the occasion of it, the circumstances of the parties to whom it was addressed, the time when written, the general scope and design of it, as well as the intention of particular arguments and passages. We ought also to note the style and manner of the writer, his mode of expression, the peculiar effect he designed to produce on those to whom he wrote, to whose temper, manners, general principles, and actual situation, he might address his arguments, &c.

The epistles afford many and most powerful evidences for the truth of Christianity; they appeal to a great number of extraordinary facts; and allude to principles, and opinions, as admitted, or as prevailing, or as opposed, among those to whom they are addressed. They mention a considerable number of persons, describe their situations in life, hint at their connections with the churches, and by sometimes addressing them, sometimes recommending them by name, they connect their testimony with that of the writer of the epistle; and often, no doubt, they gave a proportionate influence to those individuals.

Beside this, it is every way likely, that individuals mentioned in the epistles, would carefully procure copies of these writings, would give them all the authority, and all the notoriety in their power, would communicate them to other churches, and, in short, would become vouchers for their authenticity, &c. &c.

We in the present day, who possess these instructive documents, may learn from them many things for our advantage and for our conduct; how to avoid those evils which formerly injured the professors of true religion; and how to rectify those errors and abuses to which time and incident occasionally give rise, or to whose spread and prevalence, particular occurrences or conjunctures are favourable. Vide BIBLE, CANON, &c.] see the articles of the respective writers; or those of the churches to which they are addressed.

[The Epistles, being placed together without reference to their chronological order, are perused under considerable disadvantages; and it would be well to read them occasionally in connection with what the history in the Acts relates respecting the several churches to which they are addressed. This would also give us, nearly, their order of time; which should also be considered, together with the situation of the writer; as it may naturally be inferred, that such compositions would partake of the writer's recent and present feelings. The Epistles addressed to the dispersed Jews by John and James, by Peter and Jude, are very different in their style and application from those of Paul written to the Gentiles; and those of Paul, no doubt, contain expressions, and allude to facts, much more familiar to their original readers, than to later ages.]

EPOCH, a term in chronology, signifying a fixed point of time, from which to begin computation.

EQUIVOCAL. An equivocal word expresses two or more different things; e. gr. the word father father signifies in its natural acceptance (1.) father, (2.) grandfather, (3.) great-grandfather, (4.) the author of a race, a generation, a family: (5.) likewise the master, the inventor, eminent practitioner in an art, &c. Gen. iv. 21. likewise, one whom we respect: Hiram, king of Tyre, calls father a certain ingenious artificer, whom he sent to Solomon, 2 Chron. ii. 13, &c. The terms brother and sister, in like manner, signify not only natural brother and sister, but also cousins of both sexes, relations, friends, &c. Vide BROTHER.

Our Saviour used words of equivocal meaning when he said, Our friend Lazarus sleepeth, John xi. 11. which his disciples understood of common sleep; but he meant the sleep of death. In another place, John ii. 19. he says, Destroy this temple, and in three days I will rebuild it; by "temple" meaning his body, which was to rise again in three days: whereas the Jews understood his words in reference to the temple at Jerusalem.

Religion condemns all falsehood; but some equivocations deceive no one, and are used without any intention to deceive; others are merely pleasantries, which morality does not forbid, when offending neither charity, sincerity, nor justice.

EK, עק, watch, or enemy, according to different pronunciations; a city, from עיר oir: otherwise, naked, spoiled; from ערה arah. Judah's eldest son, who married Tamar: but being wicked, brought himself to an untimely end, Gen. xxxviii. 7.

ERAN, ערן, 'Ερην, their watch, or their enemy; from ער ar, watch, or har, an enemy, and י an, theirs. Son of Shuthelah of Ephraim, head of the Eranites, Numb. xxvi. 36.

ERASTUS, Ἐραστός, lovely, or amiable.

ERASTUS, a Corinthian, St. Paul's disciple, Rom. xvi. 23, chamberlain of the city, Οικονόμος, i. e. of Corinth, where St. Paul was at that time; but of Jerusalem according to the modern Greeks. Erastus resigned his employment of chamberlain, and followed St. Paul to Ephesus, where he was A. D. 56, whence St. Paul sent him to Macedonia with Timothy, probably to collect alms expected from the faithful. They were both with him at Corinth, A. D. 58, when he wrote his epistle to the Romans, whom he salutes in both their names; and it is probable, Erastus afterwards accompanied the apostle till his last voyage to Corinth in the way to Rome, where he suffered martyrdom: for then Erastus remained at Corinth, as St. Paul informs Timothy shortly after.

Usuard, Ado, and the Roman martyrology, say, that St. Paul left Erastus in Macedonia, and made him bishop there: and that he suffered martyrdom at Philippi. The Greeks, on the contrary, in their calendars, make him bishop of Paneas, near the sources of the Jordan, give him the title of apostle, place him in the number of the seventy disciples, and say he died in peace, after having gone over all the earth preaching the faith of Jesus Christ. But neither of these produce proof of what they affirm. The Latins honour him July 26, the Greeks November 10. [They may mean different persons: the name is certainly Greek, not Hebrew.]

ERECII, or ARACH, ארך, Ἀρεκ; length, or which lengthens; [long-town, Bochart, Phaleg. lib. iv. cap. 16.] otherwise, health, physic; from ארכה arecha.

ERECI, a city of Chaldæa, built by Nimrod, grandson of Cush, Gen. x. 10. probably the Aracca, placed by Ptolemy in the Susiana, on the river Tigris, below where it joins the Euphrates. Ammianus calls it Arecha. From this city the Arectæan fields, which abound with Naphtha, and sometimes take fire, derive their name:

Ardet Arectæus aut unda per hospita campis.

TIBULL.

[Michaelis labours hard to prove that the Erech of Gen. x. 10, a city built by Nimrod, was Edessa, the present Orfa, or Roha.

I have considered Erech as nearer to Babylon; but shall state the reasons of that inquisitive writer for the contrary. He observes that both the Targums for Erech read Edessa.—Ephraim Syrus says Oroch, (i. e. Erech) is Edessa: Jerom says the same; and, finally, the Edessenes are said to call themselves Arachians, or Orochians. So far Michaelis. We may add, that Edessa is one of the most ancient cities: that its commemorative insignia agree with those of Haran, or Carrhæ, and Singara, which probably gave name to, or received name from, the plain of Shinar, or Singar, in which these cities are described as standing; therefore no objection to Edessa in point of antiquity; but I do not see any probable transmutation of its name, either proved or proposed: whereas the Areka of Ptolemy, in the Susiana, south of Babylon, has the sound of the Hebrew name completely.

It is probable, that Erech was famous for the excellence of its productions by the loom; and possibly, the fable of Arachne transformed into a spider by Minerva, the goddess of weaving, for contending with her in the art, was founded on the fame of some manufacture of that city. The reader will find in several of the FRAGMENTS, remarks coincident with this idea; which, as the term aregmen, in the sense of a species of weaving, occurs so early as the Mosaic tabernacle, may be thought not inapplicable eable to the story of Achan, and the "goodly Babylonish garment," which he purloined.]

ERI, עֵר אֶחָדָה, he that watches, who is spoiled, or who sheds; see ER: my city; from עֵר oir, a city; and י, my. Son of Gad, head of a family. Gen. xlii. 16. Numb. xxvi. 16.

ESAR-HADDON, אֶסְרָחַדְדָּן, Asrapadav, that binds joy, or that closes the point; from אֶסְרָח asar, to bind, and חַדָּד chadad, to sharpen or whet; or from חָדָד chadah, joy: according to the Syriac, who forbids novelty, or unity. [Rather, most powerful sovereign.]

ESAR-HADDON, son of Sennacherib, and his successor in the kingdom of Assyria: called Sargon, or Saragon, Isaiah xx. 1. He reigned twenty-nine years. He made war with the Philistines, and took Azoth, by Tartan his general; he attacked Egypt, Cush, and Edom, Isa. xx. xxxiv. designing probably to avenge the affront Sennacherib his father had received from Tirhakah king of Cush, and the king of Egypt, who had been Hezekiah's confederates. This Esar-haddon sent priests to the Cuthmeans, whom Salmaneser king of Assyria had planted in Samaria, instead of the Israelites; he took Jerusalem, and carried king Manasseh to Babylon, whereof he had become master, perhaps, because there was no heir to Belesis king of Babylon. He is said to have reigned 29 or 30 years at Nineveh, and thirteen years at Babylon; in all forty-two years. He died A. M. 3336, and was succeeded by Saosduchinus.

ESAU, עֵשָׂו, he that does, or acts, or finishes; from עָשָׂה ashah.

ESAU, son of Isaac and Rebekah, born A. M. 2168, ante A. D. 1836. When the time of Rebekah's delivery came, she had twins, Gen. xxv. 24—26; the first-born was hairy; therefore called Esau, i. e. a man full grown, or of perfect age: but some derive Esau from the Arabic, Gescha or Gescheva, which signifies a hair-cloth. The other twin was Jacob.

Esau delighted in hunting, and his father Isaac had a particular affection for him. One day, Esau returning from the fields, greatly fatigued, desired Jacob to give him some red pottage, which he was then making. Jacob consented, provided he would sell him his birth-right. Esau, conceiving himself weakened almost to death, sold it; and by oath resigned it to him. After which he ate his mess, and went away, little concerned.

Esau, when aged forty, married two Canaanitish women; Judith, daughter of Beeri the Hittite; and Bashimath, daughter of Elon. These marriages were very displeasing to Isaac and Rebekah: [because they intermingled the blood of Abraham with that of Canaanite aliens; consequently, the offspring was mixed.]

Isaac being old, and his sight decayed, he directed Esau to procure him delicate venison by hunting; that, being exhilarated, he might give him his last blessing, Gen. xxvii. Esau went to the chase, but during his absence, Jacob, his twin brother, disguised by their mother Rebekah, procured Isaac's blessing. When Esau returned to Isaac, having learned from him what had passed, he, weeping, asked him, whether he had not reserved one blessing for him? This he, with some difficulty, obtained.

Esau hereupon contracted an aversion against Jacob, and determined to murder him: but Rebekah sent Jacob to his uncle Laban in Mesopotamia, without Esau's knowledge. Esau married several wives, as well Canaanites as the daughter of Ishmael, sister of Nebajoth, by whom he had children. He settled in the mountains east of Jordan, and became very powerful.

When Jacob returned from Mesopotamia, fearing Esau's resentment, he sent messengers to him with presents, as to his senior. Esau received them kindly, and came with four hundred men to meet Jacob, who at first feared he was coming in anger; but Esau came with peaceable intentions, and the two brothers embraced one another tenderly. Esau offered to accompany his brother over the Jordan; Jacob thanked him, but declined his offer; and Esau returned the same day to Seir. The two brothers were present when their father died; being both very rich in cattle, and the country not affording pasture for all their flocks, they separated; Esau retired to mount Seir.

Esau had three wives: the first Judith, or Abolibamah; the second, Bashemath, or Adah; the third Mahelath, or Bashemath. Judith was mother of Jeush, Jaalam, and Korah; Adah was mother of Eliphaz; and Mahelath was mother of Reuel. We know nothing certain concerning the death of Esau. King Erythros, (Strabo, lib. xvi. Quintus Curtius, lib. x. Pliny, lib. vi. cap. 18.) from whom the Red Sea is said to have been named, and whose tomb was shewn in the isle of Tyrina or Aggris, is believed to be Edom. Erythros in Greek signifies red, and Edom signifies red in Hebrew.

The Mahometans call him Ais, Bibl. Orient. p. 80. and add some particulars to his history: as, that Jacob having by surprise obtained the blessing from Isaac, Esau desired his father to beg of God, to produce kings and conquerors from his family, since he had prayed for Jacob, that saints and prophets should issue from him: this Isaac would not refuse; and God gave Esau a son, named Roum; from whom descended the Greek and Roman emperors.

It is a tradition in the East, that in the time of Abdon, judge of the Hebrews, a colony of Edomites

Edomites settled in Italy, that Latinus reigned among them, and Romulus the founder of Rome, derived his origin from them. This is all a fable, maliciously invented by the Jews, to enable them to apply what is said in Scripture against Edom and the Edomites, to Christians, and even to the sacred person of Jesus Christ.

The most famous Rabbins obstinately maintain this tradition. The Talmud calls Italy and Rome, The cruel empire of Edom. The Jews assert, that the Edomites, having embraced Christianity under Constantine, got to Rome, and into the Roman empire; others say, that an Idumean priest brought Christianity to Rome. Some of the Cabbalists have the impiety to say, that the soul of Esau passed by transmigration into the body of Jesus Christ; to prove which opinion, they remark, that if we read the Hebrew letters backwards which compose the names of Jesus and Esau, we shall find they are the same [ישוע Jesuah, עשו Esau.] Moreover, they are born under the same planet, Mars. Edom signifies red; the Roman emperors were clothed in red; and the Roman cardinals still wear red. Convincing reasons indeed!

ESDRAELON, "עֲזְרָאֵלֹן, assistance of strength; from עָזַר azar, to assist, and אוֹל aul, or ul, strength.

I. ESDRAELON, the plain of, in the tribe of Issachar, extends east and west from Scythopolis to mount Carmel: called likewise the great plain; the valley of Jezreel; the plain of Esdrela.

II. ESDRAELON, or Esdrela, a village, from which the plain of Esdraelon took name: the same as Jezreel in Issachar, Josh. xix. 18. Ten miles from Scythopolis, says the old Itinerary. See JEZREEL.

ESDRAS, or EZRA, עֲזָרָה the aid, help; from עָזַר hazar, to help: otherwise, court; from עֲזָרָה hazeruh.

ESDRAS, or EZRA, was of a sacerdotal family: by some said to be son of Jeraiah the high-priest, who was put to death at Riblatha by Nebuchadnezzar, after the capture of Jerusalem: but more probably his grandson, or great-grandson. It is believed, the first return of Ezra from Babylon to Jerusalem was with Zerobabel, in the beginning of Cyrus's reign, A. M. 3468, ante 536, of which Esdras wrote the history. He was very skilful in the law, and zealous for God's service; he had doubtless a great share in all the transactions of his time.

The enemies of the Jews procured from the court of Persia, an order forbidding them to continue the rebuilding of the temple, which they had resumed after the death of Cyrus and Cambyses: but this order being revoked in the beginning of the reign of Darius, son of Hystaspes, A. M. 3485, they proceeded, and dedicated the temple in 3489, ante A. D. 515.

Esdras, notwithstanding, returned to Babylon, on some affairs, probably of his nation; and in the seventh year of Artaxerxes Longimanus, A. M. 3537, ante A. D. 467, this prince sent him back to Jerusalem, with letters patent, permitting all Israelites in his kingdom to return to Judea, with all their gold and silver, the vessels of the temple, also offerings of the king and his counsellors to buy victims for sacrifice. Artaxerxes commanded his treasurers in the provinces beyond the Euphrates to furnish Esdras with corn, wine, oil, salt, or money: he granted immunities to the priests and ministers of the temple; and authorized Esdras to appoint judges and magistrates, and to govern and instruct those who returned to Jerusalem.

Esdras assembled a great company of Israelites, and set forward for Jerusalem. Ezra viii. At the banks of the river Abava, he sent to invite certain priests and ministers of the temple, who were at Casiphia, (probably, in the Caspian mountains) to return with him; 258 persons came to him. He appointed a solemn day to pray to God for a happy journey. He gave an account of the gold and silver vessels which the king had restored. They proceeded on their journey, in number 1775 men, and all arrived happily in Judea. A. M. 3537, ante A. D. 467.

Esdras being informed that both priests and Levites, magistrates and common people, had married wives who were strangers and idolaters, he rent his clothes, and having taken his seat in the temple, continued in great grief and silence till the evening sacrifice. Then he put up prayers to God for the sins of the people. A great multitude having flocked together, Esdras engaged the principal of the people by oath, to renew the covenant with the Lord, to dismiss their strange wives, with their children, and directed all the people to assemble, within three days, at the temple, for the same purpose, and with the same effect.

Esdras had the principal authority in Jerusalem till the arrival of Nehemiah. In the second year of Nehemiah's government, the people being assembled at the temple, during the feast of tabernacles, Esdras was desired to read the law; accordingly he read it from morning to noon, accompanied by Levites, who stood beside him in silence. The next day they desired information from Esdras how to celebrate the feast of tabernacles. This he explained to them, and continued eight days reading the law in the temple. This was followed by a solemn renewal of the covenant.

Josephus says, Esdras was buried at Jerusalem:

lem : but the Jews believe he died in Persia, in a second journey to Artaxerxes. His tomb is shewn there in the city of Zamuza. He is said to have lived near 120 years.

It is asserted, that Esdras was chiefly concerned in revising and compiling most of the books of Scripture. He corrected them, made some little changes in them, arranged them, and put them into their present order and condition. He had great zeal and knowledge, and very carefully collected all the old documents of his nation; also, having the spirit of prophecy, it is very probable that he did take pains in collecting the sacred writings and forming the present canon. It is probable he composed both books of the Chronicles.

Some of the ancient Fathers, says Dr. Pridaux in Connect. &c. held, that all the Scriptures were lost and destroyed in the Babylonish captivity, and that Esdras restored them all again by divine revelation. Thus say Irenæus, Tertullian, Clemens Alexandrinus, Basil, and others. But they had no better foundation for this, than that fabulous relation in chap. xiv. of the second apocryphal book of Esdras, a book too absurd for the Romanists themselves to receive into their canon. All that Esdras did in this matter was, 1. He corrected errors that had crept into the copies of the sacred writings through negligence or mistake of the transcribers. 2. He collected all the books of which the Holy Scriptures then consisted; disposed them in their proper order, and settled the canon of Scripture for his time. 3. He added throughout the books of his edition, what appeared necessary for illustrating, connecting, or completing them; wherein he was assisted by the same Spirit, by which they were at first written. 4. He changed the old names of several places now grown obsolete. 5. He wrote out the whole in the Chaldee character. 6. Whether he added the vowel points is a harder question.

[It is probable, that what the Fathers relate of the loss of the sacred Scriptures at Babylon, is merely a Rabbinical allegory; they were lost, i. e. their ancient character became to a certain degree obsolete: Ezra restored them, i. e. he wrote them in the Chaldee character, and studied to render them more intelligible to the people, in which he was assisted by the Holy Spirit.]

Some say he invented the Massora, and the vowel points, and changed the old Hebrew characters for the Chaldee, which the Jews now use. Some have asserted, that Esdras and Malachi were the same. Each of these articles would require a dissertation; we shall only offer a few words.

The Massora and vowel points are much later than Christianity, consequently than Esdras. See MASSORA, MASSORITES, VOWEL POINTS.

With regard to the old Hebrew characters, which are those of the ancient Phœnicians, and the Samaritan, 1. There is no inconvenience in allowing that Esdras substituted the modern Hebrew (i. e. the Chaldee) character, for the ancient. 2. That this change was not at first universal, but partial and gradual; since long after Esdras, there were traces of the old Hebrew character in the Jewish writings.

The opinion which supposes Malachi and Esdras to be the same person, is maintained by St. Jerom, the Rabbins, and others. It is certain, Malachia is not so much a proper name, as a common name, q. angel or messenger of the Lord; and that in Esdras's time prophets were called Malachias, or angels of the Lord, vide Haggai, i. 13. Malachi, i. 1. The Fathers have cited Malachi under the name of angel. See MALACHI.

We have four books under the name of Esdras: but the first two only are acknowledged as canonical. They make but one book in the Hebrew. The first of these is certainly the work of Esdras: herein he relates events whereof he was witness, and speaks often in the first person. The second book under the name of Esdras is attributed to Nehemiah. It is however confessed, that some small matters have been added to it which cannot belong to Nehemiah: as the mention of the high-priest Jaddua, and king Darius, Nehem. xii. 22. This Jaddua is Jaddus, in whose time Alexander the Great came to Jerusalem; and Darius is Darius Codomannus, overcome by Alexander a hundred years after Nehemiah.

The third book under the name of Esdras is thought canonical by the Greeks. It is the same in substance as the first of Esdras, but interpolated.

The fourth book of Esdras is written with art enough, as if Esdras himself had composed it; but the marks of falsehood are discernable in it. Neither the synagogue, nor the Greek or Latin church ever unanimously received it as canonical; though some of the Fathers have cited it, and the Latin church has borrowed some words out of it. It is not extant in Greek, and it never was extant in Hebrew.

The Jews likewise ascribe to Esdras certain regulations, blessings, and prayers. Some speak of a revelation, a vision, or dream, of Esdras; but this is spurious.

The Jews have an extraordinary esteem for Esdras: they say, if the law had not been given by Moses, Esdras would have deserved to have been their legislator. The Mahometans call him Ozair the son of Serajah.

The reader will do well carefully to attend to the distinction between espousals and marriage; as espousals in the East are frequently contracted years before the parties cohabit; and sometimes in very early youth. This custom is alluded to figuratively, as between God and his people, Jer. ii. 2. to whom he was a husband, Jer. xxi. 32. and the apostle says he acted as a kind of assistant (pronuba) on such an occasion. ESSENE, or ESENIANS. We are not acquainted with the origin of the Essenes, or the etymology of their name. Pliny, lib. v. cap. 17. says, they had been many thousand years in being, living without marriage, and without the other sex. Ita per sæculorum millia, incredibile dictu! gens æterna est, in qua nemo nascitur. The first book of Maccabees, (vide ASSIDEANS,) calls them Hasdanim, and says, they were formed into a society before Hircanus was high priest; about A. M. 3894. ante A. D. 110. The first of the Essenes, mentioned by Josephus, Antig. lib. xiii. cap. 19. is Judas, in the time of Aristobulus, and Antigonus, son of Hircanus. Suidas, in Προγόνοι, &c. and some others, were of opinion, that the Essenes were a branch of the Rechabites, who subsisted before the captivity.

Epiphanius derives their name from Jesse, father of David, or from our Lord Jesus, whose name, according to his interpretation, signifies physician, or Saviour. He says it was a sect of the Samaritans, into whom Elxai had infused several errors. Drusius believes the Essenes to be a branch of the Pharisees. Salmasius thinks they they were named from the town Essa: Ferrarius reports twelve opinions concerning their name. We take the Chasidim of the Psalms, and the Assideans in the Maccabees to be their true source. Psalm lxxviii. 2. lxxxiv. 9. Vulg.

Josephus gives the following account of the Essenes: They live in perfect union, and abhor voluptuousness as a fatal poison. They do not marry; but bring up other men's children as if they were their own, and infuse into them very early their own spirit and maxims. They despise riches, and possess all things in common. Oil and perfumes are prohibited their habitations. They have an austere and mortified air, but without affectation; they always dress in white. They have a steward, who distributes to each what he wants. They are hospitable to their own sect; so that they are not obliged to take provisions with them on journeys.

The children which they educate are all treated and clothed alike, and do not change their dress till their clothes are worn out. Their trade is carried on by exchange; each giving what is superfluous, to receive what he needs. They do not speak before the sun rises, excepting some prayers taught them by their fathers, which they address to this luminary, as if to incite it to appear. Afterwards they work till the fifth hour, [near eleven o'clock in the morning.]

They then meet together, and putting on linen bathe in fresh water, and retire to their cells, where no strangers enter. From thence they go into their common refectory, which is as it were a sacred temple, where they continue in profound silence. They are served with bread, and each has his own mess. The priest says grace, after which they eat; they finish their meal also with a prayer. Then they pull off their white clothes, which they wore while at table, and return to their work until the evening. At that time they come again to the refectory, and bring their guests with them, if they have any.

They are religious observers of their word; their bare promise is as binding as the most sacred oaths. They avoid swearing, as they would perjury. Their care of their sick is very particular; and they never suffer them to want any thing. They read carefully the writings of the ancients, and thereby acquire the knowledge of plants, stones, roots, and remedies. Before they admit any who desire it into their sect, they put them to a year's probation, and inure them to the practice of the most uneasy exercises. After this term, they admit them into the common refectory, and the place where they bathe; but not into the interior of the house till after another trial of two years: then they are allowed to make a kind of profession, wherein they engage by horrible oaths to observe the laws of piety, justice, and modesty;—fidelity to God and their prince; never to discover the secrets of the sect to strangers; and—to preserve the books of their masters, and the names of angels, with great care. If any one violate these engagements, and incurs notable guilt, he is expelled, and generally dies of want; because he can receive no food from any stranger, being bound to the contrary by his oaths. Sometimes the Essenes, moved with compassion, receive such again, when they have given long and solid proofs of conversion.

Next to God, they have the greatest respect for Moses and for old men. The sabbath is very regularly observed among them; they not only forbear from kindling any fire, or preparing any thing, on that day, but they do not stir any moveable thing, nor ease themselves.

The Essenes generally live long, owing to the simplicity of their diet, and the regularity of their lives. They shew incredible firmness under torments. They hold the soul to be immortal, and believe that souls descend from the highest air into the bodies animated by them, whither they are drawn by some natural attraction, which they cannot resist; and after death, they swiftly return to the place from whence they came, as if freed from a long and melancholy captivity. In respect to the state of the soul after death, they have almost the same sentiments as the heathen, who place the souls of good men in the Elysian fields, and those of the wicked in Tartarus.

Some among them are married; in other respects they agree with the other Essenes. As soon as their wives are breeding, they come no more near them. Slavery is esteemed by them an injury to human nature; wherefore they have no slaves. Many of them have the gift of prophecy, which is ascribed to their continual reading of the sacred writers; and to their simple and frugal way of living. They believe that nothing happens but according to the decrees of God; and their sect is nearly related to that of the Pythagoreans among the Greeks.

There were women, also, who observed the same institutions and practices.

Although the Essenes were the most religious of their nation, yet they did not visit the temple at Jerusalem, nor offer bloody sacrifices. They were afraid of being polluted by other men. They sent their offerings thither; and themselves offered up to God the sacrifices of a clean heart. Philo says, lib. v. cap. 17. the Essenes were in number about four thousand in Judæa; and Pliny seems to fix their principal abode above Eu-gedi, where they fed on the fruit of the palm-tree. He adds, that they lived at a distance tance from the sea-shore, for fear of being corrupted by the conversation of strangers. Philo assures us, that in certain cities some of them occasionally resided; but they usually chose rather to dwell in the fields, and apply themselves to agriculture, and other laborious exercises, which did not take them from their solitude.

Their studies were the laws of Moses; especially on sabbath-days, on which they assembled in their synagogues, where each was seated according to his rank; the elder above, the younger below. One of the company read, and another of the most learned expounded. They very much used symbols, allegories, and parables, after the manner of the ancients.

We do not see, that Jesus Christ has spoken of them, or that he preached among them.—It is not improbable, that John the Baptist lived among them, till he began to baptize and preach. The wilderness, where Pliny places the Essenes, was not very far from Hebron, which is thought by some to be the place of John's birth. See ASSIDEANS. Vide Epiph. Hæres. xxix. de Nazaræis.

We shall add some particulars from Philo concerning the Essenes, who may be called practical, to distinguish them from the Therapeutæ, who may be termed contemplative Essentians.

Some, says he, employ themselves in husbandry; others in trades and manufactures, of such things only as are useful in time of peace; their designs being beneficial only to themselves and other men. They amass neither gold nor silver, nor make any large acquisitions of land to increase their revenues, but are satisfied with possessing what is requisite to relieve the necessities of life. They are perhaps the only men who without land or money, by choice rather than by necessity, find themselves rich enough; because their wants are but few, and, as they understand how to be content with nothing, as we may say, they always enjoy plenty. You do not find an artificer among them who would make an arrow, a dart, or sword, or helmet, or cuirass, or shield, or any sort of arms, machines, or warlike instrument. They make none of those things, even in time of peace, which men pervert to bad uses. They concern themselves neither with trade nor navigation; lest it should engage them to be avaricious. The method which they follow in their explanation, is to unfold the allegorical meanings of Scripture.

Their instructions run principally on holiness, equity, justice, economy, policy, the distinction between real good and evil; of what is indifferent, what we ought to pursue, or to avoid. The three fundamental maxims of their morality, are the love of God, of virtue, and of our neighbour. They demonstrate their love of God in a constant chastity throughout their lives, in a great aversion from swearing and lying, and in attributing every thing that is good to God, never making him the author of evil. They shew their love to virtue in disinterestedness, in dislike of glory and ambition; in renouncing pleasure; in continence, patience, and simplicity; in being easily contented; in mortification, modesty, respect for the laws, constancy, and other virtues. Lastly, their love to their neighbour appears in their liberality, in the equity of their conduct towards all, and in their community of fortunes, on which it may be proper to enlarge a little in this place.

First, no one among them in particular is master of the house where he dwells; any other of the same sect who comes thither, may be as much master as he is. As they live in society, and eat and drink in common, they make provision for the whole community, as well for those who are present, as for those who come not looked for. There is a common chest in each particular society, where every thing is reserved which is necessary for the support and clothing of each member. Whatever any one gets is brought into the common stock; and if any one falls sick, so as to be disabled from working, he is supplied with every thing necessary for the recovery of his health, out of the common bank. The younger pay great respect to the elder, and treat them almost in the same manner, as children treat their parents in their old age.

They chuse priests of the most distinguished merit to be receivers of the estates and revenues of their society, who likewise have the charge of issuing what is necessary for the table of the house. There is nothing singular or affected in their way of living; it is simple, and the same almost as that of the Pleists among the Dacians.

By way of instance, how applicable such reference might be, I would query, whether John the Baptist were not educated in this community? Observe, 1. that his father and mother being of great age at the time of his birth, it is probable, they did not live to see their son arrive at maturity. 2. A community of the Essenes was a probable place for John to retire to; and his first appearance as a preacher being in the desert, seems to hint at his beginning to preach repentance, near to those parts where he was best known. 3. It does not appear that John went regularly up to Jerusalem, (and the Essenes did not go thither) so that he might, properly speaking, have no "personal knowledge" of Jesus; as he has been usually understood to declare. 4. His manners, as neither eating nor drinking, i. e. freely, but being of a reserved course of conduct, are perfectly agreeable to those of the Essenes; and, 5. his continual abode in the country, not entering the principal cities, agrees with their customs; 6. they baptized; 7. they lived near the Jordan; 8. they fed on dates, and certain kinds of fruit; and in many other respects they seem to have agreed with the character of John, as described or implied in the gospels.

Also, the Essenes are described as "having all things in common," no one of them claiming personal property in goods, but referring them to the whole community; this then abates the singularity of the primitive church, of which we are told, "no one said that aught which he possessed was his own, but they had all things in common." That is to say, these first converts imitated the Essenes, a sect well known among them: they were in the city what the Essenes were in the desert.

I suppose too, that the Christian deacons resembled "the steward among the Essenes, who distributed to every one what he wanted." This also sets the behaviour of Ananias and Sapphira in a strong light; since certainly they knew perfectly well the custom of this sect, and had, like them, made a profession of renouncing riches. Observe, "the Essenes took no provisions on their journeys;" so the disciples, Mark vi. 8. Luke ix. 3: "they were hospitable:" vide Rom. xii. 13. 1 Tim. iii. 2. Titus i. 8. 1 Peter iv. 9: "they did not marry;" perhaps the fear that this principle should be extended too far, ought to be taken into our consideration, when we examine the grounds of some of the apostle's advice, 1 Cor. vii. Heb. xiii. 14. 1 Tim. iv. 3.

In short, if the reader will peruse with attention the articles ESSENES and THERAPEUTÆ, with these ideas in his mind; he will agree, that this sect deserves a consideration which it does not usually receive.]

ESTHER, אֶסְתֵּר, Esth. ii. 7. Secret; from סָתַר sathar, or that demolishes; from the same, according to the Chaldee: otherwise, proof of physic. This word is thought to be Persian or Medish.

[ESTHER, most probably, is allied to the Arabic root that signifies, the green myrtle;

the myrtle that is an evergreen: but some think the particular species is the black myrtle, pulla. This agrees with the Hebrew Hadassa, the myrtle. But the Jews, and those who follow them, explain Esther by "a star;" and it is certain, that the term star enters into the composition of many names; it conveys also the idea of beautiful effulgence: so Horace, lib. iii. ode 9. sidere pulchrior: and many illustrious persons have been so complimented; as, Alexander the Great, by Craterus, Curt. lib. ix. 6, 8: and Caligula, Suet. cap. 13. Mahomet's daughter, wife of Ali, was called Star; and the Ethiopians give the name of stars to persons of distinguished piety.]

ESTHER, or HADASSAH, of the tribe of Benjamin, daughter of Abihail. Her parents being dead, Mordecai, her uncle by her father's side, took care of her education. After Ahasuerus had divorced Vashti, search was made throughout Persia for the most beautiful women.—Esther was one selected: was carried to court, and committed to the care of a eunuch.

The time being come when she was to be conducted to the king's apartment, she found favour in the eyes of king Ahasuerus, and he married her with royal magnificence, and bestowed largesses and pardons on his people. Esther had not then declared who she was, nor that Mordecai was her uncle; because he had forbid her.

Mordecai refusing to honour Haman, drew on himself the indignation of that vizir; who in revenge, obtained an order from the king to destroy the whole nation of the Jews. Mordecai gave notice of this danger to Esther, and represented to her, that no danger ought to deter her from exerting her influence to preserve her people; that God for this purpose had, in all probability, raised her to the royal dignity. Esther therefore disposed herself by prayer, by fasting and humiliation, to appear before the king.

After three days, Esther dressed herself in her royal robes, and advanced over-against the door of the inward chamber, where the king's throne was. Vide FRAGMENT, No. L. Ahasuerus seeing her, held out his golden sceptre towards her, and said, "Esther, what is thy petition? for shouldest thou ask half of my kingdom, I would give it thee." Esther humbly intreated the king's company at a banquet; and if he pleased, to bring Haman. At that banquet, she requested that he would dine with her again the next day, with Haman also.

To this second banquet the king came, and Haman with him. Ahasuerus, warmed with wine, repeated his promises to her. Esther replied, "If I have found favour in thy sight, O king, give me my own life, and the lives of my people, people, for whom I implore thy clemency." The king demanded, who had conspired against the lives of herself and her people? She said, Haman. This enraged the king. Haman was seized, and executed. (See HAMAN.) The king eventually permitted the Jews to defend themselves against their enemies. See PURIM.

The book of Esther has always been esteemed canonical both by Jews and Christians: but the authority of those additions at the end of this book in the Latin editions, which are not in the Hebrew, has been disputed. The Greek copies are not uniform, and differ much from the Hebrew; the old Latin translations, extant before St. Jerom, differ both from the Hebrew and from the Greek. In the beginning of this book in Greek, [in our printed Greek copies we find this at the end which our author says is at the beginning of the book of Esther,] we read, that in the fourth year of Ptolemy and Cleopatra, Dositheus, accompanied by his son Ptolemy, carried the letter of Purim into Egypt, which was said to have been translated into Greek by Lysimachus the son of Ptolemy. This Ptolemy is believed to be Ptolemy Philometor, who died A. M. 3861, long after Ptolemy Philadelphus, in whose reign the version of the LXX. is supposed to have been made. This Lysimachus was probably author of the additions in the Greek of Esther.

The original author of this book, Clemens of Alexandria, (Stromat. lib. i.) some Rabbins and many commentators suppose was Mordecai; and the book itself favours this opinion, saying, that Mordecai wrote the history of this event. Others think it was composed and placed in the canon by Ezra, or by the great synagogue. The time of this history we fix in the reign of Darius, son of Hystaspes, whom we believe to be Ahasuerus. See AHASUERUS, HAMAN, MORDECAI.

Simon says, "full of birds of prey:" as a city in Phœnicia was called "Bird-town:" and we have Eagle-town, Hawk-town, &c.

I. ETAM, a rock to which Samson retired, Judg. xv. 8, 11. "It is conjectured," says Dr. Witman, "that the rock Etam, where Samson was surprised by the Philistines, was at no remote distance from this town"—Yebna. Trav. p. 254.

II. ETAM, a city in the tribe of Judah, built by Rehoboam, 1 Chron. iv. 3, 32. 2 Chron. xi. 6. Probably the rock Etam was near the city Etam.]

ETAN, AITHAM, or ETHAN, in Judah. It appears by 2 Chron. xi. 6. that Etan lay between Bethlehem and Tekoah. Josephus speaks of a place of pleasure called Hethan, distant from Jerusalem five leagues, whither Solomon went frequently. From hence, probably, Pilate some few years before the destruction of Jerusalem, brought water through aqueducts into the city, at a great expence; in accomplishing which, he was forced to take a large compass around the mountains lying in the way, Joseph. de Bello, lib. iii. cap. 13. Travellers speak of fine water, and vast basons, in the neighbourhood of Bethlehem, which tradition reports, and with great reason, to be the work of Solomon. There are three basons, the first 200 paces long, and 100 wide; the second 150 paces long, 115 wide, and 60 in depth; the third 289 paces long, 197 wide, and 104 in depth. The remains likewise of the aqueduct are visible, through which this water was conveyed to Jerusalem.

ETERNAL, ETERNITY. These words often signify a long time, and must not always be understood rigorously: so we find eternal mountains, to denote their antiquity, Gen. xlix. 26. Deut. xxxiii. 15. God promises to David, an eternal kingdom and posterity; i. e. his and his sons' empire will be of long duration; and even eternal, if we include the kingdom of the Messiah: Thou shalt be our guide from this time forth and for ever: i. e. during our whole life.

But eternity, when God is the subject, always denotes a real eternity. The Lord ruleth for ever. I lift up my hand to heaven, and swear, I live for ever, eternally. The Son of God is called Priest for ever after the order of Melchisedech: his gospel, the eternal gospel: his redemption, eternal redemption: his blood shed for us, the blood of the eternal covenant: his glory, an eternal weight of glory. Eternal tabernacles, or tents, (Luke xvi. 9.) habitations appointed by God in heaven for the predestinate. [FRAGMENT, No. CCCCLXXXIX.] Wisdom is eternal,—ab æterno ordinata sum, Prov. viii. 23. It is brightness reflected from eternal light, Wisd. vii. 26.

ETHAM, עֵתָם, [their strength, or their approach, or their sign: but Simon thinks it imports the end, or termination of dwelling, being on the edge of the desert.

It might be named by persons arriving from the desert, who here come to firm ground: and instead of moving sands find solid earth; and a finish, completion, or end to the labour and toil with which they had travelled over the sandy desert: or, by persons quitting Egypt, who here find the termination of the cultivable soil, and enter the perpetually fluctuating sands.]

ETHAM, the third station of the Israelites 3 T 2 when

when coming out of Egypt. Numb. xxxiii. 6. Exod. xiii. 20. Etham must have lain towards the [north] point of the Red Sea. The same, perhaps, as Buthus, or Butham. Vide MAP to FRAGMENT, No. XXXIX.

ETHAN, אֶתָּן, 'Αἰθάν, strong, spade; see ETHAM; otherwise, gift of the isle; from אֵי ai, an island, and נָתַן nathan, a gift.

ETHAN, the Ezrahite, one of the wisest men of his time: nevertheless, Solomon was wiser than he, 1 Kings iv. 31. Psalm lxxxix. bears the name of Ethan, the Ezrahite. Ethan the Ezrahite, and Ethan son of Kishi, of the tribe of Levi, and family of Merari, are the same person. 1 Chron. vi. 44. He was called likewise Idithun, and appears under this name in the titles to several Psalms. Ethan was a principal master of the temple music. 1 Chron. xv. 17, &c.

ETHAN, son of Shammah, a Levite of the family of Gershom.

ETHAN, rivers of, Psalm lxxiv. 15: either the waters of Ethan (Etan) above-mentioned; or violent and rapid rivers, as is the import of the Hebrew, אֶתָּן Ethan, validus, fortis, strong, high, elevated. (Eng. Tr. mighty waters.) The Jews understand by it such rivers as the Israelites passed in going to the land of promise. They believe that the river Arnon as well as the Jordan was dried up to give passage to the Hebrews.

ETHANIM, אֶתָּנִים, 'Αθανίμ, strong, stout; see ETHAN: otherwise, gift; from נָתַן nathan.

ETHANIM, a Hebrew month. 1 Kings viii. 2. In this month the temple of Solomon was dedicated. After the Jews returned from captivity, the month Ethanim was called Tizri. It answers to our September, O. S.

ETH-BAAL, אֶת־בַּעַל, towards the idol, or with Baal; from אֶת eth, towards, or near, or with, and בַּעַל baal, an idol; or he that rules or possesses: otherwise, sign of the idol, or of him that possesses or rules; from סֵמֶן oth, sign, and בַּעַל baal, to govern.

ETH-BAAL, king of the Zidonians, father of Jezebel, wife of Ahab. 1 Kings xvi. 31.

ETHECÆ, אֶת־קֵדָה, balconies: otherwise, a portico, chamber, or gallery. St. Jerom, on Ezekiel xlii. 5. has translated the Hebrew atikim, by porch. LXX. Υποθαύσσιν.

ETHER, אֶתֶר, stone. ATHAR, or AETHER, twenty miles from Eleutheropolis near Malatha in the south of Judah. Allotted first to Judah, afterwards to Simeon, Josh. xv. 42. xix. 7.

ETHIOPIA, כּוּשׁ, Cush, blackness: in Greek, heat, burning; from ἀῖω, I burn, and ὤψ, face.

ETHIOPIANS, כּוּשִׁים, Cushim. Gr. Χουσιῖται, in 2 Chron. xii. 3. otherwise כּוּשִׁי tziim, Psalm lxxii. 9. from תִּזִּי tzi, ship, dry, or the demon.

ETHIOPIAN WOMAN, כּוּשִׁית, Cushith, black, burning, heat.

ETHIOPIA, south of Egypt, part of it is now called Abyssinia, one of the great kingdoms in Africa. Ethiopia is frequently mentioned in Scripture by the name of Cush: but there were several countries named Ethiopia.

By Cush, translated Ethiopia, is generally meant the country which lies along the eastern coast of the Red Sea, and at the point of this sea joining to Egypt. Zipporah the wife of Moses, who was of Midian on the Red Sea, is called a Cushite or Ethiopian. See CUSH & CANDACE.

The *Ethiopia*s may be considered as, 1. The land of Cush, on the river Gihon. 2. Cush on the eastern shore of the Red Sea. 3. Cush south of Thebais and Upper Egypt. The want of this distinction has occasioned very considerable errors.

The ancients are no clearer in their acceptance of Ethiopia. First, they thus name Ethiopia proper. Secondly, part of Arabia on the Red Sea; whence Homer (Odys. v. 22.) distinguishes the *Ethiopia*s into eastern and western, some on one side the Nile and the Red Sea, others on the other side. Dionysius the Geographer (v. 177.) and Eustathius speak likewise of the eastern *Ethiopia*s in Arabia. Lastly, they place other *Ethiopia*s in Chaldaea and the Susiana; for Memnon son of Aurora, who came from Susa to the Trojan war, is called in Hesiod—king of Ethiopia; and in Pindar—the Ethiopian son of Aurora. Hesiod. Theog. ver. 984. Pindar. Olymp. 2.

Herodotus (lib. vii.) mentions two sorts of *Ethiopia*s in Xerxes' army: 1. The eastern, who were of Asia, and reckoned among the Indians; from whom they differed only in hair and language. 2. The *Ethiopia*s of Africa, with frizzled black hair; whereas those of Asia had very long hair.

When, therefore, in the sacred text Ethiopia is spoken of, we must carefully distinguish these countries and nations. Scripture mentions but one Cush, the son of Ham, and brother of Canaan. Gen. x. 6. Whether all the countries called in Hebrew Cush, were so called from him we are not able to say. Many suppose, that his first and real abode was in Arabia Felix, east of the Red Sea; whence his descendants passed into Africa, and peopled Ethiopia.—Others assert, that Arabia was called Ethiopia, because the *Ethiopia*s subdued it, and continued long in possession of it. Bibl. Orient. p. 409. Habasch. But even in the time of Moses, the east side of the Red Sea was called Cush; and, I cannot tell whether any one can prove, that the *Ethiopia*s before his time had conquered this part of Arabia.

Ethiopia

Ethiopia proper is now generally named Abyssinia, which name the Arabians derive from Habasch a son of Cush. This Habasch is not mentioned in the Bible, nor the Cush, from whom the Mahometans suppose him to be descended; for the Scripture Cush was brother to Canaan, and father to Nimrod, Seba, Sabta, Havilah, Raama, and Sabtekah; whereas, the Arabians make Cush the father of Habasch, to be son and not brother of Canaan; and certainly it is probable, that Cush the father of Nimrod, &c. who dwelt in Asia, and on the river Gihon, is different from Cush the son of Canaan, who peopled part of Arabia Felix, or of Ethiopia proper, i. e. Abyssinia.

The city of Cous on the Nile in Upper Egypt, by some confounded with the famous Thebes, was named from Cush, the father of the Ethiopians. The Arabians call them not only Habasch, or Abyssians, but Cush, or Cousch. The Persians call them black Indians. The Ethiopians call him Salama, whom the Greeks and Latins name Frumentius, who was sent by St. Athanasius to evangelize them. Till the time of Salama they had circumcision only, which had been taught them by Zadok, high-priest of the Jews, sent to them, they say, in Solomon's time to instruct them in Judaism. [Salama is a title of office; the chief of the priesthood is called Abba Salama; which probably may be derived from the Hebrew or Syriac, and import "Father of Peace." The office is of great dignity and influence, as may be seen in Bruce's Travels, and those of Mr. Salte, to Abyssinia.]

Others believe, that this people received the Christian faith from St. Matthew or St. Bartholomew, or St. Philip, or from queen Candace's eunuch, who was baptized by Philip, one of the seven deacons—[and this is thought to be very probable.] Acts viii. 27. But these opinions are founded only on several meanings of the word Ethiopia. St. Matthew, we are told, preached the gospel to the Ethiopians, i. e. those above the Araxes, near the Persians. St. Bartholomew preached to the Indians, called by the ancients Ethiopians, i. e. in Arabia Felix. Lastly, Philip the deacon, or the eunuch, might preach the gospel to queen Candace, who reigned in the peninsula of Meroë, which is sometimes named Ethiopia.

Habasch, or Abyssinia, signifies properly a mixture of divers nations settled together; comprehending the Abyssinians, Nubians, and Pongians. The Arabians gave them this name, which the Ethiopians long rejected; and do not yet assume in their books. They call themselves Ethiopians, and their country, the kingdom of Ethiopia, or Beecra Agazi, the land of liberty, alias, people who have decamped, i. e.

from Arabia Felix, the ancient Ethiopia, or Cush, to transplant themselves into the country which they now possess. Their remove to this new habitation was, according to Eusebius, during the servitude of the Israelites in Egypt; or about the time of Joshua and the Judges, according to Syncellus. But there still remained a great number of them in Arabia, both then, and long afterwards.

The Abyssinians are black or olive-coloured, according to the different provinces which they inhabit; if transported into Europe, they become white at the second or third generation.

There is frequent mention in Scripture of Ethiopia and Ethiopians. Moses says, that the Gihon, one of the four rivers of Eden, compasseth the land of Ethiopia (Gen. ii. 13.) i. e. the country watered by the Araxes. Moses married an Ethiopian, (Numb. xii. 1.) i. e. Zipporah, daughter of Jethro priest of Midian, in the land of Cush, on the eastern shore of the Red Sea. 2 Kings xix. 9. Tirhakah king of Ethiopia came against Sennacherib's army; i. e. from Arabia. The topaz of Ethiopia, (Job xxviii. 19) came from the Red Sea and the land of Cush, Arabia Felix. So did Zerah king of Ethiopia, 2 Chron. xiv. 9. who marched against Asa king of Judah, with 200,000 men, and 300 chariots. Habakkuk, iii. 7. speaks of the tents of the Ethiopians and Midianites, as under affliction when the Lord appeared at Sinai.

King Ahasuerus (Esth. i. 1. viii. 9. xi. 1.) reigned from the Indies to Ethiopia, i. e. to Abyssinia: for Herodotus says, this country paid tribute to Darius son of Hystaspes. Nebuchadnezzar (Judith i. 9.) sent ambassadors into Palestine, to the land of Gezem, and the frontiers of Ethiopia: probably, Ethiopia proper, south of Egypt. Zephaniah, iii. 10. says, the Lord will be worshipped beyond the rivers of Ethiopia. And Isaiah, xviii. 1. says, Woe to the land shadowing with wings, beyond the rivers of Ethiopia. These rivers are the Nile and its branches. This country, with regard to Judea was beyond the Nile, which issues from Ethiopia, i. e. Abyssinia. Vide FRAGMENT. No. CCCXII.

Hezekiah sent ambassadors to the king of Egypt, desiring assistance, according to Isaiah, against Sennacherib. Zephaniah foretold, that the Egyptians would come and perform their adorations to the Lord. These prophets describe Egypt only, as the country beyond the rivers of Ethiopia. So the Psalmist (lxviii. 31) prophesies, that Egypt and Ethiopia should come and pay their homage to the Lord. Isaiah, (xx. 3.) foretells the captivity of Egypt and of the land of Cush, or Ethiopia; either the eastern Ethiopia, pia, in Arabia; or the western, west of the Red Sea, and south of Egypt. Isaiah xi. 11. says, God will recall his dispersed people from Assyria, Egypt, Ethiopia, and Pathros: which may mean, either (Cush) Ethiopia proper, or Cush on the Araxes; [but from the connexion of the words, evidently means the African Ethiopia.] In chap. xliii. 3. the prophet says, the Lord had given Egypt, Ethiopia, and Seba, to ransom Israel; which may be explained of the Ethiopians in Arabia, because they are joined with Seba, another people in Arabia Felix. So Isaiah xlv. 14. The labour of Egypt, and the merchandize of Ethiopia, and of the Sabeans, men of stature, shall come over unto thee, they shall surrender themselves to thee.

Ethiopia proper is described in the following passages: I will make Egypt waste, from Migdol to Syene; (Assouan, on the confines of Ethiopia.) Ezek. xxix. 10. See the Hebrew. And Jerem. xiii. 23. Can the Ethiopian change his skin? Psalm lxxiv. 13. Thou brakest the head of the dragon, the leviathan, the crocodile, in pieces, and gavest him to be meat to the people of Ethiopia. This is interpreted in reference to the people of Tentyra in Upper Egypt, who ate the crocodile; whereas the Egyptians paid divine honours to that reptile. [It seems to be allegorical of the Egyptian power generally; not of any particular place.] Jeremiah joins the Cushim with the Libyans. Daniel, xi. 43. mentions them together; which can be naturally explained only of the Ethiopians and Abyssinians: also Ezekiel, xxx. 4, 5. Queen Candace's eunuch was of the same country. In all these passages, it appears that Cush comprehends not only Ethiopia, above Syene and the Cataracts, but likewise a part of Thebais, or Upper Egypt.

[The following are the sentiments of Mr. Bruce, Trav. Vol. I. p. 107, &c. We give them to the reader as those of a traveller well acquainted with the manners of the nations he describes:

"The translator, 2 Chron. xiv. 9. calls Zerah an Ethiopian, which should either mean, he dwelt in Arabia, as he really did, and this gave him no advantage, or else, that he was a stranger, who originally came from the country above Egypt; either way it would have been impossible during his whole life-time to have collected a million of men, one of the greatest armies that ever stood upon the face of the earth; nor could he have fed them, though they had ate the whole trees that grew in his country; nor could he have given every hundredth man one drink of water in a day from all the wells he had in his country.

"Here then is an obvious triumph for infidelity, because, as I have said, no supernatural means are pretended. But had it been translated, that Zerah was a black-moor, a Cushite negro, and prince of the Cushites, who were carriers in the Isthmus, an Ethiopian shepherd, then the wonder ceases. Twenty camels employed to carry couriers upon them, might have procured that number of men to meet in a short space of time; and, as Zerah was the aggressor, he had his time to choose when he should attack his enemy; every one of these shepherds carrying with him his provision of flour and water, as is their invariable custom, might have fought with Asa at Gerah; without eating a loaf of Zerah's bread, or drinking a pint of his water.

"The next passage I shall mention is Isaiah, chap. xlv. ver. 14. "The labour of Egypt, and merchandize of Ethiopia, and of the Sabeans, men of stature, shall come over to thee, and they shall be thine." Here the several nations are distinctly and severally mentioned in their places, but the whole meaning of the passage would have been lost, had not the situations of these nations been perfectly known; or, had not the Sabeans been mentioned separately, for both the Sabeans and the Cushites were certainly Ethiopians. Now the meaning of the verse is, that the fruit of the agriculture of Egypt, which is wheat; the commodities of the negro, gold, silver, ivory, and perfumes; would be brought by the Sabeans shepherds, their carriers, and a nation of great power, who shall join themselves with you.

"Again, Ezekiel says, chap. xxx. 8, 9. "And hey shall know that I am the Lord, when I have set a fire in Egypt, and all her helpers shall be destroyed."—"In that day shall messengers go forth from me in ships, to make the careless Ethiopians afraid." Now Nebuchadnezzar was to destroy Egypt, Ezek. chap. xix. ver. 10. from the frontiers of Palestine to the mountains above Athara, where the Cushite dwelt. Between this and Egypt is a great desert; the country beyond it and on both sides was possessed by half a million of men. The Cushite, or negro merchant, was secure under these circumstances from any insult by land: as they were open to the sea, and had no defender, messengers therefore in ships, or a fleet, had easy access to them, to alarm and keep them at home, that they did not fall into danger by marching into Egypt against Nebuchadnezzar, or interrupting the service on which God had sent him. But this does not appear from translating Cush, Ethiopian; the nearest Ethiopian to Nebuchadnezzar, the most powerful and most capable of opposing him, were the Ethiopian shepherds of the Thebaid, and these were not accessible to ships: and the shepherds so posted near to the scene of destruction to be committed by Nebuchadnezzar, were enemies to the Cushites living in towns, and they had repeatedly themselves destroyed them, and therefore had no temptation to be other than spectators.”]

ETHNAN, אֶתְנַן, gift, recompence, sign, arrival of the son; from אֶת eth, or ath, arrival, and נָן, a son. Son of Helah, 1 Chron. iv. 7.

ETHNARCH, ἑθναρχης, governor of a country, depending on a superior king. Archelaus son of Herod, was called Ethnarch of Judæa by Augustus, says Josephus, Antiq. lib. vii. cap. 13.

[It seems that the Jews, after the destruction of Jerusalem, preserved a sort of monarchy till the beginning of the fifth century. They had in Palestine an ethnarch, or chief of their nation, who, under the toleration of the Roman governors, exercised great power. He styled himself also patriarch. His place was hereditary, and descended from father to son. All the synagogues of the East and West paid him tribute, under pretence of contributing to the support of the Rabbins, who applied themselves in Judea to the study of the law. Those whom he commissioned to levy this tax were apostles, or envoys. These patriarchs, who had made themselves very odious by their extortions and rapines, did not exist in A. D. 429. See M. Tillemont's Histoire du Temps, tom. i. La Bleterie.]

ETHNI, or ATHANAI, אֶתְנִי, Ἀθανί, strong; from אֶתְנִי eth: otherwise, ass; from אֶתְנִי athon: otherwise, giver; from nathan. A Levite, and musician under David, 1 Chron. vi. 41.

EVANGELIST. One who publishes good news. They therefore who write, as well as they who preach, the gospel of Jesus Christ, are evangelists; and in general all who declare happy tidings. In Isaiah, xli. 27. the Lord says, he will give to Jerusalem one who bringeth good tidings—an evangelist. Philip the deacon is called an evangelist, Acts xxi. 8. St. Paul speaks of Evangelists, (Eph. iv. 11.) and ranks them after apostles and prophets. He exhorts Timothy to perform the duty of an evangelist. In the beginning of Christianity, there were evangelists and preachers, who, without being fixed to any church, preached wherever they were led by the Holy Spirit. (Grot. Act. xxi. 8.) We commonly call Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, the Evangelists, because they were the writers of the four gospels, which bring glad tidings to all men.

EVANGELIUM, Ἐυαγγέλιον, good news: from εὖ well, and ἀγγέλλω, I declare.

EUBULUS, Εὐβούλος, prudent, a good coun- sellor. St. Paul's disciple. 2 Tim. iv. 21. Honoured by the Greeks, February 28.

EUCCHARIST, a word particularly signifying the sacrament of the body and blood of our Saviour Jesus Christ. Called Eucharist, because Christ, in the institution of it, gave thanks to God. Eucharistia, in Greek, signifies thanksgiving, and answers to the Hebrew barach, to bless, or hodah, to praise.

EVE, חַוָּה, living, or enlivening: Gr. ζῶη, life—[life-giving.]

EVE, the name of the first woman: Chava in Hebrew, is derived from the same root as chajim, life; because she was to be the mother of all living. God having created Adam, said “It is not good for man to be alone: let us make him a help-meet [g. help-mate] for him.” He therefore made a woman, and brought her to Adam. Adam said, “Behold now the bone of my bones, and flesh of my flesh, therefore shall she be called Ischa, [mau-ess: female man: womb-man, wo-man] because taken out of man.” It is believed she was created on the sixth day of the creation, after Adam had reviewed the animals.

Adam and Eve were placed in paradise, and God forbade them from touching one particular fruit. But the envious evil one insidiously seduced Eve to eat of the forbidden fruit: Eve afterwards seduced Adam. By thus transgressing the prohibition, they both became degraded; and were punished by expulsion from Paradise, and by subjection to evils, natural and moral. God said to Eve, “I will greatly multiply thy sorrow and thy conception; in sorrow thou shalt bring forth children, and thy desire shall be to thy husband, and he shall rule over thee: but, moreover, thy posterity shall overcome the evil one.” After being expelled from Paradise, Eve conceived and brought forth Cain, saying, “By God's assistance I have got a man:” or, I have got a child all over divine. She afterwards had Abel and daughters; also, Seth: and, no doubt, many others. The year of Eve's death is not known. It is presumed she died about the same time as Adam, cir. A. M. 930. See ADAM.

The Eastern people have paid some honours to Adam and Eve as to saints. The Greeks commemorate them, Nov. 19. The Maronites likewise commemorate them in their liturgy. Epiphanius says, that the Gnostics composed a gospel of Eve, which contained a thousand ridiculous and immodest things. Other heretics said that Eve had Cain and Abel, not by her husband, but by a monstrous intercourse with the devil. The Indian Brachmans believe, that the sin of the first man consisted in the carnal knowledge of Eve, whom the devil presented to him. See Fabricius, Apoc. F. Test. p. 101.

The

The Mahometans pretend, that Eve called her eldest son Abd-al-hareth, the gardener's or husbandman's son, or servant, because Adam was the first who cultivated the earth. They still reverence Eve's grotto, in mount Gerahim, three miles from Mecca. They believe that the tomb of this first of womankind is at Gidda, on the Red Sea.

EUERGETES, 'Ευεργήτης, liberal, beneficent. A surname given to Ptolemy III. and IV. kings of Egypt. Vide FRAGMENT, No. CCII.

EVI, 'Evi, alas! from אֵי ai: otherwise, my desire; from אָוֶה avah, desire, and 'י, my. A prince of Midian, killed in war, Numb. xxxi. 8. A. M. 2553, ante A. D. 1447.

EVILMERODACH, אֵיל־מֶרֶדַּח, 'Ebilmerodach, the fool of Merodach, or despising; the bitterness of the fool: otherwise, the fool grinds bitterness; from אֵיל evil, a fool, and מָרַר marar, bitterness, and דָּחַח dachah, to overturn; or from דָּחַ duc, to grind, to bruise. A Babylonish name, and it is difficult to give its true etymology from the Hebrew. See MERODACH. [The highly exalted or divine sultan.] EVILMERODACH, son and successor of Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon. [He proved a profligate and vicious prince, and for that reason was called Evilmerodach, i. e. foolish Merodach; for his proper name was only Merodach.] He first governed the kingdom during the indisposition of his father: but after seven years, the old king, having recovered his understanding, re-ascended the throne, and Evilmerodach, as some think, was imprisoned by him. In this confinement, Evilmerodach contracted an acquaintance and friendship with Jehoiakim king of Judah, so that immediately after the king's death, Evilmerodach, succeeding him, delivered Jehoiakim out of prison, and placed him above all the other kings, who were captives at Babylon.

The Hebrews, and after them St. Jerom, and several other interpreters, report, that Evilmerodach, after the death of his father, observing that the chief men of the kingdom scrupled to acknowledge him, fearing lest Nebuchadnezzar should be still living; he, to convince them that the king was certainly dead, ordered him to be taken out of his grave, and drawn through the streets exposed to public view. [Could his appellation foolish, as usually understood, be derived from this indecent exposure?]

Evilmerodach reigned but one year, according to our chronology, and was immediately succeeded by his son Belshazzar. [According to Dr. PRIDEAUX, he reigned two years, and was succeeded by Neriglissar, his sister's husband, who had been at the head of the conspiracy formed against him. Connect. P. I. b. i.]

Josephus says, he was succeeded by Neriglissar, then by Laborosarchod, and lastly by Belshazzar. The succession of these princes is related in the same order by St. Jerom, and others.

EULÆUS, a river of Persia. See ULAI.

EUMENES, 'Ευμενής, gracious, beneficent.

EUMENES, king of Bithynia and Pergamus, 1 Macc. viii. 8. Having joined the Romans in their war against Antiochus the Great, he received in recompence the country of "the Indians, Medes, and Lydians;" as the text of the Maccabees reads; but it is very probable we should read, "the Ionians, Mysians, and Lydians."

EUNICE, 'Ευνίκη, good victory; from εὖ, good, and νίκη, victory.

EUNICE, mother of Timothy, 2 Tim. i. 5. A Jewess by birth, but married to a Greek, who was Timothy's father. Eunice was not converted to Christianity by St. Paul, but by some other; for that apostle found at Lystra Eunice and Timothy already advanced in grace and virtue.

EUNUCH, 'Ευνσκος, a bed-keeper; from εὐνη a bed, and ἔχω, I hold, I keep.

EUNUCH, generally in the courts of eastern kings, the care of the beds and apartments belonging to princes and princesses, is committed to eunuchs; but chiefly of the princesses, who live secluded. The Hebrew saris signifies a real eunuch, whether naturally born such, or rendered such. But in Scripture this word often denotes an officer belonging to a prince, attending his court, and employed in the interior of his palace: as a name of office and dignity. In the Persian and Turkish courts, the principal employments are at this day possessed by real eunuchs. Heliodorus says, that the eunuchs who served in the Persian courts, were the king's eyes and ears; intimating the authority and the confidence which those monarchs placed in them. Potiphar, Pharaoh's eunuch, and Joseph's master, had a wife and children, Gen. xxxix. i. 7. xli. 45. Vide FRAGMENT, No. XCIV. Vide ASENATH.

God forbid his people to make eunuchs; such shall not enter into the congregation of the Lord, Deut. xxiii. 1. Some think that God thereby forbids eunuchs to marry with Israelites; others, that God forbids them to enter his temple; others, that he excludes them from the magistracy. But it is more credible, that God debars them simply the possession of some outward privileges belonging to the Israelites as the people of the Lord. They were looked on in the commonwealth as dry and useless wood; and might say of themselves—Behold I am a dry tree. But notwithstanding, Thus saith the Lord unto the eunuchs that keep my sabbaths, and and take hold of my covenant, even unto them will I give in mine house, and within my walls, a place and a name better than of sons and daughters. Isaiah lvi. 4.

There were in the courts of the kings of Judah and Israel, officers called Sarasim; probably these were real eunuchs, if they were slaves taken or bought from foreigners, but, if they were Hebrews, the name of eunuch expresses simply their office and dignity. Our Saviour, Matth. xix. 12. speaks of men who made themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven; i. e. who, on some religious motive, renounced marriage, and carnal pleasures. Origen, and some ancient heretics, construed our Saviour's words literally, and pretended, that he advised men to make themselves eunuchs, in order to obtain the kingdom of heaven. Eusebius informs us, that this was done so commonly by the inhabitants of Syria and Osroene, in honour of the goddess Cybele, that king Abgarus, to put a stop to the practice, was obliged to make a law, that they who were guilty of it, should have their hands cut off.

EUNUCH, queen CANDACE'S. See PHILIP.

EUODIAN, Euodia, sweet scent, or that smells well; from eu good, and ὄδω, fragrant.

EUODIAN, mentioned by St. Paul, Philip. iv. 2. Some Greek manuscripts read Euodum or Euodium, in the masculine; but the printed copies, and the generality of manuscripts, read in the feminine, Euodiam. There is much probability, that Euodias and Syntiche were women of great virtue, who had assisted St. Paul in the gospel: and who having differed, St. Paul conjures them to be of the same mind. Others think Euodias was a woman and Syntichus a man. But Syntiche being placed in the calendar July 22, among the female saints, it seems to have been the common opinion, that both were women.

EUPATOR, Εὐπατορ, good father; from eu, good, and πάτηρ, a father. 1 Macc. vi. 17.

EUPHRATES, fruitful, or that makes fruitful, or growing; from פֶּרֶה parah.

EUPHRATES. A famous river; its source is in the mountains of Armenia; it runs along the frontiers of Cappadocia, Syria, Arabia Deserta, Chaldæa, and Mesopotamia, and falls into the Persian gulf. At present it discharges itself into the sea in union with the Tigris; but formerly it had a separate channel: in Pliny's time, visible traces remained of this old channel. Plin. lib. vi. cap. 27, 28. Moses says, Gen. ii. 14, the Euphrates is the fourth river whose source was in Paradise. Scripture often calls it, the great river, and assigns it for the eastern boundary of that land which God promised to the Hebrews, Deut. i. 7. Josh. i. 4. The Euphrates overflows in summer, like the Nile, when the snow on the mountains of Armenia begins to melt. Ecclesiasticus (xxiv. 36.) seems to say the same.

PART XL. Edit. IV.

The source of the Euphrates, as well as that of the Tigris, being in the mountains of Armenia, some of the ancients were of opinion, that these two rivers rose from one common spring:

Quaque caput rapido tollit cum Tigride magnus Euphrates, quos non diversis fontibus edit Persis ———

LUCAN. PHARSAL. lib. iii.

And Boëthius in his Consolation of Philosophy, lib. ii. car. 1.

Tigris et Euphrates uno se fonte resolvant,
Et mox adjunctis dissociantur aquis.

But at present the sources of these two famous rivers are distant one from the other. Pliny (lib. v. cap. 24.) and Strabo (lib. xi.) place the head of it in mount Abo, or Aba, in Armenia.

The Arabians divide the Euphrates into the larger and the lesser; the larger rising in the Gordian mountains, discharges itself into the Tigris near Anbar and Pelongiah. The smaller, whose channel is often wider than that of the larger, runs towards Chaldæa, passes through Corofah, and falls into the Tigris, between Vassith and Naharvan, at Carna, i. e. the Horn, because, in reality, it is the horn, or confluence of the great and the little Euphrates. [Parsons, in his Travels in Asia, writes,—“At Korna, on the extreme point of Mesopotamia, the head of our vessel was in the Tigris, the stern in the Euphrates, and the middle in the great river where the two former unite. This point is reckoned to be from Hellah about 180 English leagues.”]

From the lesser a canal, dug by Trajan's order, passes into the larger Euphrates. This is the Fossa Regia, or Basilus fluvius of the Greeks and Romans, by the Syrians called Nahar-Malca, through which the emperor Severus passed in his way to Ctesiphon on the Tigris, when he besieged that city. The violence of the Persian gulf causes a reflux of water thirty leagues above the mouth of the Euphrates. The Arabians are persuaded, that the waters of this river are very healthy, and have virtue in curing diseases.

[The Hebrew name of this river is פֶּרֶת phrath, or perat; the eu prefixed is a Greek particle, implying excellence, and this river is written Euphrates in Greek, Rev. ix. 14: but in the Hebrew, Gen. ii. 14. xv. 18. Josh. i. 4. it is written Perath: of which the meaning seems to be fertilizing. The epithet fertilis is applied to the Euphrates by Lucan, lib. iii. Sallust, Solinus Polyhist. c. 37, and Cicero, De Nat. Deorum, lib. ii. attribute the fruitfulness of Mesopotamia to the annual overflowing of this river. That the soil between the Euphrates and the Tigris is fruitful, is expressly asserted by Curtius, lib. v. cap. 1, 12. Comp. Helmsterhorstius on Minut. Fel. 8vo. p. 38. In Arabic this river is written Forat. Between this river and the Tigris, which is east of it, is Mesopotamia, and the land of Shinar; and east of the Tigris is Assyria.]

Mesopotamia,

[II. EUPHRATES. We have found a second river of this name in the Perath, or Hirmund, supposed to have been one of the rivers of Paradise. This name, in the language of the country, implies ablution. See the DISSERTATION.]

[The Mesopotamian Euphrates is a river of consequence in Scripture geography, being the boundary which separated Padan Aram from Syria, and the utmost limits, east, of the kingdom of the Israelites. It was indeed only occasionally, that the dominion of this people extended thus far; but it should appear, that even Egypt, under Pharaoh Necho made conquests to the western bank of this river.

The general course of the Euphrates is south-east; but in some places it runs westerly, whereby it somewhat approaches the Mediterranean, near Cilicia. It is accompanied in most parts of its course by the Tigris; and the country included between them is the ancient Mesopotamia, or "between the rivers."

There are many towns on its banks, and much fruitful land, in different places. In general, its banks are rather level than mountainous. It does not appear to be of any very great breadth: the following are the estimates and accounts of it given by travellers.

The Euphrates, according to Abul Feda, rises north-east of Erzeroum: it receives the waters of many streams in its course, as the Murad, the Rouba, the Khabour, or Chaboras; and others. At length, it joins the Tigris, and the united waters of those rivers form a kind of sea, in which are many islands. All their branches being combined at Korna, they pass together to Basra, from whence they fall into the Persian gulf." Otter, p. 105.

Otter also says, "when we passed the Euphrates, the twelfth of March, this river had only 200 common paces in width; in its height, it extends 5 or 600 paces into the plains on the right."

Tournefort tells us, that the sources of the Euphrates are two; one about a day's journey, the other nearly double the distance, from Erzeroum. They rise in mountains, not so high indeed as the Alps, but covered with snow almost the whole year round. These two branches are called the Frat, the name of the river which they form. After their junction, which is three days' journey from Erzeroum, the Frat begins to be capable of carrying little Saicks, but its channel is full of rocks. The mountain wherein are the sources of the Euphrates, is one of the northern divisions of Mount Taurus, according to Strabo. Dionysius the geographer calls it, the Armenian mountain: the ancients called it Paryardes.

Thevenot observes, that, near to Bir, the Euphrates (July 3) seemed to him to be no bigger than the Seine at Paris; but they say it is very broad in winter, and the truth is, its bed is twice as broad. This river runs very slowly. Part ii. p. 40.

The river Euphrates is, near Helle, which marks the situation of the ancient Babylon, about four hundred feet wide. "The river was very low in the month of November; but at the end of December, or the beginning of January, it begins to increase," says Niebuhr.

At Bir, the same writer observes, "the Euphrates is larger at this city, than the Tigris is near Mosul: being about 380 to 400 feet; or about 80 double paces in width."

Mr. Rich, in his Memoir on Babylon, says, the current was at Hellah, at a medium, about two knots (miles) per hour. The Tigris is infinitely more rapid, being near seven knots. The Euphrates now overflows the site of Babylon.]

EUPOLEMUS, Ευπόλεμος, a good combatant, a good soldier; from eu, good, and πόλεμος, war.

EUPOLEMUS, son of John, an ambassador whom Judas Maccabæus sent to Rome. 1 Macc. viii. 17. A. M. 3483.

II. EUPOLEMUS, an old author, cited in Josephus, Clemens of Alexandria, and Eusebius. We know not in what time he lived. He wrote concerning the kings of the Hebrews.

[EUROCLYDON, a dangerous wind in the Levant, or eastern part of the Mediterranean sea, Acts xxvii. 14. It is usually said that this wind blows from the north-east; but perhaps it is what our seamen call a Levanter, which is confined to no point of the compass, but by veering to all points, is attended with great danger.]

EUTYCHUS, Ευτυχος, happy, fortunate; from ευτυχης: eu, good, and τύχη, fortune.

EUTYCHUS, the name of a young man of Troas, who sitting at a window, while the apostle Paul was preaching, slept, and fell from the third story into the street. St. Paul, coming down, brought him back alive. Acts xx. 10. A. D. 57.

EXCOMMUNICATION, an ecclesiastical penalty, whereby they who incur the guilt of any heinous sin, are separated from the communion of the church, and deprived of spiritual advantages tages. There are two or three sorts of excommunication. (1.) The greater, whereby the person offending, is separated from the body of the faithful: thus St. Paul excommunicated the incestuous Corinthian, 1 Cor. v. 1—5. (2.) The lesser, whereby the sinner is forbid the sacraments. (3.) That which suspends him from the company of the faithful; which seems to be hinted at, 2 Thess. iii. 6. Now we command you, brethren, that ye withdraw yourselves from every brother that walketh disorderly, and if any man obey not our word by this epistle, note that man, and have no company with him, that he may be ashamed. St. Austin speaks in several places of this excommunication. We see the practice of it in the rule of St. Benedict. Theophylact says, that this separation from the company of the faithful was formerly esteemed a great punishment.

The primitive church was very reserved in the use of excommunication; using it only for very serious and important reasons, and always with great concern. There is a distinction made between excommunication which is medicinal, and that which is mortal. The first was used against penitents separated from the communion of the church till they had manifested repentance; the second against confirmed heretics and impenitent sinners.

The causes of excommunication may be error, sin, and disobedience. In the beginning, the spiritual sword was used only in spiritual cases; afterwards there was a necessity for restraining the violence of wicked men against the persons and estates of ecclesiastics, by the dread of censures and excommunication. The customary manner of excommunicating in the primitive church was this: the faithful separated themselves from those whose company the church had prohibited, without obliging their superiors to proceed any farther. In process of time, the bishops used threatenings, anathemas, and sentences of excommunication; and at last, to make these ceremonies more frightful, they were attended with actions proper for infusing terror; such as lighting of wax candles, extinguishing them, throwing them on the ground, and trampling them underfoot, while the bishop pronounced excommunication, thundering also curses against the excommunicated, &c.

The principal effect of excommunication is, to separate the excommunicated from the society of the faithful, from the privilege of being present in religious assemblies, from the eucharist, from attendance at the common prayers, the sacraments, and all those duties whereby Christians are connected in one and the same society and communion. An excommunicated person is, with regard to the faithful, as a heathen and a publican, Matt. xviii. 7. But this exclusion from Christian communion does not deprive him of any duties to which he has a right, as a man, a citizen, a father, a husband, or a king, either by the law of nature and nations, or by the civil law. And when the apostles enjoin men to have no conversation with the excommunicated, not to eat with them, not even to salute them, this is to be understood of offices of mere civility, (which a man is at liberty to pay, or to withhold) and not of any natural obligations; such as are founded on nature, humanity, and the law of nations, 1 Cor. v. 1—5. 2 Thess. iii. 6—14. 2 John, 10, 11.

Among the Jews we see excommunication practised in the time of Esdras and Nehemiah, when they excommunicated those who would not dismiss the strange women whom they had married contrary to the law, Ezra x. 8. Neh. xiii. 25—28. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xi. cap. 6.

Our Saviour in the gospels, speaking to his apostles, foretold, that the Jews out of hatred to him, would treat them ill, and excommunicate them. It is said, that among the Jews, they generally whipt the excommunicated persons, before they expelled them out of their synagogues. Excommunication was preceded by censure and admonition, at first, privately; if the guilty person did not amend, the house of judgment, the assembly of judges, declared to him with menaces the necessity for his reformation. If he continued obstinate, on four sabbath-days successively, his name and the nature of his fault were proclaimed in order to bring him to shame. If he were incorrigible, he was excommunicated. Our Saviour seems to allude to this practice, where he commands us to tell our brother his fault between him and us alone; then—that we should take witnesses with us in order to admonish him; and, lastly,—that we should inform the church against him. And if after this he does not return to his duty, then we should look on him as a heathen and a publican, Matt. xviii. 15—17.

It has been matter of surprise to some, that Jesus Christ, whose design was to build his church on the ruins of Judaism, and who evidently attacked the very foundations of the Jewish religious prejudices, was, notwithstanding, never excommunicated. Perhaps the Jews might look on Christ and his followers as a new sect; and as it was not then a custom to excommunicate whole bodies, they might receive the same indulgence as the Sadducees, Essenes, Herodians, and Pharisees. Basnage, Hist. Juifs, lib. vi. cap. 21.

The sentence of excommunication among the Jews was conceived in these terms, Let such an one be in excommunication, or separation.

The judges, or the synagogue, or even private persons, had a right to excommunicate; but regularly, the house of judgment, or the court of justice, solemnly pronounced the sentence of excommunication. One particular person might excommunicate another, and he might likewise excommunicate himself; as they who bound themselves under a curse, neither to eat nor drink, till they had killed St. Paul, Acts xxiii. 12. Beasts were sometimes excommunicated; and the Rabbins teach, that excommunication has its effect even on dogs.

They who pronounced the sentence of excommunication, might take it off, and absolve him who had incurred it, provided he gave marks of repentance. He who had been excommunicated, while present, must be present too when absolved. One who had been excommunicated by a private person, might be absolved by a public judge, or by three men chosen for the purpose. He who had excommunicated himself, could not regularly absolve himself: ten persons chosen from among the people were necessary on that occasion. He who had been excommunicated in a dream, (as some fancied they might be) was to seek for ten men learned in the law and the Talmud, to give him absolution: or loosen him from his excommunication. Vide ANATHEMA, CHEREM.

[Excommunication is in most modern churches followed by heavy civil pains and penalties: in the Romish church its effects are tremendous; among Protestants it is not often resorted to.]

The heathen had likewise their excommunications of individuals, for great crimes.

EXODUS, from the Greek Ἔξοδος, going out.

EXODUS, the second of the sacred books in the Old Testament, is so called, because it contains the history of the departure of Israel out of Egypt, under Moses. It contains the history of the birth of Moses, his education, and flight; the return of Moses; the plagues of Egypt; the departure of the Hebrews; the passage of the Red Sea; the giving of the law; the erection of the tabernacle; and the celebration of the second passover. It contains the history of 145 years, from the death of Joseph, A. M. 2369, ante A. D. 1635, to A. M. 2514, the end of the first year after the going out of Egypt. The Hebrews call this book שמות ואלה שמות, because it begins within these words; Now these are the names, &c.

The Hebrews, according to our chronology, dwelt in Egypt only 215 years, from Jacob's entrance, A. M. 2298, to their departure, A. M. 2513. Notwithstanding, we read, Exod. xii. 40. Now the sojourning of the children of Israel who dwelt in Egypt was four hundred and thirty years. M. Boivin the elder, who was long employed in examining the chronology of Josephus and the LXX. thinks, that by the help of a passage from Manetho, (apud Joseph. lib. i. contra Appion.) he had settled the number of four hundred and thirty years mentioned by Moses. And on this is founded a restitution in chronology, relating, as we have said, to the children of Israel's abode in Egypt. For the principle of which, vide AGE IV. [Some translations read, "in Canaan and in Egypt, i. e. taken together, 430 years."]

EXORCISTS. From the Greek Ἐξορκιστεῖν, exorcisein, to conjure, to use the name of God, with design to expel devils from places or bodies which they possess. We see from the first apologists of our religion, that the devils dreaded the exorcisms of Christians, who displayed great power against those wicked spirits.

The Jews had their exorcists, as Jesus Christ intimates in the gospel: If I by Beelzebub cast out devils, by whom do your children cast them out? Josephus, Antiq. lib. viii. cap. 2. relates, that a Jew, named Eleazar, cured possessed persons by the help of a ring, in which a root was set, said by some to have been discovered by Solomon. The smell of this root put under the nose of the possessed person, made him fall on the ground; and the exorcist conjured the devil, forbidding him to return into that body. He says in another place, that a particular root, called barad, which grows in Judea, has the virtue of casting out devils, when applied to the body of the possessed. See DEMONS.

The apostles mention Jewish exorcists, who cast out devils in the name of Christ. Master, we saw one casting out devils in thy name, and we forbid him, because he followeth not us: which practice these exorcists continued after our Saviour's death: as appears from Acts xix. 14. Justin, Irenæus, Origen, and Tertullian, speak of Jews, who boasted of a power to cast out devils, and sometimes really did so, by calling on the God of Abraham.

EXPIATION. The Hebrews had several sorts of expiatory sacrifices;—for sins of ignorance; for purifications from certain legal pollutions; as of a woman after child-birth; of a leper when cleansed of his leprosy, &c. these were to offer sacrifices, in order to be purified; so likewise they who having touched something impure, had forgotten or had neglected to purify themselves at the time, and in the manner which the law prescribed. These expiatory sacrifices did not of themselves remit real faults committed against God, nor take away the guilt of sin: they did no more than repair the legal and external fault, and secure the transgressor from the temporal penalty wherewith God, or the judges, punished those faults, when any one neglected neglected to atone for them in the way appointed by the law.

The ceremonies observed when an Israelite offered a sacrifice for sin, see Lev. iv. 27.

For a sin-offering, they might offer a goat, or a ram, a lamb, or a kid, or two pigeons; or, the poor might offer meal. There were particular ceremonies, when the high-priest, or any prince of the people, or all the people, had fallen into trespasses. But in the main, they were mostly the same. The flesh of beasts offered for expiation, belonged exclusively to the priests.

EXPIATION, the great day of, was the tenth of Tizri, which answers to our September, O. S. The Hebrews call it Kippur or Chippur, pardon, or expiation, because the faults of the year were then expiated. The principal ceremonies were the following. The high-priest, after he had washed, not only his hands and his feet, as usual at common sacrifices, but his whole body, dressed himself in plain linen like the other priests, wearing neither his purple robe nor the ephod, nor the pectoral, because he was to expiate his own sins, together with those of the people. He first offered a bullock and a ram for his own sins, and those of the priests: putting his hands on the heads of these victims, he confessed his own sins, and the sins of his house. Afterwards, he received from the princes of the people two goats for a sin-offering, and a ram for a burnt-offering, to be offered in the name of the whole nation.

The lot determined, which of the two goats should be sacrificed, and which set at liberty. After this, the high-priest put some of the sacred fire of the altar of burnt-offerings into a censer, threw incense upon it, and entered with it, thus smoking, into the sanctuary: after he had perfumed the sanctuary with this incense, he came out, took some of the blood of the young bullock he had sacrificed, carried that also into the sanctuary, and dipping his fingers in it, sprinkled it seven times between the ark and the vail, which separated the Holy from the sanctuary, or Most Holy. Then he came out a second time, and beside the altar of burnt-offerings killed the goat which the lot had determined to be the sacrifice. The blood of this goat he carried into the most holy sanctuary, and sprinkled it seven times between the ark and the vail, which separated the holy from the sanctuary: from thence he returned into the court of the tabernacle, and sprinkled both sides of it with the blood of the goat; during all this, none of the priests, or people, was admitted into the tabernacle, or into the court; after this, the high-priest came to the altar of burnt-offerings, wetted the four horns of it with the blood of the goat, and young bullock, and sprinkled it seven times with the same blood.

The sanctuary, the court, and the altar, being thus purified, the high-priest directed the goat which was set at liberty by the lot, to be brought to him. He put his hand on the goat's head, confessed his own sins, and the sins of the people, and then delivered the goat to a person appointed, who was to carry it to some desert place, and let it loose, or, as others say, throw it down some precipice. See AZAZEL. This being done, the high-priest washed himself all over in the tabernacle, and putting on other clothes, (some say his pontifical dress, i. e. his robe of purple, the ephod, and the pectoral) he sacrificed two rams for burnt-offering, one for himself, the other for the people.

The great day of expiation was a principal solemnity of the Hebrews: a day of rest, and strict fasting; they confessed themselves ten times on this day, reckoning from the eve before supper, in memory of the high priest's pronouncing the name of God ten times in this solemnity.

On this day they are reconciled with each other; he who has offended his neighbour goes to him the night before and asks his pardon; if he who has been offended will not forgive him, the former takes three persons with him, comes to him, and again asks forgiveness two or three times: if the other persists obstinately in refusing it, he takes ten men, [Maimonides requires but three on the second day, as well as on the first; after which, he who refuses to be reconciled, incurs the guilt of sin. Tract. de Penitentia, cap. ii. p. 52.] with whom he comes once more to him, and in their presence desires him to forgive; if he still refuse, he who has taken all these steps is judged to be absolved, and firmly believes, that he has obtained forgiveness from God. [Compare the proceeding appointed by Christ, Matth. xviii. 15—17.] If the person offended is dead, he who desires reconciliation, goes to the place where he is buried, with ten persons in his company, and says before them all, I have sinned against the God of Israel, and against such an one, who is here interred.

Buxtorf says, that they prepare themselves for this solemn day early in the month Tizri, which is the first of the civil year; that during all the ten days which precede it, they fast, and perform acts of penance, and pray God to avert those evils which they have deserved. They rise early in the morning, confess themselves three times a day, prosecute no causes, and excommunicate no one. On the ninth day, which is that before the day of expiation, a Jew takes a white cock, if he can procure any of this colour; if not, of some other colour, but not red: he repeats some prayers, and striking his head three times with the cock's head, he says at each blow, "This cock cock shall be for my redemption, shall suffer the death which I merited, shall be my reconciliation, shall die for me, and I shall go into a life of bliss and immortality with all Israel." After this, he cuts its throat, embowels, dresses, and eats it. Leo of Modena says, Ceremonies of the Jews, P. iii. cap. 6. that this custom was practised formerly in Italy and in the Levant; but was suppressed, as being a superstition without any foundation. Buxtorf, Synag. Jud. cap. 20.

Many Jews spend the night which precedes the great day of expiation in the synagogue, in prayer and penitential exercises. They put on mourning, dress themselves in white, or black. Some clothe themselves in that habit wherein they desire to be buried. They go barefoot, and visit the synagogue very early. There they go to prayers four times solemnly; in the morning, at noon, in the afternoon, and at evening.

The following are particular ceremonies, and Rabbinical explanations, of what is practised among the Jews. It was the custom formerly for the high-priest to separate from his wife seven days before this festival, lest he should contract pollution. Rabbi Judah maintained, that if the high-priest's wife died in these seven days he should immediately marry again, that the law might be complied with, which appointed him to make atonement for himself and for his wife; or, according to the text, for himself and his house: but this determination was not approved by the sages.

The evening before the day of expiation, some of the elders were presented to the high-priest, who read before him, and exhorted him to read, in order to discover whether he had learned to read, or whether he had not forgot it. But this precaution was necessary only under the second temple, when the high-priesthood was sold, often to persons unfit for the office. These elders likewise prevented him from over-eating on that night, lest he should fall asleep. After this he was conducted into the chamber of Abtinez, where he was obliged to swear, that he would not change the ancient rites in any particular. It is believed, that this precaution proceeded from the inclination of the Sadducees, that the high-priest should scatter the perfume before his entrance into the Holy, which was contrary to tradition. We know that Hircanus and Ananus both high-priests, were Sadducees, and the oath was necessary for people of their character. As it seemed injurious to the high-priest, he wept when he took it, the priests too wept at the consideration of their being obliged to administer it to him. This also, therefore, was under the second temple. [Abtinez formerly presided over those who prepared the perfumes and gave his name to this apartment, which was built over the water-gate.]

The night was spent in explaining the law, or in reading passages in Job, Esdras, or Daniel. If the priest were not learned enough to be always discoursing, he had young people with him who played on the flute, or pushed him, in order to awake him when he fell asleep; and who continued this exercise till the hour of sacrifice. In the morning they prided themselves in cleaning the altar and carrying away the ashes. The very great haste which the priest made thither often occasioned accidents; for while they were pushing one another on the steps, it might happen that some fell down and hurt themselves, which made it necessary to divide the offices. There were generally nine priests appointed for the morning sacrifice, and eleven for the evening; but in great solemnities, such as that of the expiation, ten were ordered for the morning, and twelve for the evening. The Levites were likewise chosen, to dress and make ready the victims, twenty-four to a calf, and to each was assigned a part of the beast to skin or to prepare.

Every priest before he began his offices washed himself. The Rabbins say, the high-priest washed himself five times, because he changed his habit five times; and as often as he changed his habit it was necessary for him to wash himself. These habits were of linen; those used in the morning were of linen of Pelusium, and those worn in the evening of India linen, [perhaps, muslin] and cost eight drachms.

Anciently, the lots which were drawn for the scape-goat were of wood, but the son of Gamaa made them of gold. King Monobasus appointed all the handles of the vessels used in the temple on the day of expiation, to be of gold. [Very contrary, surely, to the humiliation of the day.]

The high-priest carried into the sanctuary a censer of gold filled with perfumes, and intreated of God, that the air might be of a wholesome temperature; that the sceptre might not be taken out of the hands of Judah that year; that there might be no famine in Israel, and that the prayers of travellers or strangers (i. e. wishing evil on the nation) might not be heard; his prayer was short, lest the people should be alarmed if he continued too long in the sanctuary, for they were persuaded that there was always danger in going into that place which God filled with his presence. The high-priest came out of it retiring backward, with his eyes directed always towards the ark; [or towards the foundation-stone, which the Rabbins suppose to have been placed in the middle of the sanctuary; under the second temple.] After this he sacrificed a goat, a goat, whose throat was cut in the manner already related.

The Azazel, or scape-goat, was conducted to the precipice by laymen as well as priests. There was a way, or causey, prepared purposely on this occasion, and tents placed, or ten relays, from Jerusalem to where he was to be thrown down: this was a precipice so abounding with rocks, that before the goat was fallen half way, he was beat to pieces. To give the speediest notice of this execution to the people, who waited for the news of it in the temple with uneasiness, there were signals raised at proper distances. It is affirmed likewise, that at the same instant the scarlet ribbon, which was fastened to the temple gate, immediately changed colour, and became white, as a mark that God had accepted the sacrifice, and that the sins of the people were forgiven. They add, that this miracle ceased forty years before the destruction of the second temple. [i. e. about the time of Jesus Christ's death.]

When the ceremony was over, the high-priest read the law, gave the blessing to the people, changed his dress, made a great entertainment, for joy of his coming unhurt out of the sanctuary. The people fasted very punctually during all this holy day, to which they attributed great effects; for, according to the Jews, repentance, though accompanied with a resolution of living well, does but suspend sins, whereas the feast of Expiation abolishes them entirely; and they who die before this day expiate them by their death. This is what we learn from the Rabbins concerning the feast of Expiation.

The modern Jews solemnize this feast as follows: They prepare themselves by prayer the day before, and [some do, or did formerly] by the sacrifice of a cock; they visit the place where they bury the dead, and beg of God to forgive sinners in regard to the memory of the saints there interred: they plunge into water, that the ablution of their sins, thus made, may be entire. They prepare wax candles against the next day; every one carries his own to the synagogue; the most devout carry two, one for the body, the other for the soul; by which names they respectively call them.

In the evening, when the feast begins, they go to the synagogue; there each lights his taper, and all sing aloud. The women also light up candles in their houses; from their brightness, and from the consistency of the tallow, or wax, they form presages. If the light be clear and bright, they conclude that their sins are remitted; if it be dim, they are vexed: but if the wax or tallow run, they dread the effects of God's anger; of which they take this for a token.

The next day, early in the morning, they again repair to the synagogue; the whole day is spent in strict fasting, without exception of age or sex; they suffer no one to eat, unless children under twelve years of age. They read a long prayer, wherein they declare, that all the oaths and promises which have been unperformed throughout the whole year are made void, because the atonement is made for sin. They continue their prayers all day, and sometimes all the following night. At the conclusion of the festival, the Rabbi gives the blessing to the people with his hands lifted up; and the people out of respect to the priest's hand, or rather to the majesty of God whom he represents, put their hands before their eyes, and cover their faces. They sound a horn in memory of the jubilee, and believe that God causes his voice to be heard, declaring his forgiveness of sins, and that every one may return home in this confidence. Whereupon they return home, put on clean white clothes, and break their fast.

[Compare Lev. xvi. 29, 31. xxiii. 26. The portions now usually read, are Lev. xvi. Num. xxix. 7—11. Isaiah lvii. 14, to the end of chap. lviii. They use also a prayer called "the Addition;" and the priests recite the blessing, Numb. vi. 22. standing before the place of the ark. The "conclusion prayer" is also appropriate to that day. The whole service lasts from morning to night, upwards of twelve hours, continual prayers, without intermission.]

They believe, that Adam repented and began his penance on the day of solemn expiation; that on this day Abraham was circumcised; and that Isaac was bound in order to be sacrificed; for which reason they pray God to forgive them, because of Isaac's binding; also, that on this day Moses descended from mount Sinai with the new tables of the law. Some change their name, as an indication of their inward change; and that they may address themselves to God, saying, I am another person; it is not I who have committed this sin. Maimon. de Penitent. cap. x. p. 99.

EYE, a part of the face well known. The Hebrews call fountains eyes; and give the same name to colours. And the eye (or colour) of the manna was as the eye (or colour) of bdellium, Numb. xi. 7. By an evil eye, is meant, envy, jealousy, grudging, ill-judged parsimony. To lay their eyes on any one, to regard him and his interests. To find grace in any one's eyes, Ruth ii. 10. to win his friendship and good graces. The eyes of servants look unto the hands of their masters, Psalm cxxiii. 2. to observe the least motion, and obey the least signal. Vide FRAGMENT, No. XXIX. Their eyes were opened, Gen. iii. 7. they began to comprehend in a new manner. The wise man's eyes are in his head, Eccles.

Ecclus. ii. 14. he does not act by chance. The eye of the soul, in a moral sense, the intention, the desire.

God threatens to set his eyes on the Israelites for evil, and not for good, Amos ix. 4. Nebuchadnezzar recommends to Nebuzaradan that he would set his eyes on Jeremiah, (xxxix. 12. xl. 4.) and permit him to go where he pleased. Sometimes expressions of this kind are taken in a quite opposite sense, Behold the eyes of the Lord are on the sinful kingdom, and I will destroy it. Amos ix. 8.

To be eyes to the blind, or to serve them instead of eyes, is sufficiently intelligible, Job xxix. 15. The Persians called those officers of the crown who had the care of the king's interests, and the management of his finances, the king's eyes. Vide EUNUCH.

I have made a covenant with my eyes, not even to look upon a maid: a very expressive way of speaking, whose force would be impaired by any explanation, Job xxi. 1.

Eye-service is peculiar to slaves, who are governed by fear only, Eph. vi. 6. Col. iii. 22.

The lust of the eyes, or the desire of the eyes, comprehends every thing that curiosity, vanity, &c. seek after: every thing that the eyes can present to men given up to their passions. 1 John ii. 16.

Cast ye away every man the abomination of his eyes, Ezek. xx. 7, 8. Let not the idols of the Egyptians seduce you.

The height, or elevation of the eyes, Eccles. ii. 10. is taken for pride, Ecclus. xxiii. 5.

St. Paul says, Gal. iv. 15. that the Galatians would willingly have plucked out their eyes for him; expressing the exaggeration of their zeal, affection, and devotion to him. In a contrary sense, the Israelites said to Moses, Wilt thou put out the eyes of these men? Numb. xvi. 14.

The Hebrews call the apple of the eye, the black daughter of the eye. Let not the apple of thine eye cease weeping. Lam. iii. 18. To keep any thing as the apple of the eye, is to preserve it with particular care. He that toucheth you, toucheth the apple of mine eye, Deut. xxxii. 10. injures me in the tenderest part.

[The eye and its actions are occasionally transferred to God; "The eyes of the Lord run to and fro the whole earth." Zech. iv. 10. 2 Chr. xvi. 9. Psal. xi. 4. "The eyes of the Lord are in every place, beholding the evil and the good," Prov. xv. 3. "The Lord looked down from heaven," &c.

Is not the eye used symbolically, Zech. iii. 9? "Therefore behold the stone—precious stone—ring-stone—SIGNET—which I will give to the face of Joshua"—it shall be "one stone having seven eyes" engraven on it—"behold, I will engrave the engraving thereof"—i. e. as a symbol of penetration and activity—of close inspection and accuracy in the management of business: this shall be his device on his seal of office;—such shall be his character, &c.

We read (Matt. vi. 22) "the light, or lamp, of the body is the eye—if therefore thine eye be single—simple—clear (ἀπλᾶς) thine whole body shall be full of light; but if thine eye be evil—distempered—diseased—thine whole body shall be darkened." The direct allusion may hold to a lantern, or lamp, (λυχνος)—if the glass of it be clear the light will shine through it with a sprightly lustre: but if the glass be soiled—dirty—foul—very little light will pass through it: (if they had not glass lanterns, such as we use, they had others in the East made of thin linen, &c. these were very liable to receive spots, stains, and foulnesses, which impeded the passage of the rays of light from the luminary within) so, in the natural eye, if the cornea be SINGLE, and the humors clear, the light will act correctly; but if there be a film over the cornea, or a cataract—or a skin between any of the humors, the rays of light will never make any impression on the internal seat of sight, the retina. By analogy, therefore, if the mental eye, the judgment, be honest, virtuous, sincere, well meaning, pious, it may be considered as enlightening and directing the whole of a person's actions; but if it be perverse, malign, biassed by undue prejudices, or drawn askance by improper views—it darkens the understanding, perverts the conduct of the party, and suffers him to be misled by his unwise and his unruly passions; as Saul was towards David. Vide 1 Sam. xviii. 19. in Heb.

Is there not also an allusion to distempers of the eye, in Matt. vii. 3? "Why beholdest thou the mote—the little black speck, which is in thy brother's eye—but considerest not the beam—the almost cataract-like film—which is in thine own eye?" The word (χαρπός) say some, signifies a little splinter of wood; others say, a little seed: I conjecture that it may refer to a small film, the size of a seed—(the writer of this has had such a one floating in one eye many years: it is most sensible when looking against a bright cloud. The disease is known among medical writers.) The word (δοκος) signifies a beam, or rafter, and no doubt may be used parabolically:—but, query—whether it might not import a real disorder of the eye, so called from its closure, fitting in to the eye, as beams or rafters are fitted into each other in buildings?—(This sense is independent of any parable used among the Jews, referring to a beam, or large piece of wood, being in the eye.) q. d. "Why beholdest thou with affected superiority and keenness keenness of observation, the little seed-like film which floats in thy brother's eye, but art insensible of the closed up state of thine own eye." Perhaps this would be well expressed by our English phrase—a WALL-EYE, i. e. opaque; nearly, or altogether dark; but not extracted, or absolutely disfigured, so as to be shocking to beholders. Might the Jews have a similar expression—a beam eye,—or, a timber eye?]

[EYE-LIDS. As it is not customary among us for women to paint their eye-lids particularly, we do not usually perceive the full import of the expressions in scripture referring to this custom, which appears to be of very great antiquity, and which is still maintained in the east. So we read, (2 Kings ix. 30.) "Jezebel painted her face," rather, put her eyes in paint; more correctly, she painted the internal part of her eyelids, by drawing between them a silver wire previously wetted and dipped in the powder of phuc—(this is a rich lead ore) which adhering to the eye-lids, formed a streak of black upon them, thereby, apparently, enlarging the eyes, and rendering their effect more powerful—inigorating their vivacity. This action is strongly referred to by Jeremiah, iv. 30. in our translation, "though thou rendest thy face with painting;"—or, though thou cause thine eye-lids to seem to be starting out of thine head, through the strength of the black paint which is applied to them, yet shall that decoration be in vain.

The powerful effect of this supposedly charming addition, is alluded to by the sagacious preceptor, Prov. vi. 25. "Lust not after her beauty (of the strange woman) in thine heart: neither let her captivate thee with her EYE-LIDS," i. e. which she has rendered so large and brilliant by the assistance of art, as to enchant beholders. So Ezekiel, xxiii. 40. "for whom hast thou washed thyself, and hast coloured—painted—thine eyes—(eye-lids, rather)—and hast ornamented thyself with ornaments?"]

EZBAI, אֶזְבַּי, my hyssop; from אֶזְבִּי azob, and זֵי, or ai, my. Father of Naarai, a brave officer in David's army. 1 Chron. xi. 37.

EZBON, אֶזְבוֹן, who is eager to hear; from אֶזְבִּי utz, to be in earnest, and בִּנְיָה binah, to hear: otherwise, he that hastens to build; from בָּנָה banah. Son of Bela, and grandson of Benjamin. 1 Chron. vii. 7.

EZBON, אֶזְבוֹן, precipitation or haste of the son; from אֶזְבִּי utz, eager, in haste, and בֵּן ben, a son: or he that builds, or understands. Son of Gad: probably he founded or repaired the city of Heshbon or Esebon. Gen. xlv. 16.

EZEKIEL, עֶזְקִיֵּאל, the strength of God, or supported of God, or God is my strength; from חֲזָק chazak, strength, force, and אֵל el, God.

PART XI. Edit. IV.

EZEKIEL, son of Buzi, a prophet of the sacerdotal race; carried captive to Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar, with Jehoiachin king of Judah, A. M. 3405, ante A. D. 599. It does not appear that he had prophesied before his coming into Mesopotamia.

He began his ministry in the thirtieth year of his age, according to the general account; or rather in the thirtieth year after the covenant was renewed with God in the reign of Josiah; Ezek. i. 1. which answers to the fifth year of Ezekiel's captivity, A. M. 3409; and he prophesied twenty years, to A. M. 3430; the fourteenth year after the taking of Jerusalem.

When Ezekiel was among the captives on the river Chebar, the Lord appeared to him in a vision, on a throne, or kind of chariot, borne by four cherubim, supported upon four wheels. There seemed to be presented to the prophet the roll of a book; and he seemed to eat it. The Lord directed his word to him, and appointed him the watchman of his people; commanded him to shut himself up in his house, and foretold, that he should be seized, and bound with chains as a madman; which happened accordingly.

While thus confined, God commanded him to delineate on a brick, or piece of soft earth, the city of Jerusalem besieged and surrounded with ramparts; to put a wall of iron between him and the city; and to continue 390 days lying on his left side, analogous to the iniquity of the kingdom of Israel; and 40 days on his right side, to signify the iniquities of Judah. These 430 days denoted also, the siege of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar; its duration, and the subsequent captivity, from the sackage of Jerusalem in the reign of Zedekiah; or, rather, in the fourth year after this siege, when Nebuzaradan carried away the remains of the Jews prisoners to Babylon, A. M. 3420, until the death of Belshazzar, A. M. 3466, according to Usher; or reckoning from the taking of Jerusalem, in 3416 to 3457, which, according to our computation, is the first year of Cyrus's reign at Babylon.

He was afterwards commanded to take wheat, barley, beans, lentiles, millet, and fitches, and with these to make as many loaves as he was to continue days lying upon his side, and to bake them with human excrements. [Vide FRAGMENT, No. CVI.] Ezekiel expressing his reluctance to this, God permitted him to substitute cow-dung, signifying hereby, that the inhabitants of Jerusalem should be reduced during the siege to the necessity of eating unclean bread, and in small quantity, and in continual terror. After this he was to cut off his hair, to divide it into three parts; to burn one part, to cut another ther to pieces with a sword, and to scatter the rest in the wind ; typifying the fate of the people.

The year following, Ezekiel was transported in spirit to Jerusalem, and shewn the abominations and idolatries committed by the Jews there : God commanded an angel to mark, as a pledge of security, the penitents in Jerusalem ; and other angels to slay those not marked.

Five years before the last siege of Jerusalem, the Lord directed Ezekiel to prepare for escape, as it were from enemies, by stealth ; in like manner as king Zedekiah should do. He adds a strong invective against false prophets and false prophetesses, and those seduced by them.

During these predictions of the prophet in Mesopotamia, Zedekiah king of Judah combined with Egypt, Edom, and neighbouring princes, to rebel against Nebuchadnezzar. The Babylonian prince marched against Jerusalem, and besieged it, A. M. 3414. On the same day, Ezekiel, who was in Mesopotamia, two hundred leagues from Jerusalem, declared this event to the Jews, his companions in captivity ; and predicted to them the ruin of their metropolis. At this time the prophet's wife dying, God forbade him to mourn for her. The people asking the prophet what was meant by these figurative actions ; he answered, that God was about to deprive them of their temple, city, country, and friends ; and that they should not have even the sad consolation of mourning for them.

During the siege of Jerusalem, Ezekiel prophesied against Egypt and Tyre. He was not informed, that Jerusalem was taken, till the fifth day of the tenth month, A. M. 3417, about six months after that event ; whence we may judge, that the prophet was at that time in some retired situation remote from Babylon ; where this news, without doubt, was brought very soon. In the evening of that day, the Lord opened the prophet's mouth, to foretell, that the remains of the people would likewise be dispersed : as it happened four years after. At the same time, probably, he foretold the calamities of the Sidonians, Tyrians, Edomites, and Ammonites, which happened five years after the destruction of Jerusalem.

The siege of Tyre, and Nebuchadnezzar's war against Egypt, are, next to the affairs of the Jews, what is most remarkable in Ezekiel. After these melancholy visions, God shewed him more comfortable objects ;—the return from the captivity,—the rebuilding of the temple and city,—the restitution of the kingdom of Judah and Israel, &c. chap. xxxvi. xxxvii. xxxviii. &c.

St. Jerom is of opinion, that as Jeremiah prophesied at Jerusalem at the same time as Ezekiel did beyond the Euphrates, the prophecies of Ezekiel were sent to Jerusalem, and those of Jeremiah were sent into Mesopotamia, to comfort and encourage the captive Jews. It is said, Ezekiel was put to death by the prince of his people, because he exhorted him to leave idolatry ; (Epiphan. de Vita Prophet.) but we cannot well tell who this prince could be. It is affirmed, that his body was laid in the same cave wherein Shem and Arphaxad were deposited, on the banks of the Euphrates. Benjamin of Tudela says, that his tomb is behind the synagogue, between the Euphrates and the Chebar, in a very fine vault built by Jehoiachin ; that the Jews keep a lamp always burning there, and boast, that they possess the prophet's book of prophecies, written with his own hand, which they read every year on the great day of expiation.

Josephus (Antiq. lib. x. cap. 6, 10.) says, Ezekiel left two books concerning the captivity : that this prophet, having foretold the ruin of the temple, and that Zedekiah should not see Babylon, this writing was sent to Jerusalem ; circumstances which we do not read in Ezekiel ; but which seem to favour the opinion of Jerom. Athanasius believed, that one of two books of Ezekiel was lost. Spinoza thinks, that what we have of this prophet is a fragment only. But we see no proof of all this ; nor do we know what authority Josephus had for his assertion.

The writings of this prophet have been always acknowledged canonical ; nor was it ever disputed that he was their author. Nevertheless, the Jews say, that the Sanhedrim deliberated long, whether his book should form part of the canon. The great obscurity of his prophecy, in the beginning and end, was objected ; also, what he says, chap. xviii. 2—20. that the son should not bear the iniquity of his father ; which is contrary to Moses, who says, the Lord visiteth the sins of the fathers on the children to the third and fourth generation.

The orthodoxy of Ezekiel from this expression became suspected, and the Sanhedrim had it under consideration to deprive him of his prophetic character, because he taught things contrary to the law of Moses, which is the rule of faith to the Jews. But this difficulty was removed by Ananias. See Huetius, Demonstr. Evan. Prop. iv. De Prophetiâ Ezechielis. And as to the particular objection here alleged, the reader, if he pleases, may consult the commentators.

[In answer to the rabbinical remark, that this prophet seems to contradict Moses ; which disposed the Sanhedrim to reject the prophecies of Ezekiel from the canon, observe, that Moses himself says the very same thing, Deut. xxiv. 16. " The

"The fathers shall not be put to death for the children, neither shall the children be put to death for the fathers: every man shall be put to death for his own sin." For the visitation of Divine judgment on the third and fourth generation, vide FRAGMENT, No. CCCXL.]

Another reason for their thus deliberating about the suppression of his works, was, their obscurity; and principally the vision of the mysterious chariot in the first chapter.

Clemens of Alexandria says, that some believed Nazaratus the Assyrian, Pythagoras's preceptor, to be Ezekiel. But for his part, he does not believe that Pythagoras ever saw Ezekiel. That philosopher lived long after our prophet. Epiphanius and Dorotheus relate several fabulous things in the life of Ezekiel. The time and manner of his death are very uncertain. The Jews did not permit any to read this prophet, at least the beginning of his book, till they were thirty years of age.

They speak of this prophet in a very contemptuous manner. They say, he was Jeremiah's boy, puer, servant; that he was the object of raillery and ridicule to his people; for which reason he was called son of Buzi, i. e. the son of contempt, or of the despised.

Ezekiel, we know, speaks of a resurrection, chap. xxxviii. 1. and that, having been conducted into a field full of bones, the Spirit of God induced him to prophesy to these bones, which gradually were re-assembled and revived. It has been disputed, whether this event were real, or figurative: many of the Rabbins have been of opinion, that the thing did literally happen; but the generality of commentators believe, that it passed in vision only.

The Mahometans report this transaction in the following manner, says D'Herbelot, Bibl. Orient. Khaskhil. The little town of Davardan, which is dependant on the city of Vassith, having been attacked with the plague, many of the inhabitants forsook their habitations, and preserved their lives. Another year the plague broke out afresh, and all the inhabitants fled with their flocks. Having entered a large valley, two angels appeared at the two extremities of it, and declared to them from God, that they would die very suddenly: accordingly they all died, with their cattle. The inhabitants of the neighbourhood, being informed of it, came thither to bury them; but the number of the dead was so great, that they could not accomplish their design. They shut up the valley therefore with two walls at the two ends, and left a great part of the carcasses on the ground, where they were soon consumed, and nothing but the bones remained of them. The prophet Ezekiel going this way some years after, put up this prayer to God: "O Lord, as thou hast been pleased to manifest thy power upon these persons with great terror, look now upon them with an eye of clemency and mercy." God heard his prayer, and restored them to life. Such is the character of these Eastern people! there is scarcely any history which they do not disguise and embellish after their own manner. The Mussulmen make Ezekiel the successor of Caleb, son of Jephunneh, who judged Israel after the death of Joshua: which is one of the most absurd of anachronisms, [unless they intend to express similarity of character, &c. For an instance of bones unburied, vide FRAGMENT, No. XXIV.]

II. EZEKIEL, father of Shecaniah, Ezra viii. 5.

III. EZEKIEL, a Hebrew poet, who wrote a tragedy in Greek, of which Moses was the subject. Clemens of Alexandria and Eusebius have cited it. Frederic Morel published it at Paris in Greek and Latin, in 1609.

EZEL, עֶזֶל, 'Alzel, going abroad, walk; from עזל ezel: otherwise, distillation. 1 Sam. xx. 19.

EZEM, עֶזֶם, strength. 1 Chron. iv. 29.

EZER, עֶזֶר, help; from עֶזְרָה hazarah: otherwise, court; from עֶזְרָה chazarah.

II. EZER, a Gadite, 1 Chron. xii. 9.

III. EZER, son of Joshua, Neh. iii. 19.

EZER, עֶזֶר, 'Asap, treasure, or the place where provisions are kept, cellar: otherwise, that perplexes, that hinders, or retains trouble; from עַר tzar, or עֶזֶר tzur, to shut up, to afflict.

EZER, son of Seir, Gen. xxxvi. 21, 30.

EZION-GABER, עֶזְיוֹן גַּבֵּר, the wood of the man, or of the strong; from עֵץ ets, wood, and גַּבֵּר gaber, man, or the strong; otherwise, counsel; from עֵץ jahats, to counsel: [the hero of the wood, or of counsel.]

[This name might probably be analysed to advantage, by considering, 1. that we have a Beth-gaber on the coast of the Mediterranean, whereas, Ezion-gaber was on the coast of the Red Sea; and, 2. as Beth-gaber imports, "the temple of the great personage," or hero; so Ezion-gaber seems to import, "the wood of Aun, the great personage," or hero. Whether this wood were a structure of timber, which I think likely, and that from this temple arose, in process of time, a considerable town; or whether it were a grove, or wood, dedicated to Aun the hero, we cannot determine: neither are we, that I know of, able to ascertain the distance between Eloth and Ezion-gaber; but it is probable that both had trees and cultivated ground around them: Eloth certainly had. See that article.

Why should these temples be thus named, standing on the sea-shore, unless they had reference to a person connected with the idea of the sea? May this name, under that acceptance, be analysed; "the wooden structure, habitation, or ship-temple, of Aun the great?" Ship-temples of great antiquity are yet extant in Ireland.
3 X 2 standing

Simon renders it the "great spine," or back bone of a great man: meaning a rock, called the spine: and observing, that the shore of the Red Sea was rocky. This is true; but we do not know the correct situation of this town: nor whether it actually was a port on the Red Sea. It might adjoin Eloth, but whether or not on the shore of the Elanitic Gulf is uncertain.

Geber is the Rabbinical name for a cock; and the Targum of Jonathan, on Numb. xxxiv. 18, renders Ezion-gaber by "the city of the cock." Vide ANTIOCH in Pisidia, MEDALS: Also FRAGMENT on NERGAL, No. CCXII.]

EZION-GABER, a city of Arabia Deserta, on a gulf of the Red Sea, called the gulf of Elam. The Israelites came from Hebrona to Ezion-gaber thence to the wilderness of Sin. At this port Solomon equipped his fleets for the voyage to Ophir. See Elam. Josephus says, Ezion-gaber is Berenice, a famous city on the Red Sea. Antiq. lib. viii. cap. 2. But he has confounded Berenice, on the western shore of the Red Sea, with Ezion-gaber, on the opposite shore.

EZRA, עֶזְרָא help, or court. See ESDRAS.

EZRAHITE, עֶזְרָאִי, stranger; from עֶזְרָא es-rach: otherwise, oriental; from זֶרַח zarach, he is risen.

EZRI, עֶזְרִי, my help, or my court. Vide EZER. Overseer of the gardens; or of the agricultural and farming department of king David. 1 Chron. xxvii. 26.

F

FACE. The Lord promises Moses, that his face shall go before Israel; I myself, say the LXX. rather, the angel of my face. The angel of his presence, Isaiah lxiii. 9, means likewise the Messiah. Vide FRAGMENT, No. IX. The principal angels are called angels of his presence, the archangels who appear in the presence of God, who see his face, and are nearest his person. Scripture, speaking in a popular manner, frequently represents God in heaven, like the Assyrian or Persian monarch in his palace; admitting a certain number only of his principal officers to the honour of seeing and serving him. Tobit xii. 15. Rev. i. 4. Vide FRAGMENT, No. L. and ANGELS III.

Moses begs of God to shew him his face, or to manifest his glory. God replies, I will make all my goodness pass before thee; and I will proclaim my name as a signal of my presence: but my face thou canst not see; for there shall no man see it, and live! The persuasion was very prevalent in the world, that no man could support the sight of Deity. Gen. xvi. 13. xxxii. 30. Exod. xx. 19. xxiv. 11. Judg. vi. 22, 23.

We read, Num. xii. 8, that God spoke mouth to mouth with Moses, even apparently, and not in dark speeches. And in Num. xiv. 14. The Canaanites have heard that thou art among thy people, and seen face to face. Deut. v. 4. God talked with the Hebrews face to face out of the midst of the fire. All these places are to be understood simply, that God manifested himself to the Israelites; that he made them hear his voice as distinctly as if he had appeared to them face to face; but not that they actually saw him.

BREAD OF FACES; Shew-bread. See BREAD.

The face of God denotes sometimes his anger. The face of the Lord is upon those who do evil. As wax melteth before the fire, so let the wicked perish before the face of God. Psalm lxxviii. 2.

The word face is used also in a contrary sense. To consider the face of any one, to respect his person, Prov. xxviii. 21. The judge ought to shut his eyes, as not regarding any person whose cause comes before him, and to open them only to justice. Sometimes to know thy face, signifies to do a favour, Mal. i. 8, 9. Gen. xix. 21. "I have accepted thee concerning this thing also." Heb. I have accepted thy face.

To spit in one's face, is a sign of the utmost contempt. Vide FRAGMENT, No. LXXVI.

[FAIR-HAVEN, Acts xxvii. 8, is styled by Stephen the geographer, the fair shore: and there was here, he says, a great village. It was, probably, an open kind of road; not so much a port, as a bay, which did not afford more than good anchorage for a time. Jerom and others speak of it as of a town on the shore, i. e. on the open shore.]

FAITH, fides, is a virtue, whereby we hold for certain the matter affirmed; for instance, the being of a God; and we submit to those truths which God hath revealed to us. This faith, accompanied with good works, gives life to a righteous man. Rom. i. 17. Hab. ii. 4. It may be considered, either as proceeding from God, who reveals his truths to man; or from man, who assents to, and obeys, the truths of God: in both these senses it is called fides. Rom. iii. 3. "Shall the unbelief of the Jews make the faith [faithfulness] of God of none effect?" says St. Paul, i. e. his sovereign and infallible truth, or his fidelity to his word. Vide FRAGMENT, No. CXXXI.

The articles of faith acknowledged by Christians, appear in the creeds, councils, &c.

Faith is taken likewise for a firm confidence in God, whereby, relying on his promises, we address ourselves without hesitation to him, whether for pardon, or for favours: or, in the early ages of the church, for miraculous interpositions. If you have faith as a grain of mustard-seed, . . . nothing shall be impossible unto you, says our Saviour, Matth. xvii. 20. If any of you lack wisdom let him ask of God, who giveth to all men liberally; but let him ask in faith, nothing wavering, &c. Jam. i. 5, 6.

Faith is taken for honesty, fidelity in performing promises, truth; and in this sense it is applied both to God and man.

[Faith has respect to evil as well as to good; and in this it differs from Hope. Hope wishes for good only;—no man hopes for afflictions or evils. Hope desires rewards only: Faith expects punishments as well as rewards. Faith deters from bad conduct, through fear, no less than through desire of advantage. Hope allures through promises of blessings. Faith is the full assurance, or personal conviction, of the reality of things not seen. Faith looks backward to past ages, as well as forward to futurity. Hope looks only forward. By faith we believe that the world was originally created by God; though we can form no conception of, much less can we see, the matter out of which it was composed. By faith we believe the existence of ancient cities, as Babylon, Jerusalem, &c. also of distant cities, and places, as Rome, Egypt, &c. also of persons formerly living, as Abraham, David, Jesus Christ, &c. Faith anticipates things never seen as yet: so Noah by faith, built the ark, though no general deluge had ever then been witnessed; so Moses, actuated by faith in the descent of the Messiah from Israel, quitted the honours and pleasures of Egypt; and so every pious Christian, believing that what God has promised he is able to perform, looks forward with realizing belief in the existence of heaven and of hell; of rewards and punishments beyond the grave; not such as are restricted to this world; but such as coincide with the immortality of the soul, and with the power and wisdom of the Supreme and Universal Judge.

Faith is a reliance on testimony; if it be human testimony in reference to human things, it is not entitled to reception till after examination, and confirmation. Human testimony in reference to divine things, must also be scrupulously investigated before it be received and acted on; since the grossest of all deceptions have been imposed on mankind in the name of God. Nor is testimony, assuming itself to be divine, entitled to our adherence or affection, or obedience, till after its character is proved to be genuine, and really from Heaven. The more genuine it is, the more readily will it undergo and sustain the trial; and the more clearly will its character appear. It is much to be regretted, that the delusions practised by impostors, should render the duty of examination and scrutiny so imperative and so difficult on this subject; and usually those who are most forward to enforce their principles of faith, are least entitled and least qualified so to do. But after a testimony, a maxim, or a command, is proved to be Divine, it does not become a creature so ignorant and so feeble as man, to doubt its possibility, or to dispute the obedience to which it is entitled; or to question the beneficial consequences attached to it, though not immediately apparent.]

[FAITHFUL, an appellation given in Scripture to professing Christians; to all who had been baptized: and it has continued to this day in that application in ecclesiastical language.

It is applied to individuals; to Timothy. 1 Cor. iv. 17; to Tychicus, Eph. iv. 21; to Onesimus, Col. iv. 9; to Silvanus, 1 Peter. v. 12; to the mother of Timothy, Acts xvi. 1; to Lydia, ver. 15. See also 2 Cor. vi. 15. 2 Tim. v. 16, et al plur.

It is applied to churches, as communities. Eph. i. 1. Col. i. 2.

The apostle directs Titus, chap. i. 6, that the children of the bishop should be faithful; no doubt, as examples to the flock; of the dedication of the children of the clergy to the Most Holy Trinity, by the introductory ordinance of Christianity.]

FAMINE. Scripture records several famines in Palestine, and the neighbouring countries; Gen. xii. 10, in the time of Abraham; and chap. xxvi. 1. in the time of Isaac. The most remarkable famine, is that of seven years in Egypt, while Joseph was governor. It is distinguished for continuance, extent, and severity: particularly, larly, as Egypt is one of the countries least subject to such a calamity, by reason of its general fruitfulness.

Famine is sometimes a natural effect, as when the Nile does not overflow in Egypt, or rains do not fall in Judæa, at the customary seasons, spring and autumn; or when the caterpillars, the maybugs, or locusts, swarm and destroy the fruits. The prophet Joel notices these last causes of famine. He compares locusts to a numerous and terrible army ravaging the land. Joel i.

Famine was also an effect of God's anger. The Lord called for a famine, and it came upon the land seven years, 2 Kings viii. 1, 2. The prophets frequently threaten Israel with the sword of famine, or with war and famine, evils that generally go together.

Amos (viii. 11.) threatens another sort of famine: I will send a famine in the land, not a famine of bread, nor a thirst for water, but of hearing the words of the Lord.

FASTING has in all ages and among all nations been practised in times of mourning, sorrow, and affliction. It is in some sort inspired by nature, which, under these circumstances, refuses nourishment, and suspends the cravings of hunger. We see no example of fasting, properly so called, before Moses; whether the patriarchs had not observed it, which yet is hard to believe, since there were great mournings among them, which are particularly described; as that of Abraham for Sarah, and that of Jacob for Joseph; or whether he did not think it necessary to mention it expressly. It appears by the law, that devotional fasts for expiation of sins, were common among the Israelites. Moses ordains, that if a married woman vows to keep any fast in the way of supererogation, unless her husband contradict it, she shall perform her vow. I say nothing of the forty days which Moses passed in fasting on mount Horeb, because that fast was out of the common rules of nature. Exod. xxiv. 18. Deut. x. 10. [And so also was the fasting of Jesus in the wilderness. Matth. iv. 2. Luke iv. 2.]

Since Moses, examples of fasting have been common among the Jews; but the fasts of their calendar are later than the law. Moses enjoins no particular fast, except that on the solemn day of Expiation, which was generally and strictly observed. Joshua and the elders of Israel remained prostrate before the ark from morning till evening without eating, after Israel was defeated at Ai, Josh. vii. 6. The eleven tribes which fought against that of Benjamin, fell down before the ark on their faces, and so continued till evening without eating. Judg. xx. 26. Vide also 1 Sam. vii. 6. David fasted while the first child he had by Bathsheba was sick. 2 Sam. xii. 16. The prophets, John Baptist, and the apostles, on many occasions, fasted.

The heathen sometimes fasted: the king of Nineveh, terrified by Jonah's preaching, ordered that not only men, but beasts also, should continue without eating or drinking; should be covered with sackcloth, and each after their manner should cry to the Lord. Jonah iii. 5, 6. The Jews, in times of public calamity, appointed extraordinary fasts, and made even the children at the breast fast, see Joel ii. 16. Some of the Fathers have affirmed the same of the fast observed by the Ninevites. Virgil, Ecl. v. introduces a shepherd saying, that his very cattle fasted at the death of Cæsar.

The Jews in their fasts begin the observance of them in the evening after sun-set, and remain without eating till the same hour the next day, or till the rising of the stars: on the great day of Expiation, when they are more strictly obliged to fast, they continue without eating for twenty-eight hours. Men are obliged to fast from the age of full thirteen, and women from the age of full eleven years. Children from the age of seven years fast in proportion to their strength. During this fast, they not only abstain from food, but from bathing, from perfumes, odours, and anointing. They go barefoot, and are continent. This is the idea which the eastern people have generally of fasting: it is a total abstinence from pleasures of every kind. On the great day of Expiation, the Samaritans make infants fast; some say, while at the breast: whereas, the Jews do not require children to fast till they are seven years old.

The principal fast days of the Jews, may be seen under the articles of their months, as ABIB, &c. or, in the CALENDAR.

Beside these fasts, which are common to all Jews, though not with equal obligation, others which are devotional, are practised by the most zealous and pious. The Pharisee says, Luke xviii. 12. I fast twice a week, i. e. Monday and Thursday; on Thursday, in memory of Moses' going up mount Sinai on that day; on Monday, in memory of his coming down from thence. It is said, some Pharisees fasted four days in the week.

Some of the antients supposed that the Jews fasted every sabbath-day. Justin, Histor. lib. xxxvi. says, that Moses and the Israelites, having wandered seven days in the deserts of Arabia without sustenance, they consecrated the sabbath-day, which is the seventh day, as a perpetual fast. Augustus in his letter to Tiberius tells him, that no Jew ever kept the fast on the sabbath-day, as he did the day on which he wrote to him, Sueton. in August. Juvenal says, (Satyr.

(Satyr. 6.) that the very kings of the Jews fast on the sabbath-day, and go barefooted :

Exercent ubi festa mero pede sabbata reges.

And Martial (lib. iv. Epigr. 4.) attributes the ill smell peculiar to the Jews, to their fasting on the sabbath. But these authors were ill informed. The Jews not only do not fast on the sabbath-day, but all fasting on that day is expressly forbid by their doctors.

We read in the Mishna, (Tract. Taanith. n. 8. p. 368.) the determination of the sages, that it was not lawful to fast on days of festivals, and on certain others; fasting was likewise prohibited on the day before, and according to some doctors, on the day after, too. Maimonides and Barthenora observe on this, that the old calendar of the Jewish feasts was lost in their time: that they disregarded the custom of not fasting the evening before, or the day after a festival, or even on the old feast-days themselves, which were then no longer observed. In the Greek of Judith, we read, that she fasted every day, except the eves of the sabbaths, and the sabbaths; and the eves of the new moons, and the new moons; and the feasts and solemn days of the house of Israel. Here is an instance of the practice which we have been remarking in the Mishna.

On fast-days in the morning, confessions are added to the prayers, and the recital of such melancholy accidents as happened on such a day, and occasioned the fast then celebrating: the law is opened, and part of Exodus xxxii. 11. is read: And Moses besought the Lord his God, and said, Lord, why doth thy wrath wax hot against thy people, which thou hast brought forth out of the land of Egypt, &c. In the afternoon, in the prayer of Mincha, or the offering, the same is read again, with Isaiah lv. 6. Seek the Lord while he may be found, call upon him while he is near, &c.

Some Jews voluntarily abstain from meat and wine from the 17th of Tammuz to the 9th of Ab, (three weeks) because all these days have been unfortunate to Israel. Ab 9th, (Ab is July and August, O. S.) in memory of the temple burnt by Nebuchadnezzar, and afterwards by Titus, the Jews continue fasting, neither eating nor drinking, bare-footed, and without shoes, and without washing themselves, from about an hour before sun-set till the next day, when the stars appear. In the evening of the vigil, after the common prayer in the synagogue, they sit on the ground, and read the Lamentations of Jeremiah: they repeat this the next day, adding other lamentations to them; continuing sorrowful all the day, not being permitted to study in the law, but in Job, Jeremiah, and other melancholy subjects. The sabbath which follows this fast is called Nacama, i. e. consolation, because they then read Isaiah, chap. xl. Comfort ye, comfort ye my people, saith your God, speak ye comfortably to Jerusalem, &c. and comfort themselves with the hope of the re-establishment of Jerusalem and the temple.

Beside the general fasts of the whole nation, others are peculiar to every country; the German Jews, after the feasts of passover and tabernacles, have a custom to fast three days; viz. on the two following Mondays and the Thursday between them. This is founded on an apprehension, that as the preceding feasts were of eight days continuance, they might have offended God in some part of that time. For the same reason they fast on the last day of the year; and some fast on the last day in every month.

If as penance, or particular devotion, some fast beyond the time above-mentioned, they pronounce these words before sun-set: "I undertake to fast to-morrow." After which, they remain without eating or drinking from that hour to the same hour next day, adding a prayer, wherein they beg of God, that their fast may supply for them the room of sacrifice. On this day they lie on a harder bed than usual, lessen the number of their pillows, change their fine sheets for coarser, &c. Buxtorf, Synag. Jud. Part i. cap. 4.

If any one dreams of something bad or unfortunate, and this dream gives him uneasiness, he fasts that day most rigidly, neither eating nor drinking from evening to evening. This kind of fast seems to be of such consequence to them, that they may observe it even on the sabbath-day, or other festival.

In the evening, when his fast concludes, he who had dreamed, sends for three of his friends before he goes to rest, and says seven times to them, May my dream be happy! to which they answer every time, May it be happy, may God make it so! They add some passages out of the prophets, and that he may presee well of the forgiveness of his sins, they repeat to him, Go thy way, eat thy bread with joy, and drink thy wine with a merry heart, for God now accepteth thy works, Eccles. ix. 7. After which he may eat.

They have great confidence, that fasting will either procure a happy interpretation of their dreams, or avert the ill effects of them; they hold, that fasting is with respect to dreams, what fire is to the tow which it sets on fire and burns: Basnage, Hist. des Juifs, tom. v. lib. vii. cap. 18. art. iv. If any one falls sick, sets out on a dangerous journey, or is taken prisoner, they fast to obtain his health or deliverance. A child who has loved his father tenderly, fasts yearly yearly on the day of his death. "The very Magicians fast, in order to conjure up the souls of the dead, and the devils in hell: with much more reason then," say the sages, "should good men fast, to engage the Spirit of God to rest upon them."

The Rabbins maintain, that it is not allowable to fast in March, because in this month the Israelites departed out of Egypt, and it should be intirely consecrated to joy and gratitude. Some however fast on the day of Miriam's death, because at that time the people wanting water at Kadesh-barnea, murmured against God. Numb. xx.

Some Jews believe it lawful to eat till the morning of that day on which they are to fast: and that it is sufficient to continue the whole day from break of day till the rising of the stars, without nourishment. On fast-days meat being forbidden, they content themselves with some particular herbs, for all kinds of herbs are not permitted; butter is prohibited, but not eggs.

The Mussulmen, in imitation of the Christians, fast the whole month of Ramadan, which is the ninth of the Arabian year. This month is lunar, and shifts successively through all seasons of the year. They neither eat, drink, nor smoke, the whole day, from morning to the rising of the stars. After which they eat and drink as much as they please, all night; only wine is more strictly forbidden on these occasions than at other times: some have been condemned to swallow melted lead, for having violated this prohibition.

No one is excused from fasting, neither women, soldiers, travellers, labourers, nor artificers, poor nor rich; the Sultan fasts as well as others. The sick, who are unable to keep the fast of Ramadan, are obliged to fast some other month after their recovery. In those hot countries thirst is very troublesome to travellers and labourers; but they must endure it: or if they break their fast, they must resolve to fast as many days some other time. The generality continue in repose all day, avoiding exercises which might cause drought.

As to fasts observed by Christians, it does not appear by his own practice, or by his commands to his disciples, that our Lord instituted any particular fast. But when the Pharisees reproached him, that his disciples did not fast so often as theirs', or as John the Baptist's, he replied, Can ye make the children of the bride-chamber fast, while the bridegroom is with them? but the days will come, when the bridegroom shall be taken away from them, and then shall they fast in those days, Luke v. 34, 35. Accordingly, the life of the apostles and first believers was a life of self-denials, of sufferings, austerities, and fastings: St. Paul says, 2 Cor. vi. 5. xi. 27. he had been, and still daily was, in hunger and thirst, in fastings often. He exhorts the faithful to imitate him in his patience, in his watchings, in his fastings. Ordinations and other acts of importance in the church were attended with fasting and prayers. The fasts of Wednesday and Friday, called stations, and that of Lent, particularly of the holy week, have been thought to be of early institution.

One cannot be sufficiently astonished at the extreme remissness which is become general among Christians in respect to fasting: particularly in the Latin church, and in the West.

FAT. God forbid the Hebrews to eat the fat of beasts, Lev. iii. 17. All the fat is the Lord's. It shall be a perpetual statute for your generations throughout all your dwellings, that ye eat neither fat nor blood. Some interpreters take these words literally, and suppose fat as well as blood to be forbid. Josephus says, Moses forbids only the fat of oxen, goats, sheep, and their species, which agrees with Lev. vii. 23. Ye shall eat no manner of fat, of ox, or of sheep, or of goat. The modern Jews observe this, but the fat of other sorts of clean creatures, they think is allowed for use, conformably to Levit. vii. 24. And the fat of the beast that dieth of itself, and the fat of that which is torn with beasts, may be used in any other use: but ye shall in no wise eat it.

Others maintain, that the law which forbids the use of fat, should be restricted to fat separated from the flesh, such as that which covers the kidneys and intestines; and this only in the case of its being offered in sacrifice: which is confirmed by Lev. vii. 25. Whosoever eateth of the fat of the beast, of which men offer an offering made by fire unto the Lord, even the soul that eateth it, shall be cut off from his people.

Fat in the Hebrew style signifies not only that of beasts, but the richer, or prime part of other things. He should have fed them with the fat of wheat, Psal. lxxxi. 16. cxlvii. 15. Fat expresses likewise the source of compassion or mercy. As the bowels are stirred at the recital of misfortune, or at the view of melancholy and afflicted objects, it has been thought that sensibility resided principally in the bowels, which are commonly fat. The Psalmist reproaches the wicked with shutting up their bowels, feeling no compassion at the sight of his extreme grief. Mine enemies compass me about, they are enclosed in their own fat, Psalm xvii. 10. In another passage he says, prodiit quasi ex adipe iniquitas eorum, they sinned with affectation, almost like Jeshurun, who, when waxed fat, he kicked, and forgot God that formed him, Deut. xxii. 15.

The fat of the earth signifies the dung or marle wherewith the soil is fattened. The fat of the earth implies likewise the fruitfulness of the land. God give thee of the dew of heaven, and the fatness of the earth, and plenty of corn and wine. Gen. xxxvii. 28.

Fat denotes abundance of good things: I will satiate the souls of the priests with fatness, Jer. xxxi. 14. Thy table shall be full of fatness, Job. xxxvi. 16. My soul shall be satisfied as with marrow and fatness, Psalm lxviii. 5.

FATHER. This word, besides the common acceptance of it for immediate father, is taken in Scripture for grandfather, great-grandfather, or the author and first father of a family, how remote soever. So the Jews in our Saviour's time did, and their descendants of the present generation do, and their posterity, to the consummation of ages, will, call Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, their fathers. Jesus Christ is called son of David, though David was many generations distant from him. Vide FRAGMENTS, Nos. XV. CCCXXIX. et seq.

By father is likewise understood the institutor, the original practiser, or master of a certain profession. Jabal was father of such as dwell in tents, and such as have cattle. Tubal was father of all such as handle the harp and organ, or flute, &c. Gen. iv. 20—22. Huram is called father by the king of Tyre, 2 Chron. ii. 13, and 2 Chron. iv. 16. even to Solomon, because he was the principal workman, and chief director of their undertakings. The principals of the prophets were considered as fathers of the younger, who were their disciples; who are called sons of the prophets, and who style the eldest fathers. My father, my father, the chariot of Israel, and the horsemen thereof. 2 Kings ii. 12.

Father is a term of respect given by inferiors to superiors, and by servants to their masters. My father, said Naaman's servants to him, if the prophet had bid thee do some great thing, 2 Kings v. 13. The king of Israel addresses the prophet Elisha, My father, shall I smite them? 2 Kings vi. 21. Rechab, the institutor of the Rechabites, is called their father;—Jonadab son of Rechab, our father, Jerem. xxxv. 6.

A man is said to be a father to the poor and orphans, when he supplies their necessities, and sympathises with their miseries, as a father would do towards them: I was a father to the poor, says Job, xxix. 16. God declares himself to be the father of the fatherless, and judge of the widow, Psalm lxviii. 6.

God is frequently called heavenly father, and simply father: eminently the Father, creator, preserver, and protector of all, especially of those who invoke him, and serve him. Is he not thy father that bought thee? says Moses, PART XII. Edit. IV.

Deut. xxxii. 6. Since the coming of Jesus Christ, we have a new right to call God our Father, by reason of the adoption and filiation which our Saviour has merited for us, by clothing himself in our humanity, and purchasing us by his death: "Ye have received the spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father. The spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God." Rom. viii. 15.

Job intitles God the father of rain; who produces it, who causes it to fall. He says, I have said to corruption, thou art my father: In the condition to which I am reduced, and that to which I expect to be reduced in the grave, I look on worms and putrefaction as my near kin.

Joseph says, that God had made him a father to Pharoah, had given him great authority in that prince's kingdom; that Pharoah looked on him as his father, and had given him the government of his house and dominions. [GRAND VIZIR.] See FRAGMENTS, CXII. CLXVII.

The devil is denoted the father of the wicked; Ye are of your father the devil, John viii. 44. Ye would imitate the deeds of your father, says Jesus Christ to the Jews; he was a murderer from the beginning, and ye plot my death. He is a liar, and the father of falsehood: he deceived Eve and Adam; he introduced sin and falsehood; he inspires his followers with his spirit and sentiments.

The prophets reproach the wicked Jews with calling idols, my father. In reality they said so, if not in words, since they adored them as gods. [The heathen gave the name father to several of their divinities;—as, to Jupiter, "father of gods and men;" father Jove, &c. and to Bacchus, Liber Pater, &c. These appellations the idolatrous Jews repeated and imitated.]

The father of Sichein, the father of Tekoah, the father of Bethlechem, &c. the chief person who inhabits these cities; he who built, or rebuilt them.

To be gathered to their fathers, to sleep with their fathers, are common expressions, signifying death. [Perhaps, often, (and originally) interment in the same sepulchre.]

Jesus Christ is called, (Isa. ix. 6.) the Everlasting Father, because by him we are begotten in God for eternity; he procures life eternal to us, by adopting us to be sons of God, and by the communication of his merits. [rather, "father of the everlasting—the Gospel—age."'] St. Paul says of God, he is the Father of spirits, Heb. xii. 9. Our natural fathers are fathers of our bodies only, but God is the Father of our spirits; he not only creates them, but he justifies them likewise, and glorifies them. Jesus Christ, (Matt. xxiii. 9.) forbids us to call any man "father," because we have one in heaven. [Rather, to call no man father, in the same sense as the sons of the prophets called their teacher father: to follow no earthly leader; to follow blindly the dictates of no man, however eminent or dignified; but to obey God only.] Not that we should abandon, or despise, earthly fathers; God requires us to honour that relation; but, when the glory of God is at stake, or our salvation, if our fathers and our mothers are obstacles, we should say to them, "We know you not;" and to God, "Doubtless thou art our Father, though Abraham be ignorant of us, and Israel acknowledge us not; thou, O Lord, art our Father, our Redeemer," Isaiah lxiii. 16.

Adam is the first father, the father of the living; Abraham is the father of the faithful, the father of the circumcision; called also the father of many nations, because many people sprung from him; as the Jews, the Ishmaelites, Edomites, Arabs, &c.

FEAR is sometimes used for the object of fear; as the fear of Isaac, i. e. the God whom Isaac feared, Gen. xxxi. 42. God, says, that he will send his fear before his people, to terrify and destroy the inhabitants of Canaan. Job, vi. 4, speaks of the terrors of God, as set in array against him; the Psalmist, (lxxxviii. 15.) that he had suffered the terrors of the Lord with a troubled mind.

[The FEAR of God is the beginning of wisdom; and to fear God, and keep his commandments, is the whole duty of man. It deserves notice, that true religion is more frequently described as the fear of God, in the Old Testament than in the New: one reason of which might be the temporal sanctions annexed to the Sovereignty of God, as it respected the nation of the Jews: and which, under the Gospel, are not applicable to all nations of the earth to whom the Gospel is sent, and to whom the most wonderful and supreme instance of Divine love is now revealed. We read, that "God is love," and to be loved; not that God is fear, and to be feared, i. e. dreaded; though we read of godly fear, Heb. xii. 28. and of the fear of God, as shewing itself in reciprocal affection between Christian brethren. 2 Cor. vii. 1. Eph. v. 21. Comp. Rom. viii. 15. 2 Tim. i. 7.]

FEASTS. God appointed several festivals among the Jews to perpetuate the memory of great events, wrought in favour of this people: the Sabbath commemorated the creation of the world; the Passover, the departure out of Egypt; the Pentecost, the law given at Sinai, &c. 2. To keep them firm to their religion, by the view of ceremonies, and the majesty of divine service. 3. To procure them certain pleasures, and allowable times of rest: for their festivals were accompanied with rejoicings, feasts, and innocent diversions. 4. To give them instruction; for in their religious assemblies the law of God was read and explained. 5. To renew the acquaintance, correspondence, and friendship, of their tribes and families, which, coming from distant towns in the country, met three times a year, in the holy city.

The first, and most ancient of feasts, the Sabbath, the seventh day of the week, commemorated the creation; The Lord blessed the seventh day, and sanctified it, says Moses, because that in it he had rested from all his work, Gen. ii. 3. Some of the ancient Fathers and Rabbins were of opinion, that the sabbath had been observed from the beginning of the world. But the general opinion is, that people did not cease from labour on that day, till after the command of God to the Israelites, after their coming out of Egypt, when they were encamped at Marah. Vide FRAGMENT, No. XX.

The Sabbatical Year, which returned every seven years, and was set apart for rest, and the Jubilee year, at the end of seven times seven years, or the forty-ninth year, were a kind of feasts, and may be considered as consequences of the sabbath.

The Passover was instituted in memory of the Israelites' departure out of Egypt, and of the favour which God shewed them in sparing their first-born, when he killed the first-born of the Egyptians, Exod. xii. 14, et seq. See PASSOVER.

The feast of Pentecost was celebrated on the fiftieth day after the passover, in memory of the law being given to Moses on mount Sinai, fifty days after the departure out of Egypt. They reckoned seven weeks from the passover to pentecost, beginning at the day after the passover. The Hebrews call it the feast of weeks, the Christians call it Pentecost, a Greek word, which signifies the fiftieth day.

The FEAST of Trumpets was celebrated on the first day of the civil year, on which the trumpets sounded, proclaiming the beginning of the year, which was in the month Tizri, (September, O. S.) It was rather a civil feast, than a sacred solemnity. We know no religious cause of its establishment. Moses commands it to be observed as a day of rest, and appoints particular sacrifices for it.

The New Moons, or first days of every month, were in some sort a consequence of the feast of trumpets. The law did not oblige people to rest on this day, but ordained only some particular sacrifices. It appears, that on these days also, the trumpet was sounded, and entertainments were made. 1 Sam. xx. 5—18. See NEW MOONS.

FEAST of Expiation, Chippur, or Pardon, on the tenth day of Tizri, which was the first day of the civil year, was instituted for a general expiation of sins, inadvertencies, and pollutions of all Israel, from the high priest to the lowest of the people, committed by them throughout the year. Levit. xxiii, 27, 28. Numb. xxix. 7. See EXPIATION.

The FEAST of Tents, or Tabernacles, on which all Israel was obliged to attend the temple, and to dwell eight days under tents of foliage, in memory of their fathers dwelling forty years in tents, as travellers, in the wilderness. It was kept on the fifteenth of Tizri, the first month of the civil year. The first and seventh day of this feast were very solemn. But during the other days of the octave, they might work. See Lev. xxiii. 34, 35. and Numb. xxix. 12, 13. At the beginning of the feast, two vessels of silver were carried in procession to the temple, one full of water, the other of wine, which were poured at the foot of the altar of burnt-offerings on the seventh day, always, of this festival.

Of the three great feasts of the year, the Passover, Pentecost, and that of Tabernacles, the octave, i. e. the seventh day after these feasts, was a day of rest as much as the festival itself; and all the males of the nation were obliged to visit the temple on these feasts. But the law did not require them to continue there during the whole octave; except in the feast of Tabernacles, when they seem to be obliged to be present for the whole seven days.

Beside these feasts, we find the feast of lots, or Purim, instituted on occasion of the Jews' deliverance from Haman's plot, in the reign of Ahasuerus. See PURIM.

The FEAST of the Dedication of the Temple, or rather of the restoration of the temple, which had been profaned by Antiochus Epiphanes, was celebrated in winter; and is believed to be the feast named Encania, John x. 22. See DEDICATION. The account of it is in 1 Macc. iv. 52. Josephus adds, that this was called the feast of lights, probably because this happiness befell them when least expected, and they looked on it as a new light risen on them.

Leo of Modena is more particular in relating the manner of celebrating this feast. He says, the ancient sages appointed the celebration of it in memory of the victory obtained by Judas Maccabæus over the Greeks. The first day they light up one lamp, two on the second, and so continue to the last, till eight are lighted. This is founded on the ensuing story, namely, while the enemies were masters of the city and temple, and were profaning the latter, Joshanan and his sons drove them from thence, and defeated them; and, as at his return there was no pure oil to be found, in order to light up the lamps in the candlestick with seven branches: they met with some in a little carved vessel, enough to burn one night, but miraculously this oil lasted eight nights; which obliged them, in memory of this event, to light as many lamps, as mentioned.

In this festival is likewise celebrated Judith's enterprize against Holofernes; though, as some say, it was not executed in the same season.

During these eight days, people may work, and carry on their trades; for all the service consists in the order of lighting these lamps, and in adding to the usual prayers a thanksgiving for this victory, and every morning the cxxiith and following Psalms, with the xxxth. There was likewise some small difference as to eating. This feast is called Hanucha, i. e. exercise, or renewing, because they then began to restore those religious exercises which had been interrupted.

September 21, the Jews keep a feast, as they call it, of branches, in memory of the taking of Jericho.

In the same month, the feast of the collections, because they collect for the expence of the sacrifices.

They have likewise a festival for the death of Nicanor. 1 Macc. vii. 48, 49. 2 Macc. xv. 37.

The feast for the discovery of the sacred fire in the time of Nehemiah, 2 Macc. i. 18.

The feast called Xylophoria, on which wood in great quantity was carried to the temple. Joseph. de Bello, lib. ii. cap. 17.

In the Christian church we have no festival that appears clearly to have been instituted by Jesus Christ, or his apostles: nevertheless, as we commemorate his passion as often as we celebrate his supper, he has hereby seemed to institute a perpetual feast. Christians have always celebrated the memory of his resurrection, and they keep this feast on every Sunday. We see, Rev. i. 10. that this day was called commonly the Lord's Day. Barnabas says, Epist. p. 56, we celebrate the eighth day with joy, because on that day Jesus Christ rose from the dead. The same say Ignatius the Martyr, Justin, Irenæus, Tertullian, and Origen.

[It appears clearly from Scripture, that after the promulgation of the Gospel, the apostles and Jewish Christians kept the Jewish feasts: but these being national, did not concern other nations; nor could other nations come from their distant residences to attend at Jerusalem. But, so early as we can trace, and certainly as early as the second century, the Gentile Christians kept certain feasts analogous to those of the Jewish Passover and Pentecost;—that is to say, Easter, or rather the Pascha, on which was commemorated the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ; and Whitsuntide, on which was commemorated the descent of the Holy Spirit: this was a favourite time for receiving baptism; and the white robes then worn by the new faithfuls, gave name to the season. Some have thought that Easter was kept, in the Christian sense, by the apostles; and that it is referred to, 1 Cor. v. 8. As no Jewish feast fell about Christmas, there is no probability of any substitution in this festival, as in the others.]

FELIX, vide CLAUDIUS II.

FERRET, a sort of weazel, with a long snout and thick tail; it has four teeth. Moses declares it unclean. Levit. xi. 30. The Greek μυγάλι, mygale, is compounded of mus, a rat, and gale, a weasel, because this animal has something of both. The Hebrew מנחם anach, is by some translated hedgehog, by others leech, or salamander: by Bochart, a lizard. See NAT. HIST.

FESTUS PORTIUS, succeeded Felix in the government of Judæa, A. D. 60. Felix, to oblige the Jews when he resigned his government, left St. Paul in bonds at Cæsarea in Palestine. Acts xxiv. 27. Festus, at his first coming to Jerusalem was entreated by the principal Jews to condemn Paul, or to order him up to Jerusalem; they having conspired to assassinate him in the way. Festus answered, it was not customary with the Romans to condemn any man without hearing him; but said he would hear their accusations against Paul at Cæsarea. Paul appealed to Cæsar; and so secured himself from the prosecution of the Jews, and the intentions of Festus.

Festus finding how much robbing abounded in Judæa, very diligently pursued the thieves: he suppressed a magician, who drew the people after him into the desert. He died in Judæa about the beginning of A. D. 62. Albinus succeeded him.

FIG, FIG-TREE. This tree and its fruit were common in Palestine, and are often mentioned in Scripture. Our first parents covered their nakedness with fig-leaves, either from common fig-trees, or from some of another kind, whose leaves were much larger. Gen. iii. 7.

Amos, vii. 14, being reproved by Amaziah priest of Bethel for prophesying against the kingdom of Israel, replied, I was no prophet, neither a prophet's son; but I was a herdsman, and a gatherer of wild figs, or sycamore fruit: or rather a dresser, a scratcher, or pricker, of them. Scalpando tantùm ferrets unguibus, aliter non maturescit, says Pliny; but it ripens four days after it is pricked.

To live in peace under our own vine and our own fig-tree, represents a time of happiness and prosperity. Micah v. 4. Zech. iii. 10. 1 Mac. xiv. 12.

To FIND, to meet with, is used sometimes for to attack, to surprize one's enemies, to light on them suddenly, &c. so Anah, he found the Emim. Gen. xxvi. 24. (Vide EMIM.) So the verb to find is used, Judg. i. 5. they found Adonibezek in Bezek, i. e. they attacked him there. 1 Sam. xxxi. 3, the Philistine archers found king Saul, they attacked him. 1 Kings xiii. 24, a lion found him in the way, and slew him, attacked and killed him.

It is said of a man smitten by God, that he is no more found: et non inventus est locus ejus, he has disappeared. Comp. Psalm xxvii. 10. Job vii. 10. xx. 9.

To find favour in the sight of any one, is an expressive form of speech common in Scripture.

FINGER. The finger of God, his power, his operation. Pharaoh's magicians discovered the finger of God in some of the miracles of Moses. Exod. viii. 19. That legislator gave the tables written with the finger of God to the Hebrews, Exod. xxxi. 18. The heavens were the work of God's fingers. Psalm viii. 3. Jesus Christ says, he casts out devils with the finger of God, [may not finger signify the same as hand? i. e. AUTHORITY] Luke xi. 20.

To put forth one's FINGER, is a bantering gesture. If thou take away from the midst of thee the chain or yoke wherewith thou overwelmeest thy creditors, and forbear pointing at them, and using jeering and insulting gestures, Isaiah lix. 8. Some take this for a menacing gesture, as Nicanor stretched out his hand against the temple, threatening to burn it. 2 Macc.

FIRE. God often appeared in fire, or surrounded with fire; as in the burning bush, on mount Sinai. Fire is a symbol of deity: The Lord thy God, says Moses, is a consuming fire. Deut. iv. 24. He appeared to Isaiah, Ezekiel, and St. John, in the midst of fire. The Psalmist describes the chariot of God as a flame. Psalm xviii. 9, 10. God threatens to appear in fire at his second coming. Daniel says (vii. 10.) that a fiery stream issued from before him. The wrath of God is compared to fire; also the effects of his wrath, war, famine, and other scourges. Fire is often put for thunder, lightning, the fire of heaven. 2 Kings i. 10.

Angels, as ministers of God, are compared to fire. Psal. civ. 4. Fire from heaven fell on certain victims sacrificed to the Lord, as a mark of approbation. It is thought that God in this manner accepted Abel's sacrifice. When Abraham made a covenant with the Lord, a fire passed between between the divided pieces of the sacrifices. [q. the Shekinah?] Fire fell on the sacrifice offered by Moses at the dedication of the tabernacle, Lev. ix. 24. on that of Manoh, Judg. xiii. 19, 20. on Solomon's at the dedication of the temple, 2 Chr. vii. on Elijah's at mount Carmel, 1 Kings xviii. 38. on Nehemiah's at the return from the captivity, 2 Macc. i. 19, and ii. 10.

A perpetual fire was kept up in the temple, on the altar of burnt-sacrifices, maintained by burning wood continually on it.

Besides this fire, there were several kitchens in the temple, where the provisions of the priests and the peace-offerings were dressed.

The Chaldeans, Persians, and some other people of the East, adored fire. Several have been of opinion, that Abraham was thrown into a fire, because he refused to worship this element. Nebuchadnezzar commanded Daniel's three companions to be cast into a fiery furnace, because they refused to adore his golden statue: but God suspended the effect of that fire.

HELL-FIRE is described clearly in the Old Testament. Moses says to Israel, A fire is kindled in my anger, and shall burn unto the lowest hell, and shall consume the earth with her increase, and set on fire the foundations of the mountains. Here hell-fire and the place of torment is seated in the deepest part of the earth. Isaiah is express, (xxxiii. 14.) Who among us shall dwell with devouring fire? Who among us shall dwell with everlasting burnings? Also, chap. lvi. 24. They shall go forth, and look on the carcasses of the men that have transgressed against me, for their worm shall not die, neither shall their fire be quenched. So Ecclus. vii. 17. The vengeance of the ungodly is fire and worms.

Our Saviour in the gospel uses the same similitude, Matth. xxv. 41. He speaks of eternal fire prepared for the devil, his angels, and reprobates. It is needless to produce passages, since this is admitted. John, Rev. xx. 14, 15, saw a lake of fire, into which the beast and his false prophet were cast, and which was the portion of infidels, murderers, and abominable persons. Fire is a common symbol of God's vengeance.

But whether this is to be understood of an elementary and material fire, or of a metaphorical fire, of a common living and sensible worm, or of an allegorical and figurative worm; i. e. whether the fire of hell consists only in vehement anguish, and the worm is remorse and despair, is what the doctors and Fathers are divided about. Origen has taught in several places, that the flames of hell, and the worm of the damned, were not real. St. Ambrose says, in Luc. xiv. lib. 7. Nec corporaliu aliquis stridor dentium, nec ignis aliquis perpetuus flammarum corporaliu, neque vermis est corporalis. This fire, adds he, is only bitterness for passed sins; the worm is remorse of conscience. St. Jerom acknowledges it to be the opinion of several, that the fire of the damned is only the sting and trouble of their conscience. Ignis qui non exstinguitur, a plerisque conscientia accipitur delictorum. St. Gregory of Nice is clearly of this opinion; and St. John Damascenus says expressly, that it is not a material fire; and that men in this life know not what it is. This sentiment is still common among the Greeks; and at the council of Florence they maintained, that the fire of purgatory was not a real fire.

But in the Latin church, the common opinion is, that the damned are tormented with real fire, and are gnawed by a real worm, which does not die. But how can an elementary fire, or a living worm operate on the soul, which is a spiritual substance? St. Austin replies, Why should not this be credible of the soul when separated from the body, since the mind of man, which certainly is not corporeal, does actually experience the pain of fire? for, after all, it is not strictly the body which suffers heat, or cold, or pain; it is the soul, united to that body. And why should not devils, and the souls of the damned, be inseparably linked to the fire that burns them, and the worm which gnaws them, as well as our soul is during our life united to our body? Adhærebunt ergo spiritus dæmonum, imo spiritus dæmonis, licet incorporei, corporeis ignibus cruciandi; non ut ignes isti quibus adhærebunt, eorum jacturâ inspirantur, et animalia fiant; sed, ut dixi, miris et ineffabilibus modis adhærendo, accipientes ex ignibus panem, non dantes ignibus vitam. De Civil. cap. 10. De Fide et Op. cap. 15.

St. Cyprian represents hell as a smoking gulf of active devouring fire. St. Chrysostom describes rivers of flames, and waves of fire, which beset the damned without consuming them. St. Jerom acknowledges, that hell contains two very real torments, excessive cold, and burning fire; and the author printed under his name, on Job, says, that hell-fire is no common one that requires fuel to keep it up, but is preserved and continues of itself. St. Gregory the Great says the same thing in a very particular manner: Gehennæ ignis cum sit corporeus, et in se missos reprobos corporaliter exuret, nec studio humano succenditur, nec lignis nutritur, sed creatus semel durat inextinguibilis, &c. The schoolmen for the most part have adopted this opinion.

[It is an ingenious thought, that the allusion, Isaiah lvi. 24. Mark ix. 44. is to the different modes of consuming dead bodies among the ancients;—by burning, and by burial: q. d. “the punishments in the future state will not become become extinct, as fire must needs be extinguished when the subject of it, i. e. the body, is consumed; nor will they cease to exist, as the body ceases to exist when it is wholly perished in the earth, or wholly consumed by worms, which worms themselves shall die: but as the spirit survives, so its punishments shall continue. This interpretation accepts the punishments spoken of as wholly spiritual, and as existing independently of the body.]

The Son of God says, that he had brought fire on the earth, and desired nothing more than to have it kindled, Luke xii. 49. [Rather to subject the land of Judæa to judgments, in consequence of its wickedness: part of which was already begun in the dominion of the Romans; and their sword would complete the punishment.] He came to baptize with the Holy Ghost and fire. Matth. iii. 2. To verify this prediction, the Holy Ghost descended on his disciples in the form of tongues of fire. Acts ii. 3.

Fire must one day consume this world, according to St. Peter; "The heavens and the earth are reserved unto fire against the day of judgment." 2 Pet. iii. 12.

The heathen had some knowledge of this, whether they received it from the Hebrews, or from the sacred writings; whether from tradition, or from reasoning, and their knowledge of the elements and actual state of the earth, they concluded that this world would be consumed by fire. Josephus, Antiq. lib. i. cap. 3. remarks, as an ancient tradition, that before the deluge, the sons of Seth had learned from Adam that the world would be destroyed first by water, afterwards by fire.

The Greek philosophers believed the world would be destroyed by fire. Heraclitus held, that after it had passed through the flames, it would receive a new birth amidst the fire: the Stoicks maintained the same; and Cicero particularly notices it in his books, de Nat. Deorum. lib. ii. Ex quo eventurum ut ad extremum omnis mundus ignesceret, cum humore consumpto neque terra ali posset, neque remearet, aër—ita relinqui nihil præter ignem: a quo rursum, ac de eo, renovatio mundi fieret.

Ovid speaks likewise of this tradition:

Esse quoque in fatis reminiscitur affore tempus
Quo mare, quo tellus, correptaque regis celi
Ardent, et mundi moles operosa laboret.

METAMORPH. lib. i.

Lucan tells Cæsar, that the bodies of the soldiers killed in the battle of Pharsalia would be consumed by fire, with the rest of the world:

Hos, Cæsar, populos, si nunc non uaserit ignis
Uret cum terris: uret cum gurgite ponti;
Communis mundo superest rogos, ossibus astræ

MIXTURUS— PHARSAL. lib. vii.

FIR

FIRE, perpetual, worshipped by the Persians. See ZOROASTER and SABIAN. The Magians gave out that they received this fire from heaven, therefore they maintained it religiously. The kings of Persia never went abroad without having some of the sacred fire carried before them. Quintus Curtius relates, with what ceremonies this was performed. Ignem cælitus lapsum apud se sempiternis ferculis custodiri, says Ammianus Marcellinus, (lib. xxv.) cujus portionem exigam ut faustam, præisse quondam Asiaticis Regibus dicunt.

This seems to be an invention borrowed from the Hebrews, who kept a perpetual fire on the altar of burnt-offerings, which fire descended from heaven on the first victims sacrificed by Aaron on the altar of the tabernacle. Lev. ix. 24. It is not certain that the law enjoining this constant fire was complied with in the wilderness, where the people encamped frequently, and had long marches. Maimonides believes three fires were kept on the altar of burnt-offerings; one in which the burnt-offering, and the victims were consumed every day; the second supplied coals for burning incense on the golden altar in the holy place; the third was always burning, in compliance with the law, that there should be fire constantly on the altar.

FIRMAMENT. Scripture says, God made a firmament in the midst of the waters to separate the inferior from the superior waters. רַקִּיעַ rakiah is translated expansum, something expanded, or firmamentum, something solid. The verb rakah, from which rakiah is derived, signifies to spread metal with the hammer, to make flat, to beat out, i. e. an expanse.

By the word rakiah, the Hebrews understood the heavens, which, like a solid and immense arch, served as a bank and barrier between the upper and lower waters: but we are not to infer from this idea of the ancient Hebrews, that it really was so: in matters indifferent, the sacred writers generally suit their expressions to the popular conceptions of mankind.

FIRST, primus. This word does not always signify priority of rank or order, but sometimes before that, as—literally, "This was the first enrolment made by Cyrenius governor of Syria." But as we know that Cyrenius, or Quirinus, was not governor of Syria in the reign of Herod, we are obliged to explain it thus, this enrolment was made before Cyrenius was governor of Syria. [Vide CYRENIUS.] So, John i. 15, 30. Gr. He was first of me; he was before me. And (chap. xv. 18.) If the world hateth you, ye know it hated me before you, &c. Our Saviour required his disciples to seek first the kingdom of God, before all things. Matth. vi. 33. and St. Paul says, that God displayed his mercy towards him, who who was the first of sinners, and that in him first [eminently, wonderfully] he shewed forth all long-suffering. 1 Tim. i. 15, 16.

FIRST-BORN is not always to be understood literally, it is sometimes taken for the prime, most excellent, most distinguished of things. Thus, Jesus Christ is the first-born of every creature, the first-begotten, or first-born from the dead; begotten of the Father before any creature was produced; the first who rose from the dead by his own power. Wisdom says, that she came out of the mouth of the Most High, before he had produced any creature. Ecclus. xxiv. 3. Vulg. Primogenia ante omnem creaturam. Isa. xiv. 30. the first-born of the poor, signifies the most miserable of the poor; Job xviii. 13. the first-born of death, the most terrible of deaths.

After the destroying angel had killed the first-born of the Egyptians, God ordained, that all the Jewish first-born both of men, and of beasts for service, should be consecrated to him. The male children only were subject to this law. If a woman's first child were a girl, the father was not obliged to offer any thing for her, or for his children after her, though they were males. If a man had many wives, he was obliged to offer the first-born son by every one of them to the Lord. The first-born were offered at the temple, and redeemed for five shekels.

The firstling of a clean beast was offered at the temple, not to be redeemed, but to be killed; an unclean beast, a horse, an ass, or a camel, was either redeemed, or exchanged; an ass was redeemed by a lamb, or five shekels: if not redeemed, it was killed. Commentators hold, that the first-born of dogs were killed, because they were unclean; and that nothing was given for them to the priests, because there was no trade or commerce in them. Thou shalt not bring the price of a dog into the house of the Lord. See Deut. xxiii. 18.

As to trees, see Lev. xix. 23. The fruit was unclean the first three years. In the fourth year all the fruit was the Lord's.

It has been questioned whether our Saviour, as first-born of the blessed Virgin, was subject to this law. Some believe he was not subject; others, that by the terms of the law he was subject to it; that plainly declaring all first-born male children should be consecrated. Others seem to believe, that Moses's words are prophetic, and, rigorously speaking, regarded Jesus Christ only, who by his birth opened the Virgin's womb; whereas, of other men, their mother's womb is opened rather at their conception, than at their birth.

The ceremonies of the Jews for redemption of their first-born, are as follows: If the child be a boy, when he is full thirty days old, a descendant of Aaron is sent for, who is most agreeable to the father; and the company being met, the father brings gold or silver in a cup or bason. Then the child is put into the priest's hands, who asks the mother aloud, Whether this boy is her's? she answers, Yes. He adds, have you never had any other child, male or female, no untimely birth, or miscarriage? she answers, No. If so, says the priest, this child, as the first-born, belongs to me.

Then turning to the father, he says, If you desire to have him you must redeem him. This gold and this silver, says the father, is offered to you for that purpose only. The priest, turning to the assembly, says, This child, as the first-born, is therefore mine, according to this law, those that are to be redeemed from a month old shalt thou redeem, according to thine estimation for the money of five shekels, &c.—but I am content with this in exchange. Then he takes two gold crowns, or thereabouts, and restores the infant. This is a day of rejoicing in the family. If the father or mother are of the race of the priests, or Levites, they do not redeem their son.

Beside the first-born of men and beasts which were offered to the Lord, or were redeemed by giving money to the priests, there was another kind of first-born which were carried to the temple, in order to furnish the table for feasts of charity. Of this kind mention is made, Deut. xii. 17, 18. "Thou mayest not eat within thy gates the tithe of thy corn or wine, or the firstlings of thy herds, or of thy flock, nor any of thy vows . . . but thou must eat these things before the Lord thy God in the place which he shall chuse, thou, and thy son and thy daughter, thy man-servant and thy maid-servant, and the Levite that is within thy gates," and again Deut. xv. 19.

As the first-born of beasts belonged to the Lord, but after they were redeemed, the owners might use them as their property; it is probable, that of these redeemed first-born they made such entertainments. Or else, by the name first-born we are to understand the best and most excellent parts of animals, designed for religious repasts before the Lord; in like manner as under the term first-fruits are comprehended the offerings of every thing which was the best of its kind.

The first-born among the Hebrews as among all other nations, enjoyed particular privileges; and wherever polygamy was used, it was highly necessary to fix them. See Deut. xxi. 15—17. They consisted, first, in a right to the priesthood, which, before the law, was in the eldest of the family: secondly, in receiving a double portion of the father's property above his brethren.

The right to the priesthood continued in force only only while brothers dwelt together in the same place and family: for when separated into families apart, each became priest and head over his own house.

The double portion is explained two ways: some believe, that half of the whole inheritance was given to the elder brother, and the other half was shared in equal parts among the rest. But the Rabbins inform us on the contrary, that the first-born for his share took twice as much as any of his brothers. If a father left six sons, they divided his property into seven equal parts; whereof the eldest had two, and each of the others one. If the eldest were dead, and had left children, his right devolved to his heirs. First-born daughters had none of these privileges.

Jacob transferred the right of the first-born from Reuben to Joseph; Isaac from Esau to Jacob; and David from Adonijah to Solomon. [Solomon was born after his father was king of all Israel. Vide FRAGMENT, No. XLV.]

FIRST-FRUITS were presents made to God, of part of the fruits of the harvest, to express the submission, dependance, and thankfulness of the offerers. They were offered at the temple, before the crop was touched; and, when the harvest was over, before any private persons used their corn. The first of these first-fruits, offered in the name of the nation, was a sheaf of barley, gathered on the fifteenth of Nisan, in the evening, and threshed in a court of the temple. After it was well cleaned, about three pints of it were roasted, and pounded in a mortar. Over this was thrown a log of oil, and a handful of incense; the priest taking this offering, waved it before the Lord towards the four parts of the world, threw a handful of it into the fire on the altar, and kept the rest. After this, every one was at liberty to get in his harvest. See SHEAF.

When the wheat harvest was over, on the day of Pentecost, they offered as first-fruits of another kind, in the name of the nation, two loaves, of two assarons (about three pints) of flour each, made of leavened dough. Josephus, Ant. lib. iii. cap. 10. mentions only one loaf, and says, it was served up to the priests that evening at supper, with the other offerings; and that all were to be eaten that day without leaving any thing.

Beside these first-fruits, every private person was obliged to bring his first-fruits to the temple. Scripture prescribes neither the time nor the quantity. The Rabbins say they were obliged to bring at least the sixtieth part of their fruits and harvest. The most liberal gave the fortieth, the least liberal gave the fiftieth, or sixtieth. They met in companies of four and twenty persons, to carry their first-fruits in a ceremonious manner. The company was preceded by an ox appointed for the sacrifice, with a crown of olives on his head, and his horns gilded. A player on the flute walked before them to Jerusalem. The first-fruits were of wheat, barley, grapes, figs, apricots, olives, and dates. Each carried his basket. The rich had gold or silver, [q. fillagree work, Prov. xxv. 11. "a word fitly spoken is as pleasant as apricots, &c. of first-fruits, carried in baskets of fillagree work," on such a joyful occasion?] the poor had wicker-baskets. They walked in pomp to the temple, singing songs. When near Jerusalem, the citizens came out to meet, and to salute them.

When they were come to the mountain on which the temple was situated, every one, even the king himself, if he were there, took his basket on his shoulder, and carried it to the court of the priests. Then the Levites sung, I will magnify thee, O Lord, &c. Psalm xxx. He who brought the first-fruits, said, I profess this day unto the Lord thy God, that I am come unto the country, which the Lord swore unto our fathers for to give us, Deut. xxvi. 4, 5, &c. then he put the basket on his hand, (the priest supporting it at the bottom) and continued—A Syrian ready to perish was my father, &c. then he put his basket beside the altar, prostrated himself, and went away.

There was besides another sort of first-fruits paid to God, Num. xv. 19, 21. When the bread in every family was kneaded, a portion of it was set apart, and given to the priest, or Levite, of the place. If there were no priest, or Levite, it was cast into the oven, and there consumed. The law had not fixed the quantity of this bread, but St. Jerom says, that custom and tradition had determined it to be between the fortieth and sixtieth part of what was kneaded. Philo speaks of this custom. Leo of Modena declares, it was observed in his time. This is one of the three precepts peculiar to the women, because they generally make the bread.

The Rabbins hold that no one is obliged to pay the first-fruits, excepting in the Land of Promise.

Those offerings are often called first-fruits, which were brought by the Israelites from devotion, to the temple, for the feasts of thanksgiving, to which they invited their relations and friends, and the Levites of their cities. The first-fruits and tenths were the most substantial revenue of the priests and Levites.

St. Paul says, Christians have the first-fruits of the Holy Spirit, a greater abundance of God's spirit, more perfect and more excellent gifts than the Jews. Christ is risen from the dead, and become the first-fruits of them that slept, 1 Cor. xv. 20. the first-begotten from the dead, or the first-born of those who rose again: the Thessalonians were, as it were, the first-fruits whom God had chosen to salvation, 2 Thess. ii. 12. chosen with a particular distinction, as first-fruits were chosen from amidst the most exquisite of the several fruits, with a design of offering them to the Lord.

FISH, in Hebrew dag. The Hebrews place fish among reptiles. We have few Hebrew names, if any, for particular fish. Moses says in general, Lev. ix. 9, that all sorts of river, lake, and sea fish might be eaten, if they had scales and fins; others are unclean. St. Barnabas, in his epistle, cites, as from Scripture, "You shall not eat of the lamprey, the many-feet (polypes), or the cuttle-fish."

FISH, which swallowed Jonah. Interpreters generally believe it was a Whale: the word cetus, signifies only a great fish, as does the Hebrew dag of Jonah. We know of no fish larger than a whale. John Cabri, of the Academy at Florence, mentions a whale cast ashore on the coast of Tuscany, having a mouth so large, that a man on horseback might enter it with ease. Notwithstanding, this animal does not live on flesh, but on weeds, or on small fish (mollusca): a circumstance which makes what is said of Jonah's being swallowed by a whale, and his continuing alive three days in the belly of it, to be more credible. A whale is armed with teeth and tusks like fish that live on flesh. It might have swallowed Jonah without bruising him between its teeth; it might have kept him longer without killing him in its stomach, which is accustomed to digest only the lightest and most tender food.

Others pretend, that the fish which received Jonah was a shark. This creature has four or five rows of teeth in each jaw. Its gullet and stomach are so large, that men have been found in it whole. Rondelet says, that some have been taken at Nice and Marseilles; and men entire (nay, one man all in armour) have been found in their stomachs. Hercules is said to have leaped into the belly of some such creature armed all over, whence he found no way out till he had torn its entrails in pieces, without suffering any inconvenience himself, besides losing his hair, which was occasioned by the heat of the animal's stomach. See Bochart, de Animal. Sacr. Part ii. lib. v. cap. 12. Vide FRAGMENTS, Nos. CXLV. CCCCLXX. et seq.

For the question, how fishes could present themselves to Adam in Paradise, vide ADAM.

FLESH is taken literally, for the flesh which composes bodies; whether of men, or animals.

and two of all flesh, animals of all species. All flesh hath corrupted his way. [all mankind.]

Flesh is understood of a principle opposite to the spirit. "The flesh lusteth against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh, and these are contrary the one to the other. . . . Walk in the spirit, and ye shall not fulfil the lusts of the flesh. To crucify the flesh with its lusts; not to fulfil the desires of the flesh; the wisdom of the flesh, &c. require no explanation.

Oh that we had of his flesh! said Job's enemies, or even his domestics, in his affliction. They would have eat him up alive; thus they repaid with ingratitude his services to them. [Rather, Job describes his former condition as having been so honourable, that whatever was placed on his table was longed for as the most desirable of its kind. Schnitens renders, Quis dabit de carne ejus non saturatum? and Mr. Good, "Who hath longed for his meat without fulness?" chap. xxxi. 31.] The Psalmist also says, The wicked, even mine enemies, came upon me to eat up my flesh, Psalm xxvii. 2. Wisdom, xii. 5, reproaches the Canaanites with devouring man's flesh. We have examples of this in sacred history, and in Josephus. Jeremiah threatens the inhabitants of Jerusalem that they should be constrained to eat the flesh of their friends and children. Vide also Lament. ii. 20. iv. 10. and Ezek. v. 10. Josephus relates an instance of a certain mother eating her son during the siege of Jerusalem, by the Romans. De Bell. lib. vi. cap. 21.

The custom of eating human flesh is still common in many islands of the eastern seas: there are some who eat their fathers when they are old; others eat Europeans, when they can seize them: the Peguans sold human flesh publicly. The Caffres, on the south coast of Africa, invaded the interior of Africa, eating all whom they found; and devouring the country for above three hundred leagues. In Whidah human flesh is sold as food.

We are thy flesh and thy bone; familiar expressions to denote the relations and ties of flesh and blood. Gen. xxix. 14. xxxviii. 27.

The flesh [penis] of the lascivious is compared to that of horses and asses, Ezek. xvi. 26. The wise man says, that the flesh of the intemperate is consumed by infamous diseases. Prov. v. 11. Ecclesiasticus requires a prudent man to separate his flesh from a prostitute, chap. xxv. 26.

[Coincident with this use of the word is the idea suggested in FRAGMENT, No. CLIII. 5. where it is but covertly hinted at; but, which these passages, and others may confirm.

It seems to be proper here to correct an error into which Schleusner has fallen, Art. ΣΑΡΞ, 9. "semina. Conf. 2 Pet. ii. 10." where we read of "those who walk after the flesh, in the lust of uncleanness; ubi carō nec de voluptate illicita, nec de vitiositate, nec denique de pudendis, quæ est Koppii sententia, explicari potest, sed est, i. q. γυνή—and this opinion he supports by referring to Jude 7, where we read of "going after strange flesh." But had the learned author observed, that in both places reference is expressed to the vile practices of the Sodomites, he could not have failed of seeing the true import of the phrase. In Peter we read, verse 7, of "the filthy conversation of the wicked;" also of their "unlawful deeds," verse 8; and the whole passage relates to Sodom: so also in Jude we read, "even as Sodom and Gomorrah, and the cities about them, gave themselves over to fornication, and going after strange flesh, &c. The intention of the sacred writers is clear; though veiled for the sake of decorum in a general term.]

FLIES. Insects well known; in the law, declared to be unclean, Lev. xi, 42. The Philistines adored the god of flies under the name Beelzebub. The Egyptians worshipped the beetle: we see a fly on some Phœnician medals, also on the statue of Diana of Ephesus. Wisdom, xii. 8. having said, that God sent flies and wasps against the Amorites and Canaanites to drive them by degrees out of their country, adds, that God made those very creatures the instruments of their punishment, to which they paid divine honours. [They therefore adored the fly as well as the Philistines. See BEELZEBUB, PLATE.] We cannot doubt but that many Canaanites did really abandon their country to secure themselves from these troublesome insects. See HONEY. For the dog-fly of Exod. viii. 20. vide FRAGMENT, No. LVI.

FLIGHT of Jesus Christ into Egypt. After the Purification, and presentation at the temple, an angel appeared in a dream to Joseph, directing him to take the young child and his mother, and flee into Egypt, and be thou there until I bring thee word: for Herod will seek the young child to destroy him. Joseph obeyed, and fled into Egypt. Herod, some days afterwards destroyed the male children in Bethlehem; and died five or six months after, about the passover. Thus according to our chronology, which fixes the flight into Egypt to the third or fourth of February, and the return to Judæa about the second of April, it continued only about two months. [But others suppose it lasted two years.]

The Fathers relate, that at the arrival of Jesus Christ in Egypt, the idols fell down as he passed; and that the holy family went to Hermopolis in the Thebais. There is a fountain shewn within two miles of Cairo, which was produced, as report affirms, by the infant Jesus; and here the Blessed Virgin washed his linen. This we read likewise in the spurious "Gospel of Christ's Infancy."

The following passages have been applied to this event: Isaiah xix. 1. Behold the Lord rideth upon a swift cloud, and shall come into Egypt, and the idols of Egypt shall be moved at his presence. Jer. xliii. 13. He shall break also the images of Bethshemesh, that is in the land of Egypt, and the houses of the gods of the Egyptians shall be burn with fire.

FLORUS. Gessius Florus succeeded Albinus in the government of Judæa, A. D. 54. His excesses exasperated the Jews beyond patience. He forced them to rebel against the Romans, A. D. 66. He was a man void of shame and humanity: wherever, or by whatever means, any thing might be got, it was very right in his judgment. His cruelty against the Jews was beyond bounds. His wife Cleopatra accompanied him, who was as wicked as himself. She procured him this government by the influence of Poppæa, wife of Nero. The thieves who ravaged Judæa were sure of impunity by sharing their booty with him. When the revolt of the Jews was declared, Florus, instead of endeavouring to suppress it, fomented it, having no hopes of escaping the punishment of his crimes but by this rebellion. Cestius Gallus governor of Syria, coming to Jerusalem A. D. 66, the Jews complained of Florus. Gallus gave them hopes, that Florus should be obliged to change his conduct: but after Gallus had returned into Syria, Florus renewed his violence and vexations. Cæsarea began the revolt; Jerusalem soon followed. Cestius wrote to Nero, and charged Florus with this rebellion and all its consequences. Josephus does not tell us what became of Florus. In all probability he left Judæa, when Vespasian came thither, A. D. 67.

FLOUR. Vide BREAD, CAKES, OFFERINGS, &c.

FLUTE, a musical instrument, mentioned sometimes in Scripture by the names Chalil, Machalath, Masrokoth, and Huggab. This last is generally translated Organum, an organ: but in all probability was nothing more than a flute with many pipes of unequal size, which had no holes, but were open only at the upper end. Their manner of playing on it was by letting these pipes slide successively upon the nether lip, and blowing into them as they passed. [In this manner, the instrument called "the pipes of Pan" are played on: it is extremely ancient, and, perhaps, is the original organ.]

—See ORGAN, and PLATES of MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS:

As to other flutes mentioned in Scripture, it is said, that anciently they who played on the flute, held two in their mouths, one on the right side, which had no hole, another on the left, which had two holes. The sound of one was sharper, of the other flatter. See our DISSERTATION on the Musical Instruments of the Hebrews, prefixed to the second tome of our Comment on the Psalms, page lxxxvi. &c. There is notice taken in the gospel of players on the flute, who were collected at the funeral of Jairus's daughter, to attend her body to the grave, playing on their instruments. [Rendered "minstrels," Eng. Tr. but, properly, flute players. Matt. ix. 23, 24.]

The Rabbins inform us, that it was not allowable to have less than two players on the flute, at the funeral of persons of the meanest condition, beside a professional woman hired to lament; and Josephus relates, that a false report of his death being spread at Jerusalem, several persons hired players on the flute, by way of preparation for his funeral. But in the Old Testament we see nothing like it. The Jews very probably borrowed this custom from the Romans. When it was an old woman who died, they used trumpets; but flutes when a young woman was to be buried: see Matth. ix. above.

FOOL, folly, in Scripture, signifies not only according to the literal meaning, an ideot, or one whose senses are disordered: the discourses and notions of fools and madmen; but likewise sin, particularly sins of impurity. My wounds stink and are corrupt through my foolishness, my sin, Psal. xxxviii. 5. He that is soon angry dealeth foolishly; and, the thought of foolishness is sin. Lord, says David, I have sinned greatly; do away the iniquity of thy servant, for I have done very foolishly. And Tamar said to her violent brother Amnon, Do not this folly; thou shalt be as one of the fools in Israel. 2 Sam. xiii. 13.

The wisdom of this world is foolishness with God, 1 Cor. i. 20, 21. St. Paul says, Hath not God made foolish the wisdom of this world, &c. 1 Cor. iii. 18, 19. If any man among you seemeth to be wise in this world, let him become a fool, that he may be wise. The apostle advises Timothy and Titus to avoid foolish questions, which only create disputes and wrangling.

ADDITION.

[The character of Fool, and the attribute Folly, seems to be used in the Proverbs in more than one sense: sometimes it seems to mean lack of understanding, and sometimes perverseness of will. In the Gentoo laws is described a species of folly which may illustrate some of the applications of this term.

"Among the qualities required for the proper execution of public business, mention is made, "That a man must be able to keep in subjection his lust, his anger, his avarice, his folly, and his pride." These vices are sometimes denominated in the Shanscrit under the general term Opadhee. The folly there specified is not to be understood in the usual sense of the word in the European idiom, as a negative quality, or the mere want of sense, but as a kind of obstinately stupid lethargy, or perverse absence of mind, in which the will is not altogether passive: it seems to be a weakness peculiar to Asia: for we cannot find a term by which to express the precise idea in the European languages: it operates somewhat like the violent impulse of fear, under which men will utter falsehoods totally incompatible with each other, and utterly contrary to their own opinion, knowledge, and conviction; and it may be added also, their inclination and intention. A very remarkable instance of this temporary frenzy happened lately in the supreme court of judicature at Calcutta, where a man (not an idiot) swore on a trial, that he was no kind of relation to his own brother, who was then in court, and who had constantly supported him from his infancy; and that he lived in a house by himself, for which he paid the rent from his own pocket: when it was proved that he was not worth a rupee, and when the person in whose house he had always resided, stood at the bar close to him.

"Whenever the word folly included among the vices above-mentioned, occurs in the case, it must always be understood to carry the meaning here described. Another conjecture, and that exceedingly acute and ingenious, has been started upon this folly, that it may mean the deception which a man permits to be imposed on his judgment by his passions,—as acts of rapacity and avarice are often committed by men who ascribe them to prudence, and a just assertion of their own right; malice and rancour pass for justice, and brutality passes for spirit. This opinion, when thoroughly examined, will very nearly tally with the former; for all the passions as well as fear, have equal efficacy to disturb and distort the mind: but to account for the folly here spoken of, as being the offspring of the passions, instead of drawing a parallel between it and the impulses of those passions, we must suppose the impulse to act with infinitely more violence on an Asiatic mind, than we can ever have seen exemplified in Europe. It is, however, originally produced by an effect of the will, though in the end overpowering and superseding its functions." HALHED'S Gentoo Laws, Preface.]

FOLLY AND WISDOM COMPANIONISED.

PROVERBS, chap. ix.

[It is many years since the idea struck my mind, that a companionised picture of Wisdom and Folly was included in the descriptions presented in this chapter. I mean, that the former verses of the chapter contain a description of Wisdom personified; of her actions, conduct, and behaviour; and that from verse 13 to 18 contains a description of Folly, in like manner personified; who mimics the actions, conduct, and behaviour of Wisdom, and so closely does she mimic them, that a person who will not exercise deliberation and reflection, would as readily be persuaded to follow the false, the impositious goddess Folly, as to obey the true, the genuine power of Wisdom, divine Wisdom herself. That such personification is common in the Proverbs, and in Ecclesiastes, is evident to every reader.

WISDOM.

Wisdom hath builded her house,
She hath hewn out her numerous ornamental pillars,
She hath killed her beasts,
She hath mingled her wine;
She hath furnished her table;
She hath sent forth her maidens;
She crieth on the highest places of the city,
"Whoso is simple, let him turn in hither:"
To him who wanteth understanding, she saith,
"Come eat of my bread,
"And drink of the wine I have mingled,
"Forsake the foolish and live,
"And go in the way of Understanding;
"For by me thy days shall be multiplied,
"And the years of thy life shall be many."

Thus Folly assumes the counterpart of Wisdom, and invites no less generally: but her invitation is easily detected by consideration, being very different from that of real Wisdom. The consequences of following the counsels of these contrasted personages are very strongly marked, and are diametrically opposite; one tending to prolonged life, the other to premature and violent dissolution.

It appears by the reference to the fatal ends of her guests, that the gratification of illicit passion is what Folly intends by "stolen waters," and "secret bread:" this is the utmost enjoyment she offers, and this enjoyment terminates in death! A description how applicable to great numbers of unhappy youth among us! Comp. FLESH, Σαρξ.]

FOOT. Anciently it was customary to wash the feet of strangers on their coming off a jour-

I am not without hopes, that this idea may open the way also to a true construction and correction of a passage, which, as it stands at present, is obscure; and some think is damaged: the LXX. read verse 13, A foolish and brazen faced woman, ἐνδεῆς ψυχῆς γυῖναί, she becomes to want a piece of bread: she has no shame; the Chaldee reads, she has no goodness. Some have supposed that the word פְּתִיחַת petajut, simplicity, is redundant; but if any word is redundant, I should as willingly suppose it was the first word, "a woman," in which case, as the nouns are of the feminine gender, and imply a woman, without that distinctive description, the import of the passage would stand thus:—

"Simplicity is foolish and clamorous;" or, "Folly is clamorous—simplicity itself! i. e. extremely simple; and drives away knowledge of any valuable kind, from her. Yet she sits at the door of her house and imitates the actions of Wisdom: as appears by comparing these two personages, and their addresses, to those who need instruction:

FOLLY.

Folly is stupid and clamorous,
Indeed, she repels all knowledge from her:
She sitteth at the door of her house,
On a throne in the high places of the city,
To call passengers who go right on their ways:
Saying,
"Whoso is simple, let him turn in hither:"

To him who wanteth understanding, she saith,
"Stolen waters are sweet;
"And bread eaten in secret is pleasant."
She invites him to her house of rendezvous,
But he is not aware that the dead are there,
That her guests are in the depths of the grave.

Compare, chap. v. 3.

ney, because generally they travelled barefoot, or wore sandals only, which did not secure them from dust or dirt. Jesus Christ washed the feet of his apostles, and thereby taught them to perform the humblest services for one another: [and it is made part of the character of a pious Christian woman, that she have washed the saints' feet. 1 Tim. v. 10.]

Feet, in the sacred writers, often mean inclinations, affections, propensities, actions, motions. Guide my feet in thy paths: keep thy feet at a distance from evil; the feet of the debauched woman go down to death—let not the feet of pride come upon me, &c.

To be at any one's feet, is used for obeying him, being in his service, following him. 1 Sam. xxv. 27. [Fr. Valet de pied, Foot-man.] Moses says, that the Lord loved his people, and those that sat down at his feet; who heard him, who belonged belonged to him, who were instructed in his doctrine, [his pupils.] St. Paul says, he was brought up at the feet of Gamaliel, [as his scholar.] Mary sat at our Saviour's feet, and heard his word. Vide FRAGMENT, No. CIV.

Foot. The Hebrews modestly express by this word those parts which decency forbids to name; e. gr. the water of the feet, urine. To cover the feet, to dismiss the refuse of nature. The hair of the feet, i. e. of the pubes. Withhold thy foot from being unshod, and thy throat from thirst. Jer. ii. 2. Do not prostitute yourself, as you have done, to strange people: speaking to idolatrous Jews. Ezek. xvi. 25. Thou hast opened thy feet to every one that passed by. Comp. FRAGMENT, No. CI.

In Deut. xi. 10. it is said, the land of Canaan is not like Egypt, where thou sowest thy seed, and waterest it with thy foot. Palestine is a country which has rains, plentiful dews, springs, rivulets, brooks, which supply the earth with the moisture necessary to its fruitfulness: whereas Egypt has no river but the Nile; there it seldom or never rains, and the lands which are not within reach of the inundation, continue parched and barren. To supply this want, ditches are dug, and water is distributed throughout the several villages and cantons; there are great struggles who shall first get it, and in this dispute they often come to blows.

Notwithstanding these precautions, many places have no water; and in the course of the year, places which are nearest to the Nile, require to be watered again by means of art and labour. It is done by the help of machines; one of which Philo describes, as a wheel which a man turns with the motion of his feet, by ascending successively the several steps which are within it. But, as while he is thus continually turning, he cannot keep himself up, he holds a stay in his hands, which is not moveable, and this supports him; so that in this work the hands do the office of the feet, and the feet that of the hands; since the hands which should act are at rest, and the feet which should be at rest, are in action, and give motion to the wheel. De Confusione Linguar. This is what Moses means in this place by saying, that in Egypt they water the earth with their feet. Vide the PLATE of AGRICULTURE, and FRAGMENT, No. CCXXVI.

Jacob said to Laban, Gen. xxx. 30. the Lord hath blessed thee at my feet: Jerom translates ad introitum meum, ever since I came to you, and undertook the conduct of your flocks.

To be under any one's feet, to be a footstool to him, signifies the subjection of a subject to his sovereign, of a slave to his master.

To adore the place where the feet of any one rest; Psalm xcix. 5. Fall down before his footstool. Isaiah still stronger, They shall lick the dust of thy feet. chap. xlix. 23.

Nakedness of feet, was a sign of mourning: God says to Ezekiel, Make no mourning for the dead, and put on thy shoes upon thy feet, &c. It was likewise a mark of respect, Exod. iii. 5. Loose thy shoes from off thy feet, for the place where thou standest is holy ground. The Rabbins inform us, that the Jews and priests were barefoot in the temple. Josh. v. 16.

A wicked man speaketh with his feet, says Solomon, Prov. vi. 13. He uses much gesture with his hands and feet while talking, which the ancient sages blamed in those who spake. [Compare FRAGMENT, No. XCVI.] Ezekiel, xxv. 6. reproaches the Ammonites with clapping their hands and stamping with their feet in token of joy on seeing the desolation of Jerusalem. Also (chap. vi. 11.) He describes similar motions as signs of grief, because of the ruin of his people.

My foot standeth right; I have pursued the paths of righteousness: or, rather, supposing a Levite to be the speaker, my foot shall stand in the place appointed for the Levites in the temple, in the court of the priests, where my proper station is.

If thou turn away thy foot from my sabbath, from doing thy pleasure on my holy day, says Isaiah, lviii. 13. If thou forbear walking and travelling on the sabbath-day, and do not follow thine own will. Journeys, we know, were forbidden on the sabbath-day. Matth. xxiv. 20. Acts i. 12.

The Jewish women wore rings of great value on their feet, or rather on their legs. See PARRISCELIDES; also the FRAGMENTS ON EASTERN DRESSES, with the PLATES.

Job says, xix. 15. that he was feet to the lame, and eyes to the blind; he led one, and supported the other. In another place, that God had put his feet in the stocks, and looked narrowly to all his paths; like a bird or some other animal led along, with a foot fastened to a cord, and unable to go the least step, but as he who guides it, pleases.

Anciently in those countries the men were generally barefoot in the house; the poor almost always, even on journeys; but others, when they went into the country, commonly wore shoes. See SHOES: also FRAGMENTS, Nos. CCCCXLIX. CCCCLI. 7. 8. with the PLATES.

FORESKIN, or præputium, the skin which covers the glans, and is cut off in circumcision. Vide CIRCUMCISION. Several (catholic) churches glory glory in possessing our Saviour's foreskin, which was cut off at his circumcision: as the cathedral church of Puy in Velay; the collegiate church of Antwerp in the Low Countries; that of our lady de la Colombe, in the diocese of Chartres; the abbey of St. Cornelius at Compeigne; the church of St. John de Lateran at Rome. It is very hard to reconcile all these different pretensions, since there can be but one foreskin, and there is no certainty of its being preserved so long as our time.—Indeed there is no need of the fact!

Children are sometimes born without a foreskin; which the Hebrews regard as a particular favour of Providence. The Rabbins maintain that Moses was born thus. Such a child is not circumcised; the skin is only cut so as to draw some drops of blood.

The Jews esteemed the foreskin or uncircumcision as a very great impurity; and the greatest affront they could receive was to be called uncircumcised: they sometimes gave the Gentiles and foreigners in contempt, the name of uncircumcised. St. Paul, Rom. ii. 26. frequently mentions the Gentiles by the word præputium, in opposition to the Jews, whom he names circumcisio.

[He also alludes to an imperfect mode of circumcision, or a partial removal of the foreskin, which apparently was practised by the Edomites, Egyptians, &c. This he calls con-cision; and associates those who practised it with dogs. Phil. iii. 2. Most probably, the apostle here turns the application of Jewish terms of contempt and ridicule against the Jews themselves. Vide CIRCUMCISION.]

There is mention, 1 Macc. i. 16, and 1 Cor. vii. 18. of a custom among certain wicked Jews, who being ashamed to appear circumcised, and wear this mark of their religion, made use of the surgeons' art to conceal this pretended deformity, and to make their foreskin grow again. Origen (Philocal. cap. 1.) acknowledges that some Jews put themselves into the physicians' hands for this purpose. And Epiphanius (de Ponder. & Mensuris) speaks of the instrument and means employed to make the skin join which had been cut asunder. Cornelius Celsus, an eminent and ancient physician, has written a chapter particularly concerning this operation, (lib. vii. cap. 25.) Galen mentions it in the same manner almost as Celsus; and Bartolin cites Æginetus and Fallopius, who have explained by what means the marks of circumcision may be concealed. Bartolin also cites a letter written by Buxtorf, the son, wherein he relates a great number of testimonies from Jewish authors, who speak of this practice as usual among apostates from their religion. See likewise Jerom, in Isaiam, chap. liii. and in Jovinian, lib. i. Liran, in 1 Macc. i. 16. Rupert, De Victoriæ Verbi, lib. ix. cap. 18. Haimo, in 1 Cor. vii. 18. who maintain, that it is impossible to efface the mark of circumcision; to these add Origen, de Principiis, lib. iv. cap. 2. who seems to be of the same opinion.

[We are not to expect information on this subject from modern travellers; because the practice of circumcision being general in the east, travellers have no opportunity of examining the natural formation of the præputium in the inhabitants of those parts: but, whoever will consider some of the ancient statues in the British Museum, particularly one in the Townley Gallery, and other figures delineated on the Hamilton vases, will perceive a probable cause for the removal of a natural incumbrance, not usual among Europeans; and, perhaps, not general among Orientals. Vide CIRCUMCISION.]

As a consequence of the opinion entertained by all true Jews, who looked on uncircumcision as unclean and dishonourable; but circumcision, on the contrary, as a mark of honour and distinction; they use the word foreskin, or uncircumcision, in a figurative sense, to signify something impure, superfluous, useless and dangerous: e. gr. Moses says of himself, he is of uncircumcised lips, Exod. vi. 12, 30. i. e. he had an impediment in his speech. Jeremiah, vi. 10. says of the Jews, they had uncircumcised ears, i. e. they would not hear instruction. He exhorts them (chap. iv. 4. ix. 26.) to circumcise their hearts; literally, take away the foreskins of their hearts; to be tractable and attentive. Moses inveighs against the uncircumcised hearts of the Jews, who would not obey the Lord. He says, that during the first three years after a tree is planted, all the fruit of it is unclean; no one should eat of it, Lev. xix. 23. Heb. Fructus ejus erit vobis præputidus. We have the same expressions in the New Testament; St. Stephen reproaches the Jews with the hardness of their heart, and their indolence, saying, Ye uncircumcised in heart and ears, ye do always resist the Holy Ghost. Acts vii. 51.

FOREST. There were several forests in Judæa, especially in the northern parts of it toward mount Libanus, &c.

FOREST of Ephraim. See EPHRAIM.

FOREST of Hareth, in Judah, 1 Sam. xxii. 5.

FOREST of Libanus. Beside the true forest of Libanus, where cedars and other trees still grow, Scripture calls by this name a palace, which Solomon built at Jerusalem, contiguous to the palace of the king of Egypt's daughter. Solomon usually resided in it: all the vessels of it were of gold. It was called the house of the forest of Libanus, either by reason of the great quantity of cedars used in it; or of the multitude multitude of cedar pillars which supported it. 1 Kings vii. 2. x. 17.

Some place this house, or palace, in the mountains of Libanus: but, more probably, it was in Jerusalem. What proves this, is, that the three hundred golden shields, which were carried before Solomon, when he went to the temple, were certainly hung in a hall belonging to this palace. 1 Kings x. 17.

FORNICATION is used in Scripture, not only for the sin of impurity, but for idolatry, and for all kinds of infidelity to God. Adultery and fornication are frequently confounded. Both the Old and New Testament condemn all impurity and fornication, corporal and spiritual; idolatry, apostacy, heresy, infidelity, &c.

FORTUNATUS, mentioned 1 Cor. xvi. 15, 17, came from Corinth to Ephesus, to visit St. Paul. We have no particulars of his life or death, only that St. Paul calls Stephanus, Fortunatus, and Achaicus, the first-fruits of Achaia, and, set for the service of the church and saints. They carried St Paul's first epistle to Corinth.

[There is a Fortunatus mentioned by Clement at the close of his first Epistle to the Corinthians; who possibly may be the same Corinthian Fortunatus. It should seem that he had visited Rome, and consulted Clement, who returns him to the Corinthians, accompanied by two messengers. If so, he was not an old man when he visited St. Paul. See CLEMENT.]

FOUNTAIN. There are several celebrated fountains in Judæa, most of them are noticed in our account of those places, to which they are adjacent. We have likewise mentioned several under the word En, which in Hebrew signifies an eye, or a fountain. See their names compounded, as for EN-ROGEL, see ROGEL, &c.

FOUNTAIN of the Ethiopian, i. e. where the Ethiopian, queen Candace's eunuch, was baptized by Philip the deacon, Acts viii. 36. Some place it near Bethlehem, others near Bethsur. Eusebius, and the old relation of a journey to Jerusalem, place it at the foot of the mountain of Bethsur, twenty miles from Jerusalem, near Eleutheropolis. In St. Jerom's time, the eunuch's fountain springing out of the earth, almost immediately re-entered it. At present, these waters are received into a bason, a conduit conveys them about twenty paces into a reservoir, whence they spread into the valley.

FOUNTAIN sealed, Cant. iv. 13. is probably an allegory, representing the chastity of the holy spouse. Travellers speak of a considerable fountain a league and an half from Bethlehem; (see ETHAN.) Here, it is supposed, was Solomon's sealed fountain. But this is uncertain. From hence came the water which Pilate conveyed to Jerusalem.

FOUNTAIN of Samson, which issued out of a rock, called the Grinders, or Jaw, Heb. Machtes, has subsisted a long time, and is perhaps still in being in the tribe of Dan, near Lechi, i. e. the jaw-bone. Antonin the martyr, and Glycas, place this fountain in the suburbs of Eleutheropolis. Some Rabbins place it near the brook Kedron, others near Tiberias. St. Jerom seems to put Morhasti between Succoth and Samson's fountain, which agrees pretty well with those who place it near Eleutheropolis. Glycas. Annal. p. 2. Vide Bochart, de Animal. Sac. P. I. lib. ii. cap. 15. Jerom, Epitaph. Paulæ.

FOUNTAIN, metaphorically, is used for generation, children. Let thy fountains be dispersed abroad; a numerous posterity. Prov. v. 16. Ye that are of the fountains of Israel. Psalm lxviii. 27. Eccl. xii. 6. Conderetur hydria super fontem. Vide WHEEL.

All sources of water are called fountains: All the fountains of the great deep were broken up, Gen. vii. 11. A fountain of living water, or fountain of life (Cant. iv. 15.) is a source of living water, whether it spring out of the earth like a fountain, or rise in the bottom of a well. Fons sanguinis, the blood of a person, incommode with a loss of blood, whether natural or otherwise. Lev. xx. 18. Mark v. 25.

FOX, lyw, Shuol, Ἀλώπηξ, Vulpes. A creature well known, and remarkable principally for its cunning. [In Eng. translation we often read of foxes, but the word thus rendered rather imports the jackall; an animal which goes in troops of hundreds in the East, and is no small terror and nuisance to the country. The following information refers to the jackall. Vide FRAGMENT, No. CCIX. "of the JACKALL:" where the various kinds are distinguished: also, the PLATES, and the NAT. HIST.]

Belon assures us, that in Palesting, particularly about Cæsarea, there is a kind of creature between a wolf and a fox, that sometimes goes in troops of two or three hundred. M. Morizon, who travelled in that country, says, that foxes swarm there, and that there are great numbers in the hedges, and ruins of buildings. Samson might have employed many people and much time to catch his great number of foxes, Judg. xv. 4. No animal was fitter for his design, especially when coupled together; for a fox runs very swiftly, but uses a great many turnings and windings, not going strait on, but running sometimes on one side, sometimes on another; so that while one dragged one way, and another another way, they spread the fire over all the fields of the Philistines, and could not easily get into the woods, or holes in the rocks, where their fire-brands would have been extinguished guished, and Samson's stratagem rendered ineffectual.

Foxes generally do great mischief among vines, especially when they are loaded with fruit. The spouse in the Canticles desires the foxes might be taken which spoiled his vines. Galen says, that they who love hunting, eat foxes in the autumn, because then they are fattened with grapes. The fable of the fox and the grapes is well known.

Ezekiel compares false prophets to foxes in the deserts, howling ravenous beasts of prey: whether designing to heighten their cunning and hypocrisy in imitating true prophets, or whether intending to shew, that instead of supporting Jerusalem, they endeavoured only to destroy it, by undermining its walls and foundations. Jesus Christ calls Herod the Tetrarch of Galilee, Fox, signifying thereby his craft and insidious policy.

FRANKINCENSE, vide INCENSE.

FRIEND, is taken in Scripture for a neighbour in general, Lev. xix. 18. Thou shalt love thy friend, thy neighbour, thy brother, as thyself. Deut. xix. 4, 5. Whoso killeth his neighbour ignorantly, whom he hated not in time past, but the iron of whose hatchet shall fly off and kill his friend, &c. Deut. xxiii. 24, 25. "When thou comest into thy neighbour's vineyard, thou mayest eat grapes; when thou comest into the standing corn of thy friend, thou mayest pluck the ears," &c.

By friend is meant also the favourite of a prince. So Hushai was the friend, the favourite of David, 2 Sam. xv. 37. Saints are called friends of God; but this title was given eminently to Abraham, Gen. xxvi. 24: the Mahometans generally call him by this name; and they call Hebron, where they believe his tomb to be, the city of the friend of God. The friend of the bridegroom, is the bridegroom; who does the honours of the wedding. See PARANYMPH.

[It is much to be regretted, that our language has not a more appropriate word than friend by which to render the Greek ἐταίρος; which by no means signifies friend in the sense of φίλος. This is desirable in the parable of the labourers in the vineyard, Matt. xx. 13. also, chap. xxii. 12: but, it is absolutely necessary in reference to the appellation given by our Lord to the traitor Judas, chap. xxvi. 50. who certainly was not the friend of Jesus when he betrayed him. The original word seems here to mean companion; or, as our workmen call their fellow workmen, mate; as, "bench-mate;" a fellow-workman at a bench; and so "ship-mate;" which merely means one who sails in the same ship; but is far enough from implying one to whom properly belongs the appellation of friend; or one for whom the smallest degree of friendship is entertained: for, in fact, a ship-mate may be an enemy.]

FROG, a very common creature. Moses brought on Egypt a plague of frogs. Exod. viii. 5, &c.

Frogs were unclean: Moses indeed does not name them, but he includes them by saying, ye shall not eat of any thing that moves in the waters, unless it have fins and scales, Lev. xi. 9. St. John, Rev. xvi. 13. says, he saw three unclean spirits issuing out of the false prophet's mouth like frogs.

FRONTLETS. Leo of Modena thus describes them: the Jews take four pieces of parchment, and write, with an ink made on purpose, and in square letters, these four passages, one on each piece. 1. Sanctify unto me all the first-born, &c. Exod. xiii. to the 10th verse. 2. From verse 11 to 16. And when the Lord shall bring thee into the land of the Canaanites, &c. 3. Deut. vi. 4. Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord, to verse 9. 4. Deut. xi. 13. If you shall hearken diligently unto my commandments, to verse 21. This they do in obedience to these words of Moses: "These commandments shall be for a sign unto thee upon thine hand, and for a memorial between thine eyes."

These four little pieces of parchment are fastened together, and a square formed of them, on which the letter Schin is written; then a little square of hard calf's skin is put a-top, out of which come two leathern strings an inch wide, and a cubit and an half, or thereabouts, in length. This square is put on the middle of the forehead, and the strings being girt about the head, make a knot in the form of the letter ץ; they then are brought before, and fall on the breast. It is called Teffila-schel-Rosch, or the Tephila of the head. The most devout Jews put it on both at morning and noon-day prayer; but the generality wear it only at morning prayer. Only the chanter of the synagogue is obliged to put it on at noon, as well as morning.

It is a question, whether the use of frontlets, and phylacteries, was literally ordained by Moses. They who believe their use to be binding, observe, that the text of Moses speaks as positively of this, as of other precepts; he requires the commandments of God to be written on the doors of houses, as a sign on their hands, and as an ornament on their foreheads, Exod. xiii. 16. If there is any obligation to write these commandments on their doors, as the text intimates, there is the same for writing them on their hands and foreheads. Their use was common in our Saviour's time, not only in Judæa, Judæa, but likewise among the Indian Jews, the Persians, and Babylonians, according to St. Jerom. And, long before, the doctors, whom the high-priest Eleazar sent to Ptolemy Philadelphus, king of Egypt, spoke of these phylacteries as at all times received among them; and referred the beginning of them to Moses.

They add, that in the time of Moses, the heathen carried abundance of charms and superstitious preservatives about them, and even some immodest things; that he, to cure his people of these bad customs, or to prevent them, enjoined them to wear on their hands and foreheads the sacred words of his ordinances.

Others, on the contrary, maintain, that these precepts should be taken figuratively and allegorically; meaning, that they should very carefully preserve the remembrance of God's law, and observe his commands; that they should always have them in their "mind's eye," and never forget them. Prior to the Babylonish captivity, no traces of them appear in the history of the Jews. The prophets never inveigh against the omission or neglect of them; nor was there any question concerning them in the reformation of manners at any time among the Hebrews. The almost general custom in the East of wearing phylacteries and frontlets, determines nothing for the antiquity or usefulness of this practice. Jesus Christ did not absolutely condemn them; but he condemned the abuse of them in the Pharisees, their wearing them with affectation, and larger than other Jews. The Caraites Jews, who adhere to the letter of the law, and despise traditions, call the Rabbinical Jews bridled asses, because they wear these tephilin and frontlets. See PHYLACTERIES, TEPHILIN, also FRAGMENT, No. CCXXXIV. and PLATE.

[FROST. For the alternation of frost by night, notwithstanding the great heats by day, in the East, vide FRAGMENT, No. III.]

FRUIT. By fruit is sometimes meant reward, Prov. i. 31. They shall receive the reward of their bad conduct. The fruit of the body, signifies children; Of the fruit of thy body shall I set upon thy seat, Psalm cxxxii. 12. The fruit of the lips; the punishment or reward of words bad or good. I will punish the fruit of the stout heart of the king of Assyria, Isaiah x. 12. His insolent discourses against me. Uncircumcised fruit, or impure fruit, Levit. xix. 23. is the fruit of a tree newly planted, during the first three years. In the fourth year it was offered to the Lord; after which it was free to be generally eaten.

The fruits of the spirit, mentioned by St. Paul, are love, joy, peace, Gal. v. 22. The fruits of righteousness, mentioned by the same apostle, are sown in peace, Philip. i. 11. Irregular passions and carnal dispositions produce the fruits of death: Ut fructificarent mortui; they are mortal to the soul, James iii. 18. Rom. vii. 5.

FRUIT, see APPLE.

[FULFILL. This is one of the most difficult words in the Bible, to treat within a narrow compass: for as it refers to somewhat foretold, and there are many modes of foretelling, as well as different degrees of clearness, with which future events may be foretold; we naturally expect as many corresponding modes of fulfilment as there are varieties in such predictions. For instance, Alijah the prophet foretold to the wife of Jeroboam, that directly as she got home, her child should die: this prediction received an instant and direct fulfilment in the death of her child. 1 Kings xiv. 17.

Joshua foretold, that whoever would undertake to rebuild Jericho, should begin it with the loss of his first-born son, and finish it with the death of his youngest: this was not fulfilled for 500 years, and we are uncertain whether it included the death of the intermediate children; but Hiel of Bethel experienced its fulfilment, though in a mode, probably, utterly unexpected. Vide FRAGMENT, No. V. and Josh. vi. 26. 1 Kings xvi. 34.

Sometimes prophecy has a direct and sole reference to a certain fact to come to pass hereafter, at a distant period: but, sometimes it refers (doubly) as well to a fact which is appointed to take place at no very distant period, as to another fact of which the first is only a sign or earnest: vide ALMA, HEZEKIAH, and FRAGMENT, No. II. So that when the first fact has actually happened, the prediction may be said in one respect to be fulfilled; while in another respect it may be said to continue unfulfilled: because its complete and final accomplishment is not yet arrived.

N. B. Many prophecies seem to be in this state at present: they have been partly fulfilled, in past events; and they are fulfilling now progressively; but their final and complete accomplishment is to be looked for hereafter. The Jewish nation is a striking instance in proof of this observation.

Sometimes a remarkable phraseology, which has a direct reference only to one specific event, is said to be fulfilled in another event: i. e. the phrase may be well applied to, may be remarkably illustrated by, or may, indeed, in a loose and distant acceptance, be referred to the latter event; which appears as another and further fulfilment, though, strictly speaking, the first fulfilment was enough to satisfy (and actually did satisfy) the prophecy.

I suppose the slaughter of the infants at Bethlehem may be taken as an instance of this nature; for certainly the prophet Jeremiah, xxxi. 15. employed the phrase of Rachel weeping for her children, and refusing to be comforted in reference to an event much nearer to himself than that to which the evangelist Matthew applies it; though the latter event was a remarkable coincidence, and the expression might readily be accommodated to it.

Sometimes a phrase which originally meant to describe a particular man, or class of men, is said to be fulfilled by a class of men distinct, and distant, from those of whom it was first spoken; because the resemblance is so close, and their characters are so similar, that what was predicated of one, may very aptly and expressively be applied to the other. So when the prophets complain of the perverseness of the Jews in their days, the same kind of perverseness in the days of the Messiah, may naturally be described by the same kind of language; the import of which is revived, or rather is more powerfully fulfilled, in the later application of it, though to a very distant generation.

Proverbial expressions, which do not refer to any specific occurrence, or fact, are said to be fulfilled when an event happens—not which may be applied or referred to them,—but to which they may be applied or referred as very similar or descriptive.

All these and many other modes of fulfilment, are expressed in Scripture: and it requires attention to distinguish whether a strict or a looser sense is to be put on the word fulfil. We ought also to remark, that some things are said to be done, that it might be fulfilled; but, in general, persons who were absolutely engaged in fulfilling prophecy, had no suspicion that their actions were in any degree predicted; nor did they perceive the relation of them to the prophecy, or the prophecy to them, till after the events which accomplished the prediction were over; nevertheless, it should seem, that our Lord did purposely, and with design to fulfil former predictions, use certain expressions, and perform certain actions. So he rode on an ass, that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophet; and Jesus himself knew that he was fulfilling this prophecy, but his disciples did not know it; they did not recollect that Scripture contained any such passage: still less that it thus described any part of the Messiah's character or conduct. This appears very remarkably, John xix. 28. "After this, Jesus knowing that all things were now accomplished, that the Scripture might be fulfilled, said, I thirst."

[FULFIL. Time is said to be fulfilled, in various places of Scripture. Disposition of mind is said to be fulfilled, Deut. i. 36. 1 Kings xi. 6: the counsels of God are said to be fulfilled; the law and the prophets, &c. but these phrases require no explanation.]

FULLER. The fuller's field; the fuller's fountain. See ROGEL. This word signifies a fuller. The fuller's fountain was either that of Siloam, or one of its branches. Vide SILOAM.

FULNESS. Plenitudo. Scripture uses this word to signify very different things; a handful, a full omer, a full field. The world and the fulness thereof. Psal. i. 12. Let the sea roar, and the fulness thereof. The fear of the Lord tendeth to life, and he that hath it, shall abide satisfied. Full, or fulness, are taken sometimes in this last sense; To what purpose is the multitude of their sacrifices unto me?—I am full of their burnt-offerings; I am sated with them. Full of years, one who had lived long enough: to the extreme extent of hu-life. The perfection, the consummation. The fear of the Lord is the highest point (the fulness) of wisdom. The fulness of their sins; the height of iniquity. We have all received of the fulness of Jesus Christ, from the superabundance, the store, of his graces, John i. 16. Love is the fulness of the law, Rom. xiii. 10. the fulfilling, the perfection, the consummation. The fulness of time, Gal. iv. 4. the completion of the period marked out by the prophets.

FUNERALS. See DEAD.

[FURNACE. For some thoughts on this subject, relating to the miraculous preservation of the Hebrew youths, vide, FRAGMENT, No. CXLIX. Also PLATES: PLACE OF FIRE, and SLAVES IN THE EAST, fig. A.]

FURROWS. Sulci. The sacred writers sometimes borrow similitudes from the furrows of the field. Job xxxi. 38. If my land cry against me, or the furrows thereof complain: if I have employed poor ploughmen to till my ground without paying them for their labour. Thou waterest the ridges thereof abundantly, Psal. lxx. 10. thou settlest the furrows thereof; Heb. thou breakest the clods of it.

Ecclus. vii. 3. says, figuratively, Sow not upon the furrows of unrighteousness, for if thou sowest iniquity, thou shalt reap all sorts of evils and misfortunes. See Gal. iv. 7. Hosea x. 4. Judgment springeth up as hemlock in the furrows of the field. Judgment and wrath will produce bitterness in thy fields, Vulgate. Here is a double metaphor, judgment, i. e. the vengeance geance of God ; it springs, it produces bitterness, bitter herbs, quasi super fulcos agri, as it were on a ploughed field, ready to receive seed. And verse 11, 12. I will make Judah plough, and Jacob shall break the clods, and form the furrows. The ten tribes and Judah, shall one after the other endure the effects of my anger. But, adds the prophet, immediately, Sow in righteousness, and reap in mercy.

[FURY is attributed to Divinity only metaphorically, or speaking after the manner of men: i. e. God's providential, &c. actions are such as would be performed by a man in a state of fury. So that when God is said to pour out his fury on a person, or a people, it is a figurative expression for 'dispensing afflictive providences: but we must be very careful not to attribute human infirmities, passions, malevolence to the Deity.]

G

GAAL, גַּעַל, contempt, or abomination. [Perhaps, reward, from an Arabic root; he was son of Obed, a servant, or labourer.]

GAAL, son of Ebed, having entered Shechem, to assist it against Abimelech, son of Gideon, the people amidst their entertainments cursed Abimelech; who came against Shechem with an army: Gaal advanced to engage him, but was defeated. Judg. ix. 26: A. M. 2771; ante A. D. 1233. Vide ABIMELECH III.

GAASII, גַּאשִׁי; tempest, commotion, tumult, or overthrow.

GAASII, a mountain of Ephraim, north whereof stood Timnath-Serah, celebrated for Joshua's tomb, (Josh. xxiv. 30.) which Eusebius says, was known in his time.

GAASH, Brook, or Valley of; 2 Sam. xxiii. 30. Probably at the foot of mount Gaash.

GABA, גַּבָּע, a cup, a goblet: otherwise, a hill; from גַּבְעָה gabaah.

GABA, a city at the foot of mount Carmel, between Ptolemais and Cæsarea. Josephus, de Bello, lib. iii. cap. 2. says, it was called the city of horsemen, because Herod gave it to his veteran cavalry. M. Reland is of opinion, that this is Caïpha, or Hepha, at the foot of mount Carmel, towards Ptolemais. Stephens, the geographer speaks of Gabe, as a part of Galilee. Eusebius places a little town called Gaba, or Gabe, sixteen miles from Cæsarea in Palestine, on the side of the great plain of Legio. If this be the Gaba or Gabe of Josephus and Stephens, it must be south of Carmel, and I do not see how it can belong to Galilee.

GABAA, Heb. a hill. Many places in a mountainous country like Judæa might be called Gibeah, Gibeon, Gabbatha, Gibethon, Gabbath, Gabe, or Gabaa; signifying eminences. Sometimes proper names, called Gibeah, are translated hills: as, Zech. xiv. 10, "All the land shall be turned as a plain, from Geba to Rimmon." And, on the contrary, Gibeah, (1 Sam. vii. 1.) which might be thought to be a city, is only a hill in Kirjath-jearim, [as our English translation renders it. See GEB A.]

GABAAH, or GABAATH, גַּבְעָה. See GABA.

GABAEI, Γαβαῖος; limits; from גַּבָּל gabal.

GABAEI, or GEBELUS, of Naphtali; was carried into captivity beyond the Euphrates, with Tobit his relation, and settled at Rages, a city of Media. He borrowed of his kinsman Tobit ten talents of silver, or about £4500. A. M. 3281, ante A. D. 721.

Tobit sent his son Tobias to Rages, to desire payment from his cousin Gabael: but Tobias, having married at Ecbatana, he intreated Azarias his conductor, to fetch the money. The text of Tobit implies, that these talents were not lent to Gabael, but left in trust with him.

GABARA, or GABAROTH, a town in Galilee. Josephus (de Vita Sua) speaks of it as a principal city. M. Reland shows, that transcribers have inserted Gadara for Gabara, in Josephus.

GABATHA, in the south of Judah twelve miles from Eleutheropolis, where was shown the prophet Habakkuk's sepulchre. Euseb. & Jerom. in Gabaat.

GABAI, גַּבִּי; elevation, back; from גַּב gab: otherwise grasshoppers; from גֹּב gob: otherwise, cistern, ditch; from גַּבָּע gaba. Neh. xi. 8.

GABBATHA, Γαββαθᾶ; high, or elevated. In Greek, λιθοστρωτον, lithostratos, paved with stones; from λίθος, a stone, and στρωτος, paved.

GABBATHA, the Hebrew name of a place in Pilate's palace, (John xix. 13) from whence Pilate pronounced sentence against Jesus Christ. It was probably an eminence, or terrace; a gallery, or balcony paved with stone or marble, and pretty high; for Gabbatha signifies principally elevation. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. L.

GABINIUS. Aulus Gabinius held a considerable employment in Pompey's army, and was sent by him to Jerusalem to receive the money which Antigonos had promised, A. M. 3940; ante A. D. 64. But Antigonos, not keeping his word, Gabinius was obliged to return without it: hereupon, Pompey besieging Jerusalem, took it, and sent Antigonos prisoner to Rome, with his children. Alexander, son of Aristobulus, having escaped, returned into Judæa; but Gabinius, being made consul, and coming into Syria, ante A. D. 58, compelled him to shut himself up in the castle of Alexandria. Gabinius repaired several cities, which had been destroyed during the wars, as Samaria, Azotus, &c. Josephus, Antiq. lib. xiv. cap. 10. de Bello, lib. i. cap. 6.

Alexander, seeing himself closely pressed, desired peace, and obtained it, on condition of surrendering his fortresses, which Gabinius razed to the ground, by the advice of Alexander's mother.

Gabinius restored Hircanus at Jerusalem, confirmed him in the high-priesthood, and settled governors and judges in the provinces, so that Judæa, from a monarchy, became an aristocracy. He established courts of justice at Jerusalem, Gadara (or at Dora) Amatha, Jericho, and Sephoris; that the people, finding judges in all parts of the country, might not be obliged to go far from their habitations.—Some learned men are of opinion, that the establishment of the Sanhedrim owed its origin to Gabinius. Petav. de doctr. temporum, lib. ii. cap. 26. Vide ALEXANDER and ARISTOBULUS. Gabinius marched against the Parthians; but when he had already passed the Euphrates, he received money from Ptolemy Auletes, king of Egypt, and carried his army into Egypt, to his assistance.

Ante A. D. 55, Crassus was sent into Syria, in the room of Gabinius, who, returning to Rome, was prosecuted by the Syrians, and exiled. Julius Cæsar recalled him; he returned to Syria as triumvir, about ante A. D. 41, and shewed great friendship to Phasael and Herod.

GABRIEL, גבריאל: God is my strength, or man of God, or strength of God, or my strong God; from גבר gaber, man, [hero] or גִּבּוֹר ghibbor, strength, i, my, and אֵל el, God.

GABRIEL, a principal angel in heaven. He was sent to the prophet Daniel to explain his visions: also to Zechariah, to announce to him the future birth of John the Baptist, Dan. viii. 16. ix. 21. xi. 1. Luke i. 11, & seq.

Six months after this, Gabriel was sent to Nazareth, to a virgin named Mary, betrothed to Joseph. Luke i. 26, &c. Vide ANNUNCIATION.

Probably, also, Gabriel was the angel which appeared to Joseph when thinking to dismiss the Holy Virgin; also, on another occasion, which enjoined him to retire to Egypt; and after the decease of Herod, directed him to return into Judæa. The Cabalists say, Gabriel was master or preceptor to the patriarch Joseph.

GAD, גַּד; happy, or armed and prepared: otherwise, goat; from גָּדָה gadah, [a troop, i. e. of children, says Simon: others think girded, as a soldier; or happy, fortunate.

I presume to think, the latter acceptance of this name is the most likely: as we have the deity, Gad, i. e. Fortune. The name Felix among the Latins, and Eutyches, Eutyches, among the Greeks, were common, and of the same import. It may express either the wishes of the parent for the child, as a name of good omen: or, the happy delivery of the mother, as a name of reference to a past event.]

GAD, son of Jacob and Zilpah, Leah's servant, Gen. xxx. 9, 10, 11. Leah called him Gad, saying, "Happy am I!" [g. how lucky? GOOD-LUCK!]

Gad had seven sons, Ziphion, Haggai, Shuni, Ezbon, Eri, Arodi, and Arel, Gen. xli. 16.

Jacob, blessing Gad, said, "A troop shall overcome him, but he shall overcome at the last." Gen. xlix. 19. Moses, in his last song, mentions Gad, "as a lion which teareth the arm with the crown of the head," &c. Deut. xxxiii.

The tribe of Gad came out of Egypt, in number 45,650. After the defeat of the kings Og and Sihon, Gad and Reuben desired to have their allotment east of Jordan, alleging their great number of cattle. Moses granted their request, on condition, that they should accompany their brethren, and assist in conquering the land west of Jordan. Gad had his inheritance between Reuben south, and Manasseh north, with the mountains of Gilead east, and Jordan west. Vide the MAP of CANAAN, &c.

[Whoever considers the country of Canaan, as a military position, will see in this separation of the tribes into eastern and western, the first cause of the subjugation of the Israelites by their enemies. Had the whole strength and population of the nation been concentrated, having the Jordan for its frontier, there is every reason to think, that no army the Moabites, &c. could have brought against them, would have been strong enough to force the passage of the river, and to have advanced into the western country so as to overrun it, or even to obtain a temporary possession of any considerable or important part of it.]

II. GAD, a prophet, David's friend, who followed him when persecuted by Saul. Scripture styles him a prophet, and David's seer, 2 Sam.

2 Sam. xxiv. 11. The first time we find him with this prince, is when in the land of Moab, to secure his father and mother (1 Sam. xxii. 5) in the first year of his flight, and of Saul's persecution. The prophet Gad warned him to return into the land of Judah.

After David had determined to number his people, the Lord sent the prophet Gad to him, who gave him his choice of three scourges: seven years' famine, or three months' flight before his enemies, or three days' pestilence. Gad advised David to erect an altar to the Lord, in the threshing-floor of Ornan, or Araunah, the Jebusite. Gad wrote a history of David's life, cited 1 Chron. xxix. 29.

III. GAD, a heathen deity, mentioned in several passages: as Isa. lxx. 11, "Ye prepare a table for Gad, and furnish a drink-offering to Meni." Jerom translates, Qui ponitis Fortune mensam, by Gad understanding Good Fortune. See the PLATES, BAAL-GAD. We are assured, that the Arabians call the planet Jupiter, and whatever is good and beneficent, Gad. [Rendered troop in our translation.]

We find a place in Canaan, called the Tower of Gad, Josh. xv. 37; another in the valley of Lebanon, Baal-Gad, Josh. xi. 17. [In Isaiah lxx. 11, "Those who prepare the table for Gad are allotted to the sword; and those who furnish a drink offering to Meni to the slaughter." Perhaps these were services to the powers of heaven, to conjure them to be favourable to the productions of the earth, &c.; therefore the subsequent threatening is famine. We have, in various parts of England, the ceremonies of the wassel bowl: of going round the orchards, singing and sprinkling the trees (I think) on twelfth night; wishing them fertility, &c. Is this a relic of the services prepared for Gad and Meni? or may it, by resemblance, serve to illustrate them? It seems to be a rite derived from deep antiquity; as are many others, of which traces remain. Vide the military character of MENI, &c. in FRAGMENTS, Nos. CVIII. CCLXXXII. in which we find both these deities completely armed, analogous to "the sword"—and the "slaughter" of the prophet.]

[1. Baal-GAD, the "Lord of Fortune:" Josh. xi. 17. xii. 7. xiii. 5. See PLATES; MEDALS.

2. Dibon-GAD, not so much "Dibon of the Gadites," to distinguish it from any other Dibon, as Simon thinks; as "Dibon, the lord of fortune,"—a temple of this deity: or, of the "strong Aun, the lord of fortune." It appears to have been the ancient name of this town before the Gadites had any settlement in the country. Numb. xxxiii. 45, 46. Yet, that the Gadites rebuilt it, appears from chap. xxxii. 34.

3. Migdal-GAD, the "tower of the lord of fortune." As this tower stood in the tribe of Judah, it certainly did not obtain the distinction of Gad from being rebuilt by the Gadites: not to say, that this also appears to be an ancient city of the Canaanites. Simon thinks it was built by a person named Gad.

4. River of GAD. Vide AROER. 2 Sam. xxiv. 5.

I presume, that the deity hitherto commemorated under the name Gad, is masculine; but we have a female Divinity, also of this name in Hazar-GADDAH, Josh. xv. 27. As Fortune is most commonly female in such statues, &c. of her as remain, we need not doubt but the Canaanites adored her under this sex. Indeed, the passage, Isaiah lxx. 11. seems to prove it: "Ye prepare a table to Gad, Fortune—whether lord or lady: and to Meni," which we find in the medals of Antioch, to be either male or female, without distinction; and therefore Gad, the associate of Meni, may well be thought similar in this particular.]

GADARENES, Γαδάρησις, surrounded, walled; from גדר gedar. Whence GADARA. [A stone hedge, or inclosure made of stone, or a fence or separation.

Somewhat of an intrenched inclosure, as Simon thinks; calculated to resist the insults of an enemy.]

1. GADARA, a city beyond Jordan. Josephus, de Bello, lib. v. cap. 1. calls it the capital of Persea, east of the lake of Tiberias, sixty furlongs. Pliny, lib. v. cap. 16, places it on the river Hieramace. It gave name to a district beyond Jordan. Pompey repaired Gadara in consideration of Demetrius, his freed-man, native of it. Gabinius settled there one of the five courts of justice for Judæa. Polybius says, Antiochus the Great besieged Gadara, which was thought to be one of the strongest places in the country, and that it surrendered to him on composition. Epiphanius speaks of the hot-baths of Gadara. We find medals of this city; and some of its ancient bishops in the subscriptions of councils.

The evangelist, Mark v. 1. says, that our Saviour, having passed the sea of Tiberias, came into the district of the Gadarenes. Luke says the same (viii. 26, Gr.) Matthew, (viii. 28) calls it Gergasenes; but some Greek copies read Gadarenes. Origen thinks we should read Gergasenes. Gergasa was near Gadara, and the territory belonging to it was more extensive than that of this last city. As the lands belonging to one were included within the other, one evangelist might say the country of the Gergasenes, another the country of the Gadarenes; either being equally correct.

[If Gadara be properly understood as denoting noting a fenced protection, the name might, with great propriety, be common in many parts; and such retreats would be no less necessary at the northern extremities of the country, than at the southern.

Josephus, de Bell. lib. iv. cap. 26, describes Gadara beyond Jordan, as "Gadara the strong metropolis of Perea:" which, he says, was sixty furlongs distant from Tiberias. Vita sua.

Pliny mentions Gaddara, the river Hieramiac, flowing by it, and now called Hippodion. lib. v. cap. 18. The Rabbins call this river Jarmuch. Gaddara was sometimes reckoned among the cities of Decapolis.

The inhabitants of this Gadara, and its neighbourhood, the GADARENES of the gospel history, might be a remnant of the ancient Girgashites, which formerly composed one tribe in this district, whence the name Gergasa, and Gergasenes.]

II. GADARA, a city of Palestine, near Diospolis and Nicopolis. Perhaps the same as Gazer, Gazerah, Gedor, Gadera, Gador, Gaderoth, frequently mentioned in the Maccabees and Josephus. Vide Reland, Palæstin. lib. iii. p. 679. We have observed, that in Josephus, the reading was in some places Gadara, instead of Gabara. Gabara lay west, and Gadara east of the sea of Tiberias.

[This name occurs several times in the Scriptures, and we are under the necessity of distinguishing the towns so called with considerable attention; because they have hitherto been subject to much confusion.

1. GEDER, of Judah, as appears from its associates. Josh. xii. 13.

2. Beth GEDER, of Judah, 1 Chron. ii. 51.

3. GEDOR, of Judah, Josh. xv. 58. 1 Chron. iv. 4, 18, 39. xii. 7.

4. GEDERA, of Judah, Josh. xv. 36.

5. GEDEROTH, of Judah, Josh. xv. 41.

6. He GEDEROTH, in the south of Judah, 2 Chron. xxviii. 18.

7. GEDEROTHAIM, of Judah, Josh. xv. 26.

These various places are all in one tribe, Judah; and apparently in the south of that tribe. They were, probably, rather forts, or military posts, than extensive and populous towns: "FENCIBLE STATIONS." Some of them were single, others, apparently, were double: and, perhaps, one was almost, or altogether, a chain of fencible posts, in a military sense.

1. GEDER, Josh. xii. 13, appears to have been an ancient Canaanitish town; as its king is reckoned among those of the land, which were slain by Joshua. Its situation may safely be supposed in the south of Judah.

2. It may bear a question, whether Beth GADER be the same town as the foregoing. It appears to have belonged to Judah; and to have been vested in the family of Caleb, son of Hur. It might be named Beth, from some well-fenced house of stone, answering the purposes of protection: or, this distinction might be ancient, and imply a temple. On the whole, I think it the same as the former.

3. GEDOR, Josh. xv. 58, should appear to be a different place from the Gederoth, and Gederothaim of verse 36, and from the Gederoth of verse 41. If we turn to 1 Chron. iv. 39, we find mention of a Gedor apparently in the south of Judah, and not far from Hornah, Ziklag, &c. in verses 30, 31. It is described as furnishing "fat pasture and good, and being wide, quiet, and peaceable; for they of Ham had dwelt there of old." This district was conquered in the "days of Hezekiah." It may, therefore, be presumed, that the adjacent Amalekites, or other tribes, had wrested this country from the tribe of Judah, for the sake of its pasture.

4. GEDERAH, Josh. xv. 36, is evidently in the south of Judah, because conjoined with Adullam, Socoh, Azekah, &c. I should think this Gederah was nearer to the coast than the former: but this is conjecture, merely.

5. Gederoth, Josh. xv. 41, has no distinctive marks annexed to it. Probably this was not far from the coast.

6. He GEDEROTH, 2 Chron. xxviii. 18, seems to be the same as No. 4. because it is, like that, associated with Shocoh, &c.

7. GEDEROTHAIM, Josh. xv. 36, is evidently distinguished from Gederah; and was, I presume, two or more defensible stations, near enough to afford mutual assistance.

It may well be supposed, that the southern frontier of Judah, being liable at all times to incursions from roving tribes of the desert, would be surrounded by a number of erections for purposes of defence: of which some would be more advanced, others more retired; some near the sea, others inland: but all would be places of security and retreat, and probably the stations of guards, to keep watch and ward. I would hope that these illustrations may afford some light to a passage which appears to stand in great need of it, 1 Chron. iv. 23. "These were the potters, and those that dwelt amongst plants and hedges: there they dwelt with the king for his work."—If these had been called botanists instead of potters, their residence among plants and hedges, had been well enough: but that they should "dwell with the king," in such places, and there do the king's work as potters, exceeds comprehension.

The preceding verse affords no assistance in our enquiry: it mentions some "who had the dominion in Moab, and Jashubi-lehem," adding (these are) "ancient things. These were the potters," &c. Strange enough, that these officers should be potters!

Instead of ancient things, we must understand a place or places, in order to make the passage comport with the context. The words are, "He Debirim," towns so called; from the same root as Debir, the oracle, or adytum of a temple, and Otikim, bendings, crookednesses, contortions, or prolongations: so that the terms, taken together, may import the windings of the districts called (or adjacent to the towns called) the Debirim." In short, I suppose, that three places are intended in this verse: consequently, that 1. Chozeba, and 2. Joash, and 3. Saraph, had the government of, 1. Moab, 2. of Jashubi, or "the settlements" of Lehem; and 3. of Debirim Otikim, the windings, vallies, sinuosities, of the district called Debirim.

If we might derive the word rendered potters from another root denoting to smite; and take the word Gedorah, rendered hedges, (which, I believe, it never signifies, but stone fences) for the name of a place; (it is in the singular in the original) the passage would bear this sense—"These were wardens (staff-officers, provosts) and dwelt in his plantations at Gedorah, on account of the king: because of his royalties they dwelt there." Could we suppose this Gedorah to be our No. 3, surrounded by a fat pasture, "good, wide, quiet, and peaceable," we might perceive the propriety of officers being appointed to superintend the king's rights, or flocks, &c. in these parts. Or, if we consider this Gedorah as a town of passage, it might be a place of payment for the capar duty of passage by travellers. But it ought to be noted, that the LXX. suppose the names of two places here; reading, "These were potters, and dwelt in Ataim and Gadira." If future investigations should discover a bed of potter's clay near Gadera, or near Etam, (which village, I suppose, is the Ataim of the LXX.) then this version may be considered as unquestionable: but, as no traveller, which I recollect, has mentioned such a thing, we may at present take the word potter for artificer in general, as in Isaiah xlv. 9. We may next observe, that an Etam occurs in verse 32 of chap. iv. where it is connected with the Gedor of verse 39. and the probability is, that it means the same place as the LXX. have connected with their Gedira. A comparison of the towns in the neighbourhood may render this clear.

It is very evident, from the identity of the towns around them, that Etam and Gederah could not possibly be far distant from each other; and therefore the LXX. have done well in associating them.

The position assigned to Etam by Dr. Wittman, in his "Travels in Syria," agrees extremely well with these premises. Vide ETAM. See the PLATE; MEDALS of GADARA.]

GADDI, גַּדִּי, my happiness, my army, my troop: or, a kid, or goat, or good fortune.

GADDI, son of Susi of Manasseh, sent by Moses to explore the land. Numbers xiii. 11.

GADDIEL, גַּדְיָאֵל, goat of God; from גַּדִּי gedi, a goat: otherwise, the Lord is my happiness, or my army; from גַּדָּה gadah, felicity, army, &c. and אֵל el, God. Son of Sodi, of Zebulun, sent by Moses to explore Canaan. Numb. xiii. 10.

GADDIS, גַּדִּישׁ, the same as Gaddi: or, a heap of corn on the floor; from גַּדִּישׁ gadish. The surname of John, son of Mattathias, and brother of Judas Maccabæus. Some copies read kaddis, holy.

[GADGAD, or GIDGAD, or GUDGODAH, happiness of happiness, or the girded host. Num. xxxiii. 32. Deut. x. 7.

The Arabic root of this word imports a well of much water. It was a station of the Israelites: and perhaps as Jotbathah, a neighbouring station, is described as a land of rivers of water, Gudgad, Gidgad, or Gudgoda, was a well, among rocks, or otherwise, which furnished a copious supply of water; but it did not stream like a river. The well at Chigré, described by Mr. Bruce, is an instance of what I mean. Eusebius and Jerom describe Gadgada, as they write it, "where are flowings of water." In Numb. xxxiii. 32. we have Hor-Gidgad, which either denotes the mountain Gidgad, where this water issued; or, the cavern Gidgad, where it was contained. As the word Gad signifies "a troop," it is possible, that some inspection of the armed men of Israel, not unlike a review, might take place at, or near, this mountain?]

GADI,

GADI, גָּדִי; from the same root as GADDI.

GADI, father of Menahem. 2 Kings xv. 14.

GADI, where Bani was born, a gallant officer in David's army, 2 Sam. xxiii. 36. Probably Gadah, or Hazar-gaddah. Josh. xv. 27.

GADOR, or GADARA. Vide II. GADARA.

GAHAM, גָּחַם, Gai'm: who conducts them; from גָּחַח guach, to guide, to turn out, and מֵאֵם am, them: otherwise, their departure: otherwise, going out of heat; from גָּחַח guach, going out, and חֵם chum, heat. Son of Nahor and Reumah, Gen. xxii. 24.

GAHAR, גָּהָר, the coming out of heat, or anger; from גָּחַח guach, coming out, and חֵם charah, anger, or חָרָר charar, fire, heat.—A Levite, who returned from Babylon with Esdras, Ezra ii. 47.

GAIUS, or CAIUS, Γαῖος, may signify earthy; from γῆ, the earth, or joyful. Vide CAIUS.

GAIUS, Paul's disciple, (Acts xix. 29) was probably a Macedonian, but settled at Corinth, where he lodged Paul during his abode there: Rom. xv. 23, "Gaius mine host." When the apostle went into Asia, Gaius and Aristarchus accompanied him to Ephesus, where they abode some time with him; so that in the sedition raised there about great Diana, the Ephesians ran to the house of Gaius and Aristarchus, and dragged them to the theatre: no harm happened to either of them, because the commotion was appeased by the prudence of the town-clerk. Origen, in Rom. speaks of Gaius, Paul's disciple, said to have been bishop of Thessalonica.

II. GAIUS, to whom the apostle John wrote his third epistle, was, in the opinion of several commentators, the same as Gaius, Paul's disciple and host at Corinth: others think, the Gaius of John is mentioned. Acts, xx. 4. as being of Derbe, in Lycaonia, consequently he is not Gaius the Macedonian. The Apostolic Constitutions imply, (lib. vii. cap. 46) that St. John established one Gaius in the bishopric of Pergamus; and the author of the Additions to Athanasius's Synopsis (p. 155) seems to believe, that the style of John's gospel was Gaius's, who was Paul's host. But much more probably, it was to Gaius of Derbe, St. John's epistle is addressed.

[The name Gaius was so common in antiquity, that there is great difficulty in fixing on any one as the person to whom St. John wrote; since he might be neither of those known to us in the New Testament. If we may be guided by his character, he is certainly the Gaius of Corinth; for St. Paul describes him, not only as being his host, but also, that of the whole Church;—not the Corinthian church, which could not need a host; but of the whole Christian church, whether Jews or Gentiles by nation; whether in opinion followers of Peter or of Paul: such was his Christian benevolence, and unrestricted hospitality. Now this is the very virtue for which the Gaius to whom St. John wrote is highly praised by this apostle, who could not have described the host of the whole Church in terms more appropriate than he uses of Gaius. It should also appear, that the Gaius of Corinth was known at Ephesus, he having been with St. Paul, and in great personal danger. St. John, writing from Ephesus in favour of certain travelling Christian brethren, takes this opportunity of complimenting Gaius; and as these brethren, most probably, went direct from Ephesus to Corinth by sea, it is very likely that the apostle, who promises Gaius to visit him, might take the same trip in some trading vessel; the intercourse between Ephesus and Corinth, both extensively trading towns, being considerable. Dr. Lardner has an article on this subject, conducted with his usual ability, in which he maintains a different opinion; and there are, also, many other opinions, all of them exposed to strong objections. See DIOTREPHES.]

GALAL, גָּלָל, wheel, revolution, frontier.

GALALAI, גָּלָלַי, Γαλαῖ, Γαλαῖαι: my wheel, my frontier, [roll, limit, periphery].

GALATIA, a province in Asia Minor, having Cappadocia east, Bithynia west, Pamphylia south, and the Euxine Sea north. The Gauls, having invaded Asia Minor, in several bodies (of which we have an account in Pausanias, Attica, cap. iv.) conquered this country, settled in it, and called it Galatia, which in Greek, signifies Gaul: [rather, perhaps, New Gaul, or Little Gaul.]

The Galatians, to whom St. Paul wrote, were descended from these Gauls. Paul preached several times in Galatia; first, A. D. 51. Acts xvi. 6; afterwards, A. D. 54. Acts xviii. 23; and formed considerable churches there. It is credible, he was the first who preached there to the Gentiles: but, possibly, Peter had preached there to the Jews, since his first epistle is directed to the Jews, scattered throughout Pontus, Galatia, &c. And the Jews, converted by Peter were probably they who occasioned those differences in the Galatian church, on account of which Paul wrote his epistle, wherein he takes some pains to establish his character of apostle, which had been disputed, with intention to place him below Peter, who preached generally to Jews only, and who observed the law. The subscriptions, in the Greek, of this epistle, epistle, say, it was written from Rome. Theodoret thinks it was the first which Paul wrote from thence; and Jerom will have it, that he penned it while in prison: but we choose rather to follow that opinion which dates it from Ephesus, A. D. 55.

In 2 Macc. viii. 20, it is said, that Judas Maccabæus, exhorting his people to fight valiantly against the Syrians, related to them several instances of God's protection; among others, that which they had experienced in a battle fought in Babylonia, wherein 6000 Jews killed 120,000 Galatians. We have no particulars of the time, or circumstances of this defeat; but it is probable, that the Galatians, settled in Galatia, were not meant, but the Gauls, who at that time over-ran Asia, as we have observed from Pausanias: the Greek Galatæi being taken equally for either.

[Pontus was a region, which extended along the shores of the Pontus Euxinus, whence it took its name, from Colchis to the river Halys, which separated it from Paphlagonia. The most remarkable division of it was into three parts; I. Cappadocian Pontus; II. Polemoniæ Pontus; III. Galatian Pontus: these three divisions composed the kingdom of Pontus, in the time of Mithridates Eupator.

Galatian Pontus was larger than the other two; it lay between the Thermodion and the Halys; rivers which separated it on one side from the Polemoniæ Pontus, on the other side from Paphlagonia: the Iris ran in the midst of it. As it adjoined Galatia on the continent, probably, this division took its name from that circumstance: and it might be inhabited by Galatians: or Emigrant Gauls.

This country adjoined Bithynia; and was seized by a body of Gauls, who were called in to assist a king of Bithynia: having expelled his former enemies, they established themselves in these districts, and divided the territory as their property. Being now peopled by a mixture of Gauls and Greeks, it was called Gaulo-grecia, and at length Galatia. Pliny, lib. v. cap. 32. Ptolemy, lib. v. cap. 4. Strabo, lib. iv.

The Galatians, especially those of Pessinuntum, worshipped the Mother of the Gods. Callimachus, in his hymns (in Delum. v. 184) calls them Ἀποροι δῆμι, "a foolish people:" and Hilary, who was himself a Gaul, describes them as Gallus indociles. Hymn. also Jerom, Pref. 2. Ep. ad Galat. which may well excuse St. Paul's addressing them as "foolish," chap. iii. It was probably an appellation given them, current in their neighbourhood: it is likely too, they supposed themselves, or were supposed by others, to be peculiarly liable to the effects of incantations and fascinations;—to delusion by which arts, or by others no less effectual, the liveliness of their disposition might perpetually expose them.

The possessors of Galatia were of three different nations, or tribes of Gauls: the Tolistobogi, the Trocmi, and the Tectosagi. There are imperial medals extant, on which these names are found. That of the Tolistobogi, on a medal of L. Verus, struck at Pessinuntum: that of the Trochimi, on medals of Septimus Severus, Julia Domna, and Caracalla, struck at Tavia; that of the Tectosagi, on medals of Titus and Domitian, struck at Sebaste.

It is of some consequence to maintain these distinctions, because we have supposed that while St. Peter was preaching in one part of Galatia, the apostle Paul was making converts in another part; and that some, claiming authority from Peter, propagated tenets not conformable to the opinion of Paul: to correct and expose which errors was the occasion of Paul's Epistle to the churches in Galatia. Nothing is more probable, than that the different nations of Gauls furnished partisans, whose overweening zeal far exceeded the doctrines of their principals. Such has ever been the character of the Gauls; equally with a certain fickleness of disposition, of which later ages have had but too many and too powerful demonstrations. Hence, while they were at one time ready to pluck out their eyes, if it might benefit their evangelical teacher, they quickly relinquished his principles, and were as readily brought to adopt another Gospel, which indeed was not a Gospel, but a continuation of unnecessary observances, to which they had already paid too much attention.]

[EPISTLE to the GALATIANS. There is great reason to think that the Epistle to the Galatians, is the first that was written by St. Paul. If I am not mistaken, there are in it marks of a less practiced pen, as well in language as in composition, which do not occur in any other of that Apostle's writings. This early date of this Epistle was asserted by Marcion, in the second century; and Tertullian represents the writer as a "Neophytos," full of zeal, and not yet brought to become a "Jew to the Jews, that he might gain the Jews." Without adopting this sentiment, we may conclude that Paul's first visit to the Galatians was not long after his return to Antioch from the council at Jerusalem, Acts xvi. when Paul and Silas went through Phrygia and Galatia, &c. CALMET has fixed this journey to A. D. 51, but Michaelis argues for A. D. 49, and it should seem that this letter was written very soon after the departure of the Apostle from his converts on this journey; for he expresses his wonder that they were so soon alienated from him, their Spiritual father, chap. i. 6. St. Paul writes this Epistle in his own name, and in the names of the brethren who were with him: these were, in all probability, personally known to the Galatians, and therefore Silas was one; Acts xv. 40. also Timothy, xvi. 3. and doubtless, others were in their company. As we know not of any other opportunity to which these marks agree, we may be led to think, that it was written and sent off, before Paul crossed the sea to go into Macedonia. This indicates Troas, where the Apostle made some stay, Acts xvi. 8, and where he had books and parchments, which he committed to the care of Carpus, (though whether at this time, we cannot tell; as the Apostle was several times at Troas.) —Perhaps, this implies facilities for writing in this city; which could not be expected at every place in his journey.

Other opinions have supposed this Epistle was written at Corinth, Acts xviii. about A. D. 51 or 52; Dr. Lardner is of this opinion: or, at Ephesus, Acts xviii. 23, 24;—or, at the same time with the Epistle to the Romans, Acts xx. 2, 4.—or, at Rome, which is most improbable: as the writer mentions nothing of his bonds; as he does in all his Epistles written from Rome: nor could he, at that time, have reproached the Galatians with being so soon perverted from his principles.]

GALBANUM, חלבנה chelbaneh. LXX. Χαλβάνη, a gum, or sweet spice, an ingredient in the incense burned at the golden altar, in the holy place. It is a juice, drawn by incision from a plant, much like the large kind of fenel which grows in Syria on mount Amanus. The smell is not very agreeable, especially alone. The word signifies —fat, unctuous, gummy.

GALILEE, גליל, Γαλιλαία: a frontier; from Gilgal. Vide GALAL, and GALALAI.

[GALILEE, rollings, or a wheel. This term seems to denote the nature of the country, of which it is the name; and may import either the rounds, limits, or circuit of the Israelite territory, northward: or, the mountains and hills of which it consists were considered as rounds, knolls, or what we call haughs. It is, however, certain, that the word gal, Cant. iv. 12. comp. Job viii. 17. imports a well, and it may be questioned, whether the circular bason near Paneas, where originated the stream of the Jordan, might not give name to the district adjacent to it, whence, by degrees, it spread over a much more extensive region.

Galilee is an ancient name, and is found so early as Josh. xx. 7. xxi. 32. 1 Chron. vi. 61. Isaiah viii. 23. 1 Kings ix. 11. It is written more fully, with an z final, in 2 Kings xv. 29.

Ezek. xlvi. 8. and it appears to have had appended to it, the distinction “of nations,” or, “the Gentiles,” as we read, Josh. xii. 23. of the king of the nations of Gilgal, or Galilee, and some think, it is also called Gilgal, Deut. xi. 30. We have also a Geliloth, “the circles,” a place on the confines of Judah and Benjamin, Josh. xviii. 17, which is taken for the same as Gilgal, chap. xv. 7. In all these names, the idea of rotundity or circularity, is admitted: which might refer either to round hills, round vallies, or round wells.

Galilee was one of the most extensive provinces into which the Holy Land was divided: it exceeded Judea in extent, but, probably, varied in its limits at different periods.

This province is divided by the Rabbins into 1. The Upper; 2. The Nether; and, 3. The Valley. The limits of Galilee were, on the south, Samaris and Scythopolis, unto the flood of Jordan, says Josephus, de Bello, lib. iii. 4.

Galilee contained four tribes, Issachar, Zebulun, Naphtali, and Asher: a part also of Dan; and part of Perea, i. e. beyond the river. Upper Galilee abounded in mountains, and was eminently understood by the term Galilee of the Gentiles, as the mountainous nature of the country enabled those who possessed the fastnesses, to maintain themselves against invaders. Strabo, (lib. xvi.) enumerates among its inhabitants Egyptians, Arabians, and Phenicians. Lower Galilee, which contained the tribes of Zebulun and Asher, was sometimes called the Great Field, “the champaign,” Deut. xi. 30. The Valley was adjacent to the Sea of Tiberias. Josephus describes Galilee as very populous, containing two hundred and four cities and towns. It was also very rich, and paid two hundred talents in tribute. The natives were brave, and made good soldiers: they were also seditious, and prone to insolence and rebellion. De Bell. lib. ii. cap. 9. He divides Galilee only into Upper and Lower.

We scarcely find any mention in the books of Ezra and Nehemiah, of the inhabitants of Galilee and Perea; whether they were Jews returned from Babylon, or whether a mixture of sundry nations. The language of these regions differed considerably from that of Judea; and so did various customs, in which each nation followed its own. The difference of dialect is repeatedly observed and enlarged on by the Rabbins.

Our Lord so frequently visited Galilee, that he was called a Galilean, Matt. xxvi. 69. And it deserves notice, that he was addressed under this title by his adversary the dying Julian, who, being cut off from prosecuting his purposes against Christianity, exclaimed with indignation, dignation, "Thou hast conquered, O Galilean!" Euseb. Eccl. Hist. lib. x. 35. et al. Vide infra. The population of Galilee being very great, Christ had many opportunities of doing good in this country: and being out of the power of the priests at Jerusalem, he seems to have preferred it as his abode. Both Nazareth and Capernaum were in this division. From such a mixture of people many provincialisms might be expected; hence we find Peter detected by his language, probably by his phraseology as well as his pronunciation. Mark xiv. 70.]

GALILEE, a province in Palestine, extending principally north, beyond the plain of Jezreel, or the Great Plain; divided into Upper and Lower Galilee. Lower Galilee extends into Zebulun, Asher, and Naphtali, on this side Jordan, west of the sea of Tiberias. Upper Galilee extends principally beyond Jordan, inclining toward the Trachonitis, Libanus, and Batanea. It was called, Galilee of the Gentiles, because possessed by Gentiles, with Jews interspersed among them; and because it bordered on Gentile nations, as the Phœnicians, Syrians, and Arabians.

As our opinion that Galilee extended beyond Jordan has some difficulty in it, it is necessary to support our assertion. Judas Gaulanitis is called the Galilean, Acts v. 37; and in Josephus, Antiq. lib. xx. cap. 3. Now Gaulan was beyond Jordan; Galilee therefore extended into that country. Josephus places Bethsaida on the other side Jordan, Antiq. lib. xx. also, de Bello, cap. 13, and so does Pliny, lib. v. cap. 15: that city was certainly part of Galilee, and the apostles, who were of Bethsaida, are called Galileans; Galilee, therefore, in part at least, reached beyond Jordan. Eusebius, on Isaiah ix, says clearly, that Galilee lay on the other side of Jordan. The LXX. in Isaiah, xxxiii. 9, translate Basan—Galilee. Now Basan was certainly beyond Jordan. Jerom, in his comment, remarks, that these interpreters have put the name of a province for a certain place in that province. He believed that Basan was in Galilee. For this opinion, see Lightfoot, Chorograph. on Mark, and Hor. Talmud. Matt. xvi. 13, and Cellarius Geog. Ant. lib. iii. &c.; for the contrary, Reland, Palæst. tom. i. lib. i. cap. 31.

Josephus (de Bello, lib. iii. cap. 2) limits Galilee thus: it is terminated west, says he, by the city of Ptolemais and mount Carmel, (which do not belong to Galilee); on the south by the country of Samaria and Scythopolis, on the river Jordan; on the east by the cantons of Hippos, Gadara, and Gaulan; on the north by the confines of the Tyrians.

Lower GALILEE reaches in length from Tibe-rias to Chabulon, or Zabulon, the frontier of Ptolemais; in width from Chaloth, in the great plain, to Bersabee. The breadth of Upper Galilee begins at Bersabee, and extends to Baca, which separates it from the Tyrians. Its length reaches from Tella, a village on the river Jordan to Meroth. But the exact situation of these places is not known.

Josephus says, the Galileans were naturally good soldiers, bold and intrepid; that they bravely resisted the foreign nations around them; that their country was fruitful, and well cultivated; and the people laborious and industrious. That the number of towns and villages in it was very great, and so well peopled, that the least towns contained 15,000 inhabitants.

Our Saviour was surnamed Galilean, because he was brought up at Nazareth, a city of Galilee. His disciples, and Christians in general, were called Galileans, (Acts ii. 7; Arrian, lib. iv.; Dissert. Epict. cap. 7. Julian, Emper. Ep. ad Porphy.) because the apostles were of Galilee. Matthew (iv. 15) applies to the preaching of our Saviour those words of Isaiah, (ix. 1, 2) "The land of Zebulon and the land of Naphthaliim, by the way of the sea, beyond Jordan, Galilee of the Gentiles: the people which sat in darkness saw great light." The Galileans were not esteemed very knowing in matters of religion; and the Jews did not believe that a prophet should come out of Galilee, John vii. 41, 52; forgetting the prophet Jonah, 2 Kings xiv. 25. Their language and their accent were different from those of the Jerusalem Jews. Peter was known to be a Galilean by his accent, Matt. xxvi. 73.

See of GALILEE, vide CINNERETH.

I. GALILÆANS, Christians, the disciples of Jesus Christ were called by this name; he having many disciples in that country, and having spent much time there during his ministry.

II. GALILEANS, a sect of Jews, which sprang up some years after the birth of Jesus Christ, under Judas, of Gaulan in Upper Galilee, about A. M. 4010, on occasion of Augustus's appointing an enrolment of the people; which was executed by Quirinius (Cyrenius) in the tenth year of Jesus Christ, (Luke ii. 1.) which was the last year of Augustus. Acts v. 37. This numbering, or enrolment, of the people was different from that at our Saviour's birth. Vide CYRENIUS; also FRAGMENT, No. CXXVII. Also PLATES: MEDALS OF ANTIOCH. No. 13.

Judas the Gaulanite, says Josephus, Antiq. lib. xviii. cap. 2. pretended, that the tax established by the Romans, and regulated by Quirinius, was a manifest instance of servitude; which all true Israelites ought to oppose with all their power. These discourses inflamed the people's mind: many joined Judas, took arms, and began a civil war; the spirit of which, properly speaking, was pacified only by intervals till it ended in the destruction of Jerusalem. The disciples of Judas were called Galileans, because Judas was of Upper Galilee; and his followers, for the most part, were of that province. It has been thought, they were likewise called Herodians, because the kingdom of Herod the Tetrarch included Galilee beyond Jordan, and the neighbouring places about Gaulan.

The Galileans, according to Josephus, agreed in all things with the Pharisees; but were distinguished by an excessive love of liberty; being strongly prejudiced with the idea, that they ought to obey God alone as their prince. And perhaps there was some reference to this, not only in representing Jesus as a Galilean to Pilate; but (Luke xxiii. 2) his accusers, to render him suspected of this heresy, say, they found him perverting the nation, and forbidding to give tribute to Cæsar. Vide JUDAS XII.

GALL. For the wine mixed with gall, presented to our Saviour while on the cross, (Matt. xxvii. 34) vide WINE. The prophet Habakkuk mentions gall mixed with wine, as used to intoxicate: "Woe to him who putteth his bottle to his neighbour:"—which several versions render, by words expressive of gall, or venom: i. e. what in the issue would prove so. So the Vulgate, Hab. ii. 13. We believe the prophet hints at the conduct of Pharaoh Hophra, king of Egypt, toward Zedekiah. Vide FRAGMENT, No. LVIII. That king promised Zedekiah assistance, and engaged him in rebellion against Nebuchadnezzar; but in his necessity he failed him: "He gave him gall to drink, and made him drunk, that he might have the pleasure of seeing his nakedness." The Rabbins relate, that Nebuchadnezzar one day at an entertainment, sent for Zedekiah, and gave him an intoxicating liquor to drink, purposely to expose him to ridicule. [But perhaps the idea of the prophet is, wine excessively sweet, or praised as excessively sweet, to render the reverse more bitter—more confounding.]

Moses, in the name of God, threatens the Israelites to make their grapes—grapes of gall, and their wine the poison of dragons, Deut. xxxii. 32, 33. to change the sweetness of their grapes into bitterness, and their wine into poison; which, instead of cheering and nourishing, would intoxicate and destroy them. In the story of Tobit, the gall of a fish is used in curing his father's eyes, Tobit vi. 5. ix. 8, 13. Pliny, lib. xxviii. cap. 10, notices the use of gall for sore eyes; Ad oculorum medicamenta utitius habetur. In Jeremiah, (viii. 14. ix. 15.) to give water of gall to drink, denotes very bitter affliction, Lam. v. 19. And the Psalmist (lxxix. 21.) says, that his enemies, or rather the enemies of the Messiah offered him gall to eat, and vinegar to drink. The gall of bitterness, Acts viii. 23, signifies the most excessively bitter gall: the most desperate disposition of mind; the most incurable malignity, as difficult to be corrected as to change gall into sweetness.

GALLIM, גללם; who heap up, who cover, who roll; from גל gal, or from גלגל galah. [Rather springs. A city of Benjamin, having many fountains. 1 Sam. xxv. 44. Isaiah x. 30.]

GALLIO, Γαλλίων: he that sucks, or lives on milk.

GALLIO, brother of Seneca the philosopher, before named Marcus Annæus Novatus; but being adopted by Lucius Junius Gallio, he took the name of his adoptive father. The emperor Claudius made him proconsul of Achaia; and, A. D. 53, under Nero, he was again proconsul there. He was of a mild, agreeable temper: his brother Seneca dedicated to him his books Of Anger: he shared in the fortunes of his brothers, as well when out of favour as in their prosperity at court: Nero, at last, put him to death as well as them. The Jews being enraged against Paul, for converting many Gentiles, dragged him to Gallio's tribunal, who, as proconsul, generally resided at Corinth, Acts xviii. 12, 13. They accused him of teaching men to worship God contrary to the law. Paul being about to speak, Gallio told the Jews, that "if the matter in question were a breach of justice, or an action of a criminal nature, he should think himself obliged to hear them; but as the dispute was only concerning their law, he would not determine such differences; nor would he judge them." Sosthenes, the chief ruler of the synagogue, was seized and beaten, before Gallio's seat of justice, without this governor's concerning himself about it, A. D. 54.

I. GAMALA, a town of Galilee, surnamed The City of the Horsemen: vide GAMA.

II. GAMALA, a town beyond Jordan, in the Gaulanitis; called Gamala, because its appearance somewhat resembled the form of a camel.

It was part of Agrippa's kingdom; but the inhabitants refusing to submit to him, it was besieged, first by Agrippa's forces, afterwards by the Romans, who, after a long siege, took and sacked it. Joseph. de Bello, lib. iv. cap. 2—7. in Græco; seu cap. 1—3. in Lat.

GAMALIEL, גמליאל: recompence of God, or camel of God, or weaned of God; from גמל gamal, and אל el, God.

I. GAMALIEL, son of Pedabzur, prince of Manasseh when the Israelites left Egypt, Numb. i. 10. ii. 24. vii. 54.

II. GAMALIEL,

II. GAMALIEL, doctor of the law, a Pharisee, Paul's master: likewise master of St. Barnabas and St. Stephen, if some writers may be believed. The Jews having brought Peter before the assembly of rulers, Gamaliel moved, that the apostles should retire; then he advised the assembly to take heed what they intended to do touching these men, &c. and to treat them with lenity. Gamaliel's advice was followed; and the apostles were liberated, Acts v. 34.

It is reported, but the report is very dubious, or evidently false, that Gamaliel encouraged the Christians to carry off St. Stephen's body by night; and also lent them his chariot, to carry it to lands of his own, seven or eight leagues from Jerusalem. Also, that Nicodemus was Gamaliel's nephew, or cousin, in consideration of which, the Jews, instead of putting Nicodemus to death, only banished him. Also, that Gamaliel was converted; but by whom, no one knows. Lucian, de Sancto Stephano, cap. 5. ad finem Tom. x. Oper. S., Aug. Phot. Cod. 171.

Some have believed the Gamaliel of the Acts to be the Gamaliel of Japhneh, or Dibanah, who, according to the Jewish doctors, succeeded Jochanan, as patriarch of the West.

The time they assign to him is not absolutely inconsistent with what St. Luke relates of Gamaliel. He gave his opinion in the Jewish assembly, A. D. 32. He was witness to the taking of Jerusalem, A. D. 70; and shortly afterwards he might succeed Jochanan.

III. GAMALIEL, grandson to the former; was, it is said, the first patriarch of the Jews, about A. D. 97. Basnage, Hist. Jews, Tom. ii. lib. iv. cap. 3.

GAMUL, גמול; recompence: otherwise, to rean; from gamal. Head of one of those sacerdotal families which served in the temple. 1 Chron. xxiv. 17.

[GAMUL, retribution, or yielding milk. Rather a camel: whence we find, Jer. xlviii. 23, Beth-Gamul, the "Temple of the Camel." In the Indian Zodiac, this animal, the camel, is the vehicle of Venus, the goddess and the planet. Beth-Gamul was a city of Moab, and being associated with other places which appear to have been temples, I think this also was a sacred edifice, rather than a house built by a person named Gamul.]

GARDEN, Hortus, in Hebrew גן gan, in Greek κήπος kepos, is generally supposed to mean—a kitchen garden, a fruitery, or an orchard; wherefore, that wherein God placed our first parents, is called, the Garden of Eden, i. e. of delights. But the Hebrews, to signify an orchard, more generally use the word פריש, paradise (whence is derived the Greek, παράδεισος paradisos) i. e. a garden planted with trees. Scripture mentions the king's gardens, which were either in the city, or adjoining the walls of Jerusalem. Here was the royal burial-place, 2 Kings xxi. 18, 26. Isaiah (i. 29) reproaches the Jews with their abominations and idolatry, committed in gardens. These were consecrated to Venus and Adonis; here they sacrificed;—that sacrificeth in gardens (Isaiah lxv. 3); after which, they thought they were well purified, when they had washed in the water of the garden, Isa. lxvi. 17.

GAREB, גרב; gall: Syriac, a pitcher, or water. A brave officer of David, 2 Sam. xxiii. 38.

GAREB, a hill near Jerusalem. Jer. xxxi. 39. It is said, in the Mishnah, that from Gareb to Silo were three miles; and that, there was Micah's ephod: Sanhedrin, fol. 103. But the Gareb of Jeremiah could not be so far, since he says, Jerusalem shall reach to the hill Gareb; from Jerusalem to Silo was twelve leagues.

[The name probably, imports a scurf, or scab, which scales off from the person: perhaps it might be the nature of the soil on the hill Gareb, Jer. xxxi. 39, to scale off in like manner from the surface.

Simon hints at the probability of this hill being a receptacle for lepers, sent thither from Jerusalem, to which it was adjacent. This idea is very agreeable to the usages of the East: an account of such associations may be seen in NIEBUHR.]

GARMI, גרמי; my bone: or the bones: otherwise, the water of the stranger; from מי mi, water, and גר gher, a traveller.

GARMI, of Maachathi, and son to Naham. 1 Chron. iv. 19. [The English translators read Naham, the father of Keilah the Garmite, according to the Hebrew text. Calmet keeps close to his Vulgate, which here agrees with the Septuagint.]

GATAM, גתם, Γαθμ; their lowing; from גתה gaha, to low, and תם am, their's: or, their touch; from נגע nagah, to touch: otherwise, the lowing of the perfect; from גתה gakah, to low, and תם tamam, or תם tham, perfect. Son of Eliphaz, son of Esau, Gen. xxxvi. 11.

GATE. We remark, concerning the gates or doors to the houses of the Hebrews, that generally their posts were of wood: such were the gates of Gaza which Samson carried away on his shoulders, Judg. xvi. 3; i. e. the gate, bars, posts, and locks, if there were any. [See the PLATES, MEDALS of GAZA.] The doors of houses and churches in Palestine, are generally very low, to prevent the Arabs, who always go on horseback, from getting in and misbehaving there.

GATE is often used in Scripture to denote, a place a place of public assembly, where justice was administered, Deut. xvii. 5, 8; xxv. 6, 7; xxi. 19; xxii. 15, &c. As the Jews mostly laboured in the fields, assemblies were held at their city gates, and justice was administered there, that labourers, whose duty required their work, might lose no time; and that country people, who had affairs of justice, might not be obliged to enter the town. One instance of these judgments appears in that given at the gate of Bethlehem, between Boaz, and a relation of Naomi, on the subject of Ruth. Ruth iv. 1. Another, in Abraham's purchase of a field to bury Sarah, Gen. xxiii. 10, 18. [The gate was the most public thoroughfare, &c. of a town. Comp. 2 Sam. xv. 2; also 2 Sam. xviii. 33. where we read of the gate, and the chamber over the gate.]

GATE, Porta, sometimes signifies—power, dominion; almost in the same sense as the Turkish emperor's palace is called, the Porte. God promises Abraham, that his posterity shall possess the gates of their enemies,—their towns, their fortresses, Gen. xxii. 17. Jesus Christ says to Peter, "Thou art Peter; and on this rock will I build my church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it," Matt. xvi. 1. Vide HADES, HELL, and FRAGMENT, No. CCXI. "Gates of Hell."

Scripture remarks, that the idol Dagon, having fallen before the ark, and two hands of his statue falling on the threshold of his temple, the priests afterwards forebore to tread on this part of the door-way. 1 Sam. v. 7. The prophet Zephaniah seems, perhaps, to allude to this custom of the Philistines, under the expression of "Those who leap on [rather over] the threshold," chap. i. 9.

Among the Tartars they never walk on the thresholds of princes out of respect to them; Bergeron, Voyage de Calpin, cap. 10. The caliphs of Bagdad obliged all who entered their palaces to prostrate themselves on the threshold, wherein they set a piece of the black stone of the temple at Mecca, to render it more venerable: this threshold was pretty high, and it had been a sin for any one to rest his feet on it. D'Herbelot, Bibl. Orient.

GATES OF HELL. King Hezekiah, in his hymn, representing his condition when sick, expresses himself thus (Isaiah xxxviii. 10.) "I said; in the cutting off of my days, I shall go to the gates of hell"—the grave. Jesus Christ, in the gospel (Matt. xvi. 18) says, the gates of hell shall not prevail against his church; which is the same, probably, with what the Psalmist means by the gates of death (Psalm ix. 13.) "Thou who liftest me up from the gates of death." "They drew near to the gates of death." Psalm cviii. 18. And in Wisdom, xvi.

18, the author represents the grave, hell, as a place whither people went from all parts, there to enter on another life. Achilles, Iliad ix. says, he hates the man who says one thing and acts another, as he hates the gates of hell.

The Mahometans assign seven gates to hell, and to each its particular punishment: the first for Mussulmans, the second for Christians, the third for Jews, the fourth for the Sabians, the fifth for the Magi or Guebres, worshippers of fire, the sixth for Pagans and idolaters, the seventh, and deepest part of the abyss, for Hypocrites, who make an outward show of religion, but have none. Others, by these seven gates, understand the seven principal members of a man, the instruments of sin. Al Koran, chap. of the stone.

GATES OF RIGHTEOUSNESS, Psalm cxviii. 19. those of the temple, where the righteous, the saints, true Israelites, pay their vows and praises to God; where none enter but purified Israelites, a nation of righteous men.

GATH, גַּת: a press, [a wine-press]

[This name is usually supposed to have arisen from the plenty of wine made at this town: it might be so, but the neighbouring towns were no less famous for wine than Gath was. There is at least a possibility that its situation resembled a wine-press in form; as we know that the antient wine-presses were excavations or hollows in the ground, into which the liquor ran when expressed from the grapes. Some think wine-presses were first invented or employed at Gath.]

Gath appears to have been an ancient city; being mentioned so early as Josh. xi. 22, and, probably, the grapes of Eschol, which was not far distant, were a specimen of the grapes of Gath. Timnath, also, not far from Gath, had extensive vineyards, Judges xiv. 5.]

GATH, a city of the Philistines, one of their five principalities, 1 Sam. v. 8. vi. 17; famous for having given birth to Goliath. David conquered Gath in the beginning of his reign over all Israel, 1 Sam. xviii. 4; it continued subject to his successors till the declension of the kingdom of Judah, 2 Sam. viii. 1. Rehoboam rebuilt or fortified it, 2 Chron. xi. 8. Uzziah reconquered it; as did Hezekiah. Josephus makes it part of the tribe of Dan. CALMET thinks, that Mitcah, mentioned by Moses, Num. xxxiii. 29, is the Metheg of 2 Sam. viii. 1. [We translate it, David took Metheg-Ammah, (Metheg the Mother) which in Chronicles is explained by—"He took Gath and her daughters:" Gath being the mother, and Metheg the daughter. But it may be, that the district of Gath, and its dependencies was called in David's time Metheg-Ammah; which, being unusual, or becoming obsolete, the author of the Chronicles explains it to be Gath and its villages.] According to this idea, Gath of the Philistines, the birth-place of giants (2 Sam. xx. 20, 22) must lie far in Arabia Petræa, towards Egypt, which is confirmed by Chronicles, which says, that the sons of Ephraim being in Egypt, attacked the city of Gath, and were there slain, 1 Chron. vii. 21.—[Is Metheg transposed Gathem? מתג נתח.]

Jerom says, there was a large town called Gath, in the way from Eleutheropolis to Gaza; and Eusebius speaks of another Gath, five miles from Eleutheropolis, toward Lydda (consequently, different from that which Jerom speaks of); also another Gath, or Gattha, between Jamnia and Antipatris. Jerom likewise, speaking of Gath-opher, the place of the prophet Jonah's birth, says, it was called Gath-opher, or Gath in the district of Opher, to distinguish it from others of the same name.

Gath was the most southern city of the Philistines, as Ekron was the most northern; so that Ekron and Gath are placed as the boundaries of their land, 1 Sam. vii. 1, 4. xvii. 52. Gath lay near Mareshah, vide 2 Chron. xi. 8, and Micah i. 14, Heb. which agrees pretty well with Jerom, who places Gath on the road from Eleutheropolis to Gaza. Gath was a place of strength in the time of the prophets Amos and Micah, independent of the kings of Judah (Amos vi. 2; Micah i. 10, 14); but was taken by Uzziah, king of Judah while Amos was living; and afterwards by Hezekiah, in Micah's time. Gethaim—the Guths—2 Sam. iv. 3; Neh. xi. 33, is Gath. David had a company of Gittite guards. Gath signifies a press; wherefore it is no wonder, that we find several places of this name in Palestine, where presses were common.

GATH-OPHER, גת-אפר: Γαθὰ Ἐφέρος: who digs at the wine-press; from אפר chaphar, to dig, and גת gath, a press; otherwise, he that seeks, or conjounds the press; from the same.

[GATH-HEPHER, Sunken Gath, whether as a wine-press was SUNK; whence the two words would imply the "sunken wine-press;"—or, as a well is sunk, as the word specifically imports, Gen. xxi. 30. xxvi. 15, &c.—or, a considerable sinking of ground might here form a capacious and convenient wine-press, or in its shape resemble one. We have a Hepher, the "sunken," without the Gath, Josh. xii. 17. HILLER thinks, Gath-Hepher is Gath of the Hopherites. It is written with the E, Josh. xix. 13, which Eng. Tr. has "Gittah Hepher;" it probably imports "the wine-press Hepher;" or "the wine-press at Hepher." It was in the lot of Zebulun. "Hepher the Sinks," or sinkings.]

GATH-OPHER, or GATH-EPHER, or GATH, in the district of Opher, in Galilee, the birth-place of the prophet Jonah, 2 Kings, xiv. 25. Joshua, xix. 13. places this city in Zebulun. Jerom, in his preface on Jonah, says it was two miles from Sephoris, otherwise, Diocæsarea.

GATH-RIMMON, גת-רמון: the press of the pomegranate; from גת gath, a press, and רמון rimmon, a pomegranate-tree: otherwise, exalted press; from רמם ramam, elevation.

[GATH-Rimmon, the wine-press of Rimmon, or of the deity whose symbol was the pomegranate. But some think Rimmon was a person, who gave his name to a wine-press; as we read of the "wine-press of Zeeb," Judg. vii. 25. By the bye, it appears to me extraordinary that the slaughter of Zeeb should give name to a wine-press: it seems more likely that, as the slaughter of Oreb gave name to a rock, on which he was slain, so the slaughter of Zeeb should give name to a natural sinking of the ground, which would continue permanent, and mark the place for ages, rather than to a wine-press, which the next proprietor might remove at his convenience.

The plural of Gath is written Gittaim, 2 Sam. iv. 3. Nehem. xi. 33. It was either one town divided into two parts, or, it had two presses—rather sinkings, or hollows in the ground: for, how could two wine-presses distinguish a town, when every considerable family had, or might have, its own wine-press, as it made its own wine?]

I. GATH-RIMMON, a city of Dan. Josh. xix. 45. Jerom places it ten miles from Diospolis, toward Eleutheropolis. It was given to the Korathites.

II. GATH-RIMMON, in the half-tribe of Manasseh, on this side Jordan; given to the Korathites, Josh. xxi. 25.

III. GATH-RIMMON, a city of Ephraim, given to the Korathites. 1 Chron. vi. 69.

GAVER, or GOR, גור: the young of an animal (as of a bitch, or lioness); or, dwelling, fear. The name of a place, 2 Kings ix. 27.

GAULAN, גולן, Γωλαν: their transmigration; from גלה galah, transmigration, and גו an, theirs: otherwise, their revolution.

GAULAN, or GAULON, or GOLAN, a city beyond Jordan, from which the small province of Gaulanitis was named. It was given to the half-tribe of Manasseh on the other side Jordan, Deut. iv. 43. It was ceded to the Levites of Gershon's family, and became a city of refuge, Josh. xxi. 27. Eusebius says, that in his time, the city of Gaulan was still considerable in the Batanæa; but he does not exactly describe its situation. It was in Upper Galilee, beyond Jordan. Judas of Gaulan, head of the Gatilaens, was a native of it

it. The Gaulanitis extended from the Peræa to Libanus. See GALILEANS.

GAZA, my גַּזָּה: strong; from my hazaz: otherwise, a goat; from ty hex.

GAZA, Gen. x. 19, a city of the Philistines, given by Joshua to Judah. Josh. xv. 47. 1 Sam. vi. 17. It was one of the five principalities of the Philistines, towards the southern extremity of Canaan. In the Hebrew it is called my Aza, or Osa, with a y hain, which the LXX. sometimes express by a G. Stephens the geographer, says, that, in his time, the Syrians called it Aza. It was situated between Raphia and Askelon. Its advantageous situation exposed it to many revolutions. It belonged to the Philistines; then to the Hebrews; recovered its liberty in the reigns of Jotham and Ahaz; but was conquered by Hezekiah, 2 Kings xviii. 8. It was subject to the Chaldeans, with Syria and Phœnicia; afterwards to the Persians. They held it when Alexander besieged, took, and destroyed it. This Gaza, or at least the little town of Gaza on the Sea, otherwise called Majuma, was rebuilt.

It was afterwards possessed by the kings of Egypt, says Josephus, Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 21. Antiochus the Great took and sacked it, Polyb. in excerptis Valesii. The Maccabees took it several times from the Syrians. 1 Macc. xi. 61; xiii. 43. Alexander Jannæus, king of the Jews took and destroyed it. Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 21. Gabinus repaired it, Antiq. lib. xiv. cap. 10, and there are coins extant struck in this city. [Vide Plate of "ASHTAROTH," No. 6. Also the PLATES, MEDALS of GAZA.] Augustus gave it to Herod the Great; but it was not subject to his son Archelaus. Luke says, (Acts viii. 26.) that Gaza, [written Gasa] in his time, was a desert place; meaning, most probably, the greater Gaza, situated on a mountain twenty miles from the sea; not Little Gaza, or Majuma, which was very populous. The emperor Constantine gave Majuma the name of Constantia, in honour of his son; and granted it the honours and privileges of a city, independent on Gaza. But the emperor Julian deprived it both of its name and its privileges.

[Gaza very probably imports well provided, well fortified, munitiōed: so the Latins for munita say validam, robustam. Vide Bochart, Canaan, p. 82. Reland, Palest. p. 790, who refer to Mela and Arrian for the strength of this city. Drusus, Quæst. Heb. lib. i. says, Valentian not badly expresses the sense in Latin: so Pollentia and Potentia, were cities in Italy. Pliny, lib. iii. cap. 5.

Gaza is a city of great antiquity; being noticed among those which marked the bounds of the Canaanite territory. It was a frontier defence against Egypt. Pharaoh smote Gaza, Jer. xlvii. 1. and it seems from Amos i. 7. that part, at least, of its wall or defences, was composed of wood, as the prophet threatens to send a fire on it, to consume it, which he would hardly have preferred, had it been wholly of stone.

Alexander the Great besieged Babamensis, the Persian, during two months, in Gaza, and that city which formerly had been very famous was laid waste by him, and was rendered desert, says Strabo, lib. xvi. not that he wholly destroyed it, but rather dismantled, and degraded it, so that a new city nearer to the sea, and to the haven of Gaza, rose out of the former. Diodorus Siculus, lib. xix. mentions Pale Gaza, old Gaza, and Strabo notices "Gaza, the desert," which agrees with Acts viii. 26.

Gaza was afterwards called New Majuma, and afterwards Constantia, says Eusebius in his life of Constantine. It is now pronounced Rassa, with a strong guttural, by the Arabs.

There was, say the Rabbins, a street outside the city of Gaza, where were shambles and an idol temple: also a place called the Leper's Cloister. Vide 2 Kings vii. 3, &c. Gaza was one of three famous marts; the others were Aco, and Bothna.

"From the walls of Gaza we view at once the sea, separated by a sandy beach, a quarter of a league wide, and the country, whose date trees, and flat and naked aspect, as far as the eye can discern, reminds us of Egypt; and in fact, in this latitude, the soil and climate both appear to be truly Arabian. The heat, the drought, the winds and the dews, are the same as on the banks of the Nile; and the inhabitants have the complexion, stature, manners, and accent of the Egyptians, rather than those of the Syrians." Volney's Travels, vol. ii. p. 339.

"Gaza is situated on an eminence, and is rendered picturesque by the number of fine minarets which rise majestically above the buildings, and by the beautiful date trees interspersed. A very fine plain commences about three miles from the town, on the other side, in which are several groves of olive trees. Advancing toward Gaza, the view becomes still more interesting; the groves of olive trees extending to the town, in front of which is a fine avenue of these trees. About a mile distant from the town is a commanding height. The soil in the neighbourhood is of a superior quality. Much pasture. On the east side of the town is a small gateway, near to which, it is said, Samson performed his exploit of carrying away the gate of the city; and where he threw down the building which killed him and his adversaries.

"The suburbs of Gaza are composed of wretched mud huts: but the interior of the town contains buildings superior in appearance to those generally met with in Syria. The streets are of a moderate breadth. Many fragments of statues, columns, &c. of marble, are seen in the town walls and other buildings. Ophthalmia and blindness are very prevalent.

The suburbs and environs of Gaza are rendered infinitely agreeable by a number of large gardens, cultivated with great care, on the north, south, and west of the town. Plantations of date trees, also, are numerous. Many flowers in the neighbouring plains. Lupines cultivated in patches regularly ploughed and sowed; the seeds of which are employed by the inhabitants in food, especially to thicken their ragouts. The sea is distant about a league, (i. e. from the Anglo-Turkish camp.)

The landing place of Gaza is an open beach, highly dangerous to boats, especially if laden, a heavy surf constantly beating on the shore.

Quails are very abundant in Syria: in the neighbourhood of Gaza. Dr. Wittman, 267.

"Six miles from Gaza, towards El Arish, is a river, formed by the rain waters, and after heavy rains its current is impetuous and dangerous.

"March 14, 1801. A delightful country from Yebna to Gaza: near a village called Mouat or Mouad.

"March 15. Passed Gaza, about 12 o'clock, having previously halted under some olive trees. Encamped on a height with a wide valley in our rear, and a distant view of the sea in our front. The Turkish camp being down in a valley between us and the sea, the town of Gaza about a mile, or mile and a half off. A marabout on our right where the citadel was, as we imagine, that occasioned so much difficulty to Alexander the Great to take. Passed through a large wood of olive trees.

"March 28. Intelligence of the action of March 21, was brought from Alexandria to Gaza in 40 hours, by a Turkish corvette.

"March 28. From Gaza to Khan Younes. The day's march was through a country strewed over with beautiful flowers, and pleasing beyond description." Maj. Hope.]

II. GAZA, a city of Ephraim, 1 Chron. vii. 28.

GAZABAR, גזבר, Γαζαπαριος. The Hebrew has Mithridath, the treasurer. The Vulgate puts the name for the signification; גזבר, gadar, treasurer, changing ד daleth, into ז zain. A Persian, father of Mithredath, Ezra i. 8.

GAZARA. Gadara, or Gazer. 1 Mac. xiii. 53.

GAZER, or Gazara, גזר, Γαζαρά: cut, or divided: otherwise, sentence, determination.

GAZEZ, גז: shearer, fleece. Third son of Caleb, by his concubine Ephah, 1 Chron. ii. 46.

GAZOPHYLACIUM, Γαζοφυλάκιον; it answers to the Hebrew לשכח or גשכח, domicilium, habitaculum. This word, according to the Greek etymology, signifies the Treasury-chamber. There were several places in the temple of Jerusalem, wherein were kept the rich presents, which had been consecrated by kings, princes, or private persons. But the signification of gazophylacium has been enlarged, to comprehend the rooms where the provisions of the temple were laid up, both for sacrifices, and for the priests: and in general for all the apartments of the temple. In the gospels (Mark xii. 41, 43; Luke xxi. 1.) by gazophylacium is meant, the trunk, or chest, into which people cast their offerings; it was placed at the entrance of the temple.

GAZZAM, גזז: a caterpillar: otherwise, their fleece; from גז ghez: or he that shears them; from גז ghez, and אמ, them, theirs.

[Rather from the Syriac גז, a treasury; in which it agrees with the foregoing article.]

GEBA, גבע, Γαββα; hill, or cup. Vide GABAA.

[This Geba or Geban, appears to be the root of the many names which are more commonly written in our translation Gibeah. So we have Gibeah of Benjamin, Judges xx. 10. 1 Sam. xiii. 21. which has the feminine termination Gibeah, Judges xiv. 12. 1 Sam. vii. 1. x. 10. and Gibeath, Josh. xviii. 28, &c. Vide GIBEAH.

By comparing 2 Sam. v. 25. with 1 Chron. xiv. 16. we find the same place called Geba and Gibeon: for David is said, in Samuel, to smite the Philistines from Geba to Gazer, which in Chronicles, is "from Gibeon even to Gazer." Vide GIBEON.

That Geba is not the same place as Gibeah of Saul, appears from Isaiah x. 29. "They have taken up quarters at Geba; Ramath is afraid; Gibeah of Saul is fled." From the position adopted by the prophet, it may be thought, that Rama was, in some manner, situated between Geba and Gibeah. Gibeah was hard by Ramah. Judges, xiv. 13. Comp. Hos. v. 8. It appears, nevertheless, that Geba is called "Geba of Benjamin," 1 Kings, xv. 22. though Geba simply, in the parallel passage, 2 Chron. xvi. 6. on occasion of its being mentioned among the cities rebuilt by Asa. Geba seems to have been the northern limit of the kingdom of Judah. 2 Kings xxiii. 8. "From Geba to Beersheba," seems to be, with respect to Judah, of the same import as "from Dan to Beersheba" had been, with respect to all Israel, when under one dominion.]

GEBA, גבל: bound, or limit.

[The Arabic signification of this word imports a mountain; and Abulfeda has a town of this name, situated on a hill.]

GEBA, Psalm lxxxiii. 7. Geba, Ammon, and Amalek. The Chaldee and Samaritan, instead of Mount Seir, sometimes put Mount Gebala. Josephus likewise speaks of the Gebilites, south of Palestine; and Stephens the geographer, who writes Gebala, speaks of the Gebalene, in Arabia, or the country of Amalek. Lastly, Eusebius and Jerom frequently mention the Gebalene, in Idumea, and its capital, Petra. These marks describe a country south of Judah, and in south Idumea. Gebal signifies a mountain; and the denomination of Gebalene is not ancient, since it appears only in Psalm lxxxiii. which, in our opinion, was written in the time of Jehoshaphat, king of Judah.

[2. A city on the shore of the Mediterranean. Ezek. xxvii. 9. This is written by Stephens, Ptolemy, and Strabo, Gabala; by Pliny, Gabale.—The ancient Byblus?

The first Gebal was probably a district of country, and even a kingdom or sovereignty; because such is the character of those with which it is associated.

The city of Gebal or Gebala, has the important office of "caulkers" to the ships of Tyre assigned to it by the prophet Ezekiel: its chiefs are also characterized as "wise." The best modern description that I recollect of this city, is given by Mr. Maundrell.

Friday, March 5. "Jebilee is seated close by the sea, having a vast and fruitful plain stretching round it, on its other sides. It makes a very mean figure at present; though it still retains the distinction of a city, and discovers evident footsteps of a better condition in former times. In the time of the Greek emperors, it was dignified with a bishop's see, in which sometime sate Severian, the grand adversary and arch conspirator against St. Chrysostom.

"The most remarkable things that appear here at this day, are a mosque and an almshouse, just by it, both built by Sultan Ibrahim. In the former his body is deposited. We were admitted to see his tomb, though held by the Turks in great veneration. We found it only a great wooden chest, erected over his grave, and covered with a carpet of painted calico, extending on all sides down to the ground.

"In this mosque we saw several large incense pots, candlesticks for altars, and church furniture, being the spoils of Christian churches at the taking of Cyprus. Close by the mosque is a very beautiful bagnio, and a small grove of orange trees, under the shade of which travellers are wont to pitch their tents in the summer time.

"Jebilee seems to have had anciently some convenience for shipping. There is still to be seen a ridge composed of huge square stones, running a little way into the sea, which appears to have been formerly continued farther on, and to have had a mole. Near this place we saw a great many pillars of granite, some by the water side, others tumbled into the water. There were others in a garden close by, together with capitals of white marble, finely varied: which testify, in some measure, the ancient splendour of this city.

"But the most considerable antiquity in Jebilee, and greatest monument of its former eminency, is the remains of a noble theatre, just at the north gate of the city.

"All of it that is now standing is the semicircle. It extends, from corner to corner, just a hundred yards. In this semi-circular part is a range of seventeen round windows, just above the ground: and between the windows all round were raised, on high pedestals, large massy pillars, standing as buttresses against the wall, both for the strength and ornament of the fabric; but these supporters are at present most of them broken down.

"Within is a very large arena. On the west side the seats of the spectators remain still entire, as do likewise the caves or vaults which run under the subsellia all round the theatre. The outward wall is three yards three quarters thick, and built of very large and firm stones; which great strength has preserved it thus long from the jaws of time, and from that general ruin which the Turks bring with them into most places where they come."

GEHER, גִּבְרִי: strong man [hero]; Syriac, a cock. Son of Uri, governor of Gilead, in the reign of Solomon, 1 Kings, iv. 19.

GEBIM, גְּבִימ, גִּבְיִם: ditches; otherwise, grasshoppers; from גִּבְ gob; otherwise, height; from גָּב gab. Isaiah x. 31. Madneuah is fled, the inhabitants of Gebim take to flight. The situation of Gebim we know not; by many it is taken in general for hills.

GEDALIAH, גְּדַלְיָה, Γεδολίας: God is my greatness, or fringe of the Lord; from גְּדִילִים gedilim, fringes, and יְיָ jah, the Lord.

GEDALIAH, son of Ahikam, was left by Nebuchadnezzar in Palestine, after the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple (Jer. xl. xli.; 2 Kings, xxv. 22.) A. M. 3416; ante A. D. 588, to govern the remainder of the Jewish people, and to gather again those who had fled. Jeremiah retired to him at Mizpah; and many Jews who had fled into Moab and Ammon, came thither also. Gedaliah assured them of Nebuchadnezzar's protection, provided they lived peaceably. Ishmael, son of Nethaniah, of the royal family of Judah, came likewise to see Gedaliah, who had been informed, that Ishmael was sent by Baalis, king of Ammon, to kill him; but Gedaliah would not believe it, nor would permit any one to prevent the designs of Ishmael. He received received him at his table, and entertained him; but when the banquet was over, Ishmael, and his associates, massacred Gedaliah, and all about him, as well Jews as Chaldeans.

II. GEDALIAH, son of Amariah, grandfather of the prophet Zephaniah, Zeph. i. 1.

III. GEDALIAH, a Levite, son of Ethan, or Jeduthun, 1 Chron. xxv. 3.

IV. GEDALIAH, son of Pashur, Jer. xxxviii. 1.

GEDEON, son of Raphim, and father of Jaminor, of Simeon, Judith, viii. 1.

GEDER, גדר, wall, dry wall, or hedge.

GEDER. The king of Geder was taken and slain by Joshua, Josh. xii. 13. This Geder is probably the Gedor of 1 Chron. iv. 39; the Gederoth of 2 Chron. xxviii. 18; Gedor, Josh. xv. 58; and Gazer, Gazera, or even Gadara or Gadera in the Maccabees. Vide GADARA II.

GEDEROTH, גדרות, walls, hedges, inclosures. Vide GEDERA, or GADARA.

GEDEROTHAIM, גדרתים (a city, Josh. xv. 36) the two walls. Vide GEDERA.

I. GEDOR, son of Penuel, of Judah, 1 Chron. iv. 18.

II. GEDOR, son of Maachab, of Benjamin, 1 Chron. viii. 31.

GEDRUS. In the time of Eusebius and Jerom, Gedrus was a large place, ten miles from Diospolis, towards Eleutheropolis. Probably the same as Gedera, Gadara, or Gedor. Eusebius & Jerom. in Gedur.

GEHAZI, גיחזי, valley of sight, or vale of the breast. [Rather, a man, or family, raised.]

GEHAZI, Elisha's servant, continually almost attended that prophet, and was concerned in whatever happened to him; till being overcome by avarice, he solicited, and obtained, in the prophet's name, from Naaman, the Syrian, a talent of silver, and two changes of garments, 2 Kings, v. 20. When Gehazi returned, Elisha demanded of him whence he came? Gehazi answered, he had been nowhere. Elisha said to him, "Went not my heart with thee, when thou didst receive money and garments? —the leprosy, therefore, of Naaman shall cleave to thee and to thy seed." Immediately Gehazi was seized with a leprosy, and quitted Elisha from that time. The king of Israel would sometimes make Gehazi relate the wonders which God had wrought by Elisha, 2 Kings viii. 4, 5, &c. Vide ELISHA.

GEHENNA, Γέεννα; the vale of vanity, or of deceit; from גֵּהִי ghei, a valley, and אֵן on, vanity; otherwise, of riches; from הוֹן hon: or of sorrow; from אָנָה anah: Syriac, hell.

GEHENNOM, or GEHENNON, גֵּהֶנְנוֹם, Φάραγξ ἑννὸν: the vale of their sorrow, or of their riches, or of their deceit; from גֵּהִי ghei, a valley, and אֵן on, or הוֹן hon or אָנָה anah.

GEHENNOM, or GEHENNA, or Valley of Hinnom; or Valley of the Son of Hinnom, (Vide Josh. xv. 8; 2 Kings, xxiii. 10. גֵּהֶנְנוֹם Gehennom, Vallis Hennon) a valley adjacent to Jerusalem, through which the southern limits of the tribe of Benjamin passed. Eusebius says, it lay east of Jerusalem, at the foot of its walls. But we are certain, it likewise extended south, along the brook Kidron. It is thought this valley was the common-sewer belonging to Jerusalem, and that a fire was always burning here to consume the filth of the city; in allusion to which, hell is called gehenna, vide Kimchi, in Psalms xxvii; & Cosar. Serm. i.; Matt. v. 22; xviii. 29; Mark, ix. 43; Luke, xii. 5. Others believe that Gehenna, as a name of hell, is derived from the fire kept up in the valley of Hinnom, in honour of Moloch, the false god, to whom the Hebrews too frequently offered human sacrifices, and even their own children, Jer. vii. 30. King Josiah, to pollute this place, and to render it odious, commanded all manner of ordure, and dead men's bones, to be thrown into it. 2 Kings, xxiii. 10. Vide the MAP of JERUSALEM. FRAGMENTS, Nos. CXXXVI, &c. Vide also HADES, and TOPHET.

[The Arabic root henan, signifies to shriek, and so to complain, to implore, whence Simon would render Gehinnom the valley of lamentation, and he justifies this by referring to the lamentation, or shrieks, of the children which here were sacrificed to Moloch. Josh. xv. 8. Neh. xi. 30. Nevertheless, as this is called the valley of the son of Hinnom, Josh. loc. cit. and xviii. 16. 2 Chron. xxviii. 3. xxxiii. 6. Jer. vii. 32. and the valley of the sons of Hinnom, 2 Kings, xxiii. 10. I rather incline to think that a family of the name of Hinnom was the origin of its appellation, as the use of both singular and plural, on any other supposition, seems to be hardly natural. Simon renders "the valley of the son (sons) of lamentation."

Gehinnom having been the scene of much cruelty, was afterwards the receptacle of much pollution; so far it coincided in character with hell: it is said, also, that fires were kept constantly burning in this valley, to consume the filth of the city: and this perpetual burning added another similarity to those evils attributed to the place of torment: the combined ideas of wickedness, pollution, and punishment, compose that character which might well justify the Syriac language in deriving its name of Hell from this valley of the sons of Hinnom. Comp. Matt. v. 22, and Doddridge's Note.]

GELIOTH of Jordan. Some believe it was the place beyond Jordan, where the tribes of Reuben, Gad, and the half-tribe of Manasseh, erected a monument, in proof of their relation to the other tribes, Josh. xxii. 10. Others translate Geliloth, the circuits or roundings, the limits or hills about Jordan: Tumuli Jordanis. In Josh. xviii. 18, we find Geliloth signifying Gilgal, or the eminences about Gilgal. Vulgate, Pertransit usque ad tumulos.

[GELILOTH, the circles: probably named from the nature and forms of the hills in this district. Comp. 1 Macc. ix. 2. Galgala.]

GELMON, or Gelon, or Gilon, a city of Judah, the birth-place of Ahitophel, 2 Sam. xxiii. 34, Joseph. Antiq. lib. viii. cap. 8, 9.

GEMALLI, גמלי, Gamalî; my recompence: otherwise, who has weaned me: or my camel. Father of Amniel, of Dan, Num. xiii. 12.

GEMARA, (Chald. גמרא; from גמר). This word signifies, complement, perfection. The Rabbins call the Pentateuch, the law, without any addition. Next to this they have the Talmud, which is divided into two parts; the first is only an application of the law to particular cases, with the decision of the ancient Rabbins, this is called Mishnah, or second law; the other part, which is a more extensive application of the same law, is a collection of determinations, by Rabbins later than the Mishnah. They term it Gemara, perfection, finishing, because they consider it as a conclusive explanation of the law, to which there can be no farther additions.

There are two Gemaras, or two Talmuds: that of Jerusalem, and that of Babylon. That of Jerusalem was compiled, according to the Jews, about the end of the second or third century, by a celebrated Rabbin, named Jochanan; but father Morinus maintains, that the Gemara was not finished till about the seventh century. The Jews have little value for this Jerusalem Talmud, by reason of its obscurity. The Babylonish Gemara is, as the Rabbins say, more modern. It was begun by a Jewish doctor, named Ase, and continued by Marinar and Mar, his sons or disciples.

The Jews believe that the Gemara contains nothing but the word of God, preserved in the tradition of the elders, and transmitted without alteration, from Moses to Rabbi Judah the Holy, and the other compilers of the Talmud; who did not reduce it to writing, till they were afraid it would be corrupted by the several transmigrations and persecutions to which their nation was subjected. Vide TALMUD.

GEMARIAH, גמריה; completion, or accomplishment of the Lord; from גמר gamar, accomplishment, and יה jah, the Lord.

I. GEMARIAH, son of Hilkiah, sent to Babylon with Elasah, son of Shaphan, from Zedekiah, king of Judah, to carry the tribute-money to Nebuchadnezzar. They carried likewise a letter from Jeremiah to the Jewish captives at Babylon, warning them against certain false prophets, who flattered them with promises of a speedy return to Judea. Jer. xxix. 3, 4; about A. M. 3408.

II. GEMARIAH, son of Shaphan, a counsellor of king Jehoiakim, before whom Baruch read Jeremiah's prophecies; and who reported them to the king. Jer. xxxvi. 12. A. M. 3399; ante A. D. 605.

GEMELACH, גמלח, Γεμελάκ; valley of salt-pits; from גמל ghie, valley, and מלח melach, salt, or brine-pits: otherwise, the vale of mariners. [2 Sam. viii. 13. 1 Chron. xviii. 12. Psalm lx. 2. Vide SALT.]

GENAM, GANAIS, the valley of Naim, a village in the great plain of Samaria. Joseph. de Bello, lib. ii. cap. 2. Reland, page 805.

GENEALOGY, from the Greek Γενεαλογία, genealogia, which signifies a list of ancestors. In Hebrew, ספר תולדות sepher toledoth, liber generationis. The Hebrews carefully preserved their genealogies, and never was a nation more circumspect about them. We find genealogies in their sacred writings, carried on above 3500 years. In the evangelists we have the genealogy of Jesus Christ, for four thousand years, from Adam to Joseph his father, and to Mary his mother. It is observed, (Ezra, ii. 62) that such priests as could not produce an exact genealogy of their families, were not permitted to exercise the sacred functions. Josephus says, that they had, in his nation, an uninterrupted succession of priests, for 2000 years; that the priests were particularly careful to preserve their genealogies, not only in Judæa, but also in Babylonia and Egypt; and wherever they were, they never married but into their own rank, and they had exact genealogical tables, prepared from those authentic documents which were kept at Jerusalem, and to which they had recourse; that in all their wars, persecutions, and calamities, they always were particularly diligent in securing these documents; and in renewing them from time to time.

Notwithstanding that, since the war of the Romans against the Jews, about thirty years after the death of our Saviour, and since their entire dispersion in the reign of Adrian, the Jews have lost their ancient genealogies; and perhaps not even one of the sacerdotal race, can produce authentic proofs of his genealogy. Jeron says, (ad Tit. iii.) that the Jews knew so perfectly their genealogies, that they could repeat all the names from Abraham to Zerubabel, as easily as their own. Ita illi à prima ætate, vernacula sui sermonis vocabula penitissimis sensibus imbibent, et ab exordio Adam, usque ad extremam Zorobabel, omnium generationes ita memoriter, velociterque percurrunt, ut eos suum putes referre nomen. St. Paul seems to condemn this affectation of knowing old genealogies nealogies, (Tit. iii. 9.) when used only for ostentation; "avoid foolish questions and genealogies, and contentions, and strivings about the law; for they are unprofitable and vain."

GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST.

A TABLE, shewing the Harmony of MATTHEW and LUKE, in their Account of CHRIST's Genealogy.

WE have in FRAGMENTS, Nos. CCCXXIX. to CCCXXXVII. given a very different notion of the fourteen generations of Matthew; yet being desirous of doing justice to other modes of determining those generations, we insert the following comparative GENEALOGY:

These names, Luke, iii. 34, 38, reckoneth alone; stepping up twenty degrees higher in the genealogy of Jesus than Matthew, i. e. from Abraham to Adam.

GOD.

- 1 ADAM,
- 2 SETH,
- 3 ENOS,
- 4 CAINAN,
- 5 MEHALALEEL,

The third 14 Generations mentioned by Matthew.

* Where Luke, iii. 27, calls Salathiel son of Neri, understand the natural son,

* Where Matthew, i. 13, calls Salathiel son of Jecheoniah, understand his legal son; succeeding as nearest of kin, [also, perhaps, by adoption.]

† Where Luke, iii. 23, calls Joseph son of Heli, understand his son-in-law by marriage of his daughter Mary. [Not excluding adoption, also.]

The

The genealogies recorded by Ezra and Nehemiah, vary in some particulars. The reason whereof is assigned by Dr. Prideaux in these terms: "For the true settling of these genealogies," says he, "search was made by Nehemiah for old registers, and having among them found a register of the genealogies of those who came up at first from Babylon, with Zerubbabel and Joshua, he settled this matter according to that, adding such as afterwards came up, and expunging others whose families were extinguished: and this hath caused the differences between the accounts which we have of these genealogies in Ezra and Nehemiah. For in the second chapter of Ezra, we have the old register, made by Zerubbabel; and in the seventh of Nehemiah, from the sixth verse to the end of the chapter, we have a copy of it, as settled by Nehemiah, with the alterations I have mentioned." Connect. &c. Part i. book iv.

GENERATION. Beside the common acceptance of this word, as signifying descent, it is used for the history and genealogy of any man, e. g. Gen. v. 1. "The book of the generations of Adam,"—i. e. the history of Adam's creation, and of his posterity. Gen. ii. 4. "The generations of the heavens and of the earth;" a recital of the creation of heaven and earth. Matt. i. 1. "The book of the generation of Jesus Christ, the son of David;" the genealogy of Jesus Christ, and the history of his life.

The ancients sometimes computed by generations; "In the fourth generation, thy descendants shall come hither again," Gen. xv. 16. "Joseph saw Ephraim's children of the third generation," Gen. i. 23. "A bastard shall not be admitted into the congregation, till the tenth generation," Deut. xxiii. 3. Among the ancients, when the duration of generations was not exactly described by the age of four men succeeding one another from father to son, it was fixed by some at a hundred years, by others at a hundred and ten, by others at thirty-three, thirty, twenty-five, and even at twenty years: being neither uniform, nor settled. Only it is remarked, that a generation is longer as it is more ancient. [See FRAGMENT No. CCCXXX.]

"This generation shall not pass away, till all be fulfilled," Matt. xxiv. 34.—some now living, shall witness the event foretold. "O faithless and perverse generation!"—"Save yourselves from this untoward generation:" from [the punishment of] these perverse men.—"To generation and generation," i. e. to future ages. "Who shall declare his generation?" Isaiah liii. 8. who shall relate the eternal generation of the Messiah? [Rather, who shall describe the men, and their manners, which shall be his contemporaries?] Generatio Dei conservet eum,

1 John v. 18. The saints, the children of God by regeneration, live innocently, because this regeneration, this quality of God's children, preserves them from sin: makes them hate sin.

GENESAR, otherwise GENESARETH, Γενναρ; garden of the prince: from γαν, a garden, and נשר, a prince: otherwise, protection of the prince, or of him that governs. The lake of Genesareth is that of Tiberias, or of Cennereth.

[This lake is called in the Targums Genesar, Ginosar, but most frequently the "sea of Tiberias." Josephus says, this lake Genesar is so called from the adjacent country. Pliny describes this lake as six miles broad, and sixteen long. The Talmudists allot this lake to the portion of Napthali, with space to draw his nets on the coast. Josephus, de Bell. lib. ii. cap. 43. mentions two hundred and thirty boats found on this lake, navigated by four men each. Comp. John vi. 22, 23. Pliny says, the lake of Genesareth is surrounded by pleasant towns. On the east, Julius and Hippo; on the south, Tarichea; on the west, Tiberias, Emmaus, &c.]

This region is described very elegantly in Hegeppus, lib. iii. 26. of the destruction of the inhabitants of Jerusalem. Mark vi. 53. Luke v. 1.

I suspect that we may gather the true derivation of this name from 1 Macc. xi. 67, where we read that Jonathan and his host pitched at the water of Genesar; and in the morning, gat them to the plain of Nasor. Is not this Nasor related to Gen-Nasor, in Gen-Nezereth?

GENESARETH. Josephus describes the country of this name around the lake as wonderfully pleasant and fertile. The temperature of the air agrees with fruits of different natures; so that here grow nuts, a more winter fruit; palms, which require much heat, and near them figs and olives, which require a moderate air, &c. The Rabbins say it was called Genesar, from the great men and princes who had gardens here. But they give a whimsical reason why these fruits were not brought to Jerusalem; lest those who came to the great festivals, should be thought to come, in order to enjoy the fruits of Genesareth. It should appear, that the inhabitants carefully cultivated these natural advantages; for they gathered their fruits, (or, perhaps, ripened them), under shady bowers, and protecting treillages. The length of this most fruitful soil, was but thirty furlongs, the breadth twenty.]

GENESIS, the first sacred book of Scripture; called in Greek Γενεσις, genesis or generation, because it contains the genealogy of the first patriarchs; in Hebrew בְּרֵאשִׁית Bereschith, because it begins with that word. It includes the history of 2369 years; from the beginning of the world to the death of Joseph.

GENNEUS,

GENNEUS, Γενναῖος; i. e. generous; from γενναῖος, noble. A man's name, 2 Macc. xii. 2.

GENTILE. The Hebrews called the Gentiles גוֹיִם Goiim, ἔθνη, the nations; i. e. those who have not received the faith, or law of God. All who are not Jews, and circumcised, are Goiim. Those who were converted, and embraced Judaism, they called proselytes. Since the Gospel, the true religion is not confined to any one nation and country, as heretofore. God, who had promised by his Prophets, to call the Gentiles to the faith, with a superabundance of grace, has executed his promise: so that the Christian church is now composed principally of Gentile converts; and the Jews, too proud of their particular privileges, and abandoned to their reprobate sense of things, have disowned Jesus Christ, their Messiah and Redeemer, for whom, during so many ages, they had wished impatiently. In the writings of St. Paul, the Gentiles are generally denoted as Greeks: Rom. i. 14, 16. ii. 9, 10. iii. x. 12. 1 Cor. i. 22, 24. Gal. iii. 28. St. Luke, in the Acts, expresses himself in the same manner, chap. vi. 1. xi. 20. xviii. 4. et al.

Paul is commonly called the Apostle of the Gentiles, (Tim. ii. 7.) or Greeks, because he, principally, preached Jesus Christ to them; whereas Peter, and the other apostles, preached generally to the Jews; and are called apostles of the Circumcision, Gal. ii. 7.

The prophets declared very particularly, the calling of the Gentiles. Jacob foretold that the Messiah, he who was to be sent, the Shiloh, should be the expectation of the Gentiles. Solomon, at the dedication of his temple, prays for the stranger, who should there intreat God.

The Psalmist says (Psalm ii. 8.) that the Lord shall give the Gentiles to the Messiah, for his inheritance; that Egypt and Babylon shall know him, (Psalm lxxxvii. 4.) that Ethiopia shall hasten to bring him presents, (Psalm lxxii. 9, 10;) that the kings of Tarshish, and of the Isles, the kings of Arabia and Sheba shall be tributary to him. Isaiah abounds with prophecies of the like nature, on which account he has justly been distinguished by the name of the prophet of the Gentiles.

In the New Testament, we see that Gentiles came to Jerusalem to worship. Some of these, a little before the death of our Saviour, addressed themselves to Philip, desiring him to show them Jesus, John xii. 20, 21. Queen Candace's eunuch, who came to Jerusalem, was likewise a Gentile, say several of the fathers. [But, this may be doubted.] Acts viii. 27.

Courts of the GENTILES. Josephus, de Bello, lib. vi. cap. 6. says, there was in the court of the temple, a wall, or balustrade, breast high, with pillars at particular distances, and inscriptions on them in Greek and Latin, importing, that strangers were forbidden from entering farther; here their offerings were received, and sacrifices to be offered for them, they standing here; but they were not allowed to approach nearer to the altar.

Pompey, nevertheless, went even into the sanctuary, but he committed no indecency there; and the next day he commanded the temple to be purified, and the customary sacrifices to be offered, de Bello, lib. i. cap. 5. A little before the last rebellion of the Jews, some mutineers would have persuaded the priests to accept no victim not presented by a Jew, and obliged them to reject those which were offered by command of the Emperor, for the Roman people. The wisest men in vain remonstrated to them the danger this would bring on their country; that their ancestors had never rejected the presents of Gentiles; and that the temple was mostly adorned with the offerings of such people: at the same time, the most learned priests, who had spent their whole lives in the study of the law, testified that their forefathers had always received the sacrifices of strangers.

Some of the Fathers seem to have believed, that Gentiles, who lived in a laudable manner, and observed the law of nature, were saved. St. Paul, Rom. ii. 9, &c. assigns glory, honour, and peace, to every man that worketh good, to the Jew first, and also to the Gentile. . . When the Gentiles which have not the law, do by nature, the things contained in the law; . . If the uncircumcision (the Gentiles) keep the righteousness of the law, shall not his uncircumcision be counted for circumcision?

Justin Martyr, Apolog. ii. maintains that those philosophers who lived conformably to reason, were Christians, though they knew not Christ; as Socrates, Heraclitus, and others.

Clemens Alexandrinus, Stromat. lib. i. vi. asserts that they who lived before Jesus Christ had two means for acquiring justification; the law and philosophy. Philosophy might at least dispose them to justice, but it produced not perfect righteousness. Origen thought favourably of the salvation of the Gentiles, but founded his opinion on the difficult passage, 1 Peter iii. 19, as did many of the fathers.

Chrysostom, Homil. 37, in Matt. is of opinion, that they who died before Jesus Christ, and for this reason could not come to the knowledge of him, if they had forsaken idolatry, acknowledged only one God, and led a laudable life, would share in the happiness of heaven.

But if it be enquired whether Heathens have lived up to their knowledge, commendably, and morally well; i. e. that with proper knowledge of God, they have loved him, given him glory, hoped in him, followed the precepts of the law of nature, and observed them as they ought to do, (i. e. with a view to God,) and demonstrated the power and exercise of these principles, by actions animated with grace and charity, they have practised the first and greatest commandments, to love God with all their hearts, and their neighbour as themselves;—If any one can show, that Seneca, Socrates, Heraclitus, or Plato thus knew God, loved and served him, I do not believe any divine will venture to close the entrance of heaven against them; but if enquiry be made into their lives, I very much question whether they will be found conformable to these rules. The reader may see this matter more fully treated in Pererius on the Romans.

GENUBATH, גִּנְבַּת, Genubath, theft, robbery; from גָּנַב ganab: otherwise, garden, or protection of the daughter; from גַּן gan, a garden, &c. and בַּת bath, a daughter. Son of Hadad, 1 Kings xi. 20.

GERA, גֵּרָא: pilgrimage; from גָּר gur: otherwise, combat, dispute; from גָּרַח garah: otherwise, to ruminate; from גָּרַר garar.

I. GERA, father of Ehud, Judg. iii. 15.

II. GERA, of Benjamin, father of Shimei, 2 Sam. xvi. 5.

[GERAH, the smallest piece of money among the Hebrews, twenty of which made a shekel, Exod. xxx. 13.]

GERAR, or GERARAR, a city of the Philistines, south of Judah. The Abimelechs were kings of this city, in the time of Abraham and Isaac. Vide ABIMELECH.

Gerar extended far into Arabia Petræa, being twenty-five miles from Eleutheropolis, beyond Daroma, in the south of Judah. Moses says, it lay between Kadesh and Shur. Jerom, in his Hebrew Traditions on Genesis, says, from Gerar to Jerusalem was three days journey. There was a wood near Gedar, spoken of by Theodoret; and a brook, on which was a monastery, noticed by Sozomen. Moses also mentions the brook or valley of Gerar, Gen. xxvi. 26. Sozomen speaks of a little town called Gera, fifty furlongs from Pelusium; and (2 Mac. xiii. 24.) we read that Judas was appointed governor from Ptolemais to the Gerrhenians. Gerar is confounded by some writers, with Beersheba, Askelon, Allush, and Arad.

[GERAR, גֵּרָר: wanderings, or exiles;—strivings, or the conflict of anxious settlers.

We find a city of this name so early as Gen. xx. i. xxvi. 1, 17, expressly stated to be a city of the Philistines. The probability is, that some wandering tribe of Palli had settled here, before the great influx of their nation into these parts, during the captivity of the Israelites in Egypt. As Abraham himself was a pilgrim from a region not very distant from the original country of these Palli, they might therefore, perhaps, feel some kind of sympathy with him and for him. He appears to have been, on the whole, on good terms with the king of Gerar: and his son Isaac lived many years in this neighbourhood. Gerar appears to have been a favourable station for flocks; and it might be called "the fixed residence," i. e. not tents, but buildings, by those who here abode, whether they were, properly speaking, exiles or not.]

GERASA, or GERGESA, a city beyond, and east of the Jordan; by some included in Cœlesyria, by others in Arabia. It is placed among the cities of the Decapolis. Matt. viii. 28.

The Greek editions of Matthew, for Gerasesians, have Gergesenes, and some have Gadarenes. Luke and Mark read the same. Origen thinks, the true reading is neither Geresa nor Gedara; but that the city of Gergesa is meant, which lies on the lake of Tiberias, where, in his time, people showed the rocks and precipices whence the swine ran down.

GERGESA, vide the preceding article.

GERGESENES, גֵּרְגֵּשִׁי, Gergesenes: those who come from Pilgrimage, from flight, or consumption; from נָגַשׁ nagash, and גֵּרָא gera.

GERGESENES, or Girgashites, an ancient people, of the land of Canaan, beyond the sea of Tiberias; we find traces of their name in the city Gergesa.

GERIZIM, גֵּרִיזִים, cutters; from גָּרַז garez. [Cuttings, by reapers. Simon thinks it denotes abscissions, cuttings off; the mountain being much broken, abrupt, precipitous; or, that it was very high, as it is described by Josephus Ant. lib. xi. cap. 8. It is written Garizin in the Greek. 2 Macc. v. 23.]

GERIZIM, a mount near Shechem, in Ephraim, a province of Samaria. Shechem lay at the foot of two mountains, Ebal and Gerizim. Gerizim was fruitful, Ebal was barren. God commanded that the Hebrews, after passing the Jordan, should go to the mountains Ebal and Gerizim; and should be divided in such a manner, that six tribes might be stationed on mount Gerizim, and six on mount Ebal. The former were to pronounce blessings on those who observed the law of the Lord; the others, curses against those who should violate it, Deut. xi. 29. xxvii. 12.

Joshua executed God's command: he built an altar, and offered burnt-sacrifices; and disposed the people, half on mount Gerizim, and half on Ebal, as had been directed. See EBAL.

Eusebius, Jerom, Procopius, and Scaliger, were of opinion, that the mounts Ebal and Gerizim

Gerizim were not near Shechem, but lay east of Jericho and Gilgal; that the mountains so called, near Shechem, were not those meant by Moses. Epiphanius places those mountains beyond Jordan: Hæres. ix. p. 25. But this opinion is not to be maintained. Gerizim was so near Shechem, that Jotham, son of Gideon, from the top thereof, spoke to the people of Shechem assembled at the bottom of it, and escaped, Judg. ix. 7.

While the Hebrews continued united, and of one religion, there was nothing particular at Gerizim. There is nothing said of it in the Kings or the Chronicles. But after the Cuthæans were settled in Samaria, and after the captivity, Ezra prosecuting idolatry every where, united with Nehemiah, in expelling Manasseh, son of Joiada, and grandson to the high-priest Eliashib, for having married the daughter of Sanballat, governor of Samaria. Epiphanius and Procopius affirm that at this time the Samaritans took the idols from the tops of their houses, and concealed them in a cave belonging to mount Gerizim; and that they continued secretly to worship them, by turning themselves at their prayers that way. After Manasseh, Sanballat's son-in-law, by permission of Alexander the Great, had built a temple to the true God, on Gerizim, (Joseph. Antiq. lib. xi. cap. 8.) the Samaritans joined the worship of the true God to that of their idols, which were hidden under Gerizim; whereby those words of Scripture were verified: "They feared the Lord, and served their own gods, after the manner of the nations, whom they carried away from thence."

But this tradition of idols concealed under mount Gerizim, has no foundation in Scripture, Josephus, or the Samaritan historians; and proceeds, in all probability, only from what is related, Gen. xxxv. 3, 4, of Jacob's enjoining his family, to put into his hands their idols, &c. which he hid under a turpentine tree, behind the town of Sichem.

The Samaritans maintain, that Abraham and Jacob erected altars at Gerizim, and that here Abraham prepared to sacrifice his son Isaac, Gen. xii. 6, 7. xiii. 4. xxxiii. 20. It is certain, this was on Mount Moriah; now Moriah was in the neighbourhood of Sichem and Gerizim, Gen. xii. 6. "Abraham passed through the land, unto the place of Sichem, unto the plain of Moreh," —usque ad convallem illustrem; Heb. usque ad convallem More. And Deut. xi. 30. "Super montem Gerizim et super Montem Hebal—juxta vallem tendentem et intrantem procul; Heb. juxta Elon More; as far as the oak or turpentine tree of Moreh. Jacob having purchased Hamor's field, at Sichem, built an altar there, and sacrificed to the Lord.

PART XII. Edit. IV.

The Samaritans add, that God required the blessings to be given from mount Gerizim, to those who observed his laws; and the curses from Ebal, (Deut. xxvii. 12, 13.) that Joshua's altar on Gerizim is in being at this day: that mount Gerizim being beautiful and fruitful (whereas Ebal is entirely barren) Gerizim was chose for the place of blessing. They cite, from their Bible, Deut. xxvii. 4, "When ye be gone over Jordan, ye shall set up these stones, which I command you this day, in mount Gerizim (in the Hebrew copies, mount Ebal.) thou shalt plaster them," &c. verses 12, 13. The same Exod. xx. 18.

We see here a manifest corruption of the text, either by the Jews, who substituted Ebal for Gerizim; or by the Samaritans, who substituted Gerizim for Ebal. What makes against the Samaritans, is, first, their having an interest in this falsification; secondly, that all the versions of the Bible agree, in general, with the Hebrew. [But these translations being all from the Hebrew, prove nothing against the Samaritans, whose text is not represented by them; so that this argument has little force.]

The Hebrews have much greater advantage over the Samaritans, in shewing by good histories, and authentic documents, that the public exercise of the true religion was always solemnised in Jerusalem, and never at Gerizim; whereas the Samaritans have only histories of little certainty or antiquity, to support their worship at Gerizim; and if we confess, that Gerizim, and not Ebal, were to be read in the places quoted, it would only follow, that an altar was set up in haste there, for a particular temporary ceremony.

A temple was built on Gerizim, and consecrated to the God of Israel, A. M. 3672; ante A. D. 332; and as the mountain was very high, there were many steps cut for the convenience of the people. When Antiochus Epiphanes began to persecute the Jews, (A. M. 3836; ante A. D. 170) the Samaritans entreated him, that their temple upon Gerizim, which hitherto had been dedicated to an unknown and nameless God, might be consecrated to Jupiter the Grecian; which was easily consented to by Antiochus. There is extant a medal, on which the temple is represented with many steps. Procopius says, (in Deut.) there were sixteen [six?] hundred and one. But an ancient traveller, who lived in the reign of Constantine, says, there were but three hundred.

The temple of Gerizim subsisted some time after the worship of Jupiter was introduced into it; but it was destroyed by John Hircanus Maccabæus, (Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 17) and was not rebuilt till Gabinus was governor of Syria; who repaired Samaria, and called it by his own name; (Jul. African. in Syncelli Chronico, p. 308,) nor do I find that this fact is related very distinctly in any history. It is certain, that in our Saviour's time, this temple was in being; and that the true God was worshipped there, since the woman of Samaria, pointing to Gerizim, said to him, "Our fathers worshipped in this mountain, and ye say, that in Jerusalem is the place where men ought to worship." John iv. 20. We are assured, that Herod the Great, having rebuilt Samaria, and called it Sebaste, in honour of Augustus, would have obliged the Samaritans to worship in the temple which he had erected; but they constantly refused; and have continued to this day to worship God on this mountain.

[Mr. Maundrell observes, p. 60, that neither Ebal nor Gerizim have much to boast of as to their pleasantness, yet that Gerizim seems to discover a somewhat more verdant fruitful aspect than Ebal. The reason of which may be that, fronting the north, it is somewhat sheltered from the sun by its own shade, or declivity, whereas Ebal is scorched, having a southern aspect. Vide SAMARITANS.]

[GERIZIM. I suspect that both the Jewish and Samaritan copies of the Pentateuch, after all the debates they have occasioned, are correct, in their seemingly opposite readings of Gerizim and Ebal:—for we have only to reflect, that by the Hebrew particle used, is taken with a latitude, and that the persons speaking did not stand on these mountains, strictly, but at them, i. e. in the valley between them: now, I submit, whether a person pronouncing a blessing from any part, does not bless the part opposite to him, rather than that whereon he stands; if so, then a number might stand at, adjacent to, against Ebal, to bless, as the Jewish copies say, but their blessing would be directed to Gerizim, so that Gerizim would be the mount of blessings, as the Samaritan copies say. Most probably the altar, &c. stood in the valley between both mountains, and not on the upper grounds of either. Vide Deut. xi. 19.]

GERRHENIANS, Γερρηνῖται: inhabitants, pilgrims, or disputants; or Gerraens, (2 Macc. xiii. 24) inhabitants of Gerar. Vide GERARA.

GERSHOM, גרשם, Γερσαμ: a stranger here: from גר gher, a stranger, or traveller, and שם sham, here: otherwise, a traveller of reputation; from gher, and שם shem, name, reputation.

GERSAN, GERSAM, or GERSHOM, son of Moses and Zipporah. Exod. ii. 22.

GERSHON, גרשן, his banishment: from גרש garash, exile, and ש an, his: otherwise, the change of pilgrimage; from שנה shanah, to change, and גר gher, pilgrimage.

GERSHON, son of Levi, and under Moses, prince of a great family of the Levites, consisting of 7500 men, Numb. iii. 21, &c. Their office, during marches, was to carry the veils and curtains of the tabernacle. Their place in the camp was west of the tabernacle.

GERUTH, גרות, Βαπτισμ: pilgrimage, or he that travels. The Vulgate has put the signification instead of the name:—the LXX. read ב beth, instead of ג gimel.

GERZI, גרזי, Γερζαῖος: hatchet, wedge: otherwise, he that cuts and hews: from גרז garaz.

GERZI. David, during his abode at Ziklag, made inroads on the land of Geshuri, Gerzi, and Amalek. 1 Sam. xxvii. 8. The LXX. read Gexiri, and some copies Geseri or Gesæum. The Syriac and Arabic read Gessua and Gedola. [See Eng. Margin: the text reads Gezri.]

GESHAN, גישן, Γεσων: that approaches: from נגש nagash: otherwise, the vault of change; from גיה ghe, a vale, and שנה shanah, change: or, of ivory; from שן shen: otherwise, of sleep; from שנה shenah, and ישן jashan.

[Perhaps, a great flock, i. e. family. 1 Chr. ii. 47.]

GESHUR, גשור, the sight of the valley, from גי ghei, a valley, and שור shur, to behold, to view; otherwise, the vale of the ox; from shur: otherwise, the vale of the wall.

I. GESIUR. A people of this name is mentioned Josh. xiii. 13. 1 Sam. xxvii. 8. Their habitation was between Philistia and Egypt.

II. GESHUR, in Syria, had its king, whose daughter David married, and had Absalom by her, 2 Sam. iii. 3. xv. 8. Absalom, after the murder of his brother Amnon, retired to the king of Geshur, his maternal grandfather. It may be questioned whether this Geshur be not different from that beyond Jordan, since it is said, Jair took Geshur and Aram, (or Geshur of Syria) and the Avoth (or villages) of Jair. 1 Chr. ii. 23.

GESHURITES, beyond Jordan, in the half-tribe of Manasseh. These were joined with the inhabitants of Maachathi, Deut. iii. 14. Josh. xii. 5. It is said they were not driven out by the Israelites, Josh. xiii. 13. Ishbosheth, son of Saul, was acknowledged king by these Geshurites, [Eng. Tr. Ashurites.] and by the Israelites of Gilead, 2 Sam. ii. 9.

GETHER, גתר, Γαθηρ: the vale of trial, or of searching; from גי ghe, a valley, and תר thur, examination: otherwise, the valley of the turtle; from thur: otherwise, the press of enquiry, or of contemplation; from גת geth, a press, and תר thur, contemplation. Third son of Aram, son of Shein, Gen. x. 23.

GETHSEMANE, or GE-SEMANI. Hebrew, גתשמן: a very fat vale: otherwise, the vale of oil; from גי ghe, a valley, and שמן shemen, oil, perfume, incense.

GETHSEMANE, may signify the oil-press. A village on the mount of Olives, whither Jesus Christ Christ sometimes retired. In a garden belonging to this village he endured his agony; was taken by Judas, &c. Matth. xxvi. 36. & seq.

GEZERON, or GAZERON, Ἀγαρηων (Γαζαρων, in other MSS.) cutting off, or division, or sentence of pain, or of strength; from גזר gezer, to cut off, and אץ an, strength; or from אנה anah, pain or trouble. 1 Macc. iv. 15.

GIAM, גיה, גיא: to guide, draw out, produce; from גח guach: otherwise, sigh, or groan; from אנח anach. [Outlet, extraction, derivation, eruption. It was, probably, a valley not far from Gibeon, which might be an outlet from a narrow and contracted road or country, to one more open: or it might be an eruption of water, which here was ejected, as it were, from the mountain. 2 Sam. ii. 24. Sundry interpreters understand it of a valley, simply.]

GIANT. Heb. נפל nophel, נפילי nephilim; Greek γίγας, gigas; a monster, a terrible man, a chief who beats and bears down other men. Scripture speaks of giants before the flood: "Nephilim, mighty men who were of old, men of renown," Gen. vi. 4. Aquila translates nephilim (ἑμμετροντες irruentes) men who attack, who fall with impetuosity on their enemies; which renders very well the force of the term. Symmachus translates it βαιοι, violent men, cruel, whose only rule of action is violence.

Scripture calls giants sometimes Rephaim: Chedorlaomer beat the Rephaim, at Ashteroth-Karnaim. The Emim, ancient inhabitants of Moab, were of a gigantic stature, i. e. Rephaim. The Rephaim and the Perizzites are connected as old inhabitants of Canaan. Job says, that the ancient Rephaim groan under the waters; Solomon says, (Prov. ii. 18. ix. 18.) that the ways of a debauched woman lead to the Rephaim: that he who deviates from the ways of wisdom, shall dwell in the assembly of giants, Rephaim: i. e. in hell, Prov. xxi. 16, &c. See Gen. xiv. 5. Deut. ii. 11, 20. iii. 11, 13. Joshua xii. 4. xiii. 12. Job. xxvi. 5.

The Anakim, or sons of Anak, were the most famous giants of Palestine. They dwelt at Hebron, and thereabouts. The Israelites sent to view the promised land, report, that, in comparison, they themselves were but grasshoppers, Numb. xiii. 33.

The LXX. sometimes translate גיבור gibbor, gigas, though literally it signifies—a strong man, a man of valour, a warrior: so they read, "Nimrod was a giant before the Lord;" "that the sun rises like a giant to run its course;" "that the Lord will destroy the giants, and the warlike man;" "that he will call his giants in his wrath, to take vengeance of his enemies;" "that he will destroy the power of Egypt by the sword of his giants." Vide apud LXX.

Gen. x. 8. Psalm xix. 5. Isaiah iii. 2. xiii. 2. xlix. 24, 25. Ezek. xxxix. 18, 20. (Eng. Tr. chap. xxxii.)

It is probable, that the first men were of a strength and stature superior to those of mankind at present, since they lived a much longer time; long life being commonly the effect of a strong constitution. Scripture says, that there were many of these mighty tall men of the earth, in the days of Noah; and before.

As to the existence of giants, several writers, both ancient and modern, have imagined, that the giants of Scripture were indeed men of extraordinary stature; but not so much as those have fancied, who describe them as three or four times larger than men are at present. They were, say they, men famous for violence and crime; rather than for strength, or stature.

But it cannot be denied, that there have been men of a stature much above that common at present. Moses, (Deut. iii. 11.) speaks of the bed of Og, king of Basan, as nine cubits long, and four wide (fifteen feet four inches long. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. XII.) Goliath was six cubits and a span in height (ten feet seven inches) 1 Sam. xvii. 4. Giants were common in the times of Joshua, and of David, notwithstanding the life of man was already shortened, and, as may be presumed, the size and strength of human bodies was proportionably diminished.

Homer, Odys. xi. 306, speaks of the giants Otus and Ephialtes, who were nine cubits about, and thirty-six in height.

The body of Orestes being dug up, by order of an oracle, was found to be seven cubits, or ten feet and a half. Delfio, in 1572, saw, at Rohan, a native of Piedmont, above nine feet high.

In the year 1719, at Stonehenge, near Salisbury, in England, a human skeleton was found, which was nine feet four inches long.--(French) Gazette of October, 1719; under the date of Sept. 21.

[GIANTS. It depends on the length at which the Hebrew cubit is taken, whether the height of Goliath should be estimated at ten feet seven inches, as CALMET has done; or at nine feet six inches, for which Mr. PARKHURST contends, who founds his calculation on the estimated measure of a cubit, as deduced from Josephus. The latter height is, no doubt, sufficiently tall.

There have been so few well proportioned, able bodied men, of this immense magnitude, that the wonder at the weight of Goliath's armour is greatly increased, on consideration. Such persons as have had the misfortune, as it may be called, to be excessively tall above others, have usually been of weakly body, often of disproportioned, or diseased limbs, or of still more weakly minds: but that Goliath should be able to wear his armour, and to carry it on his person, implies a strength of body no less wonderful than his extraordinary dimensions.

In proof, however, that the dimensions of Goliath, though extraordinary, are not incredible, we shall offer an instance, or two, selected from the best authorities:

"The tallest man that hath been seen in our age was one named Gabara, who in the days of Claudius, the late Emperor, was brought out of Arabia: he was nine feet nine inches high. Pliny, lib. viii. cap. 16. Solinus cap. 5.

"Maximinus the emperor was eight feet and a half in height: he was a Thracian, barbarous, cruel, and hated of all men; he used the bracelet or armlet of his wife as a ring for his thumb, and his shoe was longer by a foot than that of any other man. Zuing, vol. ii. lib. ii. Capitolin.

"There were in the time of Augustus Cæsar two persons, called Idusio and Secundilla, each of them was ten feet high, and somewhat more: their bodies after their death were kept and preserved for a wonder in a sepulchre within the Salustian gardens. Vide Kornman, de Mirac. Vivor. 25.

"Vitellius sent Darius, son of Artabanus, a hostage to Rome, with divers presents, among which was a man seven cubits, or ten feet two inches high, a Jew born; he was named Eleazar, and was called a giant by reason of his greatness." Joseph. Antiq. lib. xviii. cap. 6. cap. 5. § 5. Edit. Hudson.

Merula, who succeeded Justus Lipsius as professor of history in the university of Leyden, asserts, that A. D. 1583, he himself saw in France, a Fleming, who exceeded nine feet in height. Cosmograph. Part I. lib. iii. cap. 14. Leigh. Analecta Cæsar. Rom. p. 265.

Becanus saw a man near ten feet high, and a woman full ten feet high. Wond. Nat. & Art. Vol. ii. p. 268. Vide Phil. Trans. No. 260.

We remember to have seen in London, Bamford, a hatter by trade, who lived near Temple Bar, who measured eight feet, and six or eight inches yet wilfully lost four inches of his stature, by a habit of stooping, which he had intentionally contracted: and we know that O'Brien, lately exhibited under the name of "the Irish Giant," measured eight feet six, or eight inches, while living, and, I think, two or three inches more, when dead. Our fairs often present such sights: but, these do not prove a race of Giants.]

GIBBAR. Ninety-five of his children returned from the captivity. Ezra, ii. 20.

GIBBETHON, גִּבְתֹּן, גִּבְתָּן, his back, his eminence, his elevation, his eye-lid; from גָּב, gab, and יָן, an, his; otherwise, elevated gift; from גָּב, to lift up, and נָתַן nathan, a gift.

[As this appears to have been an ancient city of the Canaanites, I would divide the name of it into Geb, "a vaulted or arched room," say the Lexicons—a DOME: Beth, a temple—of Aun, the generative power. "The temple having a dome roof;" probably circular, or polygonal in its form. We find very few temples of such construction referred to; yet we know they are among the most ancient in India; witness those at Deogur, whose summits, though hard stone, are mouldered away by age.]

GIBBETHON, a city of Dan, allotted to the Levites, Josh. xix. 44. xxi. 23. Probably the same as Gabbata. Baasha killed Nadab, son of Jeroboam, in Gibbethon, 1 Kings, xv. 27.

GIBEAH, גִּבְעָה. Vide GABEATH, GABAA.

GIBEAH, a city of Benjamin. It gave birth to Saul, the first king of Israel; for which reason, it is frequently called Gibeah of Saul, Josh. xviii. 24; Ezra, ii. 26; Nehem. vii. 30.

It is also famous for its sins; particularly for that committed by forcing the young Levite's wife, who was come to lodge at Gibeah; and for the war which succeeded it, to the almost extermination of the tribe of Benjamin. Judges xix. Scripture remarks, that this happened at a time when there was no king in Israel, but every one did what was right in his own eyes.

Gibeah was about two leagues from Jerusalem (Hieronym. in Osee, cap. v.) north, not far from Gibeon and Kirjath-jearim. In Jerom's time, it was entirely destroyed. Josephus places it thirty furlongs from Jerusalem; but Jerom seven miles. I take it to be Gibeath, Josh. xviii. 28.

Gibea, or Gabaa, in Hebrew, signifies—a hill; we are not, therefore, to be surprized at finding, in a mountainous country, like Judæa, so many places named Gibeah, Gibeon, Gabbatha, Gabbathon, &c.

[Gibeah is derived from Geba or Gebau, signifying a hill; or perhaps, a hill of a peculiar form, humped, or like what in Scotland are called laws. Otherwise, as Canaan abounded in hills, this name would occur perpetually. The most considerable city of this name was Gibeah of Benjamin, Judges, xx. 10. 1 Sam. xiii. 16. which has a feminine termination, Judges, xix. 12. 1 Sam. vii. 1. x. 10. whence Gibeath, Josh. xviii. 28. omitting the distinction of Benjamin; which is added 1 Sam. xiii. 2, 15. The name is written at full length, "Gibeah of the children of Benjamin," 2 Sam. xxiii. 29. It is very remarkable, that what is rendered in our translation "the hill of God," is in the original Gibeah Aleim, 1 Sam. x. 5. which is called simply Gibeah, "the hill," verse 10. On this subject opinions are divided; some thinking it was called the hill of God, because here the spirit of

of God descended on Saul: others think it was the highest hill in the neighbourhood, and was so named, by way of excellence, on account of its superiority. If the "high place" mentioned in connection with this Gibeah, were situated on this hill, then this might occasion the distinguishing addition Aleim, or "of God." Yet it seems remarkable that he should "cease prophesying before he came to the high place;" verse 13, unless the garrison of the Philistines, verse 5, might render such an exhibition improper. This proceeds on the supposition, that "Gibeah of Saul" was the same place as this Gibeah: and, indeed, nothing can be more reasonable, than that Saul should afterwards choose for his royal residence, the place where he had been so singularly fitted for the occupations of royalty. I think it clear, that the garrison of the Philistines was not in Gibeah of Saul, but near to it; so that "the watchmen of Saul in Gibeah of Benjamin" could see what passed in that garrison. Vide chap. xiv. 16.

There was another Gibeah in the tribe of Judah, Josh. xv. 57, which, for distinction, is written Gibea, (with an a final in the Hebrew). 1 Chron. ii. 49.

Another Gibeah, which appertained to Phinehas, is rendered "hill" in our version, Josh. xxiv. 33. where Eleazar was buried; but in the original it is "Gibeah of Phinehas."]

GIBEON, גִּבְעון hill, or cup: otherwise, that which is without, or that which is lifted up; from גָּבַב gabab: otherwise, the elevation of iniquity; from גָּב gab, elevation, and יָצָא aven, iniquity.

GIBEON, the capital city of the Gibeonites, who took advantage of the oaths of Joshua, and of the elders of Israel, procured by an artful representation of their belonging to a very remote country, Josh. ix. Joshua and the elders had not the precaution to consult God on this affair, but inconsiderately made a league with these people: they soon discovered their mistake, and, without revoking their promise of saving their lives, they condemned them to labour in carrying wood and water for the tabernacle; and to other womens' works, as a mark of their pusillanimity and duplicity, as slaves and captives; in which state of servitude they remained, till the entire dispersion of the Jewish nation. A. M. 2553; ante A. D. 1451.

Three days after the Gibeonites had surrendered to the Hebrews, the kings of Canaan being informed of it, five of them came and besieged the city of Gibeon. The Gibeonites sent to Joshua, and desired speedy help. Joshua attacked the five kings early in the morning, put them to flight, and pursued them to Bethoron. Josh. x. 3, &c. Vide JOSHUA.

The Gibeonites were descended from the Hivites, the old inhabitants of the country, and possessed four cities: Cephirah, Beeroth, Kirjath-jearim, and Gibeon, their capital; all afterwards given to Benjamin, except Kirjath-jearim, which fell to Judah. The Gibeonites continued subject to those burdens which Joshua imposed on them, and were very faithful to the Israelites. Nevertheless, Saul, through what enmity we cannot tell, (possibly, from dislike to the service they were engaged in; or under pretence, that such unworthy persons profaned the sacred service) destroyed a great number of them, (2 Sam. xxi. 1.) but God, in the reign of David, sent a great famine, which lasted three years, (A. M. 2983; ante A. D. 1017); and the prophets told David, that this calamity would continue while Saul's cruelty remained unavenged. David asked the Gibeonites, what satisfaction they desired? They answered, "seven of Saul's sons we will put to death, to avenge the blood of our brethren." The Gibeonites crucified them before the Lord.

From this time there is no mention of the Gibeonites, as a distinct people. But we are of opinion, that they were included among the Nethinim, or given, who were public slaves, appointed for the service of the temple, 1 Chron. ix. 2. Afterwards, those of the Canaanites, who were subdued, and had their lives spared, were added to the Gibeonites. We see in Ezra, viii. 20; ii. 58; 1 Kings, ix. 20, 21, that David, Solomon, and the princes of Judah, gave many such to the Lord; these Nethinim being carried into captivity with Judah and the Levites, many of them returned with Ezra, Zerobabel, and Nehemiah, and continued, as before, in the service of the temple, under the priests and Levites.

Gibeon was seated on an eminence, as is evident from its name. It was forty furlongs from Jerusalem, according to Josephus, north. It is called Gabaa, 2 Sam. v. 25, compared with 1 Chron. xiv. 16. There is mention of the fountain and pool of Gibeon, 2 Sam. ii. 13. Joseph. de Bello, lib. ii. cap. 24.

We neither know when, nor by whom, nor on what occasion the tabernacle and altar of burnt-sacrifices, made by Moses, in the wilderness, were removed to Gibeon; (perhaps through some influence of the Gibeonites) but this we certainly know, that, toward the end of David's reign, and in the beginning of Solomon's, they were there, 1 Chron. xxi. 29, 30. David seeing an angel of the Lord, at Araunah's threshing-floor, was so terrified, that he had not time or strength to go so far as Gibeon, to offer sacrifice. But Solomon being seated on the throne, went to sacrifice at Gibeon, 1 Kings, iii. 4.

[Gibeon appears to have been among the most

most ancient and most considerable cities in Canaan; when attacked by Joshua. Josh. ix. 3. x. 2. It was a great city, like one of the royal cities, greater than Ai. We are told that the Gibeonites represented themselves as strangers from a far country; and I doubt not but they spoke truth; their ancestors being settlers from the east, and having followed those tribes from India, which over-run as well Canaan as Egypt. Thus fact was mingled with their guile, and they spoke truth, but not the whole truth. I would therefore suppose, that the name of their city was "the hill of Aun," or the generative power; in conformity with many other appellations derived from the same source.

It is said, 2 Sam. ii. 13. that there was a pool in Gibeon. Whether it were of any considerable extent, does not appear from this passage; but I think we need not doubt but that it is the same as is called "the great waters that are in Gibeon." Jer. xli. 12. Moreover, as it probably was a running stream, the discovery of such an one may contribute to distinguish and ascertain this city. There was also a great stone or rock in Gibeon. 2 Sam. xx. 8. In Gibeon was the great high place. 1 Kings, iii. 4. Here was the altar of burnt offerings. 1 Chron. xxi. 29. Here the Lord appeared to Solomon. 1 Kings, iii. 5. From Jer. xli. 16, we may infer that after the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, Gibeon became again the seat of government.

Gibeon is written for Geba, 1 Chron. xiv. 16. and again, as appears by the reference to Baalperazim, in Isaiah. xxviii. 21.

Gibeon produced prophets in the days of Jeremiah, Jer. xxviii. 1.

On considering the question of the identity of the places named Geba, Gibeah, Gibeon, &c. I incline to think, that although they might be near to each other, yet they were different, if strictly taken. Gibeon of Benjamin, also, I presume, is a different place from Gibeah of Saul; and the attention employed by the sacred writers to distinguish them, appears to me intended to establish this difference; so we read 1 Sam. xiii. 15. that Samuel went up to Gibeah of Benjamin: but, chap. xv. 34. "Saul went up to his house (palace) to Gibeah of Saul." This palace probably distinguished Gibeah of Saul; though not far from Gibeah of Benjamin.

That Gibeah was not Gibeon, may also, I suppose, be inferred from the circumstance of Saul's slaughter of the Gibeonites. 2 Sam. xxi. Now, besides the improbability that Saul should slay inhabitants of his own town, without that circumstance being mentioned by way of aggravation, it appears that the victims were hanged in Gibeah of Saul: "and they were hanged in the mountain, in the presence of the Lord," meaning, I suppose, so as to be seen, in full view, from the high place of Gibeon. The sacred place at Gibeon would have been very deeply polluted by such an almost sacrilegious execution.]

GIBLIL, or GEBAL, גִּבְלִיל, Γιβλίω (Psalm lxxxiii. 7.): end, limits, or borders of the sea; from גִּבְלוֹל ghebol, and יָם jam, the sea.

GIBLOS, or BYBLOS, a city on the coast of Phœnicia, between Tripoli and Berytus. The inhabitants were celebrated for their dexterity in cutting stone or wood, and for their skill in ship building, 1 Kings, v. 18.; Ezek. xxvii. 9. Some think the Giblil of Scripture, were inhabitants of Gabala, in Phœnicia, between Tortosa and Laodicea. Vide BYBLOS and GEBAL.

King Hiram employed the people of this place, in preparing materials for Solomon's temple, as may be collected from 1 Kings, v. 18: where the word which our translators have rendered stone-squarers, is in the Hebrew, גִּבְלִים Giblim, or Giblites; and in the LXX. βύβλιος, or men of Byblus; the former using the Hebrew, the latter the Greek name of this place. The same difference may be observed in Ezek. xxvii. 9. "The ancients in Gebal," says our translation, following the Hebrew; instead of which, we read in the LXX. πρεσβύτεροι βυβλίων, the elders of Byblus.

GIDDALTI, גִּדְלִי, my fringe, my greatness; from גִּדָּל gedalim. Son of Heman, the Levite. His family was the twelfth which served in the temple, 1 Chron. xxv. 4.

GIDDEL, גִּדֵּל, great, powerful: otherwise, fringe, ribbon; from גִּדָּלִים gedalim, fringes, or ribbons. Ezra ii. 47, 56. Neh. vii. 49, 58.

GIDEON, גִּדְעֹן, גִּדְעָן, he that bruises and breaks; from גָּדַע gudah: otherwise, cutting off iniquity, according to the Syriac and the Hebrew.

GIDEON, son of Joash, of Manasseh. He dwelt in the city of Ophrah, and had a very extraordinary call, to deliver Israel from the oppression of the Midianites. After the deaths of Barak and Deborah, Judg. vi. 1, 2, the Midianites so distressed the Hebrews, that they were forced to hide in caves. (A. M. 2752, to 2759). But, eventually, God sent his angel to Gideon, who was threshing his corn, privately, near a wine-press, under an oak, to conceal his action from the Midianites, and to be able to remove immediately with his corn, as soon as they appeared. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. XLVIII.

The angel saluted him, and said, "The Lord is with thee! thou mighty man of valour." Gideon hesitated; but the angel answered: "Go, in this thy might, thou shalt save Israel from the Midianites." Gideon asked a sign of him, that he might be convinced it was no delusion; he made made ready a kid and unleavened cakes, which he brought and presented to him: the angel said, "Put them on this rock, and pour out the broth;" then the angel, with the end of the staff that was in his hand, touched the flesh and unleavened cakes; fire issued out of the rock, and consumed them. The angel disappeared.

Gideon exclaimed, "Alas! O Lord God, for I have seen an angel of the Lord face to face:" the Lord said to him, "Fear not, thou shalt not die." In that same place he erected an altar to the Lord, which he called, The Peace of the Lord. The night following, God commanded him to cut down the grove, and ruin the altar of Baal. Gideon obeyed. The next day, the inhabitants of Ophrah told Joash, that Gideon must be slain, for this affront offered to Baal. Joash answered, "Are ye to defend Baal? If Baal be God, let him avenge himself." From that time, Gideon was called Jerobaal, i. e. let Baal see to it, or let Baal contest with him who has thrown down his altar. ירבעל Jerobaal may be derived from יראה בעל Videat Baal, or from ירב בעל Contendat Baal. He is Jerombaal, in Sanctioniathon, apud Euseb. Præpar. lib. i.

Sanctioniathon lived in the reign of Ithobal, king of Tyre, and consequently a little after Gideon. David calls Gideon, Jerub-besheth, instead of Jerob-baal; as (2 Sam. xi. 21.) Mephi-bosheth is a name used instead of Mephi-baal.

The Midianites came and encamped in the valley of Jezreel; and Gideon assembled the Israelites of the house of Abiezer, who dwelt nearest to him; also Manasseh, Asher, Zebulun, and Naphtali. Gideon, to assure them that God purposed their deliverance, prayed for a sign, that God would fill with dew a fleece of wool, spread on the ground, while all around was dry. After this, he desired a contrary sign.

Gideon permitted all the troops of his army who were any way afraid, to quit his camp; 22,000 returned to their own houses, only 10,000 remained with him. The Lord said to Gideon, "Bring the people down to the water, dismiss all such as shall kneel on the ground for their ease while drinking, and retain such only as shall sip water from their hands, or lap it with their tongues like dogs, for speed;" this latter number amounted but to 300.

He ordered these 300 to hold themselves in readiness, giving to each a trumpet, a lamp, or light, and an empty pitcher to conceal that light. Stealing over to the enemies' camp, he heard a Midianite relate his dream, of a cake of barley-bread which, rolling into the camp of Midian, upset a tent [THE tent: the general's tent.] The hearer explained the dream by answering, "this is the sword of Gideon."

Gideon divided his men into three companies, of one hundred each; which troops advanced three different ways toward the camp of the Midianites. At midnight, Gideon suddenly took his lamp from within his pitcher, and sounded his trumpet; and the men who were with him did the same. A strange terror spread among the enemies; who began to fly, and to kill each other. The neighbouring tribes of Manasseh, Naphtali, and Asher, came forward and joined in the pursuit. Gideon, with his three hundred warriors, passed the Jordan, and followed the Midianites to Succoth and Penuel, Judg. viii. defeated them, took their two kings, Zeba and Zalmunna, and returned towards Succoth and Penuel before sunset.

These two cities having refused to supply him with refreshments, when he advanced in pursuit of the enemy, he took a terrible vengeance on them at his return.

After this victory, Israel said to Gideon, "Be thou our prince." Gideon answered, "I will not rule over you, neither shall my son rule over you, but the Lord. But give me the earrings which made part of your booty;" for the Midianites were accustomed to wear gold pendants in their ears. Of these Gideon made an ephod, which became the occasion of the Israelites offending God—the cause of Gideon's ruin, and the destruction of his house. Gideon judged Israel nine years, from A. M. 2759, to 2768. He had seventy sons, born of many wives; and beside these, Abimelech, son of a concubine, who reigned three years at Shechem.

GIDGAD, גִּדְגָד: happiness of happiness, or army prepared to battle.

GIDGAD, a mountain in the wilderness of Paran, between Bene-jaakan and Jotbathah. The Hebrews encamped here. Numb. xxxiii. 32.

GIHON, גִּיחוֹן: valley of grace; from גִּיחַ ghia, a valley, and חֵן chen or hen, grace; or of the habitation; from חָנָה chanah: or breast, or impetuous GIHON, a fountain west of Jerusalem. Here Solomon was anointed king by Zadok and Nathan. Hezekiah ordered the waters of the upper channel of Gihon to be conveyed into Jerusalem. 1 Kings, i. 33; 2 Chron. xxxii. 30. A. M. 3291; ante A. D. 709. Vide the MAP of JERUSALEM and FRAGMENTS, No. CXXXVII.

GIHON, the name of one of the four rivers of Paradise. Gen. ii. 13. Many have believed, against probability, that this was the Nile of Egypt, as if the Nile, which rises in Africa, six hundred leagues from the Euphrates, could be mentioned as issuing out of the same garden with those rivers. The Arabians believe, generally, that this is the Oxur, a river which rises in the mountains of Imaus, and runs from east to west: when it comes near the country of Choraruem, Choraznem, it winds much : but afterwards returns, and discharges itself into the Caspian Sea, westward. This river separates the provinces of the Turks and the Persians. By modern geographers the Oxus is called Abiamu, the river Amu [or, father Amu] the Arabians name it Gehon, and Neher-Bulkh, the river of Balkh, because it passes through that city.

Others think, as Calvin, Scaliger, &c. that Gihon is the most western channel of the two made by the Tigris and Euphrates, when, after their conflux, they separate again to enter the sea. Their principal reason is, that the eastern channel is Phison. Others, on the contrary, maintain, that Phison is the western channel, and Gihon is the eastern. As a proof, they assert, that the land of Cush, wherein the Gihon runs, is Cissia, or the Chuzestau. This is the judgment of Bochart and Huetius.

But Moses doubtless intended to describe the situation of Paradise, by geographical marks, existing and known in his time. Now neither of the two arms formed by the divided waters of the Tigris and Euphrates were in being in his time. [See the PLATES : MAP OF PARADISE.]

Pliny says expressly, (lib. vi. cap. 27.) that it was late before the channels of the Tigris and Euphrates were joined ; that anciently they discharged themselves separately into the Persian Gulf ; and that their mouths, according to some, were five and twenty thousand paces asunder ; or seven thousand, according to others. Inter duorum amnium ostia, XXV. M. passus fuere, aut ut alii tradunt, VII. M. Sed longo tempore Euphratem præclusero Orcheni, et accolæ agros rigantes, nec nisi per Tigrim defertur in mare. Again, cap. 28. Pliny says, they still shew the mouth by which the Euphrates fell into the sea ; locus ubi Euphratis ostium fuit. Herodotus, lib. i. ascribes to queen Nitocris those cuts and drains of the Euphrates, which diminished the water of this river, formerly so large and majestic. This author speaks again of the Euphrates, as falling through its own channel into the Persian Gulf, without noticing its joining the Tigris. We take the Gihon to be the Araxes, which has its source, as well as the Tigris and Euphrates, in the mountains of Armenia, and running with almost incredible rapidity, falls into the Caspian Sea. Gihon, in Hebrew, signifies—impetuous, rapid, violent. Ecclesiasticus, xxiv. 37. speaks of the inundations of Gihon, in the time of vintage : because the Araxes swells towards the latter end of summer, the snow upon the mountains of Armenia dissolving about that time.

GILBOA, גִּלְבּוֹא : revolution of enquiry ; from גָּל gal, revolution, and בָּחַק bahak, enquiry : otherwise, collection of swelling and inflamma- tion ; from גָּל, collection, and בָּחַק : otherwise, he that overturns his prayer, according to the Syriac and Hebrew, [or revolution of deprecation.]

[Rather the “rounds (mountains) of swelling :” the mountains being, as it were, heaped round at their bottoms or sides, and their heads being, not sharp, but more or less protuberant, (or of various protuberances), bulging or swelling. Nothing but ocular inspection can justify this derivation : it must, therefore, remain conjectural. It is, however, quite as likely as Simon’s “boiling up,” or “bubbling fountains,” for it does not appear that fountains abound in these mountains ; nor that any fountain at the foot of one hill could give name to the whole range : nor that the fountain at Jezreel, 1 Sam. xxix. 1. could characterise the whole mass of mountains, so as to impart a name to them.]

GILBOA, a mountain, celebrated for the defeat and death of king Saul, and his son Jonathan, 1 Sam. xxxi. Eusebius and Jerom place this mountain six miles from Bethshan, otherwise Scythopolis, where was a large place called Gelbus. William of Tyre (lib. xxii. cap. 26.) says, that at the foot of mount Gilboa is a spring, which runs near the city of Jezreel. These mountains are said to be at present dry and barren. [But, vide the CALENDAR OF PALESTINE : among the FRAGMENTS No. CCCCLXVI.]

GILEAD, גִּלְעָד : the heap, or mass [rather, circle] of testimony, from גָּל gal, a heap, and תִּיבָה tehibah, testimony.

GILEAD. The mountains of Gilead, which lay east of the Jordan, separated the lands of Ammon, Moab, Reuben, Gad, and Manasseh, from Arabia Deserta. Gilead is often put for the whole country beyond Jordan. Eusebius says, mount Gilead reached from Libanus northward, to the land possessed by Sihon, king of the Amorites, which was given to the tribe of Reuben. This ridge of mountains, therefore, must have been above seventy leagues from south to north, and included the mountains of Seir and Bashan, perhaps also, those of the Trachonitis, Auran and Hermon. Jeremiah seems likewise to say, that Gilead is the beginning of Libanus : “Thou art Gilead unto me, and the head of Lebanon.” Jer. xxii. 6.

Jacob returning from Mesopotamia, came in six days to the mountains of Gilead, where Laban overtook him. Gen. xxxi. 21. Here they made a covenant, and raised a heap of stones as a monument of it. Laban called it Jegar-Sahadutha ; but Jacob called it Gal haed, the heap of witness ; whence came the word Gilead.

Scripture speaks highly in commendation of the balm of Gilead. Jer. viii. 22 ; xlv. 11 ; li. 8. The merchants who bought Joseph, came from from Gilead, and were carrying balm into Egypt, Gen. xxxvii. 25.

If the זורי of the Hebrew text, Gen. xxxvii. 25; xliii. 2, be the same with the balsam of Mecca, it will prove the balsam-tree to have been in Gilead long before it was planted in the gardens of Jericho, and before the queen of Sheba brought that root of it to king Solomon, which Josephus mentions. For the Ishmaelites traded with it from Gilead to Egypt, when Joseph was sold to them by his brethren. It seems to me most likely, that the zori of Gilead, rendered in our English Bible by the word balm, was not the same with the balsam of Mecca, but only a better sort of turpentine, then in use for curing wounds, and other diseases; says PRIDEAUX; Connect. &c. Part ii. b. vi.

GILEAD, son of Machir, and grandson of Manasseh, received his inheritance in the mountains of Gilead, beyond Jordan. From thence he took the name of Gilead; for these mountains were so called long before him. Numb. xxvi. 30, 31.

[A City of Gilead is also mentioned, Hos. vi. 8. This appears to have been in Ephraim; possibly it might be the principal town.]

GILGAL, גלגל; wheel, revolution, heap; or revolution of the wheel, or heap of heap.

[There can be no doubt but what this word denotes a double circle: but whether two circles by the side of each other, or one within the other, concentric, is uncertain.]

I. GILGAL. Joshua, xii. 23, speaks of a king of Gilgal of the nations, (מלך גלגל) LXX. βασιλεα γὰρ τῆς Γαλιλαίας; Vulgate, Rex Gentium Galgal) who was conquered and killed. In our opinion, this Gilgal of the Nations is the Gilgal of the Gentiles, Isaiah ix. 1; and signifies Upper Galilee, which extended principally beyond Jordan.

II. GILGAL, a celebrated place west of the Jordan, where the Israelites encamped, after their passage of that river. A considerable city was afterwards built there, which became famous for many events. Gilgal was about a league from Jordan, and from Jericho. This name was derived from the circumcision of the people there, Josh. v. 2, &c. The Lord said, "I have taken away the reproach of Egypt from off you:" literally, I have rolled away from off you, &c.: Gilgal signifies—rolling. As the ark was long at Gilgal, this place became celebrated, and the people continued to go thither in pilgrimage. It is thought that Jeroboam, or some king of Israel, his successor, set up one of the golden calves here. Hosea, iv. 15; xi. 11; Amos, iv. 4; v. 5.

There had been idols, perhaps, at Gilgal, so early as the time of Ehud, judge of Israel; for it is said, Judg. iii. 19, that Ehud having made his presents to the king, went away as far as Gilgal; that he returned from thence, and pretended to have some secret message to him from God, as if he had received some oracle at Gilgal. Here the people met to confirm the kingdom to Saul, 1 Sam. xi. 14, 15; and here Saul incurred God's displeasure, by offering sacrifices before Samuel came, 1 Sam. xiii. 8; here he received the sentence of his rejection, for sparing the king of Amalek, with the best of the spoils, 1 Sam. xv. 26. Jerom says, that Paula went to Gilgal, and saw there the camp of the Israelites, the hill of the fore-skins, and the twelve stones which Joshua had placed there. Epitaph. Paula, ep. 62.

[1. Gilgal near to Moreh. Deut. xi. 30. Josh. xii. 23.

2. Gilgal where the twelve stones were pitched, in a circle, no doubt. Josh. iv. 20.—Whether this is the same as the following?

3. Gilgal near the Jordan. Josh. xv. 7.

Gilgal, Deut. xi. 30, is placed by Moses near to Gerizim and Ebal. This Gilgal, therefore, should not be confounded with the Gilgal constructed by Joshua, (iv. 19.) which was not as yet in existence. It was probably some double circle of stones, for the nature of which, vide the PLATES: GILGAL. Judges, iii. 19.

The LXX. understand Galilee by Gilgal; but possibly this land itself might import "the Circuits;" if it did not take name from some remarkable assemblage of stones, like Stonehenge, and others, in our own country.

Gilgal was a place of importance; as, 1. It was a station of Religious: for we read, Judges, ii. 1. that "a messenger of the Lord came up from Gilgal." Comp. 2 Kings, ii. 1.—2. It was a station of justice: for Samuel in his circuit went yearly to Gilgal. 1 Sam. vii. 16.—3. It was where the coronation of Saul was performed. 1 Sam. x. 8. Comp. 2 Sam. xix. 15, 40. therefore a fit place for national business. Sacrifices were offered at Gilgal. 1 Sam. x. 8. Hos. xii. 11. Most probably these various services were performed at Gilgal near to Jericho, "in the east border of Jericho." But no late traveller, that I recollect, has examined or ascertained the place.]

GILGAI, גלגל; he that rejoices, that overturns, that passes, that reveals, or discovers; a city of Judah. Josh. xv. 51. 1 Sam. xv. 12.

[Simon thinks this imports intensively the great joy: from a root signifying to exult: Comp. Psalm xlvi. 3. Lam. ii. 15. otherwise, "the exiling migration of a great multitude." It seems to be near those cities which were occupied by the early Philistines, as Gerar, &c. and therefore might partake of their character.

It was also among the haunts of David before he was king.]

GIMZO, גִּמְזוֹ: also that; from גַּם, gam, also, and זֶה, zo, that: otherwise, this rush, this reed; from גָּמָא, gama, a rush, and זֶה, zo, or זֶה, this. A city in the south of Judah, which the Philistines took from Ahaz, 2 Chron. xxviii. 18.

[The Arabic root imports a sycamore: and the Talmud uses this word in the same acceptation.—The tree might give name to the city.]

GINATH, גִּנָּת, garden, or protection; from גָּן. Father of Tibni, 1 Kings, xvi. 21.

GINNITHO, גִּנְיָתוֹ, Γεννηθω: garden, or orchard, or his protection; from גָּן, gan, and יָאן, his. Neh. xii. 4. Comp. x. 7; xii. 16.

GIRDLE. The Hebrews generally wore no girdle in the house, nor abroad, unless when at work, or on a journey. At these times, they girt their clothes about them, as the eastern people do at this day. This appears from many passages of the Old and New Testament. Our Saviour preparing himself to wash the feet of his disciples, "girt himself about with a towel." John, xiii. 4, 5. Soldiers likewise had their belts generally girt about them: "Thou hast girded me with strength unto the battle," Psalm xviii. 30. Vide ARMOUR, Plate I. FRAGMENTS, No. CCXVIII.

Belts were often made of precious stuffs. The virtuous wife made rich girdles, and sold them to the Canaanite, i. e. the Phœnician merchants, Prov. xxxi. 24. Girdles were used both by men and women: the women's are more frequently called zonæ. We may judge of their value, by the kings of Persia giving, sometimes, cities and provinces, to their wives, for the expence of their girdles. Plato, Alcibiad. Athenæ, lib. i. &c. Our Lord in the Revelations (i. 13.) appeared to St. John with a golden girdle. The seven angels, who came out of the temple, were clothed with linen, and girt about with golden girdles. On the contrary, the prophets, and persons secluded from the world, wore girdles of skin, or leather. The prophet Elijah had one of this sort; as well as John the Baptist, 2 Kings, i. 8; Matt. iii. 4. In times of mourning, they used girdles of ropes, as marks of humiliation. Isaiah, iii. 24, threatens the daughters of Sion, who had offended by excess of ornaments, to reduce them to the wearing of sack-cloth and cord-girdles. Also, chap. xxii. 12, he menaces Jerusalem with bringing her into captivity, with cutting off her hair, the instrument of her pride, and obliging her to gird herself with sack-cloth.

The military GIRDLE, or belt, did not come over the shoulder, as among the Greeks, but was worn upon the loins; whence the expression of sword girded on the loins. Vide AR-MOUR, Plate I.) These belts were generally rich; and sometimes given as rewards to soldiers. Joab tells the soldier who had seen Absalom hanging on a tree, that "bad he smitten him to the ground, he would have given him ten shekels of silver, and a girdle," 2 Sam. xviii. 11. Jonathan, son of Saul, made David a present of his girdle, 1 Sam. xviii. 4. Job, exalting the power of God, says, "He looseth the bond of kings, and girdeth their loins with a girdle," chap. xii. 18. [where we observe two kinds of girdles, 1. the royal cincture; 2. the ordinary girdle.]

For the Priest's GIRDLE, vide PRIESTS.

The girdle was used as a purse. Our Saviour forbids his apostles to carry money in their girdles, Matt. x. 9. Haggai, i. 6, intending to show the unprofitableness of a workman's labour, says, "He putteth his wages into a girdle, with holes." Horace says, "He who has lost his girdle [the contents of his girdle, his money] is ready for any thing.

Ibit eò quo vis, qui zonam perdidit.

EPIST. lib. ii. cap. 1.

Women likewise wore girdles, which bound up their breasts. Jeremiah asks, chap. ii. 32, whether the spouse could forget this ornament? The Lord in Ezekiel, says, that he had given his spouse a girdle of the finest linen, Ezek. xvi. 10. See the PLATES OF FEMALE DRESSES IN THE EAST.

GIRGASHITES, גִּרְגָּשִׁי, Γεργασῖται; who arrive from pilgrimage. Vide GERGASENES.

[GIRGASHITES, or GERGASENES, is, from the Hebrew, understood to signify the travellers, or stragglers, or those who ruminate drawing near.

Some think Girgashita signifies clay: and that this name includes an allusion to the nature of the soil of the district. The Jerusalem writers say, that when Joshua came and proclaimed, "He that will go out hence, let him go," the Girgashites withdrew into Africa. Talm. Hieros. Shevi'ith, fol. 36. 3. This name is written Girgashi, Gen. x. 16. xv. 21. In the Greek of Judith, chap. v. 16. Gergesaios, and in Matt. viii. 28. Gergesenos. Beside the Chaldee Girgashita, the Arabic also signifies "black mud:" and this may describe the nature of the soil around the lake of Tiberias. Therefore, says Simon, it was very fit for fattening swine. This, I think, may be doubted. I would also query, whether this name may not be derived from Ger, a stranger, regesh, to meet together in a mob: "the mob, or confused assembly of strangers," which seems to describe well enough the inhabitants of the country not far from the head of the Jordan.]

GISON, or GEISON. Thus Josephus calls a little little wall, about breast-high, inclosing the temple properly so called, and the altar of burnt-sacrifices, to keep the people at a distance. In his Antiquities, lib. viii. cap. 6. he makes it three cubits high; but only one cubit, de Bello. lib. vi; Vide FRAGMENT, No. CXXL.

GISPA, גִּשְׁפָּא, Γεσπας: approach, or touching of the mouth; from גָּשָׁה gashash, to touch, and פֶּה pe, the mouth: otherwise, who approaches here; from פֶּה pe, or pah, here. Here the Nethinim dwelt. The Hebrew says, Gispa was chief of the Nethinim, Nehem. xi 21.

GITHI, a sort of grain, by the Greeks called Melanthion, by the Latins, Nigella, because it is black. In our translation fitches, or vetches, i. e. tares, Isaiah, xxviii. 25.

[This most probably, is the black seed of a plant allied in form and properties to our fennel. Mr. Parkhurst thinks it is the fennel flower, itself. The seeds were used to strew on cakes, &c. as carraways are among us.]

GITTITH. This word occurs frequently in the titles of the psalms, and is generally translated wine-presses. The conjectures of interpreters are various: some think, Gittith signifies a sort of musical instrument; others that the psalms with this title were sung after vintage; others, that hymns of this kind were invented in the city of Gath. We are rather of opinion, that such psalms were given to the class of young women, or songstresses of Gath, to be sung by them, vide Psalm viii. Gittith does not signify wine-presses, but—a woman of Gath. If wine-presses were meant, it should be gitteth.

GIZONITE, גִּזְוִיטָה, Γίζωνιτης: who shears; from גָּזַז gazaz; otherwise, that passes: from מָצוֹן mazon, passage. 1 Chr. xi. 34. A place unknown.

GLASS. Certain places in Palestine yielded sand proper for the composition of glass. Some think the Greek hialos, glass, comes from the Hebrew חֹל chol, which signifies sand. Perhaps Moses alluded to such sands, when he said of Zebulun, "They shall suck of the abundance of the seas, and of treasures hid in the sand." Deut. xxxiii. 19. In or near to the inheritance of this tribe was the little river Belus, of whose sands glass was made, as Pliny says, lib. v. cap. 10; lib. xxxvi. cap. 20. Tacitus takes notice of it (lib. v. Histor.)—Belus amnis Judaico mari illabitur: circa ejus os conlectæ arenæ, admixto nitro, in vitrum excoquantur. Vide BELUS.

GLORY of God, in Moses, denotes generally, the Divine presence: e. gr. when he appeared on mount Sinai; or, the bright cloud, which declared his presence, descended on the tabernacle of the congregation, Exod. xxiv. 9, 10, 16, 17. Moses, with Aaron, Nadab, Abihu, and seventy elders of Israel, went up Mount Sinai, and "saw the glory of the Lord." Now the glory of the Lord, was, as it were, a burning fire on the mountain; all under his feet was, as it were, the brightness of the sapphire-stone, resembling heaven itself in clearness." The glory of the Lord appeared (Exod. xvi. 7, 10.) to Israel in the cloud, also, when he gave them manna and quails. Moses having earnestly begged of God, to reveal his glory to him (Exod. xxxiii. 18, 22.) God said "Thou canst not see my face, for no man is able to support the brightness of that without dying; but I will place thee in a cleft of a rock, and when my glory shall pass before it, I will cover thee with my hand, and thou shalt see my hinder parts [train, rear, termination of glory] but my face thou shalt not see."

The ark of God is called, the glory of Israel; and the glory of God, 1 Sam. iv. 21, 22: Psalm xxvi. 8.

The Psalmist calls his instruments of music his glory: "That my glory may sing praise to thee," Psalm xxx. 12. "Awake up my glory, awake lute and harp," Psal. cviii. 3. [But perhaps the Psalmist rather means, his voice, his tongue.]

The priestly ornaments are called garments of glory, (Exod. xxviii. 2, 40): and the sacred vessels, vessels of glory: "Her vessels of glory are carried away into captivity—behold our sanctuary, even our beauty and our glory is laid waste," &c. 1 Macc. ii. 9, 12, "Solomon in all his glory, in all his lustre, in his richest ornaments, was not so beautifully white and splendid as a lily." Matt. vi. 29, Luke xii. 27.

When the prophets describe the conversion of the Gentiles, they say, the glory of the Lord shall fill all the earth; or, the whole earth shall see the glory of the Lord. St. Paul terms the happiness of believers, the glory of the sons of God, Rom. v. 2; 2 Cor. iv. &c.

When the Hebrews required an oath of any man; they said, "Give glory to God:" confess the truth, give him glory, confess that God knows the most secret thoughts, the very bottom of your heart. Josh. vii. 19; John ix. 14.

"Children's children are the glory of old men, and the glory of children are their fathers," Prov. xvii. 6. "Woman is the glory of man," 1 Cor. xi. 7. Vide FRAGMENT, No. CLXI.

When God thought fit to call his servant Moses to himself, he directed him to go up to mount Abarim. And the Lord commanded him to take Joshua, saying, "He is a man who is filled with the spirit; lay thine hands upon him, thou shalt give him thy orders in the presence of the multitude, and communicate part of thy glory to him," Numb. xxvii. 20. The question is, what was this glory? Onkelos, and some Rabbins, are of opinion that, Moses imparted to him that lustre which surrounded his countenance after his conversation with God: i. e. a part of it, Exod. xxxiv. 29. Moses, they say, shined like the sun, and Joshua like the moon. But it may be better understood of that authority whereof he stood in need, for the government committed to him. He gave him his orders, and instructions, that he might acquit himself with honour, [with DIGNITY. And part of his official dress, also: which was proper to confer a kind of glory, in the eyes of the multitude.]

GNIDUS. St. Paul, in his voyage to Italy, passed by Gnidus, a promontory of Asia Minor, over against Crete, Acts xxvii. 7. Some suppose the Isle of Gnidus to be meant, lying between the promontory of Gnidus and Crete.

GNOSTICS. This name is not in the sacred writings; but the apostles Peter and Paul, in their epistles, frequently attacked the heretics of their time, who afterwards were known by this name; or, at least, those principles which afterwards produced the Gnostic heresy.

The apostle Paul gives a description of certain ancient heretics, very much resembling them, 1 Tim. iii. 2, 3, &c. John says, in his second epistle, i. 7, "Many deceivers are entered into the world, who confess not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh." In effect, the Gnostics, or learned disciples of Simon the Magician, maintained that the Word, i. e. Christ, appeared upon earth without being incarnate, without being born of a virgin, without having a real body, or suffering truly. Vide 2 Peter, ii. 9, 10, &c. Jude, v. 10, &c.; wherein we find the character of these heretics very well set forth. Vide Iren, lib. iii. 11. Hieron. advers. Lucif. cap. 8. Clemen. Alex. Strom. lib. vii.

GO IN AND OUT (To) in the style of the Hebrews, signifies—all the actions of life: "The Lord shall preserve thy going out and thy coming in." Psal. cxxi. 8. "All the time that the Lord Jesus went in and out among us," Acts i. 21. "That he may know thy coming in and thy going out." 2 Sam. iii. 25.

To enter into the church, or congregation of the Lord, signifies—to be incorporated into the Jewish nation: to share in the interests and prerogatives [or DIGNITIES] of it, Deut. xxiii. 1, 2, &c. To go into a woman's chamber: to enter her apartment: was allowable only to her husband, Jud. xv. 1. To go in unto her: to marry her; or the use of her person, Gen. xix. 22; xxx. 3, et passim.

GOAT, an animal well known. It was a clean beast, both for food and sacrifice. They sheared off its hair in Palestine and other places, as is done at this day, in the East, and made stuffs of it, for tents. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CCVI. God commanded Moses to make part of the veils belonging to the tabernacle of goats' hair, Exod. xxv. 4; xxxv. 6, xxxvi. 14. See NAT. HIST.

SCAPE-GOAT. Vide AZAZEL.

GOATH. גִּוְתָּה; his touch, or his lowing; from נָגַח nagah, to touch, or גָּאָח gaah, to low, or bellow. [Jer. xxxi. 39. A place near Jerusalem; whence some have deduced the name Golgotha.]

GOATS. In Leviticus, xvii. 7, God commands, to bring all animals designed to be sacrificed, to the door of the tabernacle: "And they shall no more offer their sacrifice unto devils [literally, to goats] after whom they have gone a whoring." 2 Chron. xi. 15, says, "Jero-boam established priests for the high places, and for the goats and the calves he had made."

The generality of interpreters understand this as meaning devils, spectres, satyrs, idolatrous figures of goats. Herodotus says, lib. i. cap. 46, that at Mendes, in Lower Egypt, both the male and female goat were worshipped; that the god Pan had the face and thighs of a goat: not that they believed him to be of this figure, but because it had been customary to represent him thus. They paid divine honours, also, to real goats, as appears in the table of Isis. The abominations committed during the feasts of these infamous deities are well known.

GOATS. Under this name the Hebrews sometimes understood the princes of the people; "I will visit the goats," says the Lord, Zech. x. 3:—I will begin my vengeance with the princes of the people. Isaiah xiv. 9, "Hell from beneath is moved for thee, to meet thee at thy coming; it stirreth up the dead for thee, even all the great goats of the earth:" the kings, the great men [heroes?]. Jeremiah, l. 8, speaking to the princes of the Jews: "Remove out of the midst of Babylon, and be as the he-goats before the flocks." Our Saviour, in the gospel, says, that, "at the day of judgment, the goats [the wicked, the reprobate] shall be placed on the left hand, and condemned to eternal fire. Matt. xxv. 33.

GOB, גֹּב, גֹּבִי: cistern: from גִּבָּה geba: otherwise, grasshopper [locust]; from גֹּב gob: otherwise eminence, elevation; from גָּב gab.

GOB, a plain wherein two battles were fought between the Hebrews and Philistines, 2 Sam. xxi. 18, 19. In 1 Chron. xx. 4, we read Gexer instead of Gob. The LXX. in some copies, read Nob instead of Gob; in others Gath.

GOD. This name we give to that eternal, infinite, and incomprehensible Being, the Creator of all things; who preserves and governs all, by his his Almighty power and wisdom, and is the only proper object of worship. God, properly speaking can have no name: for as he is one, and not subject to those individual qualities which distinguish men, and on which the different denominations given to them are founded, he needs not any name to distinguish him from others, or to mark a difference between him and any, since there is none like him. The names, therefore, which we ascribe to him, are descriptions or epithets, which express our sense of his divine qualities, in terms necessarily ambiguous, because they are borrowed from human life or conceptions; rather than true names, which justly represent his nature.

The Hebrews call God, Jehovah, or Jao, or Jaho, which they never pronounce: but, instead of it, say, Adonai, or Elohim; lords, masters: or, El, strong: or, Shaddai, self-sufficient [the Dispenser] (by another pronunciation, the Destroyer, the Powerful One): or Elion, the Most High: or El-Sabaoth, God of Hosts: or Ja, God. In Exodus, iii. 13, 14, the angel who spoke in God's name, said to Moses, "If they ask thee, what is his name who sent thee, thou shalt say, I AM hath sent me unto you:" I am He who is; or, I shall [ever] be He who shall be. Vide JEHOVAH.

GODS, false Gods. The name of God, Elohim, is very ambiguous in Scripture. The true God is often called Elohim; as are angels, judges, princes, and sometimes idols and false gods: for example, "God created the heaven and the earth," Gen. i. 1.; Elohim, denotes, in this place, the true God. "He who sacrifices to false gods (Elohim) shall be put to death," Exod. xxii. 20. Again, "There is no god who resembles thee, or who equals thy works," Psal. lxxxvii. 8: he is speaking of false gods. The name of God is often given to angels; the three angels are thus called, who appeared to Abraham, and those who preserved Lot: he who appeared to Moses in the burning-bush; he who led Israel in the wilderness. Princes, magistrates, and great men, are called gods, in the following passages: Exod. xxi. 6. "If a slave be desirous to continue with his master, he shall be brought to the gods [Elohim: to the magistrates, the judges] who shall pierce his ear with an awl."—"If the thief be not discovered, the master of the house shall be obliged to appear before the gods:" the judges, the magistrates. Exod. xxii. 8. "If one man sin against another, the gods—Elohim shall judge them" [or reconcile them]: they shall plead their cause before the judges, &c. 1 Kings ii. 25. "Thou shalt not speak evil of the gods." Exod. xxii. 28. thou shalt not scandalize the reputation of judges; of great men, Josephus and Philo believe, that Moses designed to forbid the speaking evil of strange gods. The Psalmist says, "The Lord is seated amidst the gods, he judges among them, Psal. lxxxii. 1. "The gods of the earth are gathered together, Psal. xlvii. 9. God says to Moses, "I have made thee a god to Pharaoh," Exod. vii. 1.

Good Israelites had so great an aversion and contempt for strange gods, that they scorned even to name them: they disguised and disfigured their names by substituting some term of contempt: so, instead of Elohim, they called them עלילים elilim; nothings; gods of no value. Instead of Mephi-baal, and Meri-baal, and Jeru-baal—they said, Mephi-bosheth, and Meri-bosheth, and Jeru-bosheth. Baal signifies—master, husband; bosheth signifies a shame, or shameful. Sometimes, likewise, they called idols, ordures; Heb. גללים galilim, stercora, or dii stercorei. God forbid the Israelites from swearing by strange gods, from pronouncing their names in oaths, Ex. xxiii. 13.

Moses says, "the Israelites worshipped strange gods, whom they knew not, and whom he had not given to them," Deut. xxix. 26. gods who were not their own; gods, to whom they did not belong; which increases the ingratitude and the crime, of their rebellion. The Hebrew may be translated, strange gods, and who had given them nothing. When we compare this passage with others of Scripture, God seems to have abandoned other nations to strange gods, to the stars, to their idols, but to have reserved his own people to himself; not that he hereby excuses the idolatry of other people; but it is, without comparison, less criminal than that of the Hebrews. Compare Deut. xxix. 26, with Deut. iv. 19. xvii. 3. Acts vii. 42. Jer. xix. 13. 2 Kings xvii. 16. xxi. 3, 5. 2 Chron. xxxiii. 3, 5. Amos v. 25, 26, 27. and vide Clemens Alexandrinus, Stromat. lib. vi. and Justin's Dial. cum Tryphone, p. 274.

GOG, גג, roof; covering, from גג

GOG and MAGOG. We unite these two names, because Scripture generally joins them. Moses, Gen. x. 2. speaks of Magog, son of Japheth, but says nothing of Gog. Gog was prince of Magog, according to Ezekiel xxxviii. xxxix. But perhaps, Magog signifies the country, or people; and Gog signifies the king of that country. The generality of the ancients made Magog the father of the Scythians, or Tartars; and interpreters discover many traces of these names in the provinces of Great Tartary: as in those of Lug and Munguy; of Cangigu and Gingui; also in the cities of these provinces, as Gingui and Cugui, of Corgangui and Caigui.

Others

Others say, the Persians are descendants of Magog. Suidas and Cedrenus say, they are still called Magog in their own country. We find a people there, called Magusians: and a description of philosophers, called Magoi.

Some have imagined, that the Goths were descended from Gog and Magog; and that the wars described by Ezekiel, as undertaken by Gog against the saints, are those of the Goths, in the fifth century, against the Roman empire.

Bochart has placed Gog in the neighbourhood of Caucasus. He derives the name of this celebrated mountain from the Hebrew גִּיגִיז Gog-chasan: the fortress of Gog. He shews that Prometheus, said to be chained to Caucasus, by Jupiter, is Gog. A province in Iberia, south of Caucasus, is called the Gogarene.

The generality believe, with great reason, that Gog and Magog, in Ezekiel and the Revelations, are taken, allegorically, for princes who were enemies to the church. By Gog in Ezekiel, many understand Antiochus Epiphanes, the persecutor of the Jews; and Gog, in the Revelations, they suppose denotes Antichrist. We have endeavoured, in a Dissertation before the prophecies of Ezekiel, to demonstrate, that Gog might denote Cambyeses, king of Persia.

The Arabians call the descendants of Gog and Magog, Jaigouge and Magionge; and believe, that they inhabit the northern parts of Asia, beyond the Tartars and Slaves, or Sclavonians, by the ancients called Chalybes. It is probable, that Gog and Magog, according to the idea of the Arabians, inhabited formerly the mountains of the Hyperboreans, and that they were known to the ancients by this name. This nation is certainly very famous in antiquity, but we are not acquainted with the place of their original abode. We do not doubt, but that they were some of the Scythians, and were confounded among the Great and Little Tartars; perhaps among the Muscovites, and other northern people. [The Turks and other Mussulmans expect their empire to be destroyed by the powers denoted by these names.]

[GOIIM, the people, or the nation: meaning, a mixture of people. The same import as we have hinted on the name Girgashites, and the residence of these people in Galilee of the nations, or of the Gentiles, was not distant from what we have thought might be allotted to the Girgashites. Possibly one might be east, the other west, of the upper parts of the Jordan. Gen. xiv. 1, 9. Josh. xii. 23. Judges iv. 2. Isaiah viii. 23.]

GOI, גִּי, or Goiim. By this word the Gentiles are signified. The Jews use, when they talk with one another, to call Christians Goï, or Goiim; and Christian women Goia or Goiath, which name they give to all who are uncircumcised. Christianity they term Goiuth, or Gentilism, and they do not distinguish Christians from Gentiles and Idolaters.

GOLAN, or Goulon, גִּלְיָן, passage or revolution: from גָּלָה galah.

[The great migration, says Simon, i. e. the exile of a great multitude together. A city in Bashan, Deut. iv. 43. Josh. xx. 8. xxi. 27. 1 Chron. vi. 56. Comp. GILLO.]

[GOLD, a yellow metal, the heaviest, purest, most ductile, and shining, and on these accounts the most valuable of metals, [until the late discovery of Platina, &c.] Of all the metals, gold is most frequently found native; and is indeed very rarely found in a state of ore; i. e. divested of its metallic form by its particles being penetrated by, and intimately mixed with, sulphur, and in the few instances in which it is found thus, it never constitutes a peculiar ore, but is found intermixed among ores of other metals; and most frequently among those of silver, or those ores in which, though of some other metal, yet there is a large quantity of silver, in which the gold lies in its state of ore. Native gold, though free from the penetrating sulphurs which reduce metals to ores, is yet very seldom found pure; but has almost constantly an admixture of silver with it, and very frequently of copper. Native gold is sometimes found in masses of considerable size; many of more than a pound weight; these are met with in gold mines, and are called aurum Obrizum, Obrizium, but they are very rare; such, however, have been sometimes obtained from the German mines. Its common appearance, in its more loose state, is in form of what is called gold dust: this is native gold in smaller particles, usually indeed very small, mixed among the sand of rivers. This is found in many parts of the world, but the greatest quantity is from the coast of Guinea. By all the trials that have been made gold seems to be the most simple of all substances. It is wholly incapable of rust, and is not sonorous when struck. It requires a strong fire to melt it; is unaltered in that degree of heat which fuses tin or lead; but runs with a less vehement fire than is necessary to fuse iron, or copper. Gold occurs throughout the Scripture; and the use of that metal among the ancient Hebrews, in its native and mixed state, and for the same purposes as at present, was common. The ark of the covenant was overlaid with pure gold; the mercy seat, the vessels and utensils belonging to the tabernacle were of gold, as were those also of the house of the Lord; and the drinking vessels of king Solomon;—they made chains, bracelets, and other ornaments of gold, coins and and medals, crowns, &c. The mines whence Solomon procured the greatest part of his gold were those of Ophir. See OPHIR.

GOLGOTHA, or GOLGOLTHA, גִּלְגֹּתָא, Γολγοθᾶ, in Greek κρανίον, cranium: or Calvary, from the Latin calva, the top of the skull, or head. But Golgothā, is Syriac, גִּלְגֹּתָא, Κραβίς τοπος, and signifies—a heap of skulls; from גִּלְגֹּתָא gul, a heap, and גִּלְגֹּתָא golath, a skull, or head.

GOLGOTHA, a small hill, or rising, on a greater hill, or mount, north-west of Jerusalem; so called, either by reason of its form, which resembles a human skull; or because criminals were executed there. This mountain we generally call Calvary: from the Latin calvaria, the skull. Here Jesus Christ was crucified; and near to it he was buried in a garden belonging to Joseph of Arimathea, in a tomb dug in the rock. The emperor Adrian, when he rebuilt Jerusalem, and called it Ælia, prophaned the sacred tomb of our Saviour, filling it up and placing idols over it: but the Empress Helena directed the cleansing of our Saviour's tomb, and built over it a magnificent church, which remains at this day, [but was burnt down, though not entirely, Oct. 24, 1808.] A tradition was current in the east, that the first man Adam, or at least, his skull, was buried on Calvary, or Golgotha, where our Saviour suffered death. Hence the Syrians and Arabians call this mountain Cranion, or Acranion, because of Adam's skull. [taking the term Adam for the first of men, instead of men, generally: whereas, it should seem, that the rock really resembles in form a human skull.] The Mahometans have a book, wherein is a dialogue between Jesus Christ and Adam's skull. D'Herbelot. Bib. Orient. Article CRANION.

GOLIATH, גִּלְיָת: passage, revolution, discovery, HEAP; from גָּלַל galal, or גָּלָה galah.

I. GOLIATH, a famous giant of Gath, I Sam. xvii. 4, &c. A. M. 2942; ante A. D. 1062. Goliath presented himself before the armies of the Philistines and Hebrews, incamped between Succoth and Azekah, and defied the Hebrews. He was six cubits and a span high: about ten feet and a half, taking the cubit at twenty-one inches. His armour was suitable to his stature. At last, David coming to the camp to bring provisions to his brothers, declared that he would encounter this giant: and marching against Goliath, he slung a stone at him, which struck him with such force, in the forehead, that he fell down stunned: David running upon him, drew the giant's sword, and cut off his head.

Goliath was descended from Arapha:—i. e. the old Rephaim. An author who has examined the weight of his armour, finds, that allowing a proportionable weight to each part, it must have been two hundred and seventy-two pounds thirteen ounces.

It is believed by some, that David, on this occasion, composed the 144th Psalm: "Blessed be the Lord my strength, who teacheth my hands to war, and my fingers to fight." The LXX. notices, that it was composed on Goliath; but the titles of the Psalms are, for the most part, of little authority.

II. GOLIATH, another giant, killed by Elhanan, son of Jair, of Bethlehem, 2 Sam. xxi. 19. The Vulgate says, "Percussit Adeodatus filius Salties, polymitaris Bethlehemites, Goliath Getheum." In 1 Chron. xx. 5. we read, Elhanan, son of Jair, slew Lahmi, the brother of Goliath the Gittite. Was this giant really his brother, or of his family, or did he only resemble him in the height of his stature? and was his brother, in the sense of being his equal?

GOMER, גֹּמֶר: to finish, complete, accomplish. [The fulfilment of the parents' desires: the consummation of their wishes and vows.]

I. GOMER, son of Japheth, Gen. x. 2; was father to the people of Galatia, according to Josephus. The ancient inhabitants of that country were called Gomares, before the Galatians seized it. The Chaldee places Gomer in Africa; Bochart places him in Phrygia, because Phrygia in Greek, has the same signification (a coal) as gomer, in Hebrew and Syriac. We are of opinion, that the ancient Cimbri, or Cimmerians, sprung from Gomer.

It is probable that Gomer, or the Gomerites, his descendants, peopled likewise Germany and Gaul: the name of German is not very distant from Gomerim. Joseph. Euseb. Zonar. Isidor. Camden. The Gauls or Galatians, or Celtæ, were derived, they say, from Aschenaz, the eldest son of Noah; but Cluver pretends (Germ. Antiq. lib. i. cap. 5, 6, 7) that the ancient Celtica comprehended Illyria, Germany, Gaul, Spain, and the British Isles: all these people anciently speaking the same language. He farther supposes, that Gomer, or his family, peopled the countries in Asia, between the Paropamisus and mount Imäus, and between the confluence of the rivers Oxus and Oby; whence these people are called Gomares, by Ptolemy. lib. vi. cap. 17. and by Mela, lib. i. cap. 2.

[The country of Gomer is, in the Chaldee, named Germia (Garreja): but others write it Germania (Garmanaja).]

The later Jews by Germia understand Germany; the same as when it is written with an n, Germania: and so say the Talmudists on Gen. x. 2. "Gomer is Germanja." Joma, fol. 10. 1.

Michaelis, Spic. Geog. Hebr. denies that Germany is intended by Garameos, and points out out another country of this name, the inhabitants of which he supposes to be the same with those called Giarmacides, by D'Herbelot; these many ages before Mahomed, made incursions into Persia and Mesopotamia, and slew the Emperor Carinus.

Asselman, in Bibl. Orient, tom. iii. part 2. p. 747. treats amply on this subject, from the Syrian authorities; and agrees with Ptolemy, who, lib. vi. cap. 1. speaks of the region which adjoins Armenia, called Arrapachitis, adjacent to which lies the Susiana, Sittaceue; but the country between is possessed by the Garamæi. They call also those parts which are between Arrapachitis and Garamæan, Adiabene; that which lies between the country possessed by the Garamæans, and the Sittaceue, Apolloniatis; above which lies the people called Sambatæ, and above Adiabene, Calachene. Garamæis is close to the region of Arbela." At present this country is possessed by the Courdes.

Michaelis approves of Bochart's placing the Gomerians in Phrygia. Josephus says, "those who now by the Greeks are called Galatians, call themselves Gomaritans, from Gomar, their original leader." It is probable that this very word, under another pronunciation, is Cymr, which is the Kymr of the Welch; and in Latin would be written Cimmerii. This must be understood of a more early people than those who over-run Galatia, and to whom St. Paul wrote an epistle. Gorionides, or the false Josephus, places the Gomarites in France, and describes them as dwelling on the river Seine.

The probability is that Gomer received his possession in the regions north of the Danube; that from hence he spread abroad to the west, till Germany, France, and Britain, were peopled by him; and that his posterity still continue marked, if not distinct, in the ancient Britons now resident in Wales. The Gomerites might also make excursions east, and crossing the Black Sea, might colonize Pontus, so that the Galatians possibly were a branch of Gomer, notwithstanding their distance of time and place from the main stem. I learn, from a very intelligent Welchman, that the ancient Britons consider themselves as having emigrated from the Crimea, and by that route from the east. This track agrees with our observations already made. It would be an interesting inquiry to a Briton, did we not know that our country has been successively over-run by other nations; and that the Romans, the Saxons, and the Normans, have intermingled themselves so greatly throughout England, that no trace of the early original remains. In Wales the mountains have afforded means of preserving a purer descent; and some individuals can derive their pedigree from remote antiquity, with great appearance of probability.]

11. GOMER, daughter of Diblaim, Hosea, i. 1, 2, &c. before she became the prophet Hosea's wife, had been a kept woman; but, when she married the prophet, she forsook that way of life. Vide HOSEA: also FRAGMENT, No. XLI.

GOMORRHA, עֲמֹרָה: rebellion, people; from עַם, am, a people, and מָרָה marah, rebellious or revolting: or, the people that fear; from יִרָה, irah, to fear; from the Syriac, wool.

[As the Arabic gamara, or gamaraton, implies a well watered spot; and as we know that such was the nature of the country where Gomorrha stood, this acceptance appears to be every way preferable. Comp. Sodom.]

GOMORRHA, one of the principal cities of the Pentapolis; consumed by fire from heaven. The Hebrew reads Amora, or Homora; but the LXX. frequently express the letter Ain γ by G. It is our opinion, that Gomorrha was the most northern of the five cities. Gen. xix. 24. Comp. 2 Peter ii. 6.

GOOD: beautiful, agreeable, perfect in its kind. "God beheld all he had created, and it was good, Gen. i. 31: every creature had its proper goodness, beauty, perfection. "This man never prophesieth good to me," 2 Chron. xviii. 7; nothing agreeable.

A good eye signifies—liberality; an evil eye—a covetous, an envious person.

GOPHNA, גּוֹפְנָא, or Gophuith, the principal place of one of the ten toparchies of Judæa. Josephus generally joins this toparchy with the Acrabatene. Eusebius places Gophna fifteen miles from Jerusalem toward Sichem, or Naplouse.

GORGIAΣ, Γοργίας: terrible, diligent; from the Greek γοργός.

GORGIAΣ, an eminent captain in the troops of Antiochus Epiphanes; sent with Lysias into Judæa, by Nicanor, 1 Macc. iii. 38: A. M. 3839; A. D. 165.

GOSHEN (Vulgate Gessen) גֹּשֶׁן: approach; from גָּשַׁן gayash, or from גֹּשֶׁם goshem, rain. [the rains.]

[The thorax, or armour for the body, says Simon; as if the land of Goshen were a fighting country.]

GOSHEN. The land of Goshen, was a part of Egypt, in which Joseph placed his father and brethren, Gen. xlvii. 6. This province, lying near the Mediterranean, enjoyed rains, which were very rare in other districts, especially in Upper Egypt. Vide the MAP of the TRAVELS of the ISRAELITES.

[A city in Egypt which gave name to a district of country. Gen. xiv. 10. xvi. 28.]

This is expressly called a city by Theodotus anc and Artapanus, in the fragments preserved by Eusebius, Præp. Evan. lib. ix. Theodotus, however, writes it Kaisan, and Artapanus, writes it Kessan. La Croze derives it from Ge, Kai, or Ko, in the Coptic signifying land, and Sein, the name of Hercules among the Egyptians: in the present Coptic language denoting strength, fortitude. He also seeks Goshen in the Heracleotic Nome Pha-cusam, q. Pha-gosen (Pha being the Egyptian article) is thought by Hardt to relate to Goshen. Hასius, in his Regni David. & Solom. Descr. col. 175. doubts of this: but vide Schmidt, Geog. Bibl. p. 580, and his preface, p. 6.

In Gen. xl. 10. the LXX. read "Goshen of Arabia:" which is correct, as the country east of the Nile appears to have been called Arabia, in contradistinction from the western shore, which was referred to Libya: so Herodotus says the stones for building the pyramids were brought from Arabia. i. e. from the eastern bank of the Nile.

If Goshen might import the frontier country rather than the fighting country, as the thorax is the front of the person, then we may trace a reason why there was a Goshen in Judah, as well as in Egypt. And the situations of the places appear to agree with this supposition, for the Goshen of Judah was a frontier town in the south: not far from Gaza, Josh. x. 41. It is connected with the "south country," Josh. xi. 16, where it appears also to have been level, if not a valley, or a low country. The same may be said of the Egyptian Goshen; it was the frontier next to Syria, it was a level country, fertilized by the inundations of the Nile; and so far it was the defence and front—thorax, lorica, of Egypt.]

[2. A city of Judah, Josh. xv. 50.]

GOSPEL (Ἐβανγγέλιον, Evangeliion), signifies—good news. The book which contains the recital of our Saviour's life, miracles, death, resurrection, and doctrine, includes the best news that could be published to mankind. We acknowledge but four canonical gospels: those of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John: [and not only have these four been generally received, but they were received very early as the standards of Evangelical History, the depositories of the doctrines and actions of Jesus; they are appealed to under that character both by friends and enemies: and no writer impugning or defending Christianity, acknowledges a fifth Gospel as of equal or concurrent authority.]

But, beside these four gospels, there have been many others written, apocryphal, and without authority; some of which have been transmitted down to us, the rest are lost. We shall offer the names of so many as have been preserved.

PART XII. Edit. IV.

A LIST of the APOCRYPHAL GOSPELS.

1. The GOSPEL according to the Hebrews.
2. The GOSPEL according to the Nazarenes.
3. The GOSPEL of the twelve Apostles.
4. The GOSPEL of St. Peter.

These four Gospels are probably the same, under different titles, viz. the Gospel of St. Matthew, corrupted by the Nazarenes. [Or in its original Syriac.]

5. The GOSPEL of the Egyptians.
6. The GOSPEL of the birth of the Holy Virgin; in Latin.
7. The GOSPEL of St. James, in Greek and Latin; called also the Preparatory Gospel, or Proto-Evangelium.
8. The GOSPEL of the Infancy of Jesus, in Greek and Arabic. This is the same with
9. The GOSPEL of St. Thomas.
10. The GOSPEL of Nicodemus, in Latin.
11. The Eternal Gospel.
12. The GOSPEL of St. Andrew.
13. The GOSPEL of St. Bartholomew.
14. The GOSPEL of Apelles.
15. The GOSPEL of Basilides.
16. The GOSPEL of Cerinthus.
17. The GOSPEL of the Ebionites.
18. The GOSPEL of the Encratites. This is the same with that of Tatian, No. 30.
19. The GOSPEL of Eve.
20. The GOSPEL of the Gnostics.
21. The GOSPEL of Marcion; called also St. Paul's.
22. The GOSPEL of St. Paul: or Marcion, No. 21.
23. Mary's Interrogations, both great and small.
24. The book of Jesus Christ's birth: the same in all probability, as the Preparatory Gospel, No. 7.
25. The GOSPEL of St. John; otherwise the book of the Holy Virgin's death.
26. The GOSPEL of St. Matthias.
27. The GOSPEL of Perfection.
28. The GOSPEL of the Simonians.
29. The GOSPEL according to the Syrians.
30. The GOSPEL of Tatian: or of the Encratites, No. 18.
31. The GOSPEL of Thadæus, or St. Jude.
32. The GOSPEL of Valentine, the same as the Gospel of Truth, No. 38.
33. The GOSPEL of Life, or Gospel of the Living God.
34. The GOSPEL of St. Philip.
35. The GOSPEL of St. Barnabas.
36. The GOSPEL of St. James Major.
37. The GOSPEL of Judas Iscariot.
38. The GOSPEL of Truth; or of Valentine, No. 32.
39. The spurious GOSPELS of Leucius, Selucus, Leucianus, Hesyehius.

They who please may consult Fabricius's Codex Apocryphus Novi Testamenti, &c. concerning these spurious pieces. [Some of these may be seen by the English reader in Jones's Apocryphal Canon.]

The ancient heretics, in order to maintain their errors, or excuse them, began generally with attacking the gospels. Some rejected all the genuine gospels, and substituted spurious : others corrupted the true gospels, and suppressed whatever gave them any trouble ; or inserted what might favour their errors. The Nazarenes corrupted the original gospel of Matthew ; and the Marcionites mangled that of Luke, which was the only one they received. The Alogians, seeing their condemnation too plainly in that of St. John, admitted only the other evangelists. The Ebionites rejected Matthew ; the Cerinthians acknowledged Mark ; the Valentinians received John only.

The Mahometans believe that the Christians have suppressed several passages in the gospels which were favourable to their prophet. Notwithstanding St. Paul never wrote a gospel, he speaks of one which he calls his : " according to my gospel," Rom. ii. 16 ; xvi. 25 ; 2 Tim. ii. 8 ; whether the gospel of our Saviour which he preached ; or that of Luke, which some of the ancients ascribe to him, as if he had assisted in composing it : the former is probably the true sense.

ADDITION.

Notwithstanding the number of spurious Gospels noticed above, we have no reason to think that the list contains any of those referred to by the Evangelist Luke, who in the Preface to his Gospel, observes, that " MANY" had taken in hand to draw up histories of Christian events. St. Luke does not blame these writers ; but rather reckons himself among them by the phrase, " it has seemed good to me, also." And nothing could be more natural, than that transactions which raised so much interest among the Jewish people, especially, should excite the wishes of those at a distance from the places where they occurred, to receive that information which writing only could correctly furnish. St. Paul, pleading before king Agrippa, ascribes to that prince a knowledge of Christian events ; and asserts that, " these things were not done in a corner." What was so public and notorious, was doubtless in general circulation, as well by writing as by report : but, after the publication of the four Gospels now extant, those former documents sunk into oblivion, and were no longer distinguished.

It may, however, bear a question, whether such of those documents as were worthy of preservation have not been retained as to their essential parts, in our present Gospels? It is well known that Dr. Marsh, (now Bishop) drew up a very strong case, with intent to demonstrate that the Evangelists Matthew, Mark, and Luke, had transcribed much of their Gospels from the same document : it is more probable, that the two latter writers used several documents, of the authority of which they were well assured. Luke, indeed, asserts this, almost in so many words ; observing, that " those who were eye-witnesses and ministers of the word, delivered these things to us :"—how did they deliver them to enquirers ; or to strangers who visited Jerusalem ? The most effectual delivery was in writing ; and it was in writing Luke must have received the song of Zacharias, that of the Virgin Mary, her Genealogy, &c. It is usually supposed, that he obtained these from the Virgin, herself ; and the supposition is very rational ; but, whether from her, or from St. John, with whom she lived, or from any other Apostle—for the Apostles, chiefly should appear to be hinted at, by the terms " eye-witnesses, and ministers of the word"—is not material to their authority and authenticity.

There is, indeed, one consequence annexed to St. Luke's reception of certain documents from the Apostle Peter, that it accounts at once for any similarity between his Gospel and that of St. Mark ; who also received his documents from Peter, some years afterwards. Either Peter, or James, or John, who all remained long at Jerusalem, was competent to determine the correctness or incorrectness of the " many" attempts made to form a History of Christ ; and would scrupulously select only those which were judicious as well as accurate ; and Luke was too inquisitive a person not to exert himself to obtain all possible satisfaction and clearness.

Another consequence follows this hypothesis :—it cannot be supposed, that the leading Apostles at Jerusalem, " the pillars of the church," could be ignorant of the existence of St. Matthew's Gospel in its original form, the Syriac ; and this would, undoubtedly be one of the principal documents they distributed. Hence we see by what means the Evangelists who wrote after Matthew, might strongly agree with him ; and this, even supposing, that his Gospel, at first, was not so copious as he afterwards made it, or arranged in the same manner.

It is of no moment who translated Matthew into Greek, provided the Greek copy were patronized by Peter and John. It is very natural that Peter and John in their intercourse with inquirers, Luke, for instance, should narrate other particulars of the conduct of Jesus than what were extant in writing ; nor is it less natural that Peter, many years afterwards, when availing himself of these documents in his discourses, should add a few remarks, or vary a few phrases. This is done daily and hourly by the most correct speakers ; and while the basis of the history repeated, or of the principles enforced, remains the same, the admission of a few explanatory words, or an incidental change of expression, or varied phraseology, occasions occasions no mistake, and gives no offence. Hence, many verbal variations which critics discover in the Gospel narratives given by the different Evangelists; and hence the change of terms adopted, which in some instances seems unnecessary: not to add, that the different idioms of countries in which the Greek language was spoken, sometimes required the adoption of terms corresponding with the usage of each country, respectively.

When these things, among others, are considered, the diversities in the Gospels no longer exhibit contradictions; while the coincidences of the Gospels effectively confirm each other. The proposition, that many parts of the New Testament are of earlier date than is usually admitted, not only has nothing offensive in it, but derives great probability from a sedate consideration of circumstances. It is not credible that the strangers who flocked to Jerusalem at the great feasts, should be so wholly void of curiosity—to add no nobler motive—as to make no inquiries on a matter that interested the whole nation; and those of them who had embraced Christianity, would, doubtless, visit the places where the most remarkable events had passed; and would carry home with them every memorial they could obtain, for the conviction of others, as well as for their own satisfaction.

That an address to these strangers, comprising an Epitome of Gospel principles, was drawn up by the Apostle John, for circulation at Jerusalem, is an opinion not to be rashly condemned; and that it was, for substance, his General Epistle, may be thought probable. How far that of the Apostle James, addressed also to strangers, generally, might be written under similar circumstances, we presume not to affirm. And should it be conceded, that it was published at Jerusalem, it will still remain a question whether the writer, were James the less (the Bishop of Jerusalem) or his namesake, James the greater. But, if this early date of these Epistles could be established, the earliest date that can, with propriety, be attributed to documents assuming the character of Gospel Histories, should appear to be at least equally probable; though such narratives might then be (as Luke suggests) neither orderly nor complete.]

[GOSPEL, the word gospel is Saxon, q. God's spoll, good news, glad tidings [news from God?] There have been a variety of opinions respecting the time, and the order, of the four gospels; but, it should seem, that the plan on which each of those books is written, has hitherto not been sufficiently attended to, or ascertained.

In addition to what has been already hinted, I shall add a few thoughts on the gospel of Matthew, which may have their effect in solving some difficulties of chronology, &c.

Suppose that Matthew wrote his gospel the earliest of any—not in one continued, or orderly, narrative, but divided into twelve books, analogous, perhaps, to the twelve tribes of Israel, or to the twelve apostles, &c. These books may be divided in the following manner:

1. INTRODUCTION, containing transactions previous to the public appearance of John the Baptist, and separated from his preaching, by an interval of thirty years, chap. i. ii.

2. The appearance and ministry of John the Baptist, with his inauguration of Jesus into his office, chap. iii. iv. 22.

3. A specimen of Jesus Christ's manner of teaching, and of his doctrines, &c. collected from various discourses, chap. iv. 23. v. vi. vii.

4. Miracles performed by Jesus; in Caper-naum, principally; chap. viii. 35.—ix. 34.

5. Progress of Jesus; he commissions his disciples to perform miracles, chap. ix. 35.—x. xi. xii.

6. A collection of the parables of Jesus, delivered on various occasions, chap. xiii. xiv. xv. 28.

7. Jesus in Galilee, Casarea Philippi, &c. parts distant from Jerusalem, chap. xv. 29. xvi. xvii. xviii.

8. Jesus in Judea beyond Jordan, xix. xx.

9. Jesus at Jerusalem; his conduct there, chap. xxi. xxii. xxiii.

10. Jesus foretells the destruction of the temple, &c. chap. xxiv. 1.—xxv. 46.

11. Conspiracy against Jesus: his actions previous to his capture; chap. xxvi. 1—56.

12. Arrest, crucifixion, and resurrection of Jesus, chap. xxvi. 57. xxvii. xxviii.

If this division of Matthew be admissible, it removes at once the chronological difficulties which embarrass commentators, to reconcile Matthew with Luke; since Matthew associates similar facts into one book, while Luke proposes “an orderly history” according to the course of events: the different plans of these writers then, led them to different arrangements. This also furnishes a reason why Luke might compose for himself, and for others, an orderly history, beginning with the earliest documents, which Matthew’s, however correct, was not; that evangelist having no such design. It relieves Mark from the charge of having abstracted Matthew; and in short, it disturbs nothing in this evangelist; it merely proposes proper divisions of his work, which the present chapters have confused.

But it should, in my opinion, be understood, that St. Matthew wrote his gospel first in Syriac, and that from Syriac it was translated into Greek, some years afterwards: whether this translation were made by himself, we do not here inquire; but, if it were, as is very credible, then it gives the reason why some of the Fathers date the publication of his gospel, by Matthew, eight years after the death of Jesus, i. e. the Syriac copy; while others date the publication fifteen or even twenty years after, meaning the Greek copy: both are correct, if Matthew really published it at both these periods; but in two languages. The first, most probably, he wrote in Judea, the other he might promulgate among the Gentiles; but we have too little authentic information on the actions and conduct of the apostles, distinct from Scripture History, to offer any thing beyond conjecture on this subject.

St. MARK'S GOSPEL may be considered as a collection of facts, gathered by this evangelist from authorities adduced by St. Peter; as well from his private discourse, as from his public preachings: for this we have the testimony of antiquity. Now, it is not very likely that these facts, which might be heard, or obtained, at various times, and on various occasions, should be arranged by this evangelist precisely in chronological order; it would answer his purpose sufficiently, if they were accurately related, though but loosely connected, or, perhaps, not intentionally connected, at all, strictly speaking, in the correct historical sense; i. e. in reference to their order as a series of events.

Beside what is said of MARK'S receiving oral information from the discourses of Peter, I see no reason why he might not also, receive such written information as was extant at the time; such as, for instance, St. Matthew's gospel in Syriac, which language, no doubt, he understood: but, if he could also procure the Greek translation of it, as he himself was writing, not in Syriac, but in Greek, he would, no doubt, draw all the assistance he could from this Greek copy; this accounts for the verbal resemblance observed between some parts of Matthew, and some parts of Mark; while elsewhere Mark might adhere to such facts, as he had already collected, and to expressions which he retained, since to exchange them for others, when the histories were the same, would have answered no valuable purpose.

It remains that we consider St. LUKE'S GOSPEL as the most regular in arrangement, according to the order of facts; and we ought to reflect with the deepest gratitude on the pains taken by St. Luke to acquire such a knowledge of the series of gospel events, as that which his history presents to us. In fact, this historian in his gospel, no less than in his Acts of the Apostles, displays manifest proofs of a liberal and cultivated mind, of ardent research after truth, no doubt for his own satisfaction, in the first instance; and, I am sure, for the satisfaction of after ages.

Beside the gospel of Matthew, and perhaps other (minor), histories, whether in the Syriac language or not, obtained by St. Luke, the original papers procured by him, and forming the basis of his Introductory Chapters, (as the Hymn of Zechariah, the Salutation of Elizabeth, the Hymn of Mary, &c.) were certainly written in Syriac, and I suppose he translated them from that language into Greek; and whoever will observe the peculiar characteristics of these poems, will find his attention amply repaid. They are not only Hebrew ideas and sentiments, though clad in another language, but their construction and connection differs much from the easy Greek style of this learned and accomplished writer's original composition. This hypothesis accounts for the correspondence of some parts, and some parts only, of Luke with Matthew.

This statement is of great consequence. On the accuracy of Luke, and on his researches, depends much of our satisfaction, if not of our faith. The subject, is therefore, resumed in another part of our work; where the pains taken by this Evangelist are more fully stated.

St. JOHN'S GOSPEL is universally allowed to be supplementary to the others; it abounds more in instructive discourses than in histories.

This is easily accounted for, if we suppose John to have a knowledge of Matthew's writing, and of Luke's, from collections partly furnished by John himself; who would not desire to load the public with books, for reasons assigned by him, at the close of his own performance.

We may just glance at the opportunities enjoyed by the writers of the gospels as witnesses of what they record. St. Matthew was one of the twelve who attended on Jesus: but, were the whole twelve always with Jesus? I think not; for, 1. they are called "the twelve" when not only Judas was absent, but also Thomas, so that they were at most but ten persons. 2. It being occasionally remarked, that "the twelve were with Jesus," it should seem that at other times some of them might be absent. Now this gives a reason, why different apostles relate different facts,—that is to say, each relates what each personally beheld. The raising of Lazarus, for instance, is recorded by John, who saw that transaction; but Matthew, who omits that history, might be absent; on the other hand, Matthew inserts several facts which he saw, from which John might be absent. I mean to infer, that the evangelists relate what they beheld with their own eyes; what they had the evidences of their senses for; "that their hands had handled," and that they had the most convincing proofs of what they assert.—Comp. 1 Epist. John, i. 1]

GOVERNOR. The Romans had a custom of sending governors to their conquered provinces, and the kingdoms reduced by them into provinces.

.....

Succession of the ROMAN GOVERNORS of SYRIA:
Collected by M. BOIVIN, the elder.

- 62 i. SCAURUS, App. Syr. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiv. cap. 8, 9; Gu. 1, 5, 6.
- 62 ii. MARCUS PHILIPPUS, App. Syr.
- 59 iii. CNEIUS LENTULUS MARCELLINUS, Ib.
- 57 iv. GABINIUS, App. Syr. & Parth; Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiv. 10, 11; Cic. pro Sextio.
- 53 v. M. LICINIUS CRASSUS, Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiv. 12; App. Syr. & Parth.
- 53 vi. C. CASSIUS LONGINUS; for Crassus, in his absence, Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiv. 12.
- 52 vii. BIBULUS, Cic. lib. vi. cap. 5; App. Syr. & Parth.
- viii. SAXA, App. Syr.
- 49 ix. METELLUS SCIPIO, Joseph. Antiq. lib. 13; Cas. Bell. Civ. lib. i.; Plutar. Cic.
- 47 x. SEXT. JUL. CÆSAR, Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiv. 17. & de Bello i. 8; App. Civ. lib. iii. iv.; Dio, Hist. Bell. Alex.
- 45 xi. L. STATIUS MURCUS, or MARCUS, Strab. lib. xvi.

Judæa having been reduced into a province, by the Romans, after the banishment of Archelaus, tetrarch of that country, governors were sent thither. This officer was called sometimes præses, procurator, prætor, ἑταῖρος, ἑταῖρος, intendant, president, governor. He was subject not only to the emperor, but also to the governor of Syria, whereof Judæa made a part.

The first governor sent into Judæa, after the banishment of Archelaus, was
A. D.

- 6 i. COPONIUS, a Roman knight, from the year of Jesus Christ 9, A. D. 6. to the year of Jesus Christ, 13, A. D. 10. At the same time Publius Sulpicius Quirinius was governor of Syria, Joseph. Antiq. lib. xviii. cap. 1; de Bello. lib. ii. cap. 11.—This Quirinius is the Cyrenius of Luke ii. 2.
- 10 ii. MARCUS AMBIBUCUS, or AMBIVIVUS, succeeded Coponius about A. D. 10; he governed, probably, to A. D. 13, Jos. Antiq. lib. xviii. cap. 3.
- iii. ANNIUS RUFUS, succeeded Ambibucus, about A. D. 13, governed a year or two.

- 15 iv. VALERIUS GRATUS succeeded Rufus, or 16 and governed from A. D. 15 or 16, to A. D. 26 or 27 (eleven years). Joseph. Antiq. lib. xviii. cap. 3.
- 26 v. PONTIUS PILATE succeeded Gratus or 27 about A. D. 26 or 27, and governed to A. D. 36, which is the year 39, from the true time of Christ's birth.
- 36 vi. MARCELLUS, sent by Vitellius, governor of Syria, to govern Judæa, instead of Pilate.
- 37 The first year of the emperor Caius Caligula, Judæa returned to its former state, and was given, with the title of a kingdom, to Agrippa.
- 44 vii. After his death, Judæa was again reduced into a province:—the Emperor Claudius sent thither
- 46 viii. CUSPIUS FADUS, as governor: about two years, to A. D. 46. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xix. cap. 7; de Bello, lib. ii. 19.
- 48 ix. TIBERIUS ALEXANDER, son of Alexander, alabarch of the Alexandrian Jews, and nephew to Philo, forsook his religion; and was made governor of Judæa.
- 52 x. VENTIDIUS CUMANUS.
- 60 xi. FELIX, the emperor Claudius's freedman.
- 62 xii. PORTIUS FESTUS, sent A. D. 60, died in Judæa, A. D. 62.
- 64 or 65 xiii. ALBINUS.
- xiv. GESSIUS FLORUS, towards the end of A. D. 64, or the beginning of A. D. 65. Florus was the last governor of Judæa: his ill conduct began the war there, A. D. 66. What became of him after A. D. 66, no one can tell. The city of Jerusalem was taken and destroyed A. D. 70.

GOURD (Wild) a plant which produces leaves and branches much like garden-cucumbers, which creep on the earth, and are divided into several branches. Its fruit is of the size and figure of an orange, of a white light substance beneath the rind, and so bitter, that it has been called the gall of the earth. 2 Kings iv. 39.

GOURD of Jonah. Vide KIKAION; also FRAGMENTS, No. III. LXXVIII.

GOZAN, גּוֹזָן; fleece, or pasture; from גּוֹזָז: otherwise, who nourishes the body: from גּוֹזָה, the body, and גּוֹזָן, to nourish.

GOZAN, a river mentioned, 2 Kings, xvii. 6. It appears by 2 Kings, xix. 12, and Isa. xxxvii. 12, that Gozan was likewise the name of a province, or nation; the same, in all probability, through which the river Gozan ran. Salmeser, after he had subdued the ten tribes, carried them beyond the Euphrates, to a country bordering bordering on the river Gozan; and Sennacherib boasts, that the kings his predecessors had conquered the people of Gozan, Haran and others. Ptolemy places the Gauzanites in Mesopotamia. Pliuy says, that the province Elon-Gozine extends toward the sources of the Tigris. There is a district in Media called Gauzan, between the rivers Cyrus and Cambyases. Ptolemy places the city of Gauzania in the same country, and Benjamin of Tudela says, that Gozan is in Media, four days journey from Hemdam. The Rabbins take Gozan for the river Sabbaticus, which never flows, as they affirm, on the sabbath-day: and on this day is encompassed with fire, to prevent any one's approaching it.

[Hiller, Onomast. p. 894. Syntag. Herm. p. 172, thinks that Gozan is the same with Chosan, a region of Persia, called by Stephens Kossea. Ptolemy's city or district called Gauzania, is probably from this Gozan.]

GRACE. Gratia: this word is understood in several senses:

1. For beauty, graceful form, and agreeableness of person.

2. For favour, friendship, kindness of mind: "If I have found grace in thy sight," Gen. xviii. 3. "Noah found grace in the eyes of the Lord," Gen. vi. 8.

3. For pardon, mercy: to shew grace and mercy, to pardon any one, to restore him to our good graces. Unexpected remission of offences.

4. For benefit: "Benefits oblige all men." Likewise for reward: "If you love those only who love you, what reward can you expect from God? Luke vi. 32, 33, 34.

5. For certain gifts of God, which he bestows freely when, where, and on whom he pleases: such are the gifts of miracles, prophecy, languages, &c. 1 Cor. xii. 4. These gifts are intended rather for the advantage of others, than of the person who possesses them; though the good use he makes of them may contribute to his sanctification.

6. There are several sorts of inward graces: for the graces of the understanding may be called by this name, as well as the graces of the will. There are habitual graces, and actual graces.

St. Austin defines inward actual grace to be the inspiration of love, which prompts us to practice according to what we know, out of a religious affection and compliance. Legem volunt (Pelagiani) intelligi gratiam—non inspirationem dilectionis, ut cognita sancto amore faciamus, quæ proprie gratia est. Ad Bonif. lib. iv. cap. 5. No. 11. He says, likewise, that the grace of God is the blessing of God's sweet influence, whereby we are induced to take pleasure in that which he commands, to desire and to love it; and that if God does not prevent us with this blessing, what he commands, not only is not perfected, but is not so much as begun in us. "Benedictio dulcedinis est gratia Dei, quæ fit in nobis, ut nos delectet, et capiamus, hoc est, amemus, quod præcipit nobis; in quâ si nos non prævenit Deus, non solum non perficitur, sed nec inchoatur in nobis. Ad Bonif. lib. ii. cap. 9. No. 21.

Without the inward grace of Jesus Christ, man is not able to do the least thing that is good. He stands in need of this grace to begin, continue, and finish all the good he does, or rather, which God does in him and with him, by his grace.

The grace of Jesus Christ is free; it is not due to us: if it were due to us, it would be no more grace; it would be a debt (Rom. xi. 6.); it is in its nature an assistance so powerful and efficacious, that it surmounts the obstinacy of the most rebellious human heart, without destroying human liberty.

There is no subject on which Christian doctors have written so largely, as on the several particulars relating to the grace of God. The difficulty consists in reconciling human liberty with the operation of Divine grace: the concurrence of man with the influence and assistance of the Almighty. And who is able to set just bounds between these two things? Who can pretend to know how far the privileges of grace extend over the heart of man, and what that man's liberty is, who is prevented, enlightened, moved, and attracted by grace?

Although the books of the Old Testament express themselves very clearly with relation to the fall of man, his incapacity to good, his continual necessity of God's aid, the darkness of his understanding, and the evil propensities of his heart; although all this is observable, not only in the historical part of the Bible, but likewise in the prayers of the saints, and in the writings of the prophets; nevertheless, these truths are far from being so well unravelled in the Old Testament as in the New: nor are the Jewish doctors so well instructed in matters relating to grace, as the Fathers, and Christian divines.

The Rabbins have no distinct knowledge of original sin; some deny it, saying it is incomprehensible how a man should be born with sin; yet, at the same time, they acknowledge a natural bad propensity in man, a figmentum malum, which inclines to evil. Maimon. More Nevochim; Basnage, Hist. des Juifs, tom. i. lib. vi. cap. 13.

They believe that the Messiah will himself be perfect in sanctity, that he will convert the nations, and establish the worship of the true God in all places. Limborch, Collat. cum Judæo, p. 73. But they do not acknowledge the satisfaction faction he was to make for sin: they reckon much on their good works, repentance, and a change of life; yet in their catechism they acknowledge that no one ought to expect salvation from the goodness of his works, or the perfection of his righteousness, but that it is grace which bestows it. Catechism. Jud. ques. 14.

[GRANDFATHER, GRANDMOTHER, the progenitors of the immediate parents of the persons spoken of. In the Hebrew these are very often taken as immediate parents, and are called father or mother. It is evident that this relation divides into paternal and maternal progenitors.

Some have supposed, that when the maternal grandfather had no son to keep up his name and family, but only a daughter, either, that the husband of that daughter became his son by adoption, or that the first son of that marriage became the son of his maternal grandfather, as a customary thing. Hence they account for some men having two fathers; the first his natural father, the second his grandsire, on the mother's side. — See FRAGMENTS, No. CCCXXXIII. to CCCXXXVII.]

GRAPES (Bunch of) in Greek botrus; in Hebrew, tenab, or eshcol. There was abundance of excellent grapes in Palestine. The bunch of grapes cut in the Valley of Eshcol, and brought on a staff, between two men to the camp of Israel, at Kadesh-barnea (Numb. xiii. 24.) may give an idea how large this fruit became in that country. Travellers mention some growing there of a prodigious size. Doubidan assures us, that, in the valley of Eshcol were bunches of grapes, of ten and twelve pounds. Voyage de la Terre Sainte, cap. 21. Forster tells us, he was informed by a religious, who had lived many years in Palestine, that there were bunches of grapes, in the valley of Hebron, so large, that two men could scarcely carry one of them.

Moses, in the law, commanded, that when the Israelites gathered their grapes, what fell, or was left behind on the vine, should be for the poor, Levit. xix. 10. People who were passing, might enter another man's vineyard and eat grapes, but not carry any away, Deut. xxiv. 21, 22; xxiii. 24.

Some learned men are of opinion, that the prohibition against gleanings grapes after the vintage, may signify a second vintage after the first, Lev. xix. 10; Deut. xxiv. 21; Eccles. i. 16.

Scripture frequently describes a total destruction, by the similitude of a vine wholly stripped; not a bunch of grapes being left for those who came a gleanings, Isaiah xvii. 6; xxiv. 13.

The blood of the grape signifies—wine, Gen. xlix. 11. The vineyards of Sodom produced bitter grapes: "Their grapes are bitter as gall, their clusters are bitter;" probably because of the nitre and sulphur with which the soil was impregnated, Deut. xxxii. 32.

"The fathers have eaten sour grapes, and the children's teeth are set on edge." This proverbial way of speaking (Jer. xxxi. 29; Ezek. xviii. 2) imported, that the fathers sinned, but their children bore the punishment: in using this proverb, the Jews reproached God, who punished in them those sins, whereof they pretended they were not personally guilty: but the Lord said, he would cause this proverb to cease in Israel, and that every one should suffer the punishment of his own faults.

WILD GRAPES, the fruit of a wild bastard-vine, called in Latin, labrusca; in Greek, Ampepos agna.

. Aspic ut Antrum
Sylvestris raris sparsit labrusca racenis.
VIRGIL, Ecol. v.

"The fruit of the wild-vine is called Oenantes, or the flower of wine. These grapes never ripen, and are good only for verjuice. In Isaiah v. 2, 4, God complains of his people, whom he had planted as a choice vine, an excellent plant. He says, he expected this vine should bear good fruit, but it had brought forth only wild grapes, Heb. fruit of a bad smell and a bad taste; like the grapes of Sodom, mentioned above.

Scripture speaks of the grapes of Sorek, so called, either because they grew in the valley of Sorek, or because they had no stones, as say the Jews, Jud. xvi. 4. Vide Isaiah xix. 9. Heb. Zech. i. 8. [This species is still known.]

GRATUS (Valerius) governor of Judæa, from A. D. 15 or 16, to 26 or 27. He succeeded Annus Rufus, and was succeeded by Pontius Pilate. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xviii. cap. 3. He frequently changed the high-priests: he deposed Ananus to promote Ishmael, son of Fabi: shortly after, he deposed Ishmael, and promoted Eleazar, son of Ananus; at the year's end he transferred this dignity to Simon, son of Camith; in a year after, to Caiaphas, son-in-law of Ananus.

[GRAVE. Vide DEAD, SEPULCHRES, BURIAL, &c.]

[GRAVEN IMAGE, vide IDOL, IMAGE.]

GREAT, rich, powerful, celebrated, magnificent, illustrious, ancient. "Naaman was great before the king his master:" in high consideration with him, 2 Kings, v. 1. "I will make thee head, or father, of a great nation;" of a numerous and powerful people. "Moses was very great in the land of Egypt," Exod. xi. 3: the whole country looked on him as an extraordinary man. "The Great Sea:" the Mediterranean Sea, greater beyond comparison, than the Dead Sea and the Sea of Genesareth, which are are but lakes. Vide the PLATES: MAP of CANAAN.

GREATNESS, to exercise one's self in great matters: to speak great things with haughtiness, with insolence, with menacing. "Thy servant knew not any thing, neither little nor great:" i. e. had no knowledge at all of it, 1 Sam. xxii. 15.

The greatness of God denotes his glory, his power, his majesty, his wondrous works, &c.

GREECE. This word, in Scripture, often comprehends all the countries inhabited by the descendants of Javan, as well in Greece as in Ionia, and Asia Minor. Since Alexander the Great, the name of Greek is taken in a more uncertain and enlarged sense, because the Greeks being masters of Egypt, Syria, the countries beyond the Euphrates, &c. the Jews included Gentiles under the name of Greeks. In the Maccabees, the Gospels, and St. Paul's writings, a Greek commonly signifies—a Gentile.

In the Old Testament, Greece and Greeks are named Javan. Isaiah says, lxvi. 19, "the Lord shall send his ambassadors to Javan, who dwells in the isles afar off." Ezekiel tells us (chap. xxvii. 13, 19) that Javan, Tubal, and Meshech came to the fairs at Tyre. Daniel, xi. 2, speaking of Darius, says, "he shall stir up all against the realm of Javan." Alexander the Great is described by the name of king of Javan, Dan. viii. 21; x. 20.

[GREECE, in Hebrew, Javan. Simon thinks that Javan imports soft, tender. Isaiah, lxvi. 19. Ezek. xxvii. 19. Javan was a son of Japheth, Gen. x. 2, 4, after whom that part of Greece called Ionia was named. Ionia is interpreted from the Hebrew, deceptive, insinuating: otherwise, making sorrowful: otherwise, dirty: otherwise, the dove's country. GREECE itself is rendered robust or strong. Greece may be considered as a country partly in Asia, partly in Europe. Acts, xx.

The Apostle Paul travelled much in Greece. Vide the articles of the principal Grecian towns, ATHENS, CORINTH, EPHESUS, &c.

Greece in its largest acceptation, as denoting the countries where the Greek language prevailed, included from the Scardian mountains, N. to the Levant sea S. and from the Adriatic sea W. to Asia Minor E. Hence it is used by Daniel to denote Macedonia, as part of Greece; whereas, we read in Acts xx. 2, that St. Paul, passing through Macedonia, came to Greece: i. e. Grecia Proper. In this more restricted sense, Macedonia and the river Strymon formed the northern boundary of Greece. The name Greek seems to be derived from Graioi, or Graicoi; and these are thought to denote the people of Græcus, the father (or son) of Thessalus, who gave name to Thessaly. The Greeks are also known by the appellation of Achæi, or Achivi, from Achæus, son of Jupiter; hence the name of Achaia. They were also called Hellenes, from a son of Deucalion, the Elisha of Gen. x. 4. It is probable that these names describe distinct nations, or the inhabitants of Greece at different periods; whereas the name Iones is not only most ancient, but most general.

Scripture has but little reference to Greece, till the time of Alexander, whose conquests extended into Asia, where Greece had hitherto been of no importance. Yet that some intercourse was maintained with these countries from Jerusalem, may be inferred from the desire of Baasha to shut up all passage between Jerusalem and Joppa, which was its port, by the building of Ramah; and the anxiety of Asa to counteract his scheme. 1 Kings, xv. 2, 17. Greece was certainly intended by the prophet Daniel, under the symbol of the single-borned goat: and it is probable that when Daniel calls Greece Chittim, he spoke the language of the Hebrew nation, rather than that of the Persian court. [But, see the PLATES: MEDALS of MACEDONIA and PERSIA.]

After the establishment of the Grecian dynasties in Asia, Judea could not but be considerably affected by them, and the books of the Maccabees afford proofs of this. The Roman power superseding the Grecian establishments, yet left traces of Greek language, customs, &c. to the days of the Herods, where the Gospel History commences. By the activity of the Apostles, and especially by that of Paul, the Gospel was propagated in those countries which used the Grecian dialects; hence, we are interested in the study of this language: moreover, as Greece, like all other countries, had its peculiar manners, we are not able to estimate properly an epistle written to those who dwelt where they prevailed, without a competent acquaintance with the manners themselves, with the sentiments and the reasonings of those who practised them, and with the arguments employed in their defence, by those who adhered to them. Still less can principles directly applicable to our own conduct be drawn from Grecian instances to which we have no counterparts; from customs which, however prevalent among them, are unknown among us; or from popular sayings, admitted principles, or current notions, to which we have nothing answerable in our own country, manners or maxims.

It is nevertheless of consequence to us to know the general character of the Greeks, in order that we may more certainly understand the force of those arguments which were intended to correct objectionable particulars in their conduct; or to encourage others which were exemplary and laudable.

Greece,

Greece says Cicero, was that little district of Europe wherein flourished fame, glory, learning, and ingenious arts; and of this distinction the Greeks were so proud, as to be deluded into the boast, that they divided wisdom among themselves, and to claim it as their own, exclusively; styling other nations barbarians, or rude, and supposing that the people farthest off from them, were farthest off from learning and wisdom. Greece was, nevertheless, enslaved to idolatry, and gave no intimation of superior understanding on the subject of divine worship. "In Athens," said a merry observer, "a god is more easily found than a man;" and they rather chose, says Tatian, to have many dæmons to worship, than to have one god. The gods of Greece, says Cicero, had been men; though afterwards the heavens were filled with them; yet the same writer confesses, and no doubt many thinking persons were of the same opinion, that to make deities of dead men was extremely absurd. From the consideration of the Grecian disposition, to combine all wisdom in themselves, and to suppose themselves enlightened, while others were in darkness; to consider their own institutions as supremely excellent, united with their proneness to superstition, we may discern, with greater evidence, the propriety of the cautions addressed to some of the new converts to Christianity; of the reprimands intended for others; of the exhortations directed to all; and of those pathetic intreaties which occasionally animate the Apostolic writings. We may safely, also, conclude, that many hints are incidentally dropped, many expressions are used, and many remarks are made, which alluded to local phrases, peculiarities, and turns of thought, to local institutions, existing circumstances, and opinions: so that we do not discover the full beauty or energy of many passages for want of better acquaintance, not only with the feelings and sentiments of the writer, but also with the prejudices, the habits and the bias of mind, which influenced the original readers.

Many flourishing churches were, in early times, established among the Greeks; and there can be no doubt but that they, for a long time, preserved the Apostolic customs with considerable care; whether these were, in all cities, precisely the same in every respect, or whether they might, in some places, differ in lesser particulars from what was adopted in other towns, we have no express information; but we know that, after a time, opinions fluctuated considerably on points of doctrine; that schisms and heresies divided the church; and that rancour, violence, and even persecution followed in their train. To check these evils, various councils were called, and various creeds composed, some of which retain an authority to this day. The removal of the seat of government from Rome to Constantinople, by Constantine, gave a sensible preponderance to the Grecian districts of the empire, and the ecclesiastical determinations of the Greek church were extensively received with respect, if not with submission.

Greece continued to enjoy the presence of the emperor, till the beginning of the 15th century, when the Turks became the plague of the empire, and took Constantinople, A. D. 1453, since which event, Greece and its inhabitants, exhibit the picture of a people and a country depressed by slavery. Whether they may recover their ancient liberty, the remembrance of which is not extinct, time will shew.

The Greek church affirms, that it still preserves many institutions derived from the apostles; and this is so far credible as to deserve, at least, a considerate and impartial enquiry; but that many usages which cannot justly claim Apostolic patronage, or even Apostolic cognizance, have crept into the ritual of this church, and maintain themselves in it, admits of no doubt. Whether, if Greece were restored to liberty, instead of groaning under Mahometan bondage, its ecclesiastical concerns might be ameliorated, we cannot determine: but where the patriarchal chair is bought, where metropolitans, archbishops, and bishops, are perpetually liable to be degraded by a foreign power, very slight hopes can be entertained, that errors, if pointed out, should be corrected, or that malpractices, of whatever nature, should occasion that compunction which might lead to repentance and reformation. This church abounds in ceremonies, and is fond of titles and dignities. The patriarch of Constantinople is head of the church: other patriarchates are Jerusalem, Antioch, and Alexandria. The inferior orders of priests and ecclesiastics are very many. The priests must be married before ordination; but second marriages deprive them of their office. They have neither glebe nor tythe, but depend on certain donations and perquisites attached to their situations. The Greeks have few nunneries; but many monasteries. The recluse are obliged to follow some handicraft profession, and their rules are austere. They consider St. Basil as their founder, and adhere scrupulously to his constitutions. The fasts of this church are very severe, and are strictly observed. As to its doctrines, they are imperfectly known, as few of the clergy are learned; and those from whom most information might be expected, are usually most reserved. They deny purgatory, yet believe that Hades is the residence of departed spirits, and neither heaven nor hell. They admit a kind of transubstantiation, but different from that of the Latins. They consecrate with leavened bread; and communicate under both elements: children also, as well as adults. They do not prostrate themselves before the Sacrament; nor carry it in procession; neither have they any particular feast in honour of it. They baptize by immersing the child thrice. They give confirmation and the eucharist immediately after baptism.

The Greeks delight in pomp; the habits of their clergy when officiating, are splendid: their appellations are sonorous, and they are fond of titles. They admit no images into their churches; but they do not dislike pictures. They also embellish their sacred edifices with other ornaments, lights, &c.

Under their present political depression, the Greeks can hardly be expected to exhibit much zeal in religious matters; if ever they should be at liberty to inquire freely, and should possess a learned clergy, then, it is probable, they would also exert that good sense in which they are not deficient; and they might restore their worship and discipline to a much nearer conformity with what the Scriptures exhibit, as the exemplar for succeeding ages, by recording the practice of primitive times.

It is well known, that the Russian Ecclesiastical establishment is of the Greek church; and that the Greeks who are impatient of Mahometan bondage look with earnestness to the power and preponderancy of that extensive (and extending) Empire. So far as the principles of the Russian priesthood may be accepted as representing those of the Greeks, the doctrines of the Greek church are now better known among us, than they were at the time of the first Edition of this work: the late Archbishop of Moscow, Platon, having composed a work on the subject, which has since been translated into English by Dr. Pinkerton.]

GREEKS, יָבָנִים javanim: dirty, muddy; from יָבָן javan: otherwise, doves, pigeons: from יוֹנָה jonah, a dove: otherwise, deceivers; from יָנָח janah. In Greek, Ἑλλήνες, hellenes; strong, robust.

GREEK. The Greek tongue is the original language of almost all the books in the New Testament, except Matthew; but excepting Luke, the sacred authors have followed that style of writing which was used by the Hellenists, or Grecizing Hebrews, blending abundance of idioms and turns of speech, peculiar to the Syriac and Hebrew languages, very different from the classical spirit of the Greek writers. After Alexander the Great, Greek became the common language of almost all the East, and was generally used in commerce. As the sacred authors had principally in view the conversion of the Jews, then scattered throughout the East, it was natural for them to write to them in Greek, that being a language to which they were of necessity accustomed.

As there were generally people of all nations, and even of all religions, at the solemn festivals of the Jews, in Jerusalem, Pilate ordered the inscription on our Saviour's cross to be written in Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, because these languages were most generally known in the Roman empire, John, xix. 20: Luke xxiii. 38. [See this particular illustrated among the FRAGMENTS, with a very different view of the incident.]

Hence, at this time, which was that of the promulgation of the gospel, many Jews had two names, one Greek, the other Hebrew; others grecized their Hebrew name: of Jesus, they made Jason: of Saulus, Paulus; of Simon, or Simeon, Petros, &c.

In the books of the Maccabees, the word Greeks is commonly used for Gentiles and idolaters, 2 Macc. xi. 24.

The kingdom of the Greeks means that of Alexander the Great, and of the kings of Syria and Egypt, his successors. The year of the Greeks is the era of the Selucide. Vide ERA.

[GREEKS, were properly the inhabitants of Greece; but this is not the only acceptation of the name in N. T. It seems to import, 1. Those persons of Hebrew descent who, being settled in cities where Greek was the natural language, spoke this language rather than their parental Hebrew. They are called Greeks to distinguish them from those Jews who spoke Hebrew. 2. For such persons as were Greek settlers in the land of Israel, or in any of its towns. After the time of Alexander, these aliens were numerous in some places; as after the settlement of Roman colonies in Jewish towns, the descendants of these settlers might with great propriety have been called Latins: and they actually spoke Latin in their towns and colonies.

It is remarkable that the Hindoos call the Greeks by the name of Yavanas, which is the ancient Hebrew appellation. They also regard them with a contempt bordering on abhorrence. They are seldom described, in the Hindoo books, but as molesting other people who are better than themselves. It is difficult to account for this circumstance. The probability is, that contradictory notions on the subject of religion, or squabbles derived from some such source, or the inroads of the Greeks into Asia, might be the primary occasion of this prejudice.

It seems that we have, in Mark vii. 26. the name of Greek taken not for a native, or an inhabitant, of Greece, but, as it appears, for a descendant of a Greek family settled in Syria. We read that, "in the borders of Tyre and Sidon, don, a woman who was a Greek, a Syrophenician by nation," addressed our Lord. The Evangelist characterises her as a Syrophenician, to distinguish her from the Greeks of Europe, &c. In the parallel passage, Matth. xv. 21. she is called a woman of Canaan, and the history is said to pass in the coasts of Tyre and Sidon. I apprehend the fact was, that Jesus was by no means near the sea, but in some place a little way within the limits of Phenicia; and that this woman, who was of Grecian descent, but dwelt in Syrophenicia, came from some distance inland to solicit relief for her daughter.

Not very dissimilar is the light in which I consider the Greeks who came up to Jerusalem to worship at the feast, John xii. 20. As Galilee adjoined to the Phenicias, so it is very probable that these Greeks by descent resided not very far from Bethsaida, though under another government; and nothing hinders but that they might have had a personal knowledge of Philip, who was of that city. Certainly, I think, they were not European Greeks. We learn from Mocquet, that caravans from Damascus, or Syrophenicia, visit Jerusalem for purposes of devotion. Vide DAMASCUS. The Grecians of Acts ix. 29. appear to be the same people; yet Greeks of more distant establishment, and even very distant nations, are I suppose, intended, John vii. 35. Comp. Joel iii. 6.]

[GROVE. Vide FRAGMENT, No. CCLXXI.]

GUEL, גואל, Γωδελ: ransom, or redemption, or exaltation of God; from גאל gaal, to redeem, and גאה gaah, to lift up, to glorify, and אל el, God.

GUEL, or Gouel, son of Machi, sent to examine the Land of Promise, Numb. xiii. 15.

GUNI, גוני: my garden, he that protects me: from גן gan. Son of Napthali, head of a family, Numb. xxvi. 48.

GUR, or Gaver, גור: the young of a beast: otherwise, dwelling, assembly, or fear.

[A residence, an inn, or resting place, says Simon. I rather think this name denotes the cub, or whelp, and this conjecture is strengthened by finding the name in composition with Baal, Gur-Baal, 2 Chron. xxvi. 7. importing, no doubt, the image of the deity Baal, with an attendant whelp, or cub, (whether lion or tiger,) as a symbol. Vide BAAL-GUR.]

GUR, a narrow pass, near Jerusalem, where Ahaziah, king of Judah, was mortally wounded by Jehu, 2 Kings, ix. 27.

GUR-BAAL, גור-בעל: the young [whelp] of the idol, or of him that rules or possesses: from גור gur, the young of a beast, and בעל baal, idol, or he that governs, &c.: otherwise, the dwelling, the assembly, or the fear of the idol, or of him that rules: from the same.

GUR-BAAL. We read 2 Chron. xxvi. 7, "The Lord assisted Uzziah against the Philistines, and against the Arabians that dwelt at Gur-Baal." The LXX. "against the Arabians that dwelt above Petra." It is my opinion, that Gur-baal and Gabal, or the Gabalene, are the same: it extends into Arabia Petræa, and Idumæa, south of Palestine. [The same as Gerara; says Stephens.]

GYMNASIUM, a place of exercise; so called, because youth exercised themselves there naked. Gymnos, or gumnos, in Greek, signifies—naked. The Greeks were passionately fond of theatrical exercises, and the performers in them were nearly, or altogether naked: the exercises were wrestling, running, throwing quoits, shooting, &c. These inclinations they carried into the East, and introduced them wherever they conquered. The people whom they had subdued, desiring to imitate their masters, addicted themselves to the same diversions, and endeavoured to distinguish themselves in the same exercises. Jason having introduced these novelties at Jerusalem, and built a gymnasium, or place of exercise, many of the Jews were observed to give themselves up to these sports, and to imitate in every thing, the customs of the heathen; so that despising what was thought honourable in their own nation, they endeavoured to excel in such things only as were esteemed among the Greeks. The very priests neglecting the duties of their ministry, and the sacrifices of their temple, ran after these exercises, and were ambitious of obtaining the prizes in them. This we learn from 2 Macc. chap. iv. Herod multiplied gymnasias throughout Judæa; and being very desirous of courting the favour of the Roman Cæsars, he promoted all in his power, the introduction of Roman and Grecian institutions.

[St. Paul, in his Epistles, has many allusions to the exercises performed in these Gymnasias: he speaks of running in a race,—of wrestling,—of bruising his body as an adversary, of not dealing about his blows as one who beateth the air, and he draws various terms from those of these schools. In so far as these schools were preparatory to the games of Greece, in which the skill obtained in them was publicly exhibited, many expressions appropriate to the games may be explained from the customs of the Gymnasias: as, that no one was crowned except he strove lawfully; i. e. according to the regulations here established: and there is a remarkable instance of the strictness of the superintendants on this subject, in the case of a wrestler, who being detained by contrary winds, could not arrive in time to spend a complete forty days in preparation: he was set aside as unqualified, from this cause, cause, only. The allusions to the small rewards contended for in these schools, and the games, are illustrated by an acquaintance with their customs; a crown of parsley, of olive, or other perishable material, was all they offered; not so Christianity, which offers eternal life. The bearing of palm-branches as symbols of victory, may be referred to similar customs, which were derived from these Gymnasia, either as being there practised, or as being objects of emulation and desire, for which rivals were to strive with energy, and to suffer with cheerfulness.]

HAAHASHTARI, אֲדַשְׁתָּרִי 'Αεσθαρῆ, runner, courier: or diligence, or haste of the turtle; from חוש chush, to go quick, and תור thor, a turtle: otherwise, of the sentinel, or of the employment: according to the Syriac and Hebrew, prince of the turtle, or sentinel. Son of Ashur and Naarah. 1 Chron. iv. 6. Comp. FRAGMENTS Nos. CXXII. CCCCLXXV.

HABAZZINIAH, חַבְצִינְיָה, Χαβασση, the debt, the buckler of the Lord; from חוב chob, a debt-or, and צנה tsanah, a buckler, and יה jah, the Lord: otherwise, friendship, secret, or love of the buckler of the Lord; from חבה chabah, secret, &c. or from חבב chabal, to love. Father of Jeremiah, Jer. xxxv. 5.

HABBAKUK, חַבְבֻּק, Ἀββακὺκ, He that embraces: from חבק chabak: otherwise, wrestler, from נאבק nebac, to wrestle.

HABBAKUK, of the tribe of Simeon, native of Bethzacar, says Epiphanius and Dorotheus, de vita et morte Prophetarum. Observing that Nebuchadnezzar advanced toward Jerusalem, and foreseeing he would take it, Habbakuk escaped to Ostracin in Arabia, near the lake Sirbonis; where he lived some time. But the Chaldeans having taken Jerusalem, and retiring to Chaldaea, Habbakuk returned to Judæa; while the Jews, who escaped from being carried to Babylon, after the death of Gedaliah, fled into Egypt.

He busied himself in cultivating his fields; and it is related in the Apocrypha, that, as he was one day preparing to carry his reapers their dinner, he heard a voice, commanding him to carry that provision to Daniel at Babylon, Dan. xiv. Apoc. He excused himself, as being a stranger both to Daniel and to Babylon. But the angel of the Lord suddenly transported him by the hair of his head into that city, with his provisions; which he set before Daniel, who was shut up in the Lion's den there. The same hand carried him back again. We make no remarks on the authority of this tale. Habbakuk died and was buried in Judæa, two years before the end of the captivity, A. M. 3466, ante A. D. 538.

He is reported to be author of several prophecies, which are not among those received as canonical. The apocryphal stories of Susanna, of Bel and the Dragon, and that of his transportation to Babylon, are attributed to him. There is no foundation for all this, but an inscription, read formerly in some Greek copies, The Prophecies of Abacum, priest of Judah, of the tribe of Levi; whom many regard as a person very different from the prophet Habbakuk. Habbakuk's tomb was shewn formerly at Bethzacar, Keila, Echela, or Gabbatha. The same place is probably meant by these four names. They were near one another, and in the neighbourhood of Eleutheropolis. Sozomen speaks of the discovery of his body at Bethzacar, in the time of Theodosius the Elder.

The genuine works of Habbakuk, are contained in three chapters. He complains pathetically of the disorderly conduct of Judah. God suggests to him, that he would very shortly punish it severely by the arms of the Chaldeans. He foretells the conquests of Nebuchadnezzar, his mental infirmity, his death, and what would happen after his death to the Chaldeans. He foretells that the vast designs of Jehoiakim should be frustrated. He reproaches a prince, who built his palaces with blood and iniquity; probably

bably meaning the king of Tyre. He accuses another king with having intoxicated his friend in order to discover his nakedness; probably meaning the king of Egypt. Vide APRIES.

Habbakuk composed an ode, wherein he recollects God's being influenced by mercy, even when he is most angry; he hopes that God will show him his brethren in their captivity, but will deliver him out of it, and save him from the hands of the Chaldeans, when they ravage Judæa. He prophesied not long before the kingdom of Judah was destroyed: at the same time as Jeremiah.

HABALAH חַבָּלָה secret, or hidden of the Lord: from חָבַה chabah: otherwise, love, or affection of the Lord: from חֻבָּב chobab, affection, and יָה jah, the Lord. Nehem. vii. 63.

[HABERGEON, Exod. xxviii. 32; xxxix. 23. This is understood to be a part of armour of defence; whether a full suit of armour, or a coat of mail, or perhaps, a breast-plate, or neck-piece; it is therefore unhappily ranked in our translation with sword and dart, which are weapons of attack, Job xli. 26.]

HABITS, vestis, vestitus. Moses forbids the woman to wear that which pertaineth unto a man; neither shall a man put on a woman's garment. Designing to prevent abuses which might follow these disguises. The importance of these laws is still more apparent if we consider the manners of the East. There the women continue secluded in close apartments, to which, men, who are strangers, have no access. Every one knows what noise Clodius's behaviour made at Rome, who disguised himself like a woman, that he might steal in among the Roman ladies, who were celebrating a feast in honour of the good goddess.

Some believe, that this prohibition principally forbade the Hebrews from those superstitious ceremonies, which accompanied certain heathen festivals. In the feasts of Bacchus, men disguised themselves like women; the same in the feasts of Venus and Mars: in the first, the men put on women's clothes; in the second, the women put on men's. In the East, the men sacrificed generally to the moon dressed in women's clothes, and the women sacrificed to that deity dressed in men's clothes; because this planet was adored both as a god, and a goddess; and was affirmed to be of both sexes.

What induces us to believe, that Moses intended to forbid something more than simply a change of clothes, is his saying, that "all who do so, are an abomination to the Lord."

Others maintain, that Moses designed to prohibit from women the use of arms, and from men the employments of women; as if he had forbid martial women, such as the Amazons and Semiramis, among the soldiery, by reason of its indecency and other inconveniencies. The Hebrew text is favourable to this opinion, and it is supported by many learned interpreters. "The vessels [the instruments, the arms] of the man shall not be upon the woman; and the man shall not be dressed in woman's clothes."

To change habits, and wash one's clothes, were enjoined on the Jews, to prepare them for actions of particular purity. Jacob required his people to throw away their strange gods, change their habits, and sacrifice with him, at Bethel. Gen. xxxv. 2. Moses commands the same, Exod. xix. 10, 14.

To tear one's clothes as a token of mourning, is a custom noticed in the sacred writings. Jacob being informed that his son Joseph had been devoured by a wild beast, put on sack-cloth. He who brought the melancholy news to the high-priest Eli, at Shiloh, that the ark of the covenant was taken, appeared with his clothes rent. See MOURNING or FUNERALS.

A habit wove with woollen and linen was forbid by the law. Levit. xix. 19. The Jews still observe this prohibition: and do not sew a woollen habit with thread, or a linen garment with worsted, &c. Leo of Modena's Ceremonies of the Jews, Part. i. cap. 5.

The nuptial habit. It is common in civilized nations, on wedding-days, or days of joy, to dress in gay clothes: and, on the contrary, to wear mourning on melancholy occasions. Cicero reproaches Vatinius with having appeared in mourning at a feast given by Quintus Arius, while the other guests were dressed in white. Tul. in Vatinium.

The strange habit, mentioned Zephaniah i. 8. visitabo super omnes qui induti sunt veste peregrinâ, may denote habits worn by the Hebrews in imitation of strangers (or, in the fashions of strangers); who, not content with the stuffs and cloths, the colours and dyes of their own country, must seek others among strangers in Babylonia, Chaldæa, Egypt, Tyre, &c. Some believe the Hebrews not only imitated the worship and superstitions of idolaters, but likewise wore their habits in their sacrilegious ceremonies. Others by strange habits suppose to be meant, those which they took in pawn from the poor and unfortunate, and unjustly appropriated to themselves, contrary to the express prohibition of the law, which required that they should be returned to the poor against night. Exod. xxii. 26, 27.

The habit that trails along the ground, vestis poderis, Wisd. xviii. 24. Ecclus. xxvii. 8. Rev. i. 13. signifies literally, a habit or garment hanging down to the feet, a long trailing habit, used on days of ceremony. In Wisdom, it denotes the high-priest's sacerdotal mantle. In Ecclesiasticus, a habit of honour and distinction, allowed allowed only to persons of dignity. In the Revelations, our Saviour appeared to St John, in a long habit, girt with a golden girdle.

The ancients had a great number of habits in store by them; which might fit almost indifferently any person. The Hebrew kings had wardrobes of clothes, and frequently made presents of them: a custom still common in the East, [as may be seen in various FRAGMENTS.]

HABOR, חֲבֹר companion, associate, enchanter.

HABOR, Chabor, Chaboras, a river in Mesopotamia, which falls into the Euphrates. Part of Israel was transplanted to this river. Ezekiel dates his prophecies from the river Cheba, or Habor.

[Arab, Al-chahr; Greek, Chaboras, Habouras, Habouras. Vide Scaliger, de Emend. Temp. p. 399. Fuller, Misc. lib. ii. cap. 5. Cellarius, Geog. Ant. tom. ii. p. 716. Bochart, by Habor understands the mountain, or mountainous tract of Assyria. Hiller takes it for the river's banks, called Iberum.

Our translation takes Habor for a city situated "by the river of Gozan." The opinion of Major Rennell is to this effect. "There is found in the country anciently named Media, in the remote northern quarter towards the Caspian sea, and Ghilan, a considerable river named Ozan, or Kizil-Ozan [Red Ozan]. There is also found a city named Abhar, or Habor, situated on a branch of the Ozan, and this city has the reputation of being exceedingly ancient." Rennell's Herod. p. 395, 396.

I would observe, that the town, which Sir. W. OUSELEY writes Ebher, appears to me, from its situation among other towns which we know, as Rey, the Rages of Tobit, &c. to be the Habor, or Chabor of Scripture. The Arab geographer, Ibn Haukal, thus describes it: "The district of Rey is adjoining to Casvin. EBHER, and Rengan, and Talchan, and Kesr al Radeim, are in these territories."

He also mentions this town in another place, observing, "Ismael ben Almed ben Asad possessed so extensive an empire, that Khorazan, and Mavar-ul-nahr, and Tabaristan, and Gurkan, and Koumesh, and Rey, and Casvin, and EBHER, and Rengan, were all under his dominion. p. 121.

Again he says, "These towns, Rey, and Casvin, and ABHER, and Zengan, we have not placed in the map, as belonging to Kouhestan; we rather assign them to the province of Deilman, because it winds irregularly along Kouhestan." It appears to be spelled Abeher, p. 169. And he thus characterizes it, p. 179.

"ABHER and Zengan are two small, but pleasant and well supplied towns; of which Zengan is the larger: but its inhabitants are idle and not industrious." It is clear that the names Abher and Ebher describe the same town; as also do the names Zengan and Rengan. I think it is the Abhar of Major Rennell, and the Habor of Scripture. In my opinion the situation of it agrees with that designated by the sacred historian; and it is with propriety included among the cities of the Medes.]

HACCATAN, or ECCETAN, חֶקֶטָן 'Akātān, little, or very little; from קֶטַן katon. Father of Johanan. He brought 110 persons from Babylon. Ezra viii. 12.

HACHALIAH, חֲכִילָה, who waits for the Lord; from חָכַל chakah: otherwise, hook of the Lord; from חֹךְ chach, a hook, and יָהּ jah, the Lord. Father of Nehemiah. Neh. i. 1.

HACHILAH, חֲכִילָה, 'Ayāliā, my hope is in her; from חָכַל, to wait, to hope: otherwise, my hook in her; from חֹךְ chach: otherwise, in his palace: from the same.

[Simon thinks this name imports obscurity, and that the hill Hachilah, 1 Sam. xxiii. 19, was so called because it was shaded by the trees, &c. growing on it; so that it was proper for concealment. Such is the meaning of the Arabic root; but I rather think we have the Hebrew word itself, Gen. xlix. 12, where, being spoken of the eyes, it denotes red, sparkling, cheerful; and many interpreters take it in the sense of fierce. Hachilah in this sense would describe a hill exposed to the fierce beams of the sun; glowing, resplendent, glistening; which seems appropriate enough to a hill. So our own Shene, (i. e. Shine) near Richmond, &c.

HACHILAH was a mountain about ten miles south of Jericho, where David concealed himself from Saul, 1 Sam. xxiii. 19. In after ages Jonathan Maccabæus built here the castle of Massada. Vide MASSADA.]

HACHIMONI, חֲכִמֹנִי, 'Aqamāni, wise, or very wise; from חָכַם chacam: otherwise, hook of the account; from חֹךְ chach, a hook, and מִנִּי meni, number, account: or, expectation of a present; from חָכַם chacach, expectation, and מִנְחָה mincha, a present. Father of Jashobeam. Compare 2 Sam. xxiii. 8. with 1 Chron. xi. 11.

HADAD, הָדָד, noise, clamour, cry of mariners; otherwise, nipple, or friendship; from דָּד dod, or dud.

I. HADAD, son of Bedad, succeeded Hushan, as king of Edom, Gen. xxxvi. 35. He obtained a victory over the Midianites in Moab. The city where he reigned was named Avith, its situation is not known.

II. HADAD, king of Syria, reigned at Damascus when David attacked Hadadezer another king of Syria, 2 Sam. viii. Nicholas of Damascus, apud Joseph. Antiq. lib. vii. cap. 6, relates, that Hadad carried succours to Hadadezer, as far as the Euphrates; where David defeated them them both. Scripture tells us, 2 Sam. viii. 5. that a king of Damascus going with troops to assist Hadadezer king of Zobah, was killed by David, with 22,000 men: but it does not mention his name. Nicholas of Damascus adds, that the kings his successors, took the name of Hadad; and that one of his descendants, desirous to blot out the ignominy of this defeat, attacked Samaria, and desolated the whole country. This was Ben-Hadad.

III. HADAD, son to the king of East Edom; was carried into Egypt by his father's servants, when Joab, general of David's troops, extirpated the males of Edom. Hadad was then a child. The king of Egypt gave him a house, lands, and every necessary subsistence: and married him to the sister of Tahpenes his queen. By her he had a son named Genubath, whom queen Tahpenes educated in Pharaoh's house with the king's children. Hadad being informed that David was dead, and that Joab was killed, desired leave to return into his own country. Pharaoh wished to detain him: but at last permitted his return to Edom. Here he began to raise disturbances against Solomon; but Scripture does not mention particulars. 1 Kings xi. 17.

Josephus, Antiq. lib. viii. cap. 2. says, that Hadad did not return to Edom till long after the death of David, when Solomon's affairs began to decline, by reason of his impieties. Also, that not being able to engage the Edomites to revolt, because of the strong garrisons which Solomon had placed there; Hadad got together such people as were willing, and carried them to Razon, then in rebellion against Hadadezer, king of Syria. Razon received Hadad with joy, and assisted him in conquering part of Syria, where he reigned, and from whence he insulted Solomon's territories. Tostatus, Salian, and others, affirm, that Pharaoh made peace between Hadad and Solomon; and obtained, that Hadad should reign over Edom, on condition of paying him tribute: which Hadad did, till toward the end of Solomon's reign.

IV. HADAD, son of Baal-hanan, king of Edom; he reigned in the city Pai. After his death, Edom was governed by dukes or princes; enumerated 1 Chron. i. 51, &c.

V. HADAD. Josephus calls the kings of Syria by this name, who in Scripture are called Ben-Hadad. Nicholas of Damascus affirms, that this name became long common to them, as the name of Ptolemy was to the kings of Egypt.

[HADAD-RIMMON, shout of the pomegranate; or height of the pomegranate. Zach. xii. 11. Perhaps "the god most highest, of the pomegranate:" the duplication of the word ad-ad inclines to this sense. This deity might hold a pomegranate as his distinguishing insignia: or, the word Rimmon may be taken in its radical sense, the "great progenitor" or Aun; in which case this compound name would import "the supreme deity, the great Aun." Vide RIMMON.

Simon thinks—"the rupture of the pomegranate," i. e. a pomegranate having a breach in it. It was a place in the valley of Megiddo.

Was it rather a person, whose obsequies were here performed with great lamentations? Vide ADONIS, TAMMUZ, &c. See ADAD-RIMMON.]

HADAD, אָדָד, death, or vapour; from אָדָד ed. VI. HADAD, a god of the Syrians. Macrobius (Saturnal. lib. i. cap. 23.) assures us that this deity was the sun. Hadad signifies one or alone, [or, supreme sovereigns.] Vide ADAM, I.

HADAD, חָדָד, 'Adad, sharpened; from חָדָד chadad: or, joy; from חָדָד chadah, to rejoice.

VII. HADAD, son of Ishmael. 1 Chron. i. 30. called Hadar, Gen. xxv. 15.

HADADEZER, חָדָד עֶזֶר, some copies have Adadezer. Beauty of assistance; from חָדָד adar, beauty, and עֶזֶר ezer, assistance.

HADADEZER, king of Zobah, which country extended from south to north, from Libanus to the Orontes. David at the Euphrates defeated Hadadezer, took 700 horse and 20,000 foot; and hamstringed all the horses of Hadadezer's chariots, reserving only for an hundred chariots of war, 2 Sam. viii. 3. Hadad, king of Damascus, coming to assist Hadadezer, was defeated likewise. A. M. 2960; ante A. D. 1044.

Seven years afterward, the king of the Ammonites dying, David sent ambassadors to Hanun his son, with compliments of condolence. The young prince affronted his ambassadors, and called the neighbouring princes to his assistance, particularly Hadadezer; who not daring to declare openly against David, sent privately into Mesopotamia, and there hired troops, for the king of the Ammonites. These auxiliary forces, in all probability, came after the battle had been won by Joab.

Shobach, general of Hadadezer's troops, who commanded those of Mesopotamia, was defeated, and the kings who had helped Hadadezer, fled, and sent no more assistance to the Ammonites.

HADAN, עֲדָן, or אֲדָן ad, voluptuous, delicious, [soft, tender. Ezra ii. 15. Neh. vii. 20.]

HADAR, or HADAD, חָדָד adar, glory, beauty, splendour: otherwise, habitation; from חָדָד dar, according to the Chaldaick etymology, or from דָּר dor. Son and successor of Achbor, king of Edom, reigned in the city Pai. Gen. xxxvi. 39.

HADASHA, חֲדָשָׁה, renewing, or the first day of the month. According to the Syriac and Hebrew, a ram.

HADASHAH, or CHADASSA, a town in Judah. Josh. xv. 37. Eusebius says, it lay near Taph-נא.

nae. Jerom reads Gophna; but remarks that it was a mistake. The rabbins say, it was one of the smallest towns in Judah, having only fifty houses.

HADASSAH. See ESTHER. Esth. ii. 7.

HADID, חָדִיד, 'Adōd. See HADAD.

[Sharp, or joyful: from the Syriac, novelty: from the Syriac and Hebrew, one hand.

A city, situated, probably, on the top of a craggy hill: "Sharp-crag-town."]

HADID, or CHADID, a city of Benjamin. Ezra ii. 33. Nehem. ix. 34. In all probability the Adita or Adiada of Josephus, Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 1. and of 1 Macc. xii. 38. xiii. 3. They place it in Sephela, or in the plain of Judah. I do not know whether this city belonged originally to Benjamin. I should think rather, it was ceded to this tribe, after the return from the captivity, and that it is the Adithaim of Judah, Josh. xv. 36. Eusebius and St. Jerom speak of two cities called Aditha, or Adi; one near Gaza, the other near Diospolis, or Lydda. But this carries us too far from Benjamin.

HADLAI, חָדְלִי, my rest, my defence, or my defect; from חָדַל chadal. Father of Amasa of Ephraim. 2 Chron. xxviii. 12.

HADORAM. See ADORAM.

HADORAM, son of Joktan. Gen. x. 27.

HADRACH, חֲדָרַח, Σαδράχ, point, or joy of tenderness; from חָדַד chudad, point, and חָדָה chadah, joy, and רָכַךְ racac, to be tender: otherwise, your chamber; from חֲדָר cheder, a chamber; and the pronoun ך ec, yours: or, according to the Syriac and Hebrew, unity, and novelty of tenderness.

[The Syriac root is thought to express rotundity, or a circle; and the place is supposed to be the same as is called by Strabo Koilon pedion, "the round field." It was part of Syria between Libanus and Antilibanus. Olderman, in pec. Schediasm. de terra Chadrach, Helmst. 1712, thought it rather denoted the Trachonitis. Alphen, in a dissertation de terra Chadrach et Damasco, Utrecht, 1733, derived its name from Derce or Derceto, the Syrian goddess, the same as Atergatis. Jerom, in loc Heb. thought it was a part of the territory of Damascus. May it be compounded of Cheder, a chamber, and rik, delicate, tender? "the chamber of the tender goddess, or goddess of tenderness."]

HADRACH, or ADRA, a city mentioned by Zechariah ix. 1. who denounced dreadful threatenings and prophecies against it. Ptolemy, in Coele-Syria, notices a city called Adra, in lat. 68½, long. 32½. Hadrach could not be far from Damascus; for Zechariah calls Damascus the bulwark, defence, and confidence of Hadrach.

[HADSİ, or HOSHİ, newness, or the month: otherwise, from the Syriac and Hebrew, a single gift, or a new gift.

This is compounded in the name Tahitim-Hodshi, of our version, 2 Sam. xxiv. 6. It is thought rather to be a proper name, as we have the name Hodesh, (whence Hodeshites is easily formed,) 1 Chron. viii. 9. This woman was mother of seven sons, who became heads of families, verse 10. Comp. TAHITIM-HODSHI.]

HAGAB, חָגָב, grasshopper; from חָגַב chagab.

HAGABAH, חָגְבָה, from the same. [The name of one of the Nethinim, born in Babylon. Ezra, ii. 46. Neh. vii. 48. Hence, perhaps, the name Agabus. Acts xi. 28. xxi. 10. So Locusta, i. e. grasshopper, is a woman's name in Tacitus, Suetonius, and Juvenal.]

HAGAR, חֲגָרָה, stranger, or that fears; from חָגַר ger, or גָּרָה gur: or that ruminates; from גָּרָה gerah.

HAGAR, an Egyptian, servant to Sarah, the wife of Abraham. Sarah seeing herself old and barren, gave her servant to Abraham for a wife, that by her, as a substitute, she might have children. Gen. xvi. A. M. 2093; ante A. D. 1911.

Hagar finding herself pregnant, despised her mistress Sarah. Sarah complained to Abraham; who answered her, thy servant is in thy hands, do with her as thou pleasest.

Sarah having used her harshly, Hagar fled from the dwelling of Abraham, but an angel of the Lord finding her in the wilderness, commanded her to return to her mistress, and humble herself towards her; adding for her encouragement, a prediction of a numerous posterity. Hagar discovering that it was an angel who had spoken to her, said, "Is it possible, then, for me to live, after having seen the Lord?" She called the well therefore, where she had been accosted by him, "the well of him who liveth and seeth me." She returned to Abraham's house, submitted to Sarah, and was delivered of a son, whom she named Ishmael. Abraham was then 86 years old. A. M. 2094; ante A. D. 1910.

Fourteen years after this Sarah brought forth Isaac. Abraham was then 100 years old. Isaac being weaned, Ishmael, being now seventeen years of age, was teasing Isaac, so that Sarah urged Abraham to expel Hagar and her son. Abraham was greatly afflicted at this proposal; but the Lord said, "comply with Sarah's request, in Isaac shall thy seed be called: yet, I will make Ishmael the father of a great people, because he is sprung from thee." Abraham therefore rising early in the morning, took bread and a bottle of water, and sent away Hagar, with her son. Hagar intending to return into Egypt, lost her way, and wandered in the wilderness of Beersheba. The water in her bottle failing, she left Ishmael under one of the trees in the wilderness, and going a small distance from him, sat down saying, "I will not see him die:" then she lifted up her voice and wept.

But

But the angel of the Lord calling to Hagar, comforted her, and shewed her a well of water. She afterwards retired to the wilderness of Paran, where they settled. He became very expert at the bow; and his mother married him to an Egyptian woman.

We do not know when Hagar died. The rabbins say she was Pharaoh's daughter; but St. Chrysostom asserts, that she was one of those slaves which Pharaoh gave to Abraham, Gen. xii. 16. The Chaldee paraphrasts, and many of the Jews, believe Hagar and Keturah to be the same person. But this is not credible. Philo thinks that Hagar embraced Abraham's religion, which is very probable.

The Mussulmen and Arabians, who are descended from Ishmael the son of Hagar, speak mightily in her commendation. They call her in eminency, "Mother Hagar," and maintain that she was Abraham's lawful wife; the mother of Ishmael, his eldest son, who as such possessed Arabia, which very much exceeds, say they, both in extent and riches, the land of Canaan, which was given to his younger son Isaac.

They say also, that Hagar was born in Egypt, in or near Farma, the capital of Egypt; that she died at Mecca, and was buried in the outward inclosure of the temple there. D'Herbelot, Bibl. Orient. p. 421. Art. HAGIAR.

Hagar, according to St. Paul, may symbolize the synagogue, which produces only slaves, —[the offspring always following the condition of the mother.] Gal. iv. 24.

HAGARENES, or HAGARIMS, אַגָּרִימִּים, 'Agarimoi, Vulgate Agareti, of the family of Agar.

HAGARENS, the descendants of Ishmael: called also Ishmaelites and Saracens, or Arabians, from their country. Their name, Saracens, is not derived, as some have thought, from Sarah, Abraham's wife, but from the Hebrew Sarak, which signifies to rob or steal; because they mostly carry on the trade of thieving: [or from Sahara, the desert: Saracens, "inhabitants of the desert:" but, some think it imports south, conformably to the Arabic; hence Hagar, i. e. the southern woman; and mount Sinai is called Hagar, i. e. the southern mountain. Gal. iv. 25. Comp. Teman, Hab. iii. 3.]

The Hagarens dwelt in Arabia Felix, according to Pliny, lib. vi. cap. 28. Strabo, lib. xvii. joins them with the Nabathæans, and Chaulotæans, in Arabia Deserta. Others think their capital was Petra, and that they should be placed in Arabia Petrea. Psalm lxxxiii. 6. joins them with the Moabites; 1 Chron. v. 10. says, that the sons of Reuben, in the time of Saul, made war against the Hagarens, and conquered their country, east of the mountains of Gilead. This therefore was their true and ancient country. When Trajan came into Arabia, he besieged the capital of the Hagarens, but could not take it. Dio, lib. lxxviii. The sons of Hagar valued themselves on their wisdom. Baruch iii. 23.

HAGGAI, or AGGEUS, אֶגְיָא, 'Aggapaç, feast, solemnity, from חָגַג chagag, to dance, to turn round, to celebrate a festival.

HAGGAI, the tenth of the minor prophets, was in all probability born at Babylon, from whence he accompanied Zerubbabel. The captives immediately after their return to Judæa began with ardour to rebuild the temple, but this work was suspended fourteen years, till after the death of Cambyses. Darius son of Hystaspes, coming to the empire, Haggai was excited by God to exhort Zerubbabel prince of Judah, and the high-priest Joshua, son of Josedeck, to resume the work of the temple, which had been so long interrupted. A. M. 3483; ante A. D. 521. The remonstrances of Haggai had their effect, and in the second year of Darius, A. M. 3484, the sixteenth year after the return of the Jews from Babylon, they resumed this work, Hag. i. 14. ii. 1. The Lord commanded Haggai to tell the people, that if any one recollected the temple of Solomon, and did not think this to be so beautiful and magnificent as that structure was, he ought not to be discouraged; because God would render this new temple much more august and venerable than the former had ever been; not in embellishments of gold or silver, but by the presence of the Messiah, the desire of all nations, and by the glory which his coming would add to it.

We know nothing of Haggai's death. Epiphanius asserts, that he was buried at Jerusalem among the priests; which might induce us to believe, that he was of Aaron's family: but Haggai says nothing of himself, which favours this opinion. The Greeks observe his festival, December 16, the Latins, July 4.

HAGGERI, חֲגֵרִי, 'Aggri, Agar. 1 Chr. xi. 33.

HAGGI, חֲגִי, 'Aggiç, Haggites, from Haggai.

I. HAGGI, second son of Gad. Gen. xlii. 16.

II. HAGGI, of Gad, head of a family. Numb. xxvi. 15.

HAGGIAH, חֲגִיָּה, feast, or solemnity of the Lord; from חָגַג chagag, feast, rejoicing, and חָגַל jah, the Lord: otherwise, wheel of the Lord. Son of Shimea, a descendant of Merari, 1 Chron. vi. 30.

HAGGITH, חֲגִית, 'Aggith, rejoicing, from the same as Haggai. David's fifth wife, mother of Adonijah, 2 Sam. iii. 4.

HAGIOGRAPHIA: i. e. Holy Scriptures, which deserve respect, whether they are truly inspired, or whether they only treat of holy things, and are written after the manner of Scripture.

The Hebrews distinguish the canonical books of of the Old Testament into three classes : 1. The Law ; 2. the Prophets ; 3. the Hagiographa, or Chetubim. Hieron. Prefat. in lib. Regum.

The books of the Hagiographa are nine in number, viz. 1. Job ; 2. the Psalter, divided into five parts ; 3. Proverbs ; 4. Ecclesiastes ; 5. Solomon's Song ; 6. Daniel ; 7. the two books of Chronicles, which make but one in the Hebrew ; 8. the first and second books of Esdras, [or Ezra and Nehemiah] of which the Hebrews make but one ; 9. Ester. St. Jerom adds, that some reckon the books of the Hagiographa to be eleven, including Ruth and the Lamentations as distinct books.

[HAHIROTH, whence PI-HAHIROTH, as it is called, Exod. xiv. 2. 9. but simply Hahiroth, Numbers xxxiii. 8. the gullet, or opening : but whether of a cave, or a passage between rocks into a wider place ; or of a narrow sea into a broader, is not determined by the word itself. We have taken it for the opening of a gullet of water, at the present Suez, in the northern extremity of the Red Sea. See FRAGMENTS, No. XXXIX.]

HAI, or Ai, ὄρυ, Aya, mass, heap ; from ὄρυ hi. Aiath, Isaiah x. 28.

HAI, or Ai, a city near Bethel, west. The LXX. call it Agai ; Josephus, Aina ; others Aiath. Joshua having sent 3000 men against Ai, God permitted them to be repulsed, because of Achan's sin, who had violated the anathema respecting Jericho. Afterwards Haï, or Ai, was taken, and burnt. Josh. viii. Vide Ai.

[Jerom, in his names of Hebrew places, calls it Agai. It is written Aijah, Neh. xi. 31. This city certainly was situated on a hill. Josh. vii. 5. viii. 11. and therefore might derive its name from a heap, or pile ; but as this hill might not be straight, or the town might not stand directly across it, the derivation from crooked, curved, or oblique, is not to be despised. "Winding town." Gen. xii. 8. Josh. vii. 2. Ezr. ii. 28. Jer. xlix. 3. If the word Ai had meant heaps simply, one should have expected some play on it, Josh. viii. 28. where we read that "Joshua made Ai a heap for ever !" but the word there is tal.]

[HAIL ! as a salutation, imports a wish for the welfare of the person addressed. It is now seldom or never, used among us, in well-intentioned compliments, though sometimes jocosely, as "Hail fellow, well met !" but was customary among our Saxon ancestors, and imported as much as, "joy to you ;" &c. as a compliment of congratulation ; or rather "health to you," so that it answered to the salve of the Latins ; including in the term health, all kinds of prosperity.]

[HAIL, stones of, are no doubt, congealed—frozen—drops of rain ; rain formed into ice by the power of cold in the upper regions of the atmosphere. It probably falls from clouds which float pretty high in the air, and the drops coalescing in their fall, are formed into masses smaller, or larger, as circumstances combine them. Hail, among us, is most frequent in summer ; probably, because the upper regions of the air are then coldest, and the vapours drawn from the earth, being then warmest, when they are cooling or chilled, they proceed to the state of congelation with greater rapidity than vapours which have not been warmed ; moreover, their warmth elevates them higher in the atmosphere, as they are thereby raised with proportionably greater force, and this impulse mounts them into regions where cold has greater activity than in lower regions.

Hail, was among the plagues of Egypt, Ex. ix. 24, and, that hail, though uncommon, is not absolutely unknown in Egypt, we have the testimony of Volney, who mentions a hail storm, which he saw crossing over from Mount Sinai into that country, some of whose frozen stones he gathered ; and so, says he, I drank iced water in Egypt. See FRAGMENTS, No. CCCX.

Hail was the mean made use of by God, for defeating an army of the kings of Canaan, Josh. x. 11. God's judgments are likened to a hail-storm, Isaiah xxviii. 2 ; but the most tremendous hail mentioned in Scripture, or in any writer, is that alluded to Rev. xvi. 21. "every stone about the weight of a talent"—how prodigious is this description ! in comparison with which all accounts of hail-stones, and hail-storms, are diminutive. We have in the Philosophical Transactions, mention of hail as large as pullets' eggs : but what is this to the weight of a talent !]

HAIN, EN, EIN, OIN, fountain, &c. See EN.

HAIR. The law enjoined nothing particular respecting the mode of wearing the hair. The priests had their hair cut every fortnight, while in waiting at the temple ; they used only scissars to cut it. They were forbidden to cut their hair in honour of the dead, i. e. of Adonis ; though on other occasions of mourning, they cut it without scruple.

Ye shall not round the corners of your heads ; in imitation of the Arabians, Ammonites, Moabites, and Edonites ; of the people of Dedan, Tema, and Buz ; who did this, as it is said, in imitation of Bacchus. Vide FRAGMENT, No. XCIII.

The LXX. translate Ye shall not make sisoc of the hair of your head ; the Hebrew word sisoc, imports a lock of hair offered to Saturn. Lucian is an evidence, that the Syrians likewise offered their hair to their gods.

[This appears from many other writers.

The

The heathen consecrated their hair to gods, or to rivers, says Pollux, expressly; and Petronius asks, cui Deo crinem vovisti? to what god have you vowed your hair? In Athens, Hercules and Apollo were the chief deities selected for this rite; the first by the lower classes, the latter by the more respectable. The custom should appear to be ancient, as it is alluded to by the Scholiast on Pindar, by Plutarch in Theæus, and by Homer, Iliad xxiii. Achilles says, he and Patroclus had vowed their hair to the river-god, Sperchius, to be cut off at their safe return to their native land; but now, he with the other Greeks, cut off this ornament as a token of sorrow for the death of his friend; and,

On his cold hand the sacred lock he laid.

But, perhaps, the most extraordinary rite was the dedication of the hair of infants, (which was practised even before they well had any hair) from their birth; and it was cut off at the same time as they were named. This we learn from Tertullian, De Anima, xx; and to this Lucian also refers. On occasion of marriage, too, the maidens devoted their hair to Juno, or to Diana; the youths did the same, says Lucian, de Dea Syria. Nor was the custom unknown elsewhere, for thus sings a poet:

*Accipe laudatos juvenum, Phæbé crines,
Quos tibi Cæsaræus donat puer, accipe lætus.]*

We know that it was usual with the Heathen to make vows, that they would suffer their hair (or their beards) to grow, till they had accomplished certain things, overcome their enemies, &c.

*Occumbit Sarmens, flavam qui ponere victor
Cassariem, crinemque tibi, Gradive, vovebat.*

SILIUS ITAL. lib. iv. DE BELLO PUNICO.

The Germans had the same custom, Crinem barbamque summittere, nec nisi hoste cæso exuere, votivum obligatumque virtuti oris habitum. Tacit. de Morib. Germ. Civilis having taken arms against the Romans, vowed never to cut his hair, which was of a red colour, and which out of mere artifice he wore long, after the manner of the Germans, till he had defeated the legions. Civilis barbaro voto, post capta adversus Romanos arma propexum, rutilatumque crinem patrat à demum cæde legionum deposuit. Tacitus. Hist. lib. iv. This has some relation to the law of the Nazarites, Numb. vi. 5, 9: "All the days of the vow of his separation there shall no razor come upon his head; and if any man die very suddenly by him, and he hath defiled the head of his consecration, then he shall shave his head, and recommence his vow: he shall be polluted by the presence of a dead body, and shall begin again the whole of his Nazariteship." See NAZARENES.

When a man was suspected of having a leprosy, inspection was carefully made, whether the colour of his hair were changed, or if his hair fell, this being one indication of that disease; and when he was healed, he washed his body and his clothes, cut off his beard, the hair of his head, and of his whole body, and presented his offering at the door of the tabernacle, Levit. xiii. 4, 10, 31, 32, &c. But he did not enter into the camp till eight days after, again cutting away all the hair, off his body, in demonstration of his desire not to leave any place where the least pollution might remain undiscovered, and uncleansed, Levit. xiv. 8, 9.

The Levites on the day of their consecration to God's service, shaved their whole bodies.

Black Hair was thought to be the most beautiful; His locks are bushy, and black as a raven. Cant. v. 11. This likewise was the taste of the Romans: at least, it was so in the days of Horace, Spectandum nigris oculis, nigroque capillo.

HORAT. DE ARTE. POET.

GOATS'-HAIR; of goats'-hair Moses made the curtains of the tabernacle, Exod. xxv. 4, &c. Both ancient and modern writers describe the goats of Asia, Phrygia, and Cilicia, whose hair, which is very long, is cut off, in order to make stuffs with it. Bellon says, Observat. cap. 2. 121. that the hair of these goats is white; Busbequius assures us, that it is very bright and fine, and hangs to the ground; that in beauty it almost equals silk, and is never sheared, but combed off. The shepherds carefully wash these goats frequently in rivers. The women of the country spin this hair, and it is carried to Angora, where it is worked, and finely dyed. It is at this day a great trade at Angora and Aleppo. See Aristotle, Hist. Animal. lib. viii. cap. 18, 22. Pliny, lib. viii. cap. 50. Varro, de Re Rusticâ, lib. ii. and Virgil's Georgics.

CAMELS'-HAIR. John Baptist was clothed in a garment made of camel's hair, not with a camel's skin, as painters and sculptors represent him, but with coarse camelot made of camels hair. The coat of the camel in some places yields very fine silk, whereof are made stuffs of very great price; but in general this animal's hair is hard, and scarcely fit for any but coarse habits, and a kind of hair-cloth: as is remarked by the author of the imperfect work on Matthew, printed among Chrysostom's works. Elian relates, that there are camels near the Caspian sea, with a wool, equal in fineness, to that of Miletus; that the priests and richest people of the country wear stuffs made of it. Hist. Animal. lib. xvii. cap. 34. Some are of opinion, that camelot derives its name from the camel, being originally composed of the wool and hair of camels; but at present there is no camel's camel's hair in the composition of it, as it is commonly woven and sold among us.

HAKKOS, חֶקֶץ, thorn, or summer; from קָץ kutz, trouble, watching; otherwise, end, or extremity; from קָץ kets, or ketsa. [Kos and Koz, Eng. Tr. Ezr. ii. 61. Neh. iii. 4. 21.]

HAKUPHA, חֻקָּה, ἡκέφα, the command, or decree of the mouth; from קָח chok, statute, decree, and פֶּה pe, mouth. A Nethinim Ezr. ii. 51.

HALAIL, חֵלֵי, ἑλαα, infirmity, or pain of the jaw; from חָלָה chalah, infirmity; otherwise, principle of humility and tenderness; from חֵלֵי thechilah, the beginning. This word is not Hebrew. A river of Media, or of Colchis.

HALAH, a country beyond the Euphrates, whither the kings of Assyria transplanted the ten tribes. We do not know its situation. It is mentioned 2 Kings xvii. 6, and placed with Habor: which makes us think, it was not far from the river Chebal.

[Hyde, in Peritsolis, Itin. Mundi, p. 149, supposes it is Holwan. Bochart, in Phaleg, lib. iv. cap. 22, thinks it to be the metropolis of the Calachene, admitting a permutation of the first letter. Others discover a resemblance with Colchis, and the Colchide.

I find a place named Kellar, in Sir W. OUSELEY's translation of Ibn Haukul, p. 175, but no further notice of it. It is in the province adjoining the Caspian Sea, south. There is a village called Heileh, between Samarcand and Balk, p. 276. The first of these has considerable probability on its behalf, as the Halah (Chalach) of S. S.]

HALIUL, חֵלֵל, trouble; from חָלָה chalah, or חָלַי chil: otherwise, beginning of sorrow, or of impurity; from חֵלֵי thechilah, principle, beginning, and חָלָה chalah, trouble, and from חָלַל chalah, impure, profane: otherwise, the pain of child-birth; from חָלַי chul, to bring forth, or expectation of pain; from חָלַל cholel, to wait with pain and impatience. [Shivering, or trembling long continued; either from fear of enemies, or from frequency of earthquakes, which idea is annexed to the root, 1 Chron. xvi. 30. Psalm xcvi. 10, where we read of the earth's being moved; and to the trembling of the mountains, Hab. iii. 10. Comp. Esth. iv. 4. "Trembling Town." A city of Judah. Josh. xv. 58. The country around mount Vesuvius, &c. in Italy, might very well be quoted as a land of trembling. But if a place were named from a sect, as among ourselves, "Quaker's Town," the derivation would be very different, though the sense of the term appears the same. Might any class of men be so named anciently?—and whether from their rites of worship? I would, nevertheless, prefer the idea that sand which is easily moved, easily trembles, as we say shifting sand, drift sand, quick sand, was the cause of this name being given to this town; which appears to have been in the south of Judah, and therefore near the desert, on the edge of its sands.]

HALHUL, a city of Judah, Josh. xv. 58. St. Jerom, in Alul, says, there was a little place called Alula near Hebron.

HALI, חֵלֵי, infirmity; otherwise, prayer, from חָלָה chalah: otherwise, bracelet; from חֵלֵי cheliah.

HALI, CALI, or CHALI, a city of Phœnicia, in Asher, Josh. xix. 25.

HALICARNASSUS, Ἀλικαρνασσός, head of the sea, that is, a passage of the sea; from two Greek words, ἄλς, the sea, and καρῆα, the head. A City. 1 Macc. xv. 25.

HALIETUS, חֵלֵי, Ἀλιέτος. The Hebrew hazninah may denote the Black Eagle. Vide EAGLE.

[HALLOW, to. Vide SAINT, SANCTIFICATION. To hallow, is to render sacred, to set apart, to consecrate. The English word is from the Saxon, and is properly to holify, to make holy; hence hallowed persons, things, places, rites, &c. hence the name, power, dignity of God, is hallowed, i. e. revered as holy:—so All-Hallows is the same as All-Saints.]

HALOHESH, חֵלֵי, enchanter; from חָלַי lachash: otherwise, one that keeps silence, from חָשָׁה chashah. Father of Shallum, Nehem. iii. 12. Another of this name, Nehem. x. 24.

[HALT, to go lame on the feet, or legs. Many persons who were halt, were cured by our Lord. To halt between two opinions, 1 Kings xviii. 21, should perhaps be, to stagger from one to the other, repeatedly; but some say, it is an allusion to birds, who hop from spray to spray, forwards and backwards:—as the contrary influence of supposed convictions vibrated the mind in alternate affirmation and doubtfulness.]

HAM, חָם, HEM, or HAM, the country of the Zuzim, Gen. xiv. 5. The Vulgate translates, Chedorlaomer overcame the Rephaim, and the Zuzim with them; but the Hebrew reads, the Zuzim in Hem, or in Ham. The situation of this land of Ham, we cannot tell.

HAM, or CHAM, חָם, brown. The land of Ham is Egypt. [Swart, black, deep black. Niger, as Acts xiii. 1. so Melas, Fuscus, Fuscianus, &c.]

HAM, son of Noah, brother to Shem and Japheth, is believed to have been Noah's youngest son. One day, when Noah had drunk wine, Ham perceived his venerable ancestor lying in his tent, exposed indecently, at which he ridiculed.—Noah, when he awoke, said, Cursed be Canaan; a servant of servants shall he be to his brethren. From these words it is conjectured that Canaan gave his father Ham intelligence intelligence of Noah's nakedness. Vide CANAAN. Vide FRAGMENT, No. XIX.

Ham was father of Cush, Misraim, Phut, and Canaan. It is believed he had Africa for his inheritance; and that he peopled it. He dwelt in Egypt. Africa is called the land of Ham, in several places of the Psalms. In Plutarch, De Iside et Osiride, Egypt is called Chemia. There are traces of the name of Ham or Cham in Psochemmis, Psitta-chemmis, which are districts of Egypt. It is believed, that Hammon, adored in Egypt and Lybia, was Ham, the son of Noah. Vide AMMON-No.

M. Bagnage is rather of opinion, that neither Ham nor Misraim ever were in Egypt, personally, but that their posterity settled in this country, and called it by the name of their ancestors. And as to Ham's being worshipped as a god, and called Jupiter Ammon, he thinks this mistake has arisen from the similitude of names: and that Jupiter Ammon was the sun, to which divine honours were paid from the remotest times, in Egypt. Histoire des Juifs, tom. iii. cap. 18.

The author of Tharik-Tabari says, that Noah having cursed Ham and Canaan, the effect was, that not only their posterity became subject to their brethren, and was born, as we may say, in slavery, but likewise that the colour of their skin suddenly became black; for they maintain, that all the blacks descend from Ham and Canaan. Bibl. Orient. p. 425.

[But he had better have referred this colour to the effects of their sultry climate, or to the minerals, exhalations, &c. of their country.]

Many have been of opinion, that the posterity of Ham were at least the principal undertakers in building the tower of Babel; that they first suggested the design, and formed the presumptuous project: but it is not just to charge it without proofs on the race of Ham alone.

An Arabian author assures us, that Ham was the first who spread idolatry, who invented horoscopes, magic, and divers superstitious, wherefore he was called Zoroastres, or Adris the prophet; i. e. the image of a star, or a fire at all times giving light. See ZOROASTER.

HAMAN, חַמָּן, noise, tumult; from חָמַד hamah: otherwise, he that prepares; from מָנַח manah. This name is not Hebrew, and its etymology is not to be expected in that language.

HAMAN, son of Hammedatha the Analekite, of the race of Agag; or, according to other copies, son of Hamadath the Bugæan or Gogæan, i. e. of the race of Gog: or it may be read, Haman the son of Hamadath, which Haman was Bagua or Bagoas, eunuch, i. e. officer to the king of Persia,

We have no proof of Haman's being an Analekite, but Esther, iii. 1. reads of the race of Agag. In the apocryphal Greek, chap. ix.

24. and the Latin, chap. xvi. 6. he is called a Macedonian, Animo et gente Macedo. King Ahasuerus having taken him into favour, promoted him above all the princes of his court, who bent the knee to him, [probably prostrated themselves wholly before him, as to a deity] when he entered the palace: this Mordecai the Jew declined, for which slight, Haman plotted the extirpation of the whole Jewish nation; which was providentially prevented. See the history at large in the book of Esther. Vide FRAGMENT, No. CXL.

He was hanged on a gibbet fifty cubits high, which he had prepared for Mordecai; his house was given to queen Esther, and his employments to Mordecai. His ten sons were likewise executed. A. M. 3496; ante A. D. 508. See ESTHER and MORDECAI.

HAMATH, חֲמַת, anger, heat; from חָמַד cham: otherwise, wall; from חָמַח chomah.

HAMATH, a celebrated city of Syria, which we take to be Emesa on the Orontes. The entering in of Hamath, is a narrow pass leading from Canaan to Syria, through the valley between Libanus and Antilibanus. This entrance is placed as the northern boundary of Canaan, Judg. iii. 3. 1 Kings viii. 65. 2 Kings xiv. 25. 2 Chron. vii. 8. Josephus and St. Jerom believed Hamath to be Epiphania. But Theodoret, and many other good geographers, maintain it to be Emesa.

Theodoret also declares, that Aquila translated Hamath, Epiphania: but he believes, that there were two cities of this name, one surnamed the Great, Amos vi. 2. which is Emesa; the other called simply Hamath, which, says he, is Epiphania. Jerom and Cyril of Alexandria, believe on the contrary, that Hamath the Great is Antioch, and that Hamath simply is Epiphania. But I cannot tell whether it appears from Scripture, that there were two Hamaths in Syria. Joshua, xix. 35. assigns the city of Hamath to Naphtali. Toi, king of Hamath, cultivated a good understanding with David, 2 Sam. viii. 9. This city was taken by the kings of Judah, and retaken from the Syrians by Jeroboam the second, 2 Kings xiv. 28. The kings of Assyria took Hamath, on the declension of the kingdom of Israel, and transplanted the inhabitants into Samaria. 2 Kings xvii. 24. xviii. 34, &c.

HAMATHITES, חֲמַתִּי, Ἀμαθί, vessel, bottle; from חָמַח chemeth: otherwise, wall; from חָמַח chomah: [rather] heat, or anger; from חָמַח chamam. [The Arabic root imports well defended, inaccessible. 1 Macc. xii. 25.]

HAMATHITES, descendants of Hamath, a son of Canaan. In our opinion, they dwelt in Emath, or Hamath, or Emesa, in Syria, on the river Orontes. Vide HAMATH above.

HAMMEDATHA,

HAMMEDATHA, הַמְדָּתָה, he that troubles the law; from חָמַד hum, to trouble, and דָּת dath, the law: otherwise, measure, from מָדַד madad. This is a Persian name, whose etymology cannot easily be had from the Hebrew. Father of Haman, of the race of Amalek. Esth. iii. 1.

HAMMON, חָמוֹן, his anger, his heat, his sun. [Most probably the hot-bath, or spring of warm waters, referred to Aun, the origin of generation: and this the rather, because it is also feminine Hamath. (See HAMMATH-DOR.) "The hot-bath, sacred to Aun."]

HAMMON, or CHAMON, a city of Asher, Josh. xix. 28. The same with the city of this name, said to belong to Naphtali. 1 Chron. vi. 76.

HAMMON, Jupiter Ammon. Vide AMMON, HAM; also FRAGMENTS, No. CVII.

HAMMON GOG, הַמֹּן גֹּג, the valley of the multitude of Gog; but if gog signifies covering, is it not the covering of Ham-aun? Vide AMMON-NO.]

HAMMOTH-DOR, חַמְתִּידָר, Ἀμαθωρ, anger, or heat of generation; from חָם cham, heat, and דֹּר dor, age, generation.

[Otherwise, a ball, or sphere; or habitation. The root of hamath seems to denote heat; and this may refer to hot baths, which were not uncommon in Syria. "The hot-baths of Dor, or near to Dor." Some think they were the same as the hot-baths of Tiberias. They were in the tribe of Naphtali, Josh. xix. 35. xxi. 32. and appear to be the same as Hammon. 1 Chron. vi. 76. But I think this may be doubted, because Hammon there appears to be a considerable town, "with her suburbs;" which hardly agrees with a place which was distinguished by its relation to Dor. Comp. Pliny, lib. v. cap. 15. Joseph. Vit. 16. Ant. lib. xviii. cap. 3. Lightfoot, Cent. Chor. 74. Schultens's Indic. ad Vit. Salad. voce Tiberias. As to baths giving name to a place, it is a common thing; so we have Bath in Somersetshire, &c.]

HAMMOTH-DOR, a city of the Levites, in Naphtali, ceded to the family of Gershom, Josh. xix. 32. The same perhaps as Hamath, or Chamath, belonging to this tribe, Josh. xix. 3. which is believed to be Tiberias. See HAMATH.

HAMONAH, חַמְנָה, Πολύανδριον, a multitude, tumult, or that reckons; from חָמַן hamon, truth, according to the Syriac.

HAMONAH, a city, where Ezekiel, xxxix, 16. foretold would be the burial of Gog and his people. We do not know any town of this name in Palestine. Hamonah signifies multitude; and the prophet intended to shew, that the slaughter of Gog's people would be so great, that the place of their burial might be called Multitude.

HAMOR, חָמֹר, an ass, or clay, or wine; all from the same word, under different readings.

HAMOR, prince of Shechem; father of young Shechem, who ravished Dinah, the daughter of Jacob. Gen. xxxiv. See DINAH and SHECHEM.

Jacob returning from Mesopotamia, set up his tents at Shechem, and bought of Hamor, for the price of an hundred kesitahs, (98l. 10s.) that part of the field where he had pitched his tents.

HAMUEL, חֲמוּאֵל, heat, or anger of God; from חָם heat, &c. and אֵל el, God: otherwise, father-in-law; from חָמַח chamah: or God is his father. Son of Mishna. 1 Chron. iv. 26.

HAMUL, חָמוּל, ἱμενῆς, pious, pitiful; from חָמַל chamal, to forgive. Son of Pharez, chief of a family. Gen. xlii. 12. Numb. xxvi. 21.

HAMUTAL, חֲמוּטָל, shadow of his heat; from חָם cham, heat, and טָל tilel, shadow: or deriving it from חָל tal, dew, heat of the dew.

HAMUTAL, daughter of Jeremiah of Libnah. Hamutal was wife of king Josiah, and mother of Jehoahaz, and Zedekiah, kings of Judah. 2 Kings xxiii. 31.

HANAMEEL, חֲנַמְאֵל, the grace which comes from God, or pity, or gift of God; from חָן chen, or pity, and the preposition מֵ mem, from, and אֵל el, God.

HANAMEEL, son of Shallum, a kinsman of Jeremiah's, who sold the prophet a field at Anathoth. Jer. xxxii. 7, &c.

HANAN, חָנָן, favourable, liberal, pious, or merciful; from חָן chen, or pity, &c.

I. HANAN, father of Rinna. 1 Chron. iv. 20.

II. HANAN, son of Azel, 1 Chron. viii. 38.

HANANEEL, חֲנַנְאֵל, grace, mercy, gift of God; from חָן chen, or pity, and אֵל el, God. He gave name to one of the towers of Jerusalem. Nehem. iii. 1. xii. 39. Jer. xxxi. 38. Zach. xiv. 10.

HANANI, חֲנָנִי, Ἀνανεὶ, my grace, my mercy: otherwise, he has shewed me mercy.

I. HANANI, father to the prophet Jehu. 1 Kings xvi. 7.

II. HANANI, a prophet who came to Asa, king of Judah, and said, "Because thou hast put thy trust in the king of Syria, and not in the Lord, the army of the king of Syria is escaped out of thine hands." 2 Chron. xvi. 7. We do not know on what occasion the prophet spake thus; but Asa ordered him to be seized and imprisoned. Some suppose this Hanani was father to the prophet Jehu: but this does not appear clear from Scripture. Jehu prophesied in Israel: Hanani prophesied in Judah. Jehu was put to death by Baasha, king of Israel, who died A. M. 3075; but Hanani reproved Asa, king of Judah, who reigned from A. M. 3049 to 3090.

III. HANANI, a Levite and musician, in the temple service. 1 Chron. xxv. 4, 25.

HANANIAH, חנניה, grace, mercy, gift of the Lord; from חן chen, or חנן chanan, and יה jah, the Lord.

I. HANANIAH, one of the three young men of the tribe of Judah and of the royal family, who, being carried captive to Babylon, were selected for instruction in the sciences of the Chaldeans, and to wait in Nebuchadnezzar's palace. His name was changed to Shadrach. He is famous for his refusal to worship the golden image set up by Nebuchadnezzar. See the history, Dan. iii. 4.

II. HANANIAH, son of Zerubbabel. 1 Chron. iii. 19.

III. HANANIAH, son of Azur, Jer. xxviii. 1. A false prophet of Gibeon, who coming to Jerusalem in the fourth year of Zedekiah, king of Judah, A. M. 3409, foretold to Jeremiah and all the people, "within two full years will I bring again into this place all the vessels of the Lord's house, that Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, hath carried to Babylon." At the same time Hananiah laid hold of the chains, (or yokes, vide YOKE) which Jeremiah wore about his neck, as emblems of the future captivity of Judah, and breaking them, said, "Thus saith the Lord, even so in two years time will I break the yoke of Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon." Jeremiah answered, "Thou hast broken the yokes of wood, but thou shalt make for them yokes of iron; thou shalt die this year, because thou hast taught rebellion against the Lord." Hananiah died within the year.

HANDS, Laying on of. See IMPOSITION OF HANDS.

HAND, sometimes denotes the vengeance of God. The hand of the Lord was heavy on them of Ashdod, after they had taken the ark, 1 Sam. v. 6, 7.

HAND is likewise used for times, or degrees. Daniel and his companions were ten hands (עשר ידים) wiser than all the magi and diviners of Babylon. Dan. i. 20.

To pour water on any one's HANDS, signifies to serve him. 2 Kings iii. 11. Vide FRAGMENT, No. CXII.

To wash one's HANDS. Pilate washed his hands, to denote his being innocent of the blood of Jesus. Matt. xxvii. 24. The righteous washes his hands with the innocent; he is in strict friendship with them, Psalm xxvi. 6. [Or, in innocence;—in token of innocence.]

To kiss one's HAND, is an act of adoration, 1 Kings xix. 18. "If I beheld the sun when it shined, and my mouth hath kissed my hand," says Job, chap. xxxi. 27. See KISS.

To fill one's HANDS, to take possession of the priesthood, to perform the functions of that office; because in this ceremony, those parts of the victim which were to be offered, were put into the hand of the new-made priest. Judg. xvii. 5, 12. Levit. xvi. 32. 1 Kings xiii. 33.

To lean upon any one's HAND, is a mark of familiarity and superiority. The king of Israel had a confidant upon whom he thus leaned, 2 Kings vii. 17. The king of Syria leaned on the hand or arm of Naaman, when he went up to the temple of Rimmon. 2 Kings v. 18.

HAND is sometimes taken for the border, the side, the hinge of a door; for the arms of a chair or seat; for the support of a throne, &c.

To lift up one's HAND, is a way of taking an oath, which has been in use among all nations.

To give one's HAND, signifies to grant peace, to swear friendship, to promise entire security, to make alliance. 2 Macc. xiii. 22. The Jews say they were obliged to give the hand to the Egyptians and Assyrians, that they might procure bread; i. e. to surrender to them, to submit. Vide FRAGMENTS, Nos. LXIII. CXXXI.

The right HAND, as a distribution of space, among the Hebrews, signifies generally the south.

To stretch out one's HAND, signifies to chastise, to exercise severity, or justice. Psalm lv. 11. God delivered his people out of Egypt with a stretched out hand, and an arm lifted up: by performing many wonders, and inflicting many chastisements on the Egyptians. The hand of God is still stretched out; he is still ready to strike, Isaiah v. 25. ix. 12, 17.

To stretch out one's HAND, sometimes denotes mercy.—I have stretched out mine hand [INTREATED] all the day long, towards an ungrateful and rebellious people. Isa. lxxv. 2. "I have called," says the wise man, "and ye have refused: I have stretched out my hand, and no man regarded." Prov. i. 24.

HAND is put likewise for a monument, erected by Absalom, near Jerusalem. 2 Sam. xviii. 18. Vide SAUL, TROPHY, and FRAGMENT, No. CCXVIII.

HAND is likewise frequently taken for the power and impression of the Holy Spirit, felt by a prophet. It is said, that God gave his law by the hand of Moses, that he spoke by the hand of prophets, i. e. by their means, by them, by their instrumentality, &c.

HANES, חָנָס, ὁδὸς, temptation, or standard of grace; from חָנָס nazah, standard: and temptation; or flight of grace, from חָנָס nus, flight, and חָנָן chen, grace. [From the Hebrew and Syriac, the miracle of grace.]

HANES, a town mentioned Isaiah xxx. 4. which Jerom thinks to be on the frontiers of Ethiopia. The LXX do not read Hanes.

[HANES was a city of Egypt, Isaiah xxx. 4. called by the Greeks Anusis, or Anus-is, the city of Anus, or Anysis, king of Egypt, of whom we read in Herodotus, lib. ii. As this is most probably probably an Egyptian word, we cannot effectually pursue our enquiry respecting it. That many cities of this country took their names from kings who governed it, is extremely probable. The Chaldee paraphrast by Hanes understood Tapachnes, or Daphnes, [Pelusium? near Damietta] but apparently the names are not allied: yet one might be the ancient, and the other a later name of the same town.]

HANIEL, חַנְיָאֵל, grace, mercy, gift, or rest of God; from חן chen, &c. and אֵל el, God.

HANIEL, prince of Manasseh. Num. xxxiv. 23.

2. HANIEL, son of Ulla. 1 Chron. vii. 39.

HANNAH, חַנָּה, gracious, merciful: or he that gives; from חן chanan.

HANNAH, wife of Elkanah, of Levi, who dwelt at Ramath, or Ramathaim, in Ephraim, 1 Sam. i. 2. Elkanah going to Shiloh, to worship there, took with him his two wives, Hannah and Peninnah. Peninnah had children, who accompanied her to the feast; but Hannah had none. Elkanah having offered his sacrifice of pure devotion, made an entertainment for his family before the Lord, and gave portions to Peninnah for herself and children: to Hannah, his well-beloved wife, he gave but one portion, because she had no child. Hannah hereupon was melancholy; and her rival Peninnah increased her affliction, by reproaching her barrenness. Elkanah comforted her; but Hannah went alone privately to the tabernacle; and vowed, that if God would bless her with a son, she would give him to God all the days of his life.

As she was very fervent in her devotion, the high-priest Eli believed she had been drinking to excess, and said to her, "How long wilt thou be drunken? put away thy wine from thee." But Hannah answered, "Pardon me, my lord, I am a woman overwhelmed with affliction; I have drunk no wine, nor any thing that could intoxicate, but have been pouring forth my heart before the Lord." Whereupon Eli said to her, "Go in peace, and the God of Israel grant thee thy petition." Hannah went away, took nourishment, and was no longer dejected. Soon after they returned to Ramah, Hannah conceived, and had a son, whom she called Samuel, because she had asked him of the Lord. Samuel was born A. M. 2849, ante A. D. 1155.

Hannah did not go to the temple till she had weaned her son: when she brought him thither, in compliance with her vow. [The tabernacle is sometimes called the temple, 1 Sam. xix; 2 Sam. xxii. 7; Psalm xviii. 6. Josephus terms it ναὸν μεταφερόμενον, a moveable temple.] [She took three bullocks, three measures of flour, and a bottle of wine. Having made her offering, and prayer, she presented her son to the Lord, committing him to Eli. Hannah also composed a hymn of thanksgiving, wherein she exalts the power of God's mercy, who dispenses fruitfulness or barrenness as he pleases. 1 Sam. ii. Her subsequent history is not known.

HANNATHON, חַנְתָּוֶן, grace, mercy, or gift; from chen, or chanan: otherwise, nathon, gift; from nathan, to give: otherwise encampment; from חָנָה chanah.

[A city of Zebulon, Josh. xix. 14. Perhaps this may be more advantageously referred to the root signifying a settlement, encampment, or pitching place: "the station of Ann;" and here, after a while, was a settlement of people, probably a temple, &c. and at length a town. Many cities have had a similar origin.]

HANNEKEB, or Nekeb, a city of Naphtali. Josh. xix. 33. The Vulgate joins it with Adami; Adami que est Neceb. The rabbins say, its name was changed, and that it was afterwards called Ziadata.

[HANOCH, dedicated. Son of Midian, Gen. xxv. 4. 1 Chron. i. 33.

II. HANOCH, son of Reuben, Gen. xlii. 9. Numb. xxvi. 5.]

HANUN, חַנּוּן, 'Ανών, gracious, merciful, or he that rests; See HANAN.

I. HANUN, son of Nabash king of the Ammonites, is famous for his insult to David's ambassadors, sent to compliment him after his father's death, 2 Sam. x. and 1 Chron. xix. David, exasperated at his dishonourable proceeding, declared war against the Ammonites, and sent Joab to invade them. The Ammonites procured assistance from Syria, and from beyond the Euphrates; but Joab giving part of the army to his brother Abishai, attacked the Syrians, while Abishai fought the Ammonites. They conquered both enemies. David receiving intelligence of this success, passed the river Jordan in person, with the rest of his troops, and defeated the Syrians in a set battle.

The year following, David sent Joab to besiege Rabbath their capital. During this siege, David committed the sin of adultery with Bathsheba, and procured the death of Uriah by the sword of the Ammonites. When the city was reduced to extremities, Joab informed David, who came with the rest of Israel, took the city, enslaved the inhabitants, and carried off a great booty.

II. HANUN, son of Seleph; after the return from Babylon, he assisted to build the valley-gate. Nehem. iii. 13.

HAPHARIM, חַפְרִים 'Αφαρημ, they that dig, examine, or found; from חָפַר chaphar.

HAPHARAIM, a city of Issachar. Josh. xix. 19. Eusebius says, that in his time, there was a place called Apharaim, six miles from Legio, north.

[The diggings, most probably for water. We have this name in the singular, Josh. xii. 17. and and 1 Kings, iv. 10. where "all the land" is mentioned. This land of Hopher, by its proximity to Shochob, should hardly be in Issachar, and whether the land might not be dug for other things besides water, as clay, or minerals, may be considered. Neither does it seem likely that Gath-hepher, should be denominated from a well dug; but we know that wine-presses were dug, no less than wells for water. Vide GATH-HEPHER.]

HARA, הָרָא, mountain, from har הָר: otherwise, ready to bring forth, from harah הָרָה: otherwise, demonstration.

HARA, a city or district of Assyria, whither the Israelites of the ten tribes were transplanted by Tiglath-Pileser. 1 Chron. v. 26.

HARADAH, חָרָדָה, Xapadaí, from chared חָרַד, astonishment, fear.

[HARADAH, terror of the enemies: a place which is a terror to its enemies. A camp station of Israel. Numb. xxxiii. 34. "The fear." Tremor; or, perhaps, from its vicinity to Egypt, the place of bustle, or hasty removal.]

HARAN, חָרָן, Apav, the same city as CHARRÆ.

HARAN, חָרָן, mountain, or mountainous country; from har הָר: otherwise, which is inclosed; from harah הָרָה: otherwise, song, cry; from ranan רָנָה.

[The name imports, say some, angry, or passionate: in Syria, liberty. They say, too, that there was a river named Charra, which ran by the town. Others think that the name signifies very noble, illustrious, from the Arabic root of that meaning: but rather in respect of this city, very dry, referring to the soil; and certainly, not far from this city, were districts burnt up by heat, as Plutarch and Appian relate. Abulfeda also informs us, that the neighbouring country suffers under a great want of water. Niebuhr did not visit Haran.]

I. HARAN, son of Caleb, and Ephah his concubine. 1 Chron. ii. 46.

II. HARAN, eldest son of Terah, and brother to Abraham and Nahor. Haran was father of Lot, Milcah, and Iscah. Nahor married Milcah; and Abraham, according to several interpreters, married Sarah, otherwise called Iscach; but this second name of Sarah is very dubious. Haran died before his father Terah; a circumstance which had not occurred among mankind till this time. Epiphanius, lib. 1. de Hæresib. says, that Haran was smitten by God, as a punishment to his father Terah, who had forged [invented the figures of] new gods. The Rabbins tell us, that Haran was accused by Terah for refusing to adore the deity fire, and was condemned to be cast into a burning furnace; where he was consumed in the presence of his father. Vide ABRAHAM. Others say, that Abraham having set fire to the place where Terah's idols were, Haran attempted to rescue them from the flames, and was himself consumed. Gen. xi. 28.

III. HARAN, otherwise CHARRÆ in Mesopotamia, a city to which Abraham first retreated after he had left Ur; and where Terah, Abraham's father died, Gen. xi. 31, 32. Hither likewise Jacob retired to Laban, when he fled from his brother Esau, Gen. xxvii. 45. At Haran or Charra in Mesopotamia, Crassus the Roman general was defeated and killed by the Parthians. Haran was situated between the Euphrates and the river Chebar. Vide the Map of SCRIPTURE HISTORIES. Some read it Charan, but the Vulgate always reads Haran.

F. Hardouin believed that Haran was in Mesopotamia, which he places between the Jordan and the Euphrates, and not the city Carra, celebrated for the defeat of Crassus, but Palmyra, or some other city in Cœle-Syria. He endeavours to prove, that there was a Mesopotamia on this side the Euphrates, between this river and the Jordan; quoting the title of Psalm lx. which imports that David fought in Mesopotamia, and in Syria of Shobah; and again, Judith ii. 14. where it is said, Holofernes having passed the Euphrates, came into Mesopotamia. But these authorities do by no means prove his assertion. The title of Psalm lx. does not say, that Mesopotamia was on this side of the Euphrates; David might fight in Mesopotamia at one time, and in Syria of Shobah at another; or rather, he defeated the people of Mesopotamia, in Syria, and on this side of the Euphrates. See 2 Sam. x. 16, 19; 1 Chron. xix. 19. Holofernes might have returned to the other side of the Euphrates, and into Mesopotamia, after having first passed this river.

The people of Charra, in Mesopotamia, are said to have adored the moon under the name and habit of a god, and not a goddess; and in the worship which they paid to this deity, the men wore the habit of women, and the women that of men. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CIII. CCXIII. CCLXVIII. CCLXX. and the PLATES of BAAL, BETH-SHEN, PARTHIA, &c.

HARARITE, חָרָרִי, the country of hills, or rocks; from har הָר. The LXX read Arodi חָרָדִי. 2 Sam. xxiii. 33. 1 Chron. xi. 34.

HARBONAH, חֲרֹבְנָה, ἡ ἀκαθάρτης, his destruction, or his sword, or his dryness; from charab or chareb, destruction, sword, and the pronoun o, his, or hers: otherwise, the anger of him that builds, or that understands; from charah חָרָה, anger, and binah בִּינָה, understanding, or to build. This being a Persian name, its etymology is not easily found in the Hebrew. Ahasuerus's eunuch; appointed to see Haman executed. Esth. i. 10. vii. 9.

HARD, imports difficult, sad, unfortunate, cruel, austere, &c. Pharaoh overwhelmed the Israelites Israelites with hard labour, with tasks that were difficult and insupportable. Exod. i. 14. Ye are a people of a hard head, untractable, inflexible, indocile. Exod. xxxii. 9. These sons of Zeruiah are too hard for me; treat me with insolence, with overbearing, unseasonable cruelty. Nabal was a hard and evil-conditioned man; a man without humanity, without gentleness, without consideration. 1 Sam. xxv. 3. I followed hard ways, I led an austere life; my behaviour was morose. Psalm xvii. 4. A hard heart, a hardened, insensible mind. A hard forehead, insolent. I have made thy forehead hard against their foreheads, Ezek. iii. 8. The Israelites are hardened to insensibility: they have lost all shame: but I will make you still harder, still bolder in reproving evil, than they are in committing it. Isaiah i. 7. I have made thy face like a rock, very hard, for their sins are become hard, and they are become incorrigible.

HARE. This animal resembles, a rabbit, but is something larger. There is no quadruped so fruitful as the hare. It is not uncommon to find female hares actually suckling young ones, and at the same time big with future broods more or less formed, according to the difference of the times wherein each brood was conceived. Very credible persons have assured me, that they have seen and had experience of there being hermaphrodite hares. The hares on the Alps are white, while those mountains are covered with snow, but afterwards they become grey again. Hares and rabbits take, in the colours of their coat, that colour which is around the dam at the time of her conceiving. See the PLATES, UNCLEAN ANIMALS: and NAT. HIST.

The Hebrews esteem this animal unclean; perhaps, because in Palestine it is subject to the mange and leprosy like foxes. The Romans, on the contrary, valued it highly as food, Inter quadrupedes gloria prima lepus.

MARTIAL. lib. xiii. Epg. 92.

Moses ranks it among unclean creatures, notwithstanding it chews the cud, because it divides not the hoof, Lev. xi. 6. Naturalists agree, that the hare does not chew the cud, and we know of no author besides Moses, who has written that it does. Aristotle, Hist. Animal. lib. iii. cap. 22. has observed, that the hare has this in common with animals which chew the cud, that we find something curdled in its stomach. Pope Zachary in his Epistle to Boniface, Archbishop of Mentz, exhorts Christians to abstain from the flesh of hares. Interpreters are divided concerning the signification of the Hebrew word Arnebeth; but they agree that it signifies a hare of some kind. [Query, Whether any kind of hare, or any creature allied to it in form, &c. (which might be the Arnebeth of the Hebrews,) chews the cud?—Cowper, the Poet, in his account of the three hares he domesticated, asserts that they "chewed the cud all day till evening."]

HARED, or HEROD, חרוד, astonishment, fear. See ARAD.

[HAROD, stupor, or trepidation. A place not far from Jezreel and Mount Gilboa, so called from the apprehensions and fears of those who here were tried by Gideon. Judges vii. 1. 3. "Palpitation" of the heart, as a symptom of alarm and terror.]

HARETH, חרת, Χάρεθ, to engrave: otherwise liberty; from חרים, chorim, freemen; a forest in Judah, whither David fled. 1 Sam. xxii. 5.

[Sculpture is certainly a kind of cutting off, or chipping, but this circumstance could hardly give name to a wood or forest. Others, therefore, think it denotes the act of falling, after having been cut off, and hence describes the state of woods, which, when the trees of them are cut down, are said to be fallen, and so the "fallen wood." 1 Sam. xxii. 5.]

HARHOIAH, חרהיה, Ἀραγία, heat, or anger of the Lord; from חרה, charah, heat, and יה, jah, the Lord. Neh. iii. 8.

HARHUR, חרור, Ἀσπ, burnt, fry'd; from חרר charar: otherwise, anger, or heat of whiteness; from חרה charah, anger, or heat, and חר chur, whiteness, hole, or cavern, and חרים chorim, freemen. The name of a man, Ezra ii. 51.

HARIM, חרים, Χαριμ, destroyed, anathematized; from חרם charam, anathema.

HARIM, the third of the twenty-four sacerdotal families; 1 Chron. xxiv. 8. The descendants of Harim returned from Babylon in number 1017, Ezra ii. 39. Some of their family having married strange women, separated from them, Ezra x. 21.

II. HARIM, his children returned from Babylon in number 320. Ezra ii. 32.

HARIPH, חרף, winter, affront, youth; from חרף charaph, or choreph; according to the Syriac, sharp, pointed, subtle, ingenious: his children returned from Babylon in number 112. Neh. vii. 24.

HARNEPHER, חרנפר, Ἀρναφ, anger of the bull; from חרה charah, anger, and נפר phar, a bull: otherwise, anger which grows and increases; from פרה pharah, to grow, to increase; otherwise, liberty of the bull, according to the Syriac and Hebrew. Second son of Zophai. 1 Chron. vii. 36.

HAROD, or HARODI, חרדי, Ἀραδι, astonished, surprized; from חרד charad: otherwise, abundance of heat and anger; from חרה charah, heat or anger, and די di, plenty, or sufficiency.

I. HAROD, the well, or fountain of, Judg. vii. 1. in the great plain at the foot of mount Gilboa.

II. HAROD, the birth-place of Shamnah and Elikah

Elikah, two valiant men in David's army, 2 Sam. xxiii. 25. In 2 Sam. xxiii. 21. Shammah is surnamed the Hararite, but in 1 Chron. xi. 27. Shammath the Harorite; and 1 Chron. xxvii. 8. Shamnoth the Izarite. See SHAMMAH.

HAROSHETH, חרש, Ἀρωσθ, agriculture, silence, deafness, or vessel of earth; from חרש charash, or cheresh.

[HAROSHETH, workmanship, or plough: from the Syriac, a wood.

Among the earliest articles wrought by the hand of man, we may, no doubt, include the ploughshare (of wood) and its connections; these might give the name of workmanship to implements (afterwards) made of iron; but later ages saw at least equal labour bestowed on warlike instruments. The arms and accoutrements of cars for war are thought by Bouffere to be the import of this name: he remarks that this was a city of Galilee, and that this dominion was now famous for military chariots, which were, in some way or other, greatly composed of iron. Judges iv. 2, 3, 14. Simon remarks that harosh signifies a vessel burnt in the fire; and that kir-harosheth imports a wall of kiln-baked brick, Isaiah xvi. 7. 2 Kings, iii. 25. So Plinthine and Ostracine were cities in Egypt. After all, it is probable that this word may mean workmanship, without being restricted to any one kind, as our own manufactories usually make a variety of articles, though of the same materials. "Ironworkers' town:"—Smiths' Town.]

HAROSHETH, of the Gentiles, a city on the lake Semechon, where Sisera dwelt, who commanded the troops of Jabin, Judges iv. 2.

[HARP, vide the PLATES: MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS, FRAGMENTS, No. CCXXXII.]

[HARSHA, חרשא, ploughing; "ploughman," according to the English idiom: from the Syriac, wooden.] Head of a family, Ezra ii. 52.

[HART. See DEER.]

HARUM, הרום, Ἀρού, exalted, great; from רום rum: otherwise, he that rejects or drives away; from רמה ramah. Son of Cos, and father of Aharhel, 1 Chron. iv. 8.

HARUMAPH, חרום, destruction, or anathema of the mouth; from חרם cherem, destruction, anathema, and פה pe, mouth: according to the Syriac, anger of the covering. Neh. iii. 10.

HARUPHITE, חרופי, See HARIPH. Sephtiah, one of David's brave officers, was surnamed the Haruphite. 1 Chron. xii. 5.

HARUZ, חרוץ, cut, or pure, or trod down, or careful: from חרץ charatz. Father of Mesbullemeth, wife of Manasseh. 2 Kings xxi. 19.

HASADIAH, חסדיה, mercy of the Lord; from חסד chased, mercy, goodness, and יָה jah, the Lord. Son of Zerubbabel. 1 Chron. iii. 20.

HASENUAH, חסנאה, Savaa, bush; from חסנא jenah; Enemy, in the Syriac. 1 Chron. ix. 7.

HASHABIAH, חשביה, Ἀσαβια, reckoning, or account of the Lord; from חשב chashab, and יָה jah, the Lord.

I. HASHABIAH, son of Amaziah the Levite. 1 Chron. vi. 45.

II. HASHABIAH, a Levite, son of Jeduthun. His descendants had the twelfth place among the Levites in the temple. 1 Chron. xxv. 3, 19.

III. HASHABIAH, master of half a street at Keilah, contributed toward building the walls of Jerusalem. Nehem. iii. 17.

HASHABNAH, חשבנא, account, thought, haste of the intelligent, or of him that builds; from חשב choshab, and חוש chush, to hasten.

HASHABNAH, חשבנא, account, intelligence, or silence, (see HASHABNAH) from יָה jah, the Lord; otherwise, haste of the son of the Lord; from חוש chush, to hasten, בן ben, a son, and יָה jah, the Lord.

HASHBADANA, חשבדנא, Ἀσαβδαν, who makes haste; from חוש chush; otherwise, he that thinks, or reckons judiciously; from חשב choshab, and דינא dinah. judgment: otherwise, he that conceals his judgment; from חשב chashab, to keep silence, and דין din, judgment, and אֵה ah, his. A Levite, who was at Ezra's left hand, while he read the law. Neh. viii. 4.

HASHIEM, חשם, Ἀσι, their silence, or their eagerness; from חשב chashab, to keep silence, or from חוש chush, to make haste, and אֵם am, theirs. [HUSHIM. Eng. Tr. 1 Chron. vii. 12.]

HASHIEM, חשם, name or fame; from שם shem, a name: otherwise placed or put; from שום shum, to place. A considerable citizen of Jerusalem, 1 Chron. x. 14. called Jashen, 2 Sam. xxiii. 32.

HASHIMONAH, חשמנא, Ἀσμεονά, diligence, or enumeration; from חוש chush, to hasten, and מני meni, reckoning: otherwise, embassy, or present: from חשמן chashman. See ASSEMON.

[HASHMONAH, a station of the Israelites. Num. xxxiii. 29. Simon thinks this name denotes extremely fat; but, as soil of this kind did not abound in the desert, I should as soon think it denoted a heavy sand; a sand into which the foot sunk, in like manner as it might do in a rich, unctuous soil.]

HASHUB, חשב, reckoned, esteemed, laboured with care; from חשב chashab: otherwise, artifice, or art; from the same. He contributed towards rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem, Neh. iii. 11. he repaired the tower of furnaces, assisted by Malchijah.

HASHUBAH, חשבה, Vulgate, Hasaban, enumeration, estimation, thought, industry; from חשב chashab. Son of Zerubbabel. 1 Chron. iii. 20.

HASHUM, חשם, Ἀσם, their silence, their haste; from חשב chasha; or from חוש chush, to hasten, and the pronoun אֵם am, theirs. His descendants descendants returned from Babylon, in number 328, Neh. vii. 22; but Ezra ii. 19. we read in number 223.

HASRAH, חסרה, 'חסר, defect, want; from חסר chasur, to want. 2 Chron. xxxiv. 22.

HASSENAAH, חסניא, bush; from סנה senah: according to the Syriac, enemy. The sons of Hasenaah, after the return from Babylon, made the fish-gate at Jerusalem. Neh. iii. 3.

HASSHUB, חשב, estimated, reckoned, worked with care; from חשב chashab: otherwise, artifice, or art; from the same. 1 Chron. ix. 14.

HASUPHA, חשופא, 'Ασφάθ, spoiled, exhausted; from חשף chashaph. Nethinim. Ezr. ii. 43.

HATACH, חתר, he that strikes. This name is foreign to the holy language, and therefore its etymology cannot be derived from thence. Chamberlain of Esther. Est. iv. 9.

HATE, HATRED, is not always to be taken rigorously, but frequently signifies merely a lesser degree of love. No one can serve two masters: for he will hate the one, and love the other, Luke xvi. 13. i. e. he will neglect the service of one, and attach himself to the other. He who spareth the rod, hateth his child. Fathers often spare their children out of excessive love to them; but to forbear correcting them, is improper affection. If any man have two wives, one beloved, and another hated, i. e. less beloved. Deut. xxi. 15. Thus Jesus Christ says, Luke xiv. 26. he who would follow him, must hate father and mother, i. e. love them less than his salvation; must not prefer them to God. He who loveth iniquity hateth his own soul. Psalm xi. 5. (Thus the Vulgate, which herein agrees with the Septuagint, who translate the passage in this sense; 'Ο δὲ ἀγαπῶν ἀδικίαν μισεῖ τὴν ψυχὴν. Our English version translates, The Lord alloweth the righteous, but him that delighteth in wickedness does his soul abhor. Perhaps the Greek and Latin translations, express more exactly the meaning of the Hebrew.) And St. Paul, No one hateth his own flesh; his own person, his life, his relations, &c.

HATHIATH, חתת, 'Αθῶ, breaking, bruising, or astonishment. Son of Othniel. 1 Chron. iv. 13.

HATIPHA, חטיפא, pillage, rapine; from חטף chataph, otherwise, remains of sin; from חטא chatah, sin. One of the Nethinim. Ezr. ii. 54.

HATITA, חטיא, declensions of sin; from חטא chata, sin, נסח, natah, to decline. Ezr. ii. 42.

HATTIL, חטיל, cry of sin; from חטא chata, sin, יליל, jalil, to cry. Ezr. ii. 57.

HATTUSH, חטוש, he that forsakes sin; from חטא chata, to sin, and טוש tush, to fly away. Son of Schecaniah, of David's family. 1 Chron. iii. 22; Ezra viii. 2.

HAVILAH, חוילה, 'Ενυλά, that suffers pain; from חולל cholel; otherwise, that brings forth; from חול chul: otherwise, that speaks, or declares to her; from חויה chivah, and לה lah, to her.

I. HAVILAH, son of Cush, Gen. x. 7. According to Bochart, he peopled the country where the Tigris and Euphrates unite, and discharge themselves together into the Persian Gulf. This probably is the land of Havilah, (Gen. xxv. 18; 1 Sam. xv. 7.) which extended to Shur, over against Egypt. The sons of Ishmael dwelt from Havilah unto Shur that is before Egypt; as thou goest towards Assyria.

II. HAVILAH, son of Joktan, Gen. x. 20. In all probability he peopled Colchis, and the country encompassed by the river Pison, or Phasis, Gen. ii. 11. There are in Armenia, and in the territories of the Cholchians, the cities Cholva and Cholvata, and the region of Cholobeta, noticed by HATTON.

[Simon thinks, terror, dismay, i. e. to enemies.

There appear to be two people of this name.

1. HAVILAH, its territories were surrounded by the Phison, a river of Paradise. Gen. ii. 11.

2. HAVILAH, son of Joktan, Gen. x. 20.

By the first Havilah, the paraphrast Jonathan, on Gen. x. 20, and the Chaldee paraphrast on Chronicles, understand India. Jonathan's words are, "the name of the first river is Phisou, which environs the whole land of India, (Indike), where there is gold, and the gold of that land is excellent;" whereby, I conclude, is intended the India at the head of the Indus, not the present Hindoostan. Vide FRAGMENTS.

The Arabic for Havila reads Zavila, which we usually write Zabilasthan, or Zablestan; but that is of no consequence, as v and b are interchangeable letters in most Oriental languages. A sound much nearer to that of the Hebrew letters would be Chabilistan, or Chabulstan.

2. Havilah, son of Joktan, may safely be placed in Arabia, where the districts of Chaulon may mark his residence. Gen. xxv. 18. 1 Sam. xv. 7. may refer to this Chavilah, or Havilah, which appears to have been of considerable extent, though not, perhaps, very fertile. It certainly lay between the southern extremity of the Dead Sea and Egypt, probably in the track between the wilderness of Paran and the desert of Shur. Vide AMALEK, 2.]

HAVOTH-JAIR, חויתאי, 'Ανοθη, villages that enlighten, or that shew forth light; from חוה chavoth, a village, and אור or, light, and from חויה chivah, to shew forth.

[More probably "villages of Jair," deriving their appellation from the name of their proprietor Jair. Num. xxxii. 41. In Deut. iii. 14. this district is called Bashon Havoth Jair. The level of the villages of Jair. Has the Hebrew

Havoth any agreement with the Welch Hafod, summer residences for the purpose of pasturing flocks?]

HAVOTH-JAIR. The Hebrew Havoth or Avoth signifies properly cabins, or huts belonging to the Arabians, which are placed in a circle; such a collection of them forming a hamlet or village. Havoth still has this signification in Arabic. They were in the Batanæa, beyond Jordan, in the land of Gilead, and belonged to the half tribe of Manasseh.

HAVRAN, חורן, a hole, hollow, whiteness; from חור chor, or hor, according to different readings; otherwise, Liberty.

HAVRAN, Ezekiel xlvii. 16. speaks of Havran as a district situated north-east of the Holy Land. Some suppose it to be Ituræa. St. Luke, iii. 1. says, that Philip was tetrarch of Ituræa and the Trachonitis. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xvii. cap. 7, says, he possessed Batanæa, Trachonitis, and Auranitis; where Auranitis and Ituræa are put one for another. St. Jerom says, on Ezek. xlvii. 16. that Havran is a city in the wilderness belonging to Damascus. An Arabian geographer, quoted in Reland, tom. 1. lib. i. cap. 22, places the land of Havran, or Auran, south of Damascus; and Abulfeda says, that Bozra is the capital of the country of Havran. Gölius in his notes on Abulpharagius says, that the Syrians and Arabians call that part of the land Havran, where Tiberias on the sea of Galilee is situated. William of Tyre calls it the Auranitis. It is certain that the Auranitis was beyond Jordan.

[HAURAN no doubt gave name to the Auranitis; and it is so understood by the Greek interpreter. Ezek. xlvii. 16.

Hauran is reckoned by the Jewish Rabbins among those hills from whence a flaming torch may be seen at a great distance. Rosh Hashahana, cap. 2.

Hauran is supposed to signify extremely white; it is a region placed by the Arabian geographers south of Damascus. Vide Gölius, Lex Arab. col. 664. See HOWRAN in the MAP OF GEOGRAPHICAL ILLUSTRATIONS OF SCRIPTURE HISTORIES. But Lightfoot, Chorogr. prefixed to Luke, Lamy, Apparat. Geog. cap. 12. and Dapper, Descr. Syr. p. 65, think it is a part of Antilibanus, and called white, from the permanent snows which covered its surface. Cellarius considers it as denoting simply "the mountain." Geog. Ant. tom. ii. p. 623. The plains of the Hauran are described as being the granary of the country around them; and producing excellent corn. They are south-west of Damascus, on the edge of the desert. What is the colour of the sand in these districts? Is it extremely white?]

[HAWK, a bird of prey, of which there are many kinds: is very quick-sighted, ravenous, and bold. It was declared unclean by the law. Lev. xi. 16. Deut. xiv. 15. Vide KITE, and NAT. HIST.] HAZAEI, חזאי, that sees God; from חזק chazak, to see, and אל el, God.

HAZAEI. The prophet Elijah, 1 Kings xix. 15. 16. at mount Horeb, received orders from God to anoint Hazael to be king of Syria. The prophet returned home for this purpose, but it does not appear that he himself executed this commission. Nevertheless, Elisha many years afterwards foretold to Hazael, that he should reign over Syria. See the history, 2 Kings viii. 7. Hazael had been sent by Benhadad to enquire of Elisha whether he should recover? the prophet foreseeing his cruelty, wept; Hazael enquired the cause; which, when he knew, he could not think it possible such barbarity should lurk in his heart.—"The Lord," said Elisha, "hath revealed to me that thou shalt be king of Syria." Hazael returned to the king, his master, and told him he would recover; but the next day he stifled him with a cloth dipt in water, which he spread over his face; and immediately usurped the throne. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. VII.

Hazael without delay, executed on Israel all the evils which Elisha had foretold; when Jehu broke up the siege of Ramoth-Gilead, Hazael took advantage of his absence, fell on his territories beyond Jordan, and destroyed the land of Gilead, Gad, Reuben, and Manasseh, from Aroer to Bashan. Many years passed without Hazael's attacking the kingdom of Judah, because it was more remote from Damascus: but he began to distress it in the reign of Joash, son of Jehoahaz. He took Gath, and marched against Jerusalem. Joash perceiving himself unable to resist Hazael, gave him all the money in his treasury, and in the treasuries of the house of God, to purchase his absence; but the year following, Hazael returned against Judah and Jerusalem, slew all the princes, and sent a very rich spoil to Syria. The Syrian army was not numerous; but God delivered up to it the inhabitants of Judah; and Joash himself was treated by the Syrians with the utmost ignominy. Hazael did not spare the king of Israel any more than the king of Judah; but the particulars are not distinctly known. He died about the same time as Jehoahaz, king of Israel, 2 Kings xiii. and was succeeded by his son Benhadad: A. M. 3165, ante A. D. 839.

HAZAR-ADDAR, a village, Numb. xxxiv. 4. [called Addar, Josh. xv. 3.]

HAZAR-GADDA, חצר גדי, the court of the goat; from חצר chatzar, a court, and גדי gedi, a goat: otherwise, the dwelling of happiness: otherwise, according to the Syriac and Hebrew, the the court of his incision, or of his slit; from tzadad, a slit. A city of Judah, lying pretty far south. Joshua xv. 27.

[Simon thinks, a city, or seclusion, of a throng, i. e. very populous. I partly incline, nevertheless, to refer it to the deity Gad, or good fortune; the residence, or court of Fortune, "Lucky court." The original is not so properly Gadda, as Gad-he. Nevertheless, this may easily be taken for the court of the kid. "Kid's Cote," or court.]

HAZAR-MAVETH, חָצָר־מוֹת, 'Asapamoth, court, or entry, or dwelling of death; from חָצָר chatzar, a court, and מוֹת maveth, death; or hay of death; from חָצִיר chazir, hay.

HAZAR-MAVETH, third son of Joktan. There is a city called Asarmoth in Armenia. Some believe the Sarmate were named from Asarmoth, or Hazar-maveth.

HAZAR-SHUAL, חָצָר־שׁוּעַל, town, or village, or court, or dwelling of the fox; from חָצָר chatzar, a court, and שׁוּעַל shual, a fox, [rather, a jackall: see the PLATES.] A city of Simeon, or Judah. Josh. xv. 28; Neh. xi. 27.

[Bochart has collected several instances of places named from foxes; Canaan, p. 682. So the Arabic name for a fox is given to a place. So the French have Chateau Renard, and we have Fox Court.

The fox of Scripture is the jackall; and, considering the great numbers of this animal which over-run Syria, it is not wonderful that places should derive their names from them.]

HAZAR-SUSIM, חָצָר־סוּסִים, court, or dwelling of horses; from חָצָר chatzar, a court, and סוּס sus, a horse. A city of Simeon, 1 Chron. iv. 31. called Hazar-Susah, Josh. xix. 5.

[Probably of the same nature as what we call a stud of horses, or, as the word appears to be feminine, of brood mares. But the same place is thought to be called Hazer Susim, the court of horses, in the masculine. 1 Chron. iv. 31.]

Among the Greeks there was a city, Hippos, "Horse-town," in Ionia, another in Lycia, another in Africa: and the present Isbahan, the capital of Persia, is thought to have been a station for cavalry, or a place for riding: and to have taken its name from the horses kept there anciently by the Persian kings.]

HAZALAH, חָזַל, who sees the Lord; from חָזַח chazah, to see, and ה' jah, the Lord. Neh. xi. 5.

HAZELEPONI, חָזַל־פָּנִי, shade, and sorrow of countenance: otherwise, submersion of the face: from חָזַל tzalal, to make sorrowful, and shadow, and פָּנִי pami, the face. 1 Chr. iv. 3.

HAZERIM, חָצִירִים, 'Asapamoth, villages, hamlets: otherwise, Hazeroth, courts, entries, porches; from חָצָר chatzer: otherwise, arrow, lifted up; from חָצֵץ chatzatz, an arrow or dart, and רָמַם ramam, lifted up.

HAZERIM, HAZEROTH, HAZOR, AZEROTHAIM. All these names signify the same thing; and are often put before the names of places: There is a town called Hazor in Arabia Petræa, in all probability, the same as Hazerim, the ancient habitation of the Hivites, before they were driven away by the Caphthorim, Deut. ii. 23, who settled in Palestine. It is likewise, according to all appearances, the Hazeroth, where the Hebrews encamped, Num. xi. 35. xii. 16. xxxii. 1.

[HAZEROTH appears to be the feminine of Hazerim; and is of the same import, viz. courts or seclusions: perhaps our word apartments or separations, may nearly express the meaning of these appellations.]

HAZEZON-TAMAR, חֲצִצְוֶן־תְּמָר, sand, or flint, or stone of change; from חָצֵץ chatzatz, sand, &c. and תְּמָר tamar, change: otherwise, division of the palm; from חָצַח chatzah, to divide: or from חֵץ chetz, an arrow or dart, and תְּמָר tamar, a palm. Gen. xiv. 7. The same as En-gedi, on the western coast of the Dead Sea. See EN-GEDEI.

[HAZEZON-TAMAR, arrows of the palm tree, i. e. dates.—That this name refers to the palm tree, Tamar, is plain; and nothing is more probable, than that it should import a copious yielding of the fruit of this tree, but rather in the sense of protrusion, putting forth, than in that of arrows, or shooting, which would imply a separation from the parent tree, not unlike a dropping of unripened fruit. Gen. xiv. 7. This town was also called Engaddi. Josh. xv. 62. 1 Sam. 24. 1. 2 Chron. xx. 2. Cant. i. 14. Ezek. xlviii. 10. That the country abounded in palm trees, we have the testimony of Pliny, lib. v. cap. 17. Solinus, cap. 35. Joseph. Antiq. lib. ix. cap. 1.]

HAZIEL, חָזִי'אֵל, who sees God; from חָזַח chazah, to see, and אֵל el, God. Son of Shimei, a Levite, a singer. 1 Chron. xxiii. 9.

HAZO, חָזוּ, prophet, or seer. Gen. xxii. 22.

HAZOR, חָצָר, Vulgate, Asar; court, or hay; from חָצָר chatzer, a court, or חָצִיר chazir, hay. Comp. FRAGMENT, No. CLXXVIII.

I. HAZOR, a city of Judah, Josh. xv. 23. Eusebius speaks of a Hazor, east of Askelon.

II. HAZOR, New Hazor, otherwise Hezron, in the same tribe, Josh. xv. 25.

III. HAZOR, a city of Naphtali, Josh. xix. 36. probably the famous city Hazor, king Jabin's capital, taken by Joshua, after the great battle, wherein he defeated Jabin, and his allies, near the waters of Merom. Josh. xi. 7, 10, 11. Hazor was situated on the lake Semechon.

IV. HAZOR, built by Solomon, 1 Kings ix. 15. It is no contradiction to say, it was Hazor of Naphtali, which Solomon rebuilt or fortified; for the Hebrews having no compound name, often use the word build to signify rebuild, or restore.

[Probably "a separated place;" and it may be doubted whether, when it refers to foxes, to horses, to kids, &c. it may not hint at some such structure as our kennels for dogs, &c. It seems to denote a place surrounded, but whether with a bound hedge, palings, walls, or other fences, does not appear.

1. In Judah. Josh. xv. 23.

2. Another in Judah, Josh. xv. 25. which some suppose was called Hadattah, New Hazor; or, the New Court; from the Syriac and Arabic root.

3. Another in Judah, called also Hezron. Ib.

4. In Naphtali. Josh. xi. 1. xii. 19. xix. 36. Judges, iv. 2.

5. In Benjamin. Nehem. xi. 33.

6. In Arabia. Jer. xlix. 28.

This name, in its signification of court, is combined with many others, as above.]

HEAD, Caput. This word has several significations besides its natural one, which denotes the head of a man. To be at the head, in capite, to command, conduct, govern. "Thou hast caused men to ride over our heads," Psalm lxvi. 12. thou hast subjected us to masters. "Thou hast made me the head of the heathen," Psalm xviii. 43. thou hast advanced me to the regal state. His enemies were upon his head, Lam. i. 5. facti sunt hostes ejus in capite. And Moses says, the Lord shall make thee the head and not the tail, Deut. xxviii. 13. thou shalt be always master, and never in subjection.

HEAD, for the beginning. In capite libri scriptum est de me: In the beginning of the book it is written of me, Psalm xl. 8. [Vide FRAGMENTS, No. LXXIV.] The river of paradise was divided into four heads, Gen. ii. 10. in quatuor capita, four springs, four branches. The stone which the builders rejected was placed in the head of the corner, Psalm cxviii. 22, in caput anguli, was the first in the angle, whether at the top of that angle to adorn and crown it, or at the bottom to support it. Thy sons are killed, and thrown to the ground at the head of all the streets, in the beginning of the highways, Isaiah li. 20.

HEAD is taken sometimes for poison, because the Hebrew rosch, which signifies head, signifies likewise poison. Caput aspidum suget, he shall suck the venom [head] of asps, Job xx. 16. And Ecclesiasticus xxv. 22. Non est caput nequius super caput colubri, et non est ira super iram mulieris: there is no poison more dangerous than that of a serpent, and no wrath more impetuous than that of a woman.

[These instances are correctly copied from nature; for the poison of serpents is concealed in bags which lie in the roof of the mouth: this poison, in the act of biting, passes down a slit in the fang teeth, and is ejected into the wounds made by them. See PLATES of SERPENTS; especially SERPENT'S HEAD.]

In times of grief, the mourners covered their heads, they cut and plucked off their hair; upon all heads baldness, says the prophet Amos, viii. 10. speaking of unhappy times; in prosperity they anointed their heads with sweet oils: "Let thy head lack no [perfumed] ointments," Eccl. ix. 8.

To shake the HEAD at any one, expresses contempt: "The daughter of Sion hath despised thee, and laughed thee to scorn: the daughter of Jerusalem hath shaken her head at thee," Isaiah xxxvii. 22. This sometimes was a sign of joy and admiration: Job's friends and relations, after his cure and restoration, came to eat and rejoice with him: Et moverunt caput super eum, Job xlii. 11.

HEAP. The ancients, before the use of writing, and even afterwards, erected heaps of stones to preserve the memory of events. Jacob at Bethel, Gen. xxviii. 11, 18, set up the stone which had served him for a pillow, as a monument, and anointed it with oil.

Jacob having made a covenant with Laban, his father-in-law, on mount Gilead, Gen. xxxi. 44, 45, 47, they said, let us raise here a heap of stones; they did so: and afterwards ate upon it in token of friendship. Laban called it the heap of witness; and Jacob, the heap of testimony. Vide FRAGMENT, No. CXLVI. and the PLATES: GILGAL.

It is probable, that the altar made of turf, or of rough stones, at the foot of mount Sinai; with the twelve stones, Exod. xx. 25. xxiv. 4, 5, set up at the same place, in order to offer sacrifices, at the ratification of the covenant which God made with Israel, were to serve as memorials to posterity; as also the altar of rough stones, on mount Ebal, Deut. xxvii. 4, 5, 6, 7.

Joshua erected two monuments of stone in memory of the miraculous passage of the Jordan; one in the middle channel of that river, the other on the shore, at Gilgal; "That," says he, "when your children ask their fathers in time to come, saying, "What mean you by these stones?" then ye shall answer them, that the waters of Jordan were cut off before the ark of the covenant of the Lord, when it passed over Jordan, whereof these stones shall be for a memorial unto the children of Israel for ever." Josh. iv.

After the conquest and distribution of the promised land, the tribes of Reuben and Gad, and the half-tribe of Manasseh, having repassed the Jordan, raised a vast mass of earth, with stones, on the bank thereof, as a monument to posterity, that the Hebrews on both sides of this river river were but one people, and of the same religion. See the history, Josh. xxii. 10, 11.

HEAPS of stones over graves: we see examples of this in Achan, Josh. vii. 26: in the king of Ai, Josh. viii. 29: in Absalom, 2 Sam. xviii. 17. "They took Absalom, and cast him into a great pit in the wood, and laid a very great heap of stones upon him," &c.

[HEAR, HEARING.] This word is taken in several senses in Scripture. In its obvious and literal acceptation, it denotes the exercise of that bodily sense, of which the ear is the organ:—to receive information by the ear, 2 Sam. xv. 10. and, as hearing is a sense by which instruction is conveyed to the mind, and the mind is excited to attention, and to obedience, so the ideas of attention, and obedience, are grafted on the expression, or sense, of hearing.

God is said, speaking after the manner of men, to hear prayer, i. e. to attend to it, and to comply with requests made in it. Psal. cxvi. 1. "I love the Lord because he hath heard—hath attended to—hath complied with—the voice of my supplication:"—on the contrary, God is said—not to hear, i. e. not to comply with—the desires of sinners, John ix. 31.

Men are said to hear, when they attend to, or comply with, the requests of others, or when they obey the commands of God. "He who is of God, heareth—obeyeth—practiseth God's word," John viii. 47. "My sheep hear my voice,—and shew their attention to it, by following me," John x. 27. and Matth. xvii. 5. "This is my beloved son, hear him;" where there seems to be an allusion to Deut. xviii 15, 18, 19. "The Lord shall raise up unto you a prophet, him shall ye hear;" which passage is also expressly applied, Acts iii. 22.

What other senses may be attached to the word hear seem to rise out of the foregoing, and may be referred to the same ideas. To hear, signifies to judge, to settle a matter, 2 Sam. xv. 3. "Thy matters—words—pleadings are good and right, but there is no man deputed by the king to hear thee;"—the king by office should hear and do justice between man and man in his own person, but David holds every thing under his own cognizance, though able to do justice to only a small part of those who want it, and he will not delegate his power to any one who might in his stead distribute equity. The caution to take heed how we hear, or what we hear, as it includes application, reception, and practice, was never more necessary than in the present day among ourselves: never was the necessity greater for appealing "to the law and to the testimony."] "

HEART. This word has a strong emphasis in all languages. The Hebrews regarded the heart as the source of wit, understanding, love, grief, and pleasure. Hence, are derived many ways of speaking: To find his heart, to possess his heart, to incline his heart, to bind his heart toward the Lord: A good heart, an evil heart, a liberal heart, a heart which does a kindness freely, voluntarily, generously, &c. To harden one's heart, to lift up one's heart to God; to beseech him to change our stony hearts into hearts of flesh. To love with all one's heart: to have but one heart and one soul with another person. "To turn the hearts of children to the fathers, and the hearts of fathers to the children," Luke i. 17. to cause them to be perfectly reconciled, kindly affectioned, and of the same mind. To want heart, sometimes denotes to want understanding and prudence. A silky dove without heart, Hosea vii. 11, a dove without wit and cunning [or, without courage]. O fools and slow of heart, Luke xxiv. 25, not exerting reflection and understanding. The heart of this people is stupified, destitute of understanding, Matth. xiii. 15. their heart is loaded with fat. Thou shalt speak to all that are wise-hearted, Exod. xxxiii. 3. whom I have filled with the spirit of wisdom. The false prophets speak from their heart [q. without their heart: knowing their own falsehood?] Ezek. xiii. 2, who give out their imaginations for true prophecies. To lay any thing to heart, or set one's heart on any thing; to remember it, to apply one's self to it, to have it at heart. The righteous perisheth, and no one layeth it to heart, Jer. xii. 11. no one concerns himself about it. To return to one's heart; to recollect one's self.

Tender of heart, i. e. timorous. The heart is dilated by joy, is contracted by sadness, is broken by sorrow, grows fat, and is hardened in prosperity. The heart sometimes resists truth. God opens it, prepares it, turns it as he pleases. To steal one's heart, Gen. xxxi. 20, to do a thing without one's knowledge. The heart melts under discouragement: the heart forakes one, under terror; the heart is desolate, in amazement; the heart is fluctuating, in doubt. To possess one's heart, to be master of its motions. To speak to any one's heart, to comfort him effectually, to say pleasing and penetrating, affecting things to him.

The heart expresses likewise the middle of any thing: Tyre is in the heart, in the midst of the sea, Ezek. xxxii. 4. Vide FRAGMENT, No. CCVIII. CCX. We will not fear, though the mountains be carried into the heart of the sea, Ps. xlv. 2. As Jonah was three days and three nights in the whale's belly; so shall the son of man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth. Matt. xii. 40. Moses, speaking to the Israelites, says, "And the mountain burnt with fire, unto the heart of heaven;" the flame rose as high as the clouds.

We should rend our hearts, and not our garments, ments, in mourning, Joel ii. 13. To obtain righteousness, we must believe with the heart, Rom. x. 10. God promises to give his people "an understanding heart, and a heart fearing God."

[HEATH, a well known shrub, that grows on barren moors; it knows not when good cometh, doth not flourish in the spring, but towards the end of summer. Men are likened to it, Jer. xvii. 6. It likewise represents men in a destitute and concealed condition. Jer. xlviii. 6.]

[HEATHEN, or the people of the earth, at large: all who are not of the family of Israel, to which family pertained the law, and the sacred oracles, and the covenants of promises, and the descent of the Messiah, &c. As it was customary with polished nations to call all others barbarians, so it was customary with the Jews to call all other nations heathen; and to consider them as totally void of any knowledge of God; whereas, we ought in fact, to remember, that in early ages mankind had generally much the same knowledge of God; that it was not till after some time that the promise of the Messiah was restricted to a particular family, and that a particular nation was favoured with peculiar privileges: we ought also, to remember that many persons among those called heathen nations, possessed the true knowledge of God; and were perhaps no less acceptable as worshippers, to him, than the Jews were, who to much information, and knowledge of their duty, made oftentimes but very ungracious and ungrateful returns.

It must be owned, nevertheless, that generally speaking, the heathen were sunk into gross idolatry, had adopted most impure modes of worship, were utterly averse from obedience to the holiness of God, and in short, exhibited the depravity of the human race in its most shocking forms. Nevertheless, from men thus depraved God eventually adopted a people to shew forth his praise, to be memorials of his mercy, and to glorify his grace, through the Messiah, who, though he was of the Jewish nation by descent, yet was the Messiah, the anointed, the chosen, the consecrated, on the behalf of all mankind, heathen as well as Jews; for God will justify the heathen through faith, while the Jews shall be punished for their unbelief. Vide GENTILES.

How long the heathen retained the true worship of God, to what degree, how far their attention and obedience to him were depraved, and whether they have now any expectation of a Messiah as their deliverer from sin, and their victim to mediate peace for them before God, are very important questions, but demand very extensive enquiries.]

HEAVEN. Heaven and Earth, Gen. i. 1. are used to denote all visible things.

(I.) HEAVEN is often taken for the air; birds of heaven, i. e. which fly in the air: waters of heaven, cataracts of heaven, i. e. rains from the atmosphere. God caused fire and brimstone to rain from heaven on Sodom; i. e. to fall from the air. Gen. xix. 24. The dew of heaven, the manna from heaven; the clouds of heaven, the winds of heaven; in all these, and similar phrases, heaven is put for the air.

(II.) THE CELESTIAL HEAVEN. The stars are placed in heaven: i. e. in the firmament. The Hebrews conceived of the heaven wherein the stars appear, as a solid and extended vault. "God placed the sun and moon in the firmament of heaven," Gen. i. 14, 15, 16, 17. The stars are the host of heaven. God, like a powerful monarch, calleth the stars by their names, and giveth them his orders. The God of the Hebrews is named, not only by the Jews, but also by heathen and foreigners, the God of heaven; because the Jews adored nothing visible, but said their God was in heaven; there was his throne, and there the seat of his sovereign dominion. Comp. ANCHIALUS.

(III.) THE HEAVEN OF HEAVENS is the highest heaven, as the song of songs is the most excellent song; the God of Gods, or the Lord of Lords, is the greatest of Gods, or the supreme of Lords. St. Paul mentions the third heaven, 2 Cor. xii. 2. which has always been considered as the place of God's residence, the dwelling of angels and blessed spirits.

For the Kingdom of Heaven, vide KINGDOM. HEAVINESS. Heavy. Heaviness of heart and ears; for hardness of heart, indolence. See HEART and EARS. Also FRAGMENT, No. CXC.

The heaviness of God's hand, or his hand lying heavy upon any one; denotes his wrath, his chastisements, his corrections. A heavy yoke, or a heavy weight, signifies slavery, servitude under cruel and merciless masters.

Populus gravis, a great people, a numerous assembly. Musca gravissima, a very troublesome multitude of flies. Populus iste gravis est mihi, this people is insupportable to me. Gravis nox, an uneasy night. Infirmis gravis, a dangerous disease. Gravis somnus, deep sleep. Multitudo gravis, a great multitude. Mandata gravia, commands hard to obey. Allegant onera gravia, they put heavy loads upon other people's shoulders. Matth. xxiii. 4, &c.

HEBER, עֲבֵר, one that passes, or a passage; otherwise, anger, wrath. Gen. x. 24.

HEBER, or EBER, son of Salah, was born A. M. 1723, ante A. D. 2281. Several have been of opinion, that from Heber, Abraham and his descendants were called Hebrews. But it is much more probable, that this name was given to Abraham and his family, because they came from beyond (over) the Euphrates into Canaan; Heber Heber in Hebrew, signifying beyond, or passage, i. e. of the river Euphrates. [or, of some other river, further east?] Why should Abraham, who was the sixth in generation from Heber, take his name from this patriarch, rather than from any other of his ancestors? Why not rather from Shem, for example, who is styled by Moses, the father of all the children of Heber, or of the other side of the Euphrates? Heber is not in any circumstance extolled in Scripture. Abraham is first called a Hebrew about ten years after his arrival in the land of Canaan, on occasion of the war with Chedorlaomer. The LXX. and Aquila translate Heberi, Perates, or Peraïtes, which signifies a passenger, one who came from beyond the river, Gen. xiv. 13. אֲבִרָהִי דְעִבְרִי LXX. Ἀβραῖα τῷ περάτῃ Aquil. τῷ περάτῃ. Vide Walton's Prologomena.

Both ancients and moderns are divided on the question, whether the Hebrew tongue derives its name from Heber, and whether, on the confusion of languages at Babel, it continued only in the family of Heber? As the confusion of languages was looked on as a punishment for the temerity of those who undertook to build this tower, there seems reason to presume that Heber's posterity, which seemed to be designed by God for the stock of the holy family, and the true religion, had no share in that undertaking, nor consequently in its punishment.

Two things are said in reply to this: 1. There is no proof that Heber's family was not concerned in building the tower of Babel. 2. The Hebrew tongue was the language of other people, who had no relation to Heber's family; for example, the Phœnicians or Canaanites, the Syrians and Philistines, in Abraham's time, spoke Hebrew, or a language little different from it.

Why then was it called the Hebrew tongue? was it because it was spoken beyond the Euphrates? as we have observed, that Abraham was called a Hebrew, because he came from beyond that river?

I answer, 1. There is a great probability, that this language was spoken in Chaldaea and Mesopotamia in Abraham's time, because when this patriarch came among the Canaanites, he was at no loss to make himself understood, or to understand the language of the country. And when Jacob went from the land of Canaan into Mesopotamia, he spoke, he understood, and was himself understood, without an interpreter. His two wives, Rachael and Leah, give their children Hebrew names. The names of the persons and places in these provinces, as well as those in Palestine, are Hebrew. It is not therefore improbable, that the Hebrew language was so called, because it was spoken beyond the Euphrates.

But it was spoken likewise on this side of that river, and with more purity, and for a longer time than in Chaldaea and Mesopotamia, as is proved by the monument erected on mount Gilead by Jacob and Laban, each of whom gave it a different name according to the language of each: which shews that even then the Syriac differed from the Hebrew or Phœnician: whereas, till the empire of the Greeks, the Hebrew, Canaanæan, and Phœnician, and the language of the Philistines and Samaritans, were in their purity in Palestine. There seems therefore to be reason for our asserting, that the Hebrew tongue is called so rather from the Hebrews, the descendants of Abraham, than from the people on the other side of the Euphrates, of whom few were descended from Heber. Besides, we are not to imagine, that the language which we call Hebrew, was known commonly by this name among the heathen. By them it was called the Phœnician, Syriac, or Judaic language. Among us it is celebrated as the Hebrew, or holy language, because it is the idiom wherein the divine oracles of the Old Testament are written. [N. B. It should seem that if Abraham were called a Hebrew, because he came from beyond the Euphrates, then the Hebrew language should be traced up to that country: but if the Hebrew language were named from a paternal stock, then the descendants from that stock might also derive their appellation from the same origin. Why not apply the same train of reasoning to both subjects?]

The letters which we now call ancient Hebrew letters, are rather Chaldean. The real Hebrew or Phœnician characters are preserved only on medals, and in the Pentateuch of the Samaritans. See SAMARITANS, and PLATES OF HEBREW COINS.

HEBER, חֶבֶר, companion, associate, friend, ally, enchanter: otherwise, wound, scar, swelling,; חֶבֶרָה חֶבֶרָה chaburah.

II. HEBER, the Kenite, of Jethro's family, husband to Jael, who killed Sisera. See the history, Judg. iv. 17, &c. Heber's tents and flocks were near the city of Hazor.

HEBREWS, Epistle to the, see PAUL, A. D. 63.

[Was there any distinction or prerogative generally attached to the appellation Hebrew, in the early days of the Gospel? St. Paul describes himself as a "Hebrew of the Hebrews," Phil. iii. 5. and the Grecians are said to murmur against the Hebrews, Acts vi. 1, though both parties were of the same nation. It seems likely therefore, that the residents in the Holy Land, at least, if not the whole nation, preferred the name of Hebrew, as more honourable than that of Jew; and that the term Jew was rather a foreign appellation imposed on them, especially ly out of their own country. This discovers a propriety in addressing, as most respectful, this Epistle "to the Hebrews," not "to the Jews." And it may be questioned whether the converts to Christianity did not retain this disposition; and rather decline being called Jews, as no longer professing Judaism; even while they acknowledged themselves to be Hebrews by descent from the father of the faithful.]

HEBRON, חֶבְרוֹן, Ἡρακλῶν, society, friendship, enchantment.

I. HEBRON, or CHEBRON, one of the most ancient of cities: built seven years before Tanis, the capital of Lower Egypt, Numb. xiii. 22. As the Egyptians gloried much in the antiquity of their cities, and their country was indeed among the first peopled after the dispersion from Babel, it may be concluded, that Hebron was extremely ancient. Some think, it was founded by Arba, an ancient giant of Palestine, and therefore was called Kirjath-arba, Arba's city, Josh. xiv. 15. which name was afterwards changed into Hebron. Arba was father of Anak, from whom the Anakim took their name: they dwelt at Hebron when Joshua conquered Canaan. Josh. xv. 13. Vide ARBA.

We cannot tell when it was first called Hebron: some think, not till it had been conquered by Caleb, and that he called it Hebron from one of his sons. But my opinion is, that the name of Hebron is more ancient; and that Caleb gave to his son the name of this ancient and celebrated place, [where, perhaps, he was born; or, born about the time the city came into Caleb's possession.]

Hebron was situated on an eminence, twenty miles southward of Jerusalem, and twenty miles north from Beersheba. Abraham, Sarah, and Isaac were buried near Hebron, in the cave of Machpelah, Gen. xxiii. 7, 8, 9. Near this place was the oak or turpentine tree, under which Abraham received three angels, Gen. xviii. 1. Eusebius, Sozomen, and other ancients, speak of the veneration not only of Christians, but of heathen, for this turpentine tree. It was reported to have been there ever since the beginning of the world; as if the matter were not sufficiently exaggerated, by saying, it had been there ever since the time of Abraham—above 2300 years. Others said, it was the staff of one of the angels, which had taken root in this place. Here was a fair, much resorted to; and this turpentine tree was thought to be incorruptible; because it seemed sometimes to be all in a flame, from a fire which was made about it, but did not consume it. [Q. the fire of Semiramis, FRAGMENT, No. CCLXXI ?]

Hebron was allotted to Judah. The Lord assigned it to Caleb for his inheritance, Josh. xiv. 13. Joshua first took Hebron, and killed its king, named Hoham, Josh. x. 3, 23, 37. But afterwards Caleb reconquered it, assisted by the troops of his tribe, and the valour of Othniel. It was appointed for a dwelling of the priests, and a city of refuge. David, after the death of Saul, settled his kingdom here. At Hebron Absalom began his rebellion. During the captivity of Babylon, the Edomites having invaded the south of Judah, took Hebron; wherefore in Josephus it is sometimes made a part of Edom. Here Zachariah and Elizabeth are believed to have dwelt, and John the baptist to have been born.

[The name is, I think, compounded of two ideas, cheber, the company, or consociation, i. e. of persons, whether travelling together, or settling together; and of Aun, the great progenitor:—"the Aun of society."

The inference seems to be, that this settlement was placed under the protection of this venerable personage, by those who here confederated themselves into a public society or township; and the early date of this town gives additional support to the idea, that the Aun commemorated was a person rather than an attribute.

Hebron is in a rocky situation, yet the Rabbins have a proverbial tradition, "Rams from Moab, lambs from Hebron." (Compare the expression of Absalom, 2 Sam. xv. 7.) The turf, say they, was fine, yielding excellent pasture. This town was visible from Jerusalem, and when it was enlightened by the dawn of morning, so that it could be seen from a station in the temple, the morning sacrifice was killed, &c. say the Rabbins. Is there any allusion to this custom, Luke i. 78 ?

The following testimony to the fertility of this neighbourhood agrees with that of the Rabbins, though the grass of the district be not particularly mentioned.

"From Bethlehem on the southern side, there is a small town called the Mesjed Ibrahim, or Temple of Abraham: and in the mosque where they pray on high feasts, are the burial-places of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, (may peace be on them!) and those of their wives are opposite. Here are many hills and trees; all the hills of Palestine are covered with trees; and there is much fruit, olives, and figs. Ibn Haukal, p. 40.

This is a clear testimony to the fertility of Palestine, as well as of Hebron, in the opinion of an Oriental.

The most particular account of this city which I know of, is given by D'Arvioux. I have, therefore, translated his narration of his journey from Bethlehem to Hebron. His character of the country agrees in determining its fertility.

"Quitting

"Quitting Bethlehem for Hebron, we entered on a difficult and rugged road, bordered on each side with vineyards, leaving on the right hand a village called Boticalli, where no Turk dare reside. The only inhabitants are Greeks, who cultivate the neighbouring lands, which are good and fertile, whereby they are wealthy and substantial.

"After a journey of some miles, we arrived at a monastery of Greeks, dedicated to St. George, whose chains and fetters perform miracles of healing. About a league from this monastery we saw the sealed fountain, whose waters Solomon conducted to the temple of Jerusalem, by means of a canal of stone, very solidly built, which still conveys them thither. A hundred paces eastward of the sealed fountain, is a reservoir and sources of water, whose streams encrease those which flow to Jerusalem. At length we arrived at the garden enclosed, but enclosed less by labour than by nature, the hills south and north of it being high and almost perpendicular. They are covered with aromatic plants.

"We left the main road about a league from Hebron, and turned to the left in order to see the valley of Mamre, where Abraham dwelt. The foundations, and some very thick walls of hewn stone, are all that remain of the church built here by the bishop of Jerusalem, in the days of Constantine.

"In approaching Hebron we saw the well of Jacob, and a vineyard called the field of Damascus, of the earth of which Adam is reported to have been made. A grotto is also shewn here, where Adam and Eve resided after their expulsion from Paradise; and where they wept over Abel, whom Cain slew at the end of this valley. The sepulchre of Caleb is shewn on a little hill.

"The city of Hebron is seven leagues from Jerusalem southward. It may boast of being one of the most ancient cities in the world. It formerly stood on a hill to the north, but has insensibly changed its site in the course of its various rebuildings. A castle now stands on its highest elevation; and this is its only defence. Its inhabitants are Mahometans, and lay heavy contributions on the few Jews whom they, not without difficulty, suffer to inhabit here. The Turks have so great a veneration for this city, that they admit into it neither wine nor brandy. Water only is drank in it. They call it El Katil, "the well beloved," which is one of the titles they give to Abraham.

"St. Helena built a magnificent church at the double cave, (or Machpelah) where the patriarchs were interred; and founded a bishopric, with a considerable revenue. There is at the entry a great kitchen, where a soup made of pulse and herbs is daily distributed, by the der-vises, to all comers who need it; in memory, it is said, of what passed between Jacob and Esau. We partook of it, but we could not enter into this handsome church, now changed into a mosque: admission being, therefore, forbidden to all but mussulmans.

"The entry of the double cavern is inside the church, and of course it is inaccessible to both Christians and Jews. Neither do the Turks themselves dare to enter it, for fear of losing their sight, which, they say, has happened to some who were over curious. By means of an opening, however, the first cavern may be inspected, in some degree, by the help of torches. At this opening both Christians and Jews address their prayers. The religious and pilgrims burn lamps and tapers before it, which smoke it sufficiently.

"The situation of this city is very agreeable, and its district is very fertile and plentiful. It abounds in vineyards, whose produce is excellent. The grapes are carried to Jerusalem, and make good wine. The country people make raisins of them, which are as yellow as gold, and of exquisite flavour. Generally speaking, the fruits have all the perfection that can be desired.

"There are in Hebron some manufactories of glass, of all colours. They make cups, bottles, flower-vases, &c. The city and its environs appertain to the government of Jerusalem, which maintains a Soubachi and a few soldiers to enforce the payment of its duties; but the populace is so mutinous that they rarely pay without force, and commonly a reinforcement from Jerusalem is necessary. The people are brave, and when in revolt extend their incursions as far as Bethlehem, and make amends by their pillage for what is exacted from them. They are so well acquainted with the windings of the mountains, and know so well how to post themselves to advantage, that they close all the passages, and exclude every assistance from reaching the Soubachi.

"In going out of Hebron we passed through the village of the Holy Virgin, so called, because tradition says, that here she rested when fleeing to Egypt to escape the wrath of Herod. The Turks dare not dwell here, believing that they could not live a week if they attempted it. The Greeks have a church in this village."

This mutinous character of this people, one would think, was but a continuation of their ancient disposition; which might render them fit instruments for serving David against Saul, and Absalom against David. The advantage they possess, in their knowledge of the passes, &c. accounts also for the protracted resistance which David made to Saul, and the necessity of that king's employing a considerable force in order to dislodge his adversary. David was so well aware of this advantage of station, that when Absalom had possessed himself of Hebron, he did not think of attacking him there, but fled in all haste from Jerusalem, northward.

Volney says, "Hebron is seven leagues south of Bethlehem: the Arabs have no other name for this village than El-kali, the well beloved, which is the epithet they usually apply to Abraham, whose sepulchral grotto they still shew. Hebron is seated at the foot of an eminence, on which are some wretched ruins, the mis-shapen remains of an ancient castle. The adjacent country is a sort of oblong hollow, five or six leagues in length; and not disagreeably varied by rocky hillocks, groves of fir trees, stunted oaks, and a few plantations of vines and olive trees. Trav. vol. ii. p. 324.]

II. HEBRON, son of Kohath, chief of a family. Exod. vi. 18.

HEBRONA, עֲבְרֹנָה, which passes, or is in anger. See HEBER.

[Possibly, "the passage over," whether of the Gulph of Eloth, of some mountain, or &c.]

HEBRONAH, or EBRONAH, an encampment of the Israelites, in the wilderness, between Jotbathah and Elath. Numb. xxxiii. 34, 35.

HEDGE-HOG. Hericius, Herinacens, Eri-cius, Gr. Χειρόγρυλλος. Charogryllus. A little quadruped, covered with sharp prickles. When alarmed whether by man, or dog, it rolls itself up, and thereby forms itself into a ball stuck round with sharp points; so that no one can touch it, without hurting himself. It lives in holes of the earth, and feeds on wild fruits. In Lev. xi. 5, the hedge-hog is declared unclean, because it does not divide the hoof. The Hebrew Shaphan, which the LXX. and Vulgate render Charogryllus, signifies according to some, a coney; others say a hare; Bochart says, a certain large rat, common in Arabia, and edible, called Aharbuho. [Al Jerboa.]

Shaphan occurs in Psal. civ. 18. where the LXX. translate it Lagoos, which may signify a hare, a coney, or a hedge-hog. Some old Latin Psalters read, Petra refugium leporibus, others Herinacis; as our present copies. St. Jerom takes it for a sort of rat living in Palestine, about the size of a hedge-hog, in shape almost like a bear, which lives in holes and hollows of the rocks. [The ASHKOKO of Mr. BRUCE. See the PLATES: SHAPHAN.]

HEGAI, or HEGSE, הָגַי, meditation, word, taking away, separation, groaning; from הָגָה chagah. This name is Persian, and therefore its true etymology is not in the Hebrew. Esther's eunuch. Esth. ii. 8.

HEIFER, Red Heifer, Sacrifice of. The order for this service is in Numb. xix.

Spencer believes this ceremony to have been instituted in opposition to Egyptian superstition. The Egyptians never sacrificed heifers; and the Hebrews generally sacrificed males only. The Egyptians abhorred red hair, and all red animals: the Hebrews made no distinction in the colour of victims except on this occasion. Jerom, Epist. 27. and others, thought the red heifer was sacrificed yearly, and the ashes of it distributed among the towns and cities of Israel. But some of the Rabbins maintain, that only one was burnt from Moses to Esdras; and from Esdras to the destruction of the temple by the Romans only six, or at most nine. Jerom informs us, that this ceremony was always performed on the Mount of Olives, directly over against the temple, after the ark was fixed at Jerusalem; the Jews say, that after the building of the temple, the high-priest always sacrificed this victim. [Comp. FRAGMENTS. No. CXXXII.—Also, the "red-coloured ox;" Article APIS. It is by no means likely that a single quantity of ashes could suffice for the many millions of persons who were polluted by the dead, during the interval from Moses to Ezra.]

Some authors suppose the sacrifice of the red heifer was one of those offered in the name of all the people. It was required to be without blemish or defect; its blood was sprinkled seven times toward the entrance of the tabernacle; the whole body was burnt intirely; the ashes were used in purifying from pollution contracted by touching any dead body, &c.

The red heifer, says Abrabanel, was a sacrifice for the sins of the whole people of Israel. It may be called, I think, a sacrifice for sin, but not, in my opinion, an oblation, because that name is proper only to what was offered solemnly to God on the altar of burnt-offerings. The same judgment should be made of that other heifer, whose head was cut off, for the expiation of murder by persons unknown. This sacrifice cannot be called an oblation, because not made on the altar of burnt offerings; nevertheless, it was a real sacrifice for sin, since by it an atonement was made for a crime.

The red heifer sacrificed without the camp was a figure of Jesus Christ, whose blood cleanses our consciences from all sins. Heb. ix. 13.

[When the red heifer was burned without the camp, its ashes were gathered and preserved in a clean place without the camp. Part of them were occasionally put into water, with which every one who had contracted legal defilement was to be sprinkled; on pain of being cut off from the congregation. It was a water of separation: it is no where said in Scripture, that this water was used on the grand day of expiation, if we except that of the apostle. But since since it is called a purification for sin, (Numb. xix. 9.) and was always used when particular persons stood in need of cleansing, we have reason to think it was used also on that solemn day when the main body of the people were cleansed. A. H.]

HEIFERS. As the words ox and bull, in their figurative sense, signify rich and powerful persons, the great who live in affluence, who forget God, and condemn the poor; so by heifers are meant women who are rich, delicate, and voluptuous, who make pleasure their god. So Amos iv. 1. "Hear this, ye kine of Bashan, that are in the mountains of Samaria, which oppress the poor, and which crush the needy; which say to their masters, Bring and let us drink." And Hosea iv. 16. "For Israel slideth back, as a back-sliding heifer."

The prophets frequently call the golden calves of Jeroboam by the name of heifers. So Hosea, x. 5. The inhabitants of Samaria shall fear because of the calves of Bethaven. The LXX. and after them Josephus and the Greek fathers call them golden heifers. The Hebrew Hegel signifies properly a calf; but the Hebrews without question designed in this to imitate the Egyptians, who worshipped Apis. Vide CALF GOLDEN.

The prophets Isaiah, xv. 5. and Jeremiah, xlviii. 3, 4. give the cities of Zoar and Horonaim the epithets of "calves" or "heifers of three years old;" which in the opinion of some, denotes their vivacity and indocility, q. d. they are cities not to be governed, not to be brought under the yoke. Others infer, that the strength and vigour of Zoar and Horonaim are meant; q. d. these cities know their own strength, and will not be subdued. In our opinion, the Hebrew words Agla and Shalisha,—"a heifer of three years old," denote two cities; one called Beth-agla, the other Baal-Shalisha. The first was on the Dead Sea, Joshua xv. 6. xviii. 19, 21. the other is mentioned 1 Sam. ix. 4. and 2 Kings iv. 42. Vide ZOAR. [and the addition to BAAL SHALISHA.]

In the prophetic style, the Gentile nations are sometimes compared to heifers. Egypt is like a very fair heifer: but destruction cometh, it cometh out of the north. Jer. xlv. 20. He means the Chaldeans, who were to subdue Egypt. Hosea, says, x. 11. Ephraim is an heifer that is taught, and loveth to tread out the corn, to live in plenty: but I will tame her, and force her to submit to be yoked.

Sampson, Judges xiv. 18. accuses the young men, his bride-men, with abusing the easiness of his wife, to get his secret out of her: If ye had not ploughed with my heifer, ye had not found out my riddle. Moses ordains, Deut. xxi. 3. that if a murdered body be found, within the liberties of any city, and the murderer be not known, the elders and judges shall sacrifice a heifer in that place. Vide MURDER.

[HEIR, a person who succeeds by right of inheritance to an estate, property, &c. But the principles of heirship in the East differ from what are common among us; so that children do not wait (always) till their parents are dead, before they receive their portions: hence, when Christ is called, heir of all things, it does not imply the death of any former possessor of all things; and when saints are called heirs of the promise, of righteousness, of the kingdom, of the world, of God, joint heirs with Christ, it implies merely participants in such or such advantages, but no de cease of any party in possession would be understood by those to whom these passages were addressed; though among ourselves there is no actual heirship till the parent, or proprietor, be departed. Vide INHERITANCE.]

HELAH, חֵלָה, Ἑλαά, infirmity; from חָלָה, chaluh: otherwise, scum, rust; from חָלָה chala. [ornament, or necklace. Wife of Ashur, 1 Chr. iv. 5. 7.]

HELAM, חֵילָם or חֵלָאָם Chalaam, their army, or their trouble, their strength; from חָיַל hail, or chail, an army, trouble, strength, and the pronoun ך am, theirs; otherwise, expectation; from חָלַל cholel: otherwise, dream; from חָלַם chalam, to doze, to dream.

HELAM, a place celebrated for a defeat of the Syrians by David, wherein he took their horses and chariots. 2 Sam. x. 17. but 1 Chron. xix. 17. instead of Helam, (of which city we have no knowledge) reads אֶלְחֵם Alchem, i. e. David fell upon them; which is probably the best reading.

[It was a place of rendezvous for the Syrian troops. 2 Sam. x. 16. The name, therefore, should seem to denote the place of assembling for the purpose of being trained in the use of arms: the great, or national parade, or drill-grounds. In verse 16 it is written Chilem; in verse 17. Chelam. It may be considered as differing from mahanaim, camps; because it accommodated recruits, not soldiers.]

HELBAH, חֵלְבָה, milk, or fatness; from חָלַב chalab: otherwise, he has dwelt in her; from חָלַל chul, to abide, and the preposition ב beth, in, and the pronoun ה ah, her.

[Fat, corpulent, being the import of this root when applied to persons; the probability is, that when applied to places, it denotes a fat soil. Comp. Gen. xlv. 18. and, indeed, that the whole soil of Asher was fat, appears from Gen. xlix. 20. Deut. xxxiii. 24.]

HELBAH, or CHELBA, a city of Asher, Judg. i. 31. might it not be Helbon in Syria, which could not be far from Damascus?

HELDAL, הַלְדַּי, or הַלְדִּי, the world, &c.

I. HELDAL, Zechariah received orders from God, to demand of Heldai, and others, gold to make crowns for Joshua son of Josedeck. Zech. vi. 10, 11.

II. HELDAL, of the twelve captains appointed by David to do duty at the palace, with the 24,000 men which they commanded. Heldai waited in the twelfth month.

HELEB, son of Baanah, a gallant officer in David's army. 2 Sam. xxiii. 29.

HELEK, חֶלֶק, portion, lightness, slippery. Son of Gilead, of Manasseh, chief of a family. Numb. xxxi. 30.

HELEM, חֶלֶם, he that dreams, or cures; otherwise, their expectation, or their trouble; from חֹלֶל cholel, or חִיל chil, and נָא am, theirs. [fat. Zach. vi. 14. Comp. Job xxxiv. 4.]

HELEM, חֶלֶם, bruising. 1 Chron. vii. 35.

HELENA, sister and wife of Monobazus king of the Adiabeniens; she embraced the religion of the Jews, with Izates her son, the successor of Monobazus, Joseph. Antiq. lib. xx. cap. 2. Coming to Jerusalem, she directed a palace to be built there, in the lower part of the city, where she dwelt till the death of Izates, De Bello. lib. vi. cap. 16. In a severe famine which wasted Judæa, she employed great sums of money in relieving the poor. Paulus Orosius insists that she embraced Christianity.

This famine was in A. D. 44; the same with that foretold by Agabus, Acts xi. 28, 29, 30.

HELEPH, חֶלֶף, Μετέφ, passage, change; or to trace, to cleave; to pierce, to cut. A city of Naphtali. Josh. xix. 33. Called Meheleph in Heb. LXX. and Eusebius.

[Being a place at the edge of the tribe of Naphtali, Josh. xix. 33. some suppose it signifies the passage from one tribe to the other. It may, however, denote a passage of a different kind, as over a rivulet, by fording, or over a bridge, or, &c.]

HELEZ, חֶלֶץ, armed, or spoiled and discomfited. A valiant man of David's army, 2 Sam. xxiii. 26. called Helez the Pallite; but 1 Chron. xi. 27. Helez the Pelonite.

HELIODORUS, Ἡλιόδωρος, gift of the sun; compounded of ἥλιος, the sun, and δῶρον, a gift.

HELIODORUS, prime minister to Seleucus Philopator king of Syria, sent by his master to Jerusalem, to carry off the treasures from the temple, 2 Macc. iii. 7, 8, &c. When he came to Jerusalem, and declared the occasion of his journey, the high-priest represented to him, that the money belonged to Hircanus son of Joseph, and grandson of Tobias, governor of the country beyond Jordan for Seleucus, who levied the tribute-money, which was paid there for the king's use; that the rest was money deposited in trust for private persons, which could not be touched without injustice, says Joseph. Antiq. lib. xii. cap. 4. Heliodorus insisted on obeying the king's orders, and appointed a day to inspect the temple, and take away the wealth.

When he entered the temple, the consternation was very great over the whole city, and particularly among the priests. But says the history, a terrible person appeared on horse-back; and his horse fell impetuously on Heliodorus, while two resplendent young men richly clad, stood on each side of Heliodorus, and beat him. Heliodorus was thrown down, and became insensible, and was carried in this condition out of the temple: afterwards, the high-priest Onias was intreated to offer sacrifice, and prayers, for the restoration of his life and health: which he effected.

Heliodorus having offered sacrifice, made great promises, and returned to king Seleucus at Antioch, to whom he related what had befallen him; the king asking him, whom he thought proper to be sent to Jerusalem? he answered, "If you have any enemy, or one whom you would get rid of, send him thither; for there is certainly some divine power in this temple. Josephus ben Gorion, says Heliodorus turned Jew."

HELIOPOLIS, Ἡλιόπολις, compounded of ἥλιος, the sun, and πόλις, a city. The Hebrew On, or Aun, signifies riches, iniquity.

I. HELIOPOLIS, mentioned Genesis xli. 45. and Ezekiel xxx. 17. called On. This city was situated on the Nile, half a day's journey from Babylon in Egypt. Strabo lib. xvi. speaks of ancient temples and obelisks, shewn here in his time, and great houses belonging to the priests, though the city was then deserted.

Beside this Heliopolis, there was in Egypt another Heliopolis situated between the town of Cairo, Copte, and the Red Sea, D'Herbelot Bibl. Orient. p. 274. assures us, that the Arabian writers call the city of Coos, Ain-al-Schams, i. e. fountain of the sun; or Heliopolis, city of the sun. He believes it to be the ancient Thebes in Upper Egypt: he says, the Arabian geographers place it in long. 61° 30'; lat. 23° 30'. Dapper places Heliopolis 7,000 paces east of Cairo, and near the village of Matarea, very far from the famous Thebes. The name of Heliopolis is said to have been given it by reason of a temple dedicated to the sun, wherein was a looking glass so disposed, that it reflected the rays of that luminary all day long, and enlightened the whole temple with great splendor.

Onias, son of Onias III. having retired from Judea into Egypt, and won the good graces of Ptolemy Philometor, and his wife Cleopatra, obtained obtained permission to build a temple at Helio-polis, like that of Jerusalem, for the use of the Jews settled in Egypt. See ONION.

[HELIOPOLIS, the city of the Sun; in the Hebrew called On, or Aun, was not far from the present Cairo. It still retains the name of Heliub, though some think Matarea, its neighbour, may be the true On. It is famous for a fine obelisk, still standing, of considerable size, and nearly seventy feet in height, covered with hieroglyphics, but not equal in execution to some remaining in the south of Egypt. Several others, which formerly stood here, have been carried to Rome, or to Constantinople. This city was also famous for a temple of the sun. A fountain of excellent water contributed to its celebrity. Niebuhr places Matarea about two leagues from Cairo; and says it is famous among the Christians for a sycamore, whose trunk is said to have afforded shelter to the holy family when in Egypt. This sycamore should seem to have the power of renewing itself, for of the crowds of superstitious persons who visit it, each usually cuts off and carries away a piece. This village was formerly famous for the cultivation of those trees which produced Egyptian balsam. The last died in the beginning of the seventeenth century. Ibn Haukal says, "Ainal-Shems, or Fountain of the Sun, lies to the south of Fostat." It is mentioned by most modern travellers; Denon, Dr. E. D. Clarke, &c.]

II. HELIOPOLIS, a city in Coele-Syria, between Libanus and Antilibanus, Laodicea and Abila, otherwise Baalbeck, or Malabeck. Here was a famous temple dedicated to the sun, or God Balanus, magnificent remains whereof are still visible. [Vide the superb "Ruins of Balbec," by Mr. Wood] In my opinion, this is the city meant by the prophet Amos, i. 5. I will cut off the inhabitants of the idol's camp, Heb. of Bikath-aven, or the valley of iniquity: he calls Bikath-aven that city which the heathen call Bikath-Baal, and which at present is named Baal-beck, the valley of Baal. Vide FRAGMENT, No. CCCIV "VALLEY OF BACA."

HELCATH, חלקת, portion, division, partition, or that which is softened, made sweet, from חלק chalak, to soften, to slip. A city of Asher, given to the Levites of Gershom's family. Josh. xxi. 31.

[Josh. xix. 25. xxi. 31. it is written Helkath. Hiller thinks it is the same as Helkath hazzurim, 2 Sam. ii. 19, which he understands as importing the "field of the sharp" fighters. It is probable, that this gladiator-like combat took place in a level and convenient spot of ground, in a close, as we call it, referring to a field; and this seems to be the import of the word, Helkath. Tzurim I would willingly take in the sense of our word flints, importing persons who did not give way when attacked: it implies knives of flint, Exod. iv. 25. Josh. v. 2. and the unabating, unyielding temper of a sword, Psalm lxxxix. 44. It also imports a rock; frequently. "Helkath of the unyielding warriors;" "the place of sepulchre of the combat-enduring flints."]

HELL, Infernus; Heb. שאול, Scheol. Greek ᾍδης. This word signifies often the grave, a depth under the earth, where the bodies of the dead rest: Sepulchrum. Jacob says, "he shall go down into the grave, or into hell," Gen. xxxvii. 35. Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, were swallowed up by the earth, and descended quick into hell; i. e. they were buried alive, Numb. xvi. 30, 33. Thou wilt not leave my soul [נפשי, my person, my SELF,] in hell, says the Psalmist, xvi. 10. thou wilt not suffer my body to putrify in the grave.

II. HELL is often put for a place; the residence of the souls of men after separation from the body. Isaiah, xiv. 9. speaking to the king of Babylon, says, "Hell from beneath is moved for thee, to meet thee at thy coming; it stirreth up the dead for thee, even all the chiefs of the earth." Ezekiel, xxxi. 15. speaks much the same to the king of Egypt: "In the day when the king of Assyria went down to hell, I caused a mourning, I covered the deep for him . . . They who were before in the nether parts of the earth were comforted at his arrival." In these subterraneous places, the giants groan under the waters, according to Job's expression, xxvi. 5. Here the rich man was, after being buried, Luke xvi. 2. The rebellious angels were cast down into Hell, and delivered into chains of darkness, 2 Pet. ii. 4.

The learned are divided as to the origin, and authors of those descriptions of Hell, Tartarus, the Elysian Fields, &c. which we read in the Greek and Latin fathers, concerning the state of souls separated from the body. Some pretend, that the ancient Jews acknowledged only temporal rewards and punishments for virtue and vice. The law seems to promise no other: It threatens untimely and ignominious death: cutting off or extermination, excommunication, extinction of families, barrenness in the land, captivity and slavery, a heaven of brass, and an earth of iron, &c. but not hell and eternal death. It promises long life, a numerous family, plentiful harvests, fruitful flocks, profound peace; victory, riches, plenty, honours, but not eternal life, glory, paradise, &c.

Some of the learned are of opinion, that after the Jews became conversant with the Greeks, they enquired into the representations of Homer and other poets of Hell, Tartarus, and the Elysian Fields; and that their doctors were divided in their sentiments; some adopting the Greek notions, notions, others adhering to the ancient opinions of their nation. And this division produced, they say, those sects which afterwards appeared among the Jews: the Pharisees and Essenians favoured the opinions of the Greeks, the Sadducees maintained their ancient Jewish traditions.

Others think, the Jews received these opinions rather from the Persians and Egyptians, than from the Greeks; because they obtained among them also, and there is a general prepossession, that the religion of the Greeks was derived from Egypt. These authors agree in their judgment of the Jews borrowing from other people, their representations of hell and paradise; which the Christians received from them.

But on examination of the Hebrew writings, we shall find them coinciding with the ancient Greeks, Homer, Hesiod, and others their most ancient poets. Job, the Psalmist, Solomon, Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel, very clearly mention hell as a place where the wicked are detained. Moses himself supposes "a fire which is kindled in God's anger, and shall burn unto the lowest hell, and shall consume the earth with her increase, and set on fire the foundation of the mountains," Deut. xxxii. 22. And Deut. xxx. 15. "I have set before thee this day life and good, and death and evil." It is evident, that good men are not always rewarded in this life, neither are the wicked adequately punished. Moses therefore intended to point out another life, and another death, other goods, and other evils. And if the Hebrews expected nothing after death, why should Balaam desire that his end might resemble theirs? "Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his." Numb. xxiii. 10.

It is agreed, that Job lived pretty near the time of Moses: and though there may be difficulty in ascertaining the author of the poem, some attributing it to Job himself, others to Moses, others to Solomon, and others to Isaiah; yet we have reason to believe, that the writer expressed the sentiments of Job; such as they were at that time received in his country; and among the Edomites, or Arabians. Now he distinctly describes hell: saying, that those wicked wretches of old, who corrupted the ways of nature by their sins, and whose abominations occasioned the general deluge,—that these giants groan under the waters, and they who dwell with them: the place of their punishment, Hell, is naked before God, and destruction hath no covering, Job xxvi. 5. "Drought and heat consume the snow-waters; so doth the grave, or hell, those which have sinned," Job xxiv. 19, 20. This is previous to the heathen poets, who relate that to punish their rebellion against Jupiter, the giants were plunged under the waters, and imprisoned under mountains,

Solomon, who is more ancient than the Greek authors, speaks of hell almost in the same manner as Job: Libertine women, he says, allure fools to pleasures, but they perceive not that this is the way to hell, where the giants have their abode, Prov. ix. 18. [in our English translation, "he knoweth not that the dead are there," which diversity of interpretation proceeds from the different signification of the same word דָּוָם, which may be rendered either giants, or the dead. The corresponding word in the Septuagint is Τῆγγνεις: in Theodotion's version Τῖγαντες] and that they who eat at the table of a debauched woman, go into the depths of hell. He says, Prov. ii. 18. "That the house of a harlot inclineth unto death, and that her paths lead to hell, or to the giants . . . and that none who go unto her return again," Prov. v. 5.—"that her feet go down to death, and her steps take hold on hell," Prov. vii. 27. "Her house is the way to hell, going down to the chambers of death," Prov. xv. 11. And again, "Hell and destruction are before the Lord, how much more then the hearts of the children of men?" Here hell, and the abode of the giants, are represented as a place where profligates, and adulterers are punished. This certainly was no imitation from Homer, or Hesiod, much less from Virgil, no more than that other passage, Prov. xxi. 16. "The man that wandereth out of the way of understanding, shall remain in the congregation of the giants:" in cœtu gigantum. Comp. FRAGMENT No CCXI.

If we could ascertain that all the psalms were David's, we might find excellent proofs in those divine hymns, against those who pretend, that the ancient Jews had no distinct idea of hell; but supposing the author of the lxxxviii psalm to have lived no earlier than the captivity of Babylon, it would still be very certain, that he did not borrow his notions of hell from any Greek writings. He addresses himself to God, "Wilt thou shew wonders to the dead? shall the dead arise and praise thee?" (Heb.) "Shall the Rephaim rise to publish thy praises? shall the old giants come forth out of hell to praise thee?" He adds, "shall thy wonders be known in in the dark? and thy righteousness in the land of forgetfulness?" Here hell, destruction, and forgetfulness are synonymous. The very bea-then placed the river Lethe, or of forgetfulness, in hell; and maintained, that the dead drank of it, in order to lose their remembrance of life

VIRGIL, ÆNEID. 6.

The prophet Isaiah was nearly contemporary with Hesiod and Homer; Ezekiel lived some time after them: but it may be affirmed on very good grounds, that these prophets had no knowledge either of their persons or writings: that they speak of hell, and the state of the dead, at least as clearly as those poets do, and in expressions almost similar. Isaiah, lxvi. 24. mentions the fire of the damned which never is extinguished; the worm which gnaws them and dies not; and the insupportable stench which every way surrounds them; literally, they shall be an abhorring unto all flesh. The same prophet says, chap. xxvi. 14, 19. "The dead shall not live, they are deceased, they shall not rise: therefore hast thou visited and destroyed them, and made all their memory to perish." Here therefore they are represented to be in hell, and in a state of oblivion. "But thy dead men (the Israelites) shall live, together with my dead body shall they arise: awake, and sing ye that dwell in dust; for thy dew is as the dew of herbs, and thou shalt destroy the land of the giants;" rather, according to the Hebrew, "thou shalt cast down the land of the giants." "Thou shalt overwhelm thine enemies the giants with the earth which shall fall upon them, and close the mouth of the great deep upon them." Compare Ezek. xxxi. 10. Lament. iii. 5. Psalm lxxiii. 16. with what the poets say of the gates of hell, and the difficulty of going out of it.

The same Isaiah, xiv. 9, &c. speaking of the king of Babylon's fall, says to him, Hell from beneath is moved for thee: here we have a prosopopœia, very like those which occur in the poets and prophane authors, who describe hell and the Elysian fields.

Ezekiel is still more express, (xxx. 15, 16.) In the day when the Assyrian went down to the grave, I caused a mourning: I shut the entrance of the deep upon him, (that he might not get out.) They also went down into hell with him, unto them that be slain with the sword, and they that were his arm, that dwell under his shadow in the midst of the heathen . . . Thou shalt be brought down with the trees of Eden unto the nether parts of the earth, thou shalt lie with them that be slain by the sword."

He afterwards addresses his discourse to the king of Egypt, and tells him, he "must descend into hell with others: with Ashur and all her company, all of them slain, fallen by the sword; Elam, Meshech, and Tubal, and all her multitude, which are gone down to hell with their weapons of war; and they have laid their swords under their heads, &c. Ezek. xxxii. 18.

Here as well as in the poets, the dead retain in hell the marks of their profession, and the instruments of their inclinations. The heroes of the prophet wear their swords in hell, and place them under their bolsters: in Virgil they have their horses, chariots, arms, and exercises in the Elysian fields,

Quæ gratia currûm
Armorumque fuit vlvïs; quæ cura nitentes
Pascere equos, eadem sequitur tellure repostos.

The Essenians, of whom Josephus (de Bello, lib. ii. cap. 12. & Antiq. lib. xviii. cap. 2.) gives us so advantageous an idea, entertained almost the same opinions as the heathen, in relation to departed souls. They held the soul to be immortal, that as soon as it was released from the body, it soared with great joy towards heaven; freed, as it were, from a long bondage, and loosed from the ties of earth: that the souls of good men went beyond the ocean to a place of delight and rest; but those of the wicked, to places exposed to all possible injuries, where they suffer eternal torments. Josephus adds, that from these ideas, the Greek poets seem to him to have forged the delicious abodes of their heroes and demi-gods, and the punishments and tortures of the wicked, in hell under the dominion of Pluto: i. e. their Elysium and Tartarus.

The Jews place hell in the center of the earth: they call it the deep, and destruction; they believe it to be situated under waters and mountains: they likewise term it often Gehennon, or Gehenna, which signifies the valley of Hinnon, or the valley of the sons of Hinnon, which was, as it were, the common sewer of Jerusalem, where children were sacrificed to Moloch. See GEHENNA. The heathen, in like manner, believed the place of torture to be in the deepest part of the earth:

Tum Tartarus ipse
Bis patet in præceptis tantùm, tenditque sub umbras, Quantus ad æthereum cœli suspectus olympum.
VIRGIL, ÆNEID. vi. ver. 576.

The gates of Hell, mentioned by our Saviour, Matt. xvi. 18. signify the power of hell; for the eastern people call the palaces of their princes—gates. There are three, say the Jews, belonging

ing to hell: the first is in the wilderness, and by that Korah, Dathan, and Abiram descended into hell: The second is in the sea; for it is said that Jonah, who was thrown into the sea, cried to God out of the belly of hell, Jonah ii. 3. The third is in Jerusalem; for Isaiah tells us, that the fire of the Lord is in Sion, and his furnace in Jerusalem, Isa. xxxi. 9. [1. Earth; 2. water; 3. fire. These are evidently three modes of death, or destruction.] These remarks are but trifling: it is certain, however, that Pythagoras and the poets speak of the gates of hell. [Comp. PLATES: HADES.]

Porta adversa ingens, solidoque adamant columnæ,
Vis ut nulla virum, non ipsi excindere ferro
Cœlicolæ valeant.

VIRGIL. ÆNEID. vi.

The Hebrews acknowledged seven degrees of pains in hell, because they find this hell called by seven different names in Scripture; and are persuaded, that there is a great diversity in the pains suffered by the damned. Christians have likewise owned degrees of suffering: but no one ever thought of determining their number. It is very credible that it is as infinite, as the degrees of men's demerits.

Beside the torment of fire, which is that of sense, and acknowledged by Mussulmen as well as by Christians, divines acknowledge likewise the pœna damni, which is the most terrible, and without which the other would be inconsiderable: this is—a hopeless separation from God, a privation of his sight, and of the beatific vision: herein consists the utmost extremity of punishment.

The eternity of hell-torments is acknowledged throughout Scripture: the fire of the damned will never be extinguished, nor their worm die. But the Jews believe, that some among them, will not continue for ever in hell. They maintain that every Jew, not infected with some heresy, and who has not acted contrary to certain points mentioned by the Rabbins, is not above a year in purgatory; and that infidels only, or people eminently wicked, remain perpetually in hell. Every one knows Origin's opinion, that the torments of the damned were not eternal. Manasseh Ben Israel, de Resurrect lib. ii. cap. 1. names three sorts of persons who would be damned eternally; 1. Atheists, who deny the existence of God; 2. They who deny the divine authority of the law: 3. They who reject the resurrection of the dead. These people, though otherwise of moral lives, will be punished with endless tortures. Other Rabbins, such as Maimonides, Abrabanel, &c. assert, that after a certain time, the souls of wicked men will be annihilated.

As the happiness of paradise is expressed in Scripture under the idea of a feast or wedding, surrounded by abundant light, joy, and pleasure, so hell is represented in the New Testament as a place of dismal darkness, where is nothing but grief, sadness, vexation, rage, despair, and gnashing of teeth; like that of a person excluded, or during the obscurity of night, and the severity of nocturnal cold, driven from the place of entertainment, where he had pleased himself with the thoughts of being admitted.

The Rabbins acknowledge three different sorts of torments in hell, cold, heat, and despair. Cold and fire are noticed, Job xxiv. 19. Ad nimium calorem transeat ab aquis nivium. Let him return from the cold of snow-water to excessive heat. The 4th of Esdras, places the souls of the damned between fire and water (fire on the right, and water on the left hand), equally tormented by both. The Rabbins believe, that God took from hell the fire wherewith he burnt Sodom, and the water wherewith he overflowed the earth at the deluge. The heathen also imagined a river of fire in hell, and another as cold as ice, which they called Phlegeton and Acheron; they said too, that some of the Titans were tormented with fire, and others with water,

Aliis sub gurgite vasto
Infestum eluitur scelus, aut exuritur igni.

VIRGIL. ÆNEID. vi.

The regret, remorse, and despair of the damned, are expressed by the Rabbins under the name of disorder in the soul: this is what Isaiah, lxvi. 24. and after him the gospel, Mark ix. 43, 45. means by that worm which gnaws and does not die. Vide FIRE of HELL.

The Mussulmen, says D'Herbelot, (Bibl. Orient. Article Gehennem) have borrowed the name Gehennem or Gehim, from the Jews and Christians, to signify hell; Gehennem in Arabic signifies a very deep ditch; and Gehim an ugly and deformed man; they say Ben-Gehennem, a son of hell, a reprobate. The angel who presides in hell, they call Thabeck.

As the Jews acknowledge seven degrees of torments in hell, so do the Mussulmen seven gates; (Alcoran, chap. of the Stone), which is the opinion of several commentators, who suppose Mussulmen to be in the first degree of torment, called Gehennem. The second named Ladha, is for Christians. The third, Hothama, for Jews. The fourth, Sair, for the Sabians. The fifth, Sacar, for the Magians, or Guebres, worshippers of fire. The sixth, Gehim, for pagans and idolaters. The seventh, the deepest part of the Abyss, is named Haoviath, and is reserved for hypocrites, who disguise their religion, and conceal another in their heart, different from that which they profess.

Others explain these seven gates of hell, as denoting denoting the seven deadly sins: others as the seven principal members of the body, which are the seven principal instruments of impiety. So a Persian poet speaks, you have the seven gates of hell in your body; but the soul may make seven locks for these gates, whose key is your free-will, which may be used so effectually by you, as firmly to close these gates, that they may never more open for your destruction.

HELLENISTS, Ἑλληνισταί, from ἔλλην, a Greek.

HELLENISTS, "the Grecians," Acts vi. 1, &c. et al. Those were called Hellenistical Jews, who lived in cities and provinces where the Greek tongue was native; and not being much accustomed to Hebrew or Syriac, they generally used the Greek Version of the LXX. both in public, and private; which was disapproved of by Hebraizing Jews, who could not endure that the Holy Scriptures should be read in any language beside their original Hebrew.

[This was not the only difference between the Hellenistical and Hebraizing Jews, the latter reproached their brethren with reading scripture after the Egyptian manner, i. e. from the left to the right; whereas the Rabbins say, that as the sun moves from east to west, so they should read from the right hand to the left. This difference, however, produced no schism or separation. Salmasius indeed endeavours to prove, that they never read the bible in Greek; and he gives this reason for his assertion, viz. because they never read it in Arabic, a language which the Jews were much more generally acquainted with than Greek. See Salmasius, Fusus Linguae Hellenisticæ: and for the contrary opinion, Morin, Exercitatio Biblicæ, and Vossius, de LXX. Interpret.]

The Hellenists were not known till the establishment of the Greek empire in the east. Sometimes they are called simply, Hellenes, Greeks; and sometimes Hellenistæ, in the New Testament (for I do not find this last word in the Maccabees, or in the Old Testament,) Acts vi. 1, ix. 29, xi. 20. Basnage, Histoire des Juifs, tom. v. cap. 19. [Vide HEBREWS.]

[HELMET, a defensive armour for the head; for the form of it, &c. vide ARMOUR, PLATE I. FRAGMENTS, No. CCXVIII.]

HELON, הלון, ὅλα, window: otherwise, profanation; from חלל chalah: otherwise, sickness or infirmity; from חלה chalah. Father of Eliab, of Zebulun. Numb. i. 9.

HEMAN, המן, much, or in great number: otherwise, tumult; from המה hamah trouble: or, according to the Syriac, faithful: otherwise, faith, trust, confidence; from המין amen.

HEMAN, the Ezrahite. In 1 Kings iv. 31. we find Ethan, Eman, Chalcol, and Darda, sons of Mahol, eminent musicians belonging to the temple in Solomon's time. In 1 Chron. ii. 6, we find Zimri, Ethan, Eman, Calcol, and Darda, sons of Zerah, and grandsons of Judah. I have some suspicions, that transcribers have confounded the descendants of Mahol, with those of Zerah, and by mistake have given Eman or Heman, son of Mahol, the surname of Ezrahite, as if he were son of Zerah.

HEMDAN, המדן, Ἀβαδᾶ, called אמרן Amram, 1 Chron. i. 41. — רֶשֶׁת resh, instead of דֹּלֶת daleth. Desire, or heat of judgment; from חם cham or chum, heat, and נָחַם chemed, desired, lust, and דִּין din, judgment. Son of Dishon, descendant of Sehir the Horite. Gen. xxxvi. 26.

HEMONA, המונה, Καραφα, or Καφαρραμωνα, Vulgate, Emona. Popular, or of our people; from חם ham, a people, and נֹחַ noach, ours.

HEMONA, or VILLA HEMONA, or HAAMONAI, a city of Benjamin. Josh xviii. 24.

[HEMONA, or HAAMMONAI, Chephar-haamonai, of Eng. Tr. Chephar is probably the same as Caphar, in Capher-naum, &c. signifying a village. Hemona, say some, is of the people, or of our people; others say, of a great people: but the Ketibh reads "of the Ammonites," and there is no improbability that a village should be settled by this people, and derive its name from them: or that, originally, it should have been a colony of Ammonites.]

HEN, הן, Vulgate, Hem, grace; from חן chen: and pity; from חנן chanan: otherwise, quiet, or rest; from חנה chanah.

HEN, son of Zephaniah, in whose name Zechariah said that a crown should be consecrated to the Lord. Zech. vi. 14.

HIENA, הינה, motion, trouble. 2 Kings xviii. 34. Thought to be the Anais of the Persians: or the deity Nanea, Venus, the star of Venus, or Lucifer. Its root is not properly Hebrew.

HENADAD, הנדד, Ἀννὰδᾶ, grace, mercy of the well-beloved; from חן chen, or חנן chanan, and from דוד dod, beloved. Neh. iii. 18.

HEPHA, כֶּפְחָא, ΕΦΑ, or CAIPHA, otherwise SYCAMINON, a maritime town at the foot of mount CARMEL, north: Vide CAIPHA.

HEPHER, הֶפֶר, he that seeks, or treads under: otherwise, disgrace, and confusion; from חֶפֶר chaphar. Son of Asher, 1 Chr. iv. 6.

I. HEPHER, father of Zelophehad, head of a family. Numb. xxvi. 33. xxvii. 1.

II. HEPHER. Joshua killed a Canaanitish prince, who was king of Hepher. Josh. xii. 17. This town is perhaps the Ephraim, of 2 Chron. xiii. 19. in Benjamin; or the Opkrah, in the same tribe, the place of Gideon's birth, five miles east from Bethel, according to St. Jerom.

[The more probable derivation of this name is from pits or wells, which had been dug; and so Hapharaim, Josh. xix. 19. "The pits," in the tribe of Issachar; [vide Gath-Hepher] "the well;"

well:" so we have Bir, and El Bir, the well: but one might be a natural spring, the other water obtained by sinking a well, Josh. xviii. 17. 1 Kings, iv. 10. It appears to have been in or near the north of Judah.]

HEPHZIBAH, חֶפְצִיבָּה, "Εἰψα, my will in her; from חֶפֶץ chaphatz, to will, and the preposition ב beth, in, and the pronoun, ה ah, her. Isaiah lxii. 4.—Also, the Mother of Manasseh, king of Judah. 2 Kings xxi. 1.

HEPTATEUCH. This word signifies literally, the seven works; meaning the seven first books of the Old Testament, i. e. Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Deuteronomy, Joshua, and Judges.

HERCULES, Ἡρακλῆς, the glory of Juno, or of her that governs; from Ἥρα Juno, and κλέος, glory.

HERCULES. There were several among the ancients, the most famous is the son of Jupiter and Alcmena; he was born about the time when Gideon was judge of Israel; about A. M. 2757, ante A. D. 1247. Mention is made of Hercules (2 Macc. iv. 19, 20.) on occasion of three hundred drachms of silver, which Jason the pretended high-priest of Jerusalem, sent to Tyre, to contribute to the games and solemn sacrifices, which were celebrated there every five years. [In the English version it is three hundred drachms; and so it is also in the common printed books of the Greek original. But in the Arundel manuscript, it is τριακοντίας, i. e. 3300, which is the truer reading; for 300 drachms, at the highest valuation, making no more than 75 Jewish shekels, that is, of our money, £11 5s. it was too little to be sent on such an occasion. See PRIDEAUX's Connection, &c. Part ii. book 3.] Hercules was the tutelary deity of Tyre. The Tyrians called him Melicartha, "king of the city." [See the PLATES: MEDALS of TYRE; Nos. 7, 8; and for games in honour of this god, Nos. 17, 18, 19.]

[Hercules was so called by the Tyrians from the Phœnician words Melec and Kartha, which signify the king, or lord, of the city. The Greeks from some similitude, which they observed in the worship of this God at Tyre, with that wherewith they worshipped Hercules in Greece, thought them to have been the same; and therefore called this Tyrian God, Hercules: and hence came the name of Hercules Tyrius among them. This seems to be the Baal, whose worship was introduced among the Israelites by Jezebel. See PRIDEAUX Connect. Part ii. b. 3.]

Sir Isaac Newton is of opinion, that Hercules was called Melcartus, from being the founder and governor, or prince of the city Carteia in Spain. See his Chronology, p. 112.]

Several circumstances in the lives of Joshua, Sampson, and Moses, have been confounded with stories told of Hercules: the heathen related much the same thing of Hercules, as is related of Jonah: Hercules, they said, was three days in the belly of a sea-dog, [the shark of modern naturalists] as Jonah was three days in that of a great fish, Jonah, ii. 1, &c. Vide FRAGMENT No. CLXV.

HERES, חֶרֶס, Ἄρεσ, the sun: otherwise an earthen vessel; from חֶרֶשׁ cheresh.

HERES, a mountain in Dan. Judg. i. 35.

[This name imports, probably, the orb of the sun: whereas, Shemesh, which is another term translated sun, imports, the light of the sun; so that, though Mount Shemesh, &c. would be nearly to the same effect, yet it would not be altogether the same as Mount Heres, "Sun Mount."]

HERESY, from the Greek, Ἄρεσις, Hairesis, signifies in general, a sect, or choice. It is usually taken in a bad sense, for some fundamental error in religion, adhered to with obstinacy. Thus we say, the heresy of the Arians, Pelagians, Novatians, &c. St. Paul says that there should be heresies in the church, that they who are tried may be made manifest,—1 Cor. xi. 19. He requires Titus to shun, and even to avoid the company of, a heretic, after the first and second admonition, Tit. iii. 10. St. Luke, in the Acts, speaks of the heresy of the Sadducees, and of that of the Pharisees, Acts v. 17. xv. 5.

Now it is evident that among the Jews these sects or heresies, especially that of the Pharisees, were not odious; since St. Paul, even after his conversion, declares himself to be of the sect of the Pharisees. Acts. xxiii. 6. The same Apostle says, that Christianity was called a sect or heresy, Acts. xxvi. 5. Philip. iii. 6. and it is true, that in the beginning, the Christian religion was scarcely looked on by strangers as any thing more than a sect of Judaism; and the primitive Fathers made no difficulty of calling it sometimes a divine sect. Tertull. de Pallio. "divinam sectam." Tertullus, the advocate of the Jews accuses St. Paul before Felix, with being the head "of the sect of the Nazarenes." Acts xxiv. 5. St. Paul declares, that he had lived without reproach "in the sect of the Pharisees," Acts xxvi. 5. which was the most in repute among the Jews. The Jews of Rome when visiting Paul, told him, they were desirous to know his thoughts concerning Christianity: that for their parts, they knew nothing of this sect, except that it was every where opposed, Acts xxviii. 22.

I say nothing here of the several sects or heresies among the heathen philosophers, which might occasion any sects among the Jews: for as the heathen distinguished their philosophers into Stoicks, Platonists, Peripateticks, Epicureans, reans, &c. so the Hebrews, after the establishment of the Grecian empire in the East, were divided into Sadducees, Pharisees, Essenians, Assideans, Herodians, &c. We can in a great measure shew sects or heresies almost like those of the Jews, not only in the schools of philosophy, but in those likewise of divinity, wherein we find opinions divided on matters problematical and undecided, which are no way prejudicial to the fundamentals of religion, nor to that unity wherein all members of the church should unite, in subordination to the same governors, in communion of the same sacraments, and in confession of the same essential articles of belief.

From the very beginning of the Christian church, there were dangerous heresies; which attacked the most essential doctrines of our religion, such as the divinity of Jesus Christ, his office of Messiah, the reality and truth of his incarnation, the resurrection of the dead, the liberty of Christians from legal ceremonies, and many other points. The most ancient of these heretics, is Simon Magus, who desired to buy the gift of God with money, Acts viii. 9, 10, and who afterwards set himself up for the Messiah, God Almighty, the Creator. Cerinthus, also, and those false apostles, against whom St. Paul inveighs in his Epistles, who determined that the faithful should receive circumcision, and subject themselves to all the legal observances. Gal. iv. 12, 13, 17. v. 11. vi. 12. Philip. iii. 18.

The Nicolaitans, it is said, allowed a community of women, committed the most ignominious actions, and followed the superstitions of heathenism: they went over to the sect of the Cainites. St. John, Rev. ii. 6, 15, charges this heresy with producing great disorders in the churches of Asia. At the same time there were false Christs and false prophets. St. Paul speaks of Hymenæus and Alexander. 1 Tim. i. 20. Likewise of Hymenæus and Philetus, 2 Tim. ii. 17, who departed from the truth. He foretold, that in the last times, some should forsake the truth, and give themselves up to a spirit of error, and to doctrines of Devils. 1 Tim. iv. 1. St. Peter and St. Jude foretel the same things, and herein only repeat what Jesus Christ himself had said in the gospel, that false Christs and false prophets should come, who should seduce the simple. See NICHOLAS, SIMON, CERINTHUS, ANTICHRIST, &c. Also FRAGMENT No. CCXCII.

HERMAS, Ἑρμῆς, Mercury, [the god of gain] otherwise, gain, or refuge.

HERMAS, mentioned Rom. xvi. 14, was, according to several of the ancients, and many learned modern interpreters, the same as Hermas, whose works [visions, allegories] are extant, and have been placed by some among canonical Scriptures. The books of Hermas, intitled

The Shepherd, were written at Rome, or in the neighbourhood, about A. D. 92, before Domitian's prosecution.

Ado, Usuard, and the Roman Martyrology, place the festival of Hermas, May 9; the Greeks observe it March 8, and again, October 5. They rank him among the apostles and seventy-two disciples: and add, that he was bishop of Philippi, in Macedonia; or Philippopolis in Thrace.

HERMES, mentioned Rom. xvi. 14. was, as the Greeks say, one of the seventy disciples, and bishop of Dalmatia. His festival is April 8.

HERMOGENES, Ἑρμογένης, born of Mercury, or generation of Iucere, or refuge of generation; from ἑρμῆς Mercury, and γένεσις generation.

HERMOGENES, whom St. Paul speaks of 2 Tim. i. 15. was, according to some authors not much to be depended on, a magician, converted by St. James the Great, together with Phygellus. But, after having followed the apostle some time, they forsook him, when they saw him in prison for the faith. Tertullian, contra Hermogen, says, Hermogenes renounced the faith, and was a different person from that Hermogenes, against whom he wrote. Some say he adopted the errors of Simon and Nicholas, denying the resurrection of the dead, maintaining that it was already passed. [i. e. in the new life professed at baptism.] This is the most certain account we have of Hermogenes. They who please may see the fabulous circumstances of his conversion in Abdias.

HERMON, הרמון, anathema, destruction.

[Otherwise, a net, or network: otherwise, dedicated, or consecrated, i. e. to God.

Simon thinks this name imports, "a strong weapon." Le Clerc thinks "the high mountain."—Perhaps, "the bright Aun." Comp. BAAL-HERMON.]

HERMON, Chermon, Aërmon, or Baalhermon, Deut. iii. 9, 10. The Sidonians called it Sirion; and the Amorites Shenir. Jerom says, this mountain lies higher than Paneas, and that in summer-time snow was carried from thence to Tyre, that people might drink al fresco. The Chaldee and Samaritan interpreters on Deut. iv. 48. where Sion is spoken of, as if it were a part of mount Hermon, call it the mountain of snow, because it is always covered with snow, by reason of its height.—[The Jerusalem Targum on Numb. xxxv. places the "mountain of snow" at Cæsarea Philippi. From this it should appear, that mount Hermon was one of the southern branches of Lebanon; and this may account for its receiving name from the Sidonians.] Scripture places mount Hermon as the northern boundary of the land beyond Jordan, and the brook Arnon as the

the southern, Deut. iii. 8. iv. 48. Baal-gad was situated in the plain of Libanus, at the foot of mount Hermon; and the Hivites dwelt under the same mountain in the land of Mispeh, from Baal-Hermon unto the entering in of Hamath, Judg. iii. 3. Mount Hermon belonged to king Og, and lay at the northern extremity of his dominions, before the Israelites conquered them.

The Psalmist says, cxxxiii. 3. that the union of brethren is as agreeable as the dew of Hermon which fell upon the hill of Zion. Hermon is the general name of a mountain with several little hills belonging to it, one whereof was called Sion, another Shenir, or Sirion. Thus the dew of mount Hermon falls upon the hill of Sion, which is joined to it, as perfumed oil from Aaron's beard fell upon the neck of his tunick. It is true, the Sion or Zion of Psalm cxxxiii. יצ, is written differently from that of Deut. iv. 48. ירז, but as these are letters of the same sound and organ, we need not make any difficulty of confounding them.

The same writer says, Psalm lxxxix. 12. "Thou hast made the north and the south, Tabor and Hermon shall rejoice before thee." The situation of Tabor is known. This mountain lies between the Mediterranean to the west, and the sea of Tiberias east. Mount Hermon is north of both. In the Hebrew, Thou hast created the north and the right hand; i. e. the south. Tabor to the south, and mount Hermon to the north, shall rejoice before thee. The two parts of this verse are parallel, and explain one another. [See FRAGMENTS: CALENDAR OF PALESTINE, April and November.]

HERMONIIM, [HERMONITES, Eng. Tr.] הַרְמוֹנִים, the mountains of Hermon, HERMON, or Hermoniim, a mountain on this side the Jordan in the tribe of Issachar, south of mount Tabor. Several are of opinion, that it is spoken of Psalm xlii. 6. I will remember thee from the land of Jordan, and the little hill of Hermon; as if this mount Hermon, on this side Jordan were called "little" to distinguish it from the great Hermon, beyond that river. Others find no mention of little Hermon in Scripture, but think the mount Hermon of Jerom's time, in the tribe of Issachar, was so called in later times only. Others explain what is said of the foregoing Hermon of this mount Hermon, As the dew of Hermon which falls on mount Sion. Maundrell says, that the dew in this place, is as plentiful as a large shower. But this does not persuade us that the Psalmist speaks here of mount Hermon on this side Jordan, since mount Sion has no relation to it; whereas we find one of the little hills of the great Hermon was called Sion.

HERN, or HERON; Herodius, Herodio. A water-fowl distinguished by its beak and long neck. It flies high, lives in lakes, marshes, and rivers, and feeds on fish. There are several sorts of Herons. They build their nests in woods of lofty trees. The trees on which their dung falls, lose their verdure, and die. They keep themselves for a long time, as it were, immovable beside the water, waiting to surprise the fish when least aware of it. The LXX. and St. Jerom seem to take it for the Stork; for they translate the Hebrew Chasid, by Herodio. Chasid signifies merciful, compassionate. Storks are thought to be gentle, kindly-natured birds, and to feed their parents in their declining age; in which particular, the ancients have observed, that they are often more just than man. Moses declares the Stork to be unclean, perhaps because it feeds on serpents. But Chasidah, which is the word in the original, signifies, according to the generality of interpreters, a Stork: it comes from the Hebrew Chasid, mercy; whereof the stork is a symbol. Some old Latin Psalters, instead of Herodii domus, read fulicæ domus, a house for the coot or moor-hen. But the LXX. and many of the interpreters, declare for the heron. Lev. xi. 19. Deut. xiv. 18. Job. xxxix. 12. Ps. civ. 17. Vide STORK and FRAGMENT, No. CCLXXXV. also the NATURAL HISTORY.

HEROD, Ἡρώδης, glory of the skin; from ἥρος, favour, glory, and δερμας, the skin; or rather, son of the hero; according to the Syriac, a dragon in the fire.

I. HEROD, son of Antipater and Cypros. His brothers were Phasael, Joseph, and Pheroras; his sister was Salome. He married 1. Doris, by whom he had Antipater. 2. Marianne, daughter of Alexander, son to Aristobulus, of the Asmonæan family; by whom he had Alexander, Aristobulus, Herod, Salampso, and Cypros. 3. Mariamne, daughter of Simon the high-priest, by whom he had Herod, the husband of Herodias. 4. Malthace, by whom he had Archelaus, Philip, and Olympias. 5. Cleopatra, by whom he had Herod Antipas and Philip. 6. Pallas, by whom he had Phasael. 7. Phædra, by whom he had Roxana. 8. Elpis, by whom he had Salome, who married one of the sons of Pheroras. He had also two other wives, whose names are not known. See the PLATES: GENEALOGY OF HEROD THE GREAT.

Herod was born A. M. 3932, ante A. D. 72. His father Antipater, according to some, was by nation an Idumæan: others say, by extraction a Jew, deriving from some of the Jews who returned from Babylon: others maintain, that Antipater was a heathen, and guardian of one of Apollo's temples at Askalon; and that having been taken prisoner by some Idumæan scouts, he was carried into Idumæa, and brought up according to the manners of the Jews; for since

since the time of John Hircanus, the Idumæans had observed the law of Moses.

Hardouin formed a system, entirely new, concerning Herod's family, and contradictory to Josephus, &c. as if Herod were of Grecian extraction.

Nicholas, of Damascus, to make his court to Herod, to whom he was much obliged, derived his descent from the principal of those Jews, who returned into Judæa after the captivity of Babylon. Josephus, being a Jewish priest, who lived almost in the time of this prince, his sons and grandsons, should be better informed of this matter: he charges that historian with infidelity in his account. Why should we not refer ourselves to Josephus?

Herod was never able to win the hearts of the Jews. Neither his building the temple, a work of very great charge; nor his infinite expences, in procuring provision for the people during an extreme famine, could over-power their antipathy; which was founded on three reasons: 1. His not being a Jew, but a stranger, and by descent an Idumæan. 2. His cruelty, whereof he had given proofs on very many occasions. 3. His little zeal for the observance of the law of Moses, and his frequent violations of it in matters of a public nature, and of great consequence: e. gr. he caused a theatre and amphitheatre to be built at Jerusalem, and appointed games to be celebrated there in honour of Augustus: He placed trophies round about this theatre in honour of the same prince, and of his victories: He would have had a golden eagle set up over one of the temple doors: He built a temple to Augustus, and other foreign deities, and affected to favour heathens and strangers, without concerning himself about the religion of the Jews, which he outwardly professed; but he excused himself, by alleging the necessity of the times, and of obedience to the Romans. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xvii. cap. 8.

Herod never had much religion. He manifested continually that grandeur and ambition were his only deities. If he did any thing for God's glory, he took sufficient care to discover at the same time, that his own reputation was the chief aim of his endeavours. However, after all, he was a Jew, and was desirous to pass for such.

Herod was but twenty-five years old [Joseph. Antiq. xiv. 17. says, he was only fifteen; but we allow him to be twenty-five; A. M. 3957, before the true birth of Jesus Christ 43, before A. D. 47. See Usher, ad Ann. Mundi 3957.] when his father Antipater gave him the government of Galilee, with the approbation of Hircanus. Joseph. de Bello, lib. i. cap. 8. Antiq. lib. xiv. cap. 16, 17. He behaved with so much prudence and valour, that he restored the peace of his province, which had been disturbed by monstrous hordes of thieves, who committed great ravages. Among others, he took one Hezekiah, captain of these banditti; whereby he procured the friendship and esteem of Sextus Cæsar, governor of Syria. But the chief people of the Jews, growing jealous of the authority assumed by Antipater, and of the power which he gave to his sons, complained of it to Hircanus, who cited Herod to justify his conduct at Jerusalem. Thither Herod came, but well armed, and attended with good troops. His countenance terrified the judges. Sameas was the only one who had courage, to lay the fault of Herod's misconduct on the judges themselves, and on Hircanus, who had permitted him to assume too much authority. But Hircanus observing that the judges were more disposed to condemn than to absolve him, deferred judgment till the next day, and gave advice privately to Herod, that he should escape in the night. A. M. 3958, ante A. D. 46.

He retired therefore to Sextus Cæsar at Damascus, and by him was entrusted with the government of Cœle-Syria. Being desirous to revenge the insult offered him by citing him to Jerusalem, he marched toward that city with an army; but Antipater his father, and Phasaël his brother, persuaded him to return. After the death of Julius Cæsar, Herod was appointed governor of all Cœle-Syria by Cassius and Marcus Brutus. They gave him troops, and promised him the kingdom of Judæa, when the war between Mark Antony and young Cæsar should be ended. About the same time Antipater, Herod's father was poisoned at Jerusalem, by one Malichus; but Herod put Malichus to death at Tyre. ante A. D. 43.

Mark Antony coming into Syria, and being at Daphne, near Antioch, a hundred Jews of the best rank came to him, with accusations against Herod and his brother Phasaël. Hircanus who had promised his grand-daughter Mariamne to Herod, was there. Mark Antony having heard what was alleged against Herod, asked Hircanus whether Herod and Phasaël, or their accusers were fittest to govern the state? Hircanus answered, the two brothers. Whereupon Antony made them tetrarchs, and trusted the government of all Judæa to them. He ordered letters to be dispatched forthwith to this purpose, and fifteen of the most malicious of their enemies to be imprisoned; and had put them to death, if Herod had not interceded for them. De Bello, lib. i. cap. 10. Antiq. lib. xiv. cap. 23. A. M. 3964, ante A. D. 40.

Antigonus, son of Aristobulus, having undertaken to dispossess Hircanus, the prince and high-priest of the Jews, engaged the Parthians by great promises, to march against Jerusalem.

Phasaël

Phasaël defended the city walls, and Herod defended the palace. Pacorus, the king of Parthia's son, having persuaded Hircanus and Phasaël to meet Barzaphernes, who was in Galilee, in order to agree on some accommodation, he himself accompanied them thither. Hircanus and Phasaël soon discovered that they were betrayed. When they came to Ecdippa, a maritime town of Phœnicia, they were seized by the Parthians, and put in chains. Herod, informed of what had passed, departed from Jerusalem, with his mother Cypros, his sister Salome, Mariamne his bride, and Alexandra, her mother. These he lodged in the castle of Massada, and took the way of Petra, hoping for assistance from Malchus, king of the Arabians. But before he reached Petra, he received a message from Malchus, desiring his return, because he feared to offend the Parthians, by receiving him. Antiq. lib. xiv. 25.

Herod therefore went to Rhinocorura, where he was informed, that his brother Phasaël had killed himself, to avoid the ill treatment of the Parthians. From Rhinocorura he went to Damiatta, where after some contradiction he embarked, the season being already far advanced. At sea, he was assailed by a violent storm, which obliged him to throw part of his effects overboard, and with much difficulty he arrived at Rhodes. Here he was assisted by two of his friends; and his necessities could not prevent him from doing good to this city, which had suffered extremely in Cassius's war. From Rhodes he went to Rome, where he opened his affairs to Mark Antony. Antony remembered the good offices, which Antipater, Herod's father, had done him formerly in Syria: he was besides exasperated against Antigonus, whom he considered as a turbulent man, and an enemy to the Romans; and was moreover swayed by Herod's promises of a large sum of money, if he would procure him to be declared king. Octavius Cæsar, afterwards Augustus, was equally desirous of obliging Herod. Antony and Cæsar used their interest so effectually, that the senate gave him the kingdom of Judæa, and declared Antigonus an enemy to the commonwealth. Antiq. lib. xiv. 26. ante A. D. 40.

Seven days afterwards he departed from Rome, and landing at Ptolemais, began to gather troops, to march against Antigonus, who kept the castle of Massada besieged. He fortunately relieved that fortress, and from thence marched against Jerusalem, with Silo, a captain of some Roman troops. But Antigonus shut the gates against him, and winter coming on, Herod and Silo put their troops into quarters. Notwithstanding, he did not remain idle; but seized several posts, and took several towns from Antigonus, as well in Judæa as in Galilee.

The next year there were skirmishes between Antigonus's party and Herod's, generally to the advantage of the latter. In the beginning of his third year's reign, Herod came and besieged Jerusalem in earnest: he attacked it on the same side as Pompey had done several years before. While preparing for the siege, he went to Samaria, where he married Mariamne daughter of Alexandra. After his marriage he returned to the siege, with reinforcements; shortly after Sosius, captain of the Roman troops, brought powerful succours to him from Syria: so that after five months siege, the first enclosure of the city was taken by assault: and some time after, the second enclosure. Antigonus retired to the temple: but did not long resist. The city and temple were taken; and Antigonus came, and threw himself at Sosius's feet, who insulted him, calling him Antigona instead of Antigonus. Thus Herod acquired the kingdom of Judæa. Antiq. lib. xiv. cap. ult.

Hitherto the high-priesthood had been possessed by kings of the ASMONÆAN race. Herod, being neither of a family of the priests, nor qualified to exercise this ministry, and Hircanus being at that time in captivity among the Parthians; the king sent for one Ananel from Babylon to be high-priest. Ananel was of Aaron's family; but all his merit was his acquaintance with Herod, who had long had a regard for him. Mariamne, Herod's wife, had a brother, named Aristobulus, to whom the high-priesthood by right of birth belonged. The queen never ceased soliciting Herod till he had divested Ananel, and restored this dignity to Aristobulus: who was then only seventeen years of age, and who enjoyed the high-priesthood but one year, being drowned by Herod's order. Vide ARISTOBULUS.

Alexandra, mother of Aristobulus, made great complaints of his death to Cleopatra; who incensed Antony against Herod. Antony sent for Herod, to justify himself: but he effectually persuaded Antony by presents and discourses.

War being declared between Augustus and Mark Antony, Herod espoused the party of his benefactor Antony. But Antony being overcome, Herod was obliged to solicit the clemency of Augustus; whom he met at Rhodes, and appeared before him with all the royal ornaments, except the diadem. He spoke to Augustus with admirable constancy and magnanimity: confessed, he had favoured Antony's party, that he should have done more for him, had he not been hindered by the war in Arabia: that he was disposed to do as much for Augustus, and to serve him with the same fidelity as he had done Antony, if he would restore him his kingdom, and admit him to his favour.

Augustus,

Augustus, charmed with his behaviour, granted what he desired; and Herod made great presents to that prince and his friends. When Augustus afterwards passed through Palestine in his way to Egypt, Herod accompanied him, and furnished his army plentifully.

Herod seemed now to be in full possession of all he could wish. But his peace was soon disturbed by domestic divisions, and misfortunes of different kinds; which in the midst of the greatest prosperity, rendered him one of the most unhappy princes of his age. He had so great a passion for Mariamne, his wife, that he could not moderate it; but the affection of Mariamne was alienated from him, and she despised him. Herod's mother and sister, envying his wife Mariamne, forgot nothing that might irritate Herod against her, and after several little quarrels had risen to animosity, in a transport of fury, he commanded Mariamne to be put to death. A. M. 3976, ante A. D. 28. But when his fury had subsided, he was so afflicted at what he had done, that he fell dangerously ill, and was very near death. Some little time afterward, he ordered the execution of Alexandra, who had too easily credited the news of his death. See ALEXANDRA.

He spent the following years in raising several public and private edifices in the province, and elsewhere, in representing shews and games, and in building temples in honour of Augustus. He sent his two sons by Mariamne to Rome, to receive an education suitable to their birth. But his most important work, undertaken at this time, was the rebuilding of the temple at Jerusalem. A. M. 3985, ante A. D. 19. The people, surprised, could scarcely be brought to consent to it, at first; fearing, that after he had demolished the old temple, he might leave the new edifice imperfect. But Herod assured them that he would not touch the old building, till he had provided every necessary for raising the new. He finished it in nine years, and dedicated it A. M. 3996, ante A. D. 8. [This, which by some is called the third temple, was properly Zerubbabel's temple, renewed and enlarged; for such parts of it as Herod intended to make more lofty and magnificent, were pulled down by parts; and the sacrifices and religious offices were never interrupted. So that the prophet Haggai's prediction concerning the glory of the second house was verified; which would apparently be false, if this of Herod's were supposed to be a third temple. See Lud. Capelli Templi Hierosol. delineat. ex Villalpando, p. 3800.]

Some time after beginning this work he went to Rome, designing to make his court to Augustus, and to see his two sons. Augustus received him favourably, and Herod every where, both on his journey, and at Rome, manifested his munificence. He brought his two sons with him into Judæa, where he married Aristobulus, to Berenice daughter of Salome; and Alexander, to Glaphyra daughter of Archelaus, king of Cappadocia. About this time Agrippa coming into Asia, Herod invited him into his kingdom, and shewed him the cities of Samaria, otherwise Sebaste, and Cæsarea, which he had built in honour of Augustus; and he received him with so much magnificence at Jerusalem, that Agrippa could not sufficiently express his satisfaction. A. M. 3993, ante A. D. 11.

Divisions again rising in Herod's family, he imbibed a jealousy of his two sons, Aristobulus and Alexander. To check their pride, Herod sent for Doris, and his son by her, Antipater, to court, and shewed them much esteem and consideration. This preference exasperated the two princes, who expressed their discontent too openly. Herod carried them to Rome, designing to accuse them before Augustus; but Augustus reconciled them to their father, and Herod on his return to Jerusalem, declared before a great assembly of the people, that his intention was, that his three sons should reign after him; first, Antipater; secondly, Alexander; and then Aristobulus. Antiq. lib. xvi. cap. 7, 8.

Herod was again disturbed by the malice of Antipater, and the artifices of Pheroras and Salome, Herod's brother and sister. Archelaus, king of Cappadocia, coming into Judæa, A. M. 3996, ante A. D. 8, once more reconciled the two brothers to Herod. But at last the calumnies of Antipater and Salome prevailed, and Herod, believing they had some designs on his life, ordered Alexander and Aristobulus to be strangled. A. M. 3999, ante J. C. 1. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xvi. 11, 12. Vide ALEXANDER VII.

Antipater having thus got rid of his brothers, who gave him most umbrage, began to consider how he might dispose of Herod himself, whose resentment and inconstancy he continually feared. To conceal his intrigues, he procured the king's leave to visit Rome. But during his absence Herod discovered his conspiracy, and several months were employed in examining depositions against him. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xvii. cap. 6. A. M. 3999, the very year of Jesus Christ's birth; four years before A. D.

In the mean while the Saviour of the World being born at Bethlehem, wise men from the East came to pay their homage to him. When arrived at Jerusalem, they asked, where was the new-born king of the Jews? The whole city was disturbed at their arrival: Herod, who was then at Jericho, seeking remedies for a languishing illness, whereof he died shortly after, was likewise much concerned, and convened the priests and doctors of the law to know of them where where the Messiah should be born. They told him in Bethlehem of Judah, according to the prediction of the prophet Micah chap. v. 2.

Herod, sending privately for the wise men, enquired very carefully the time when the star had appeared to them; he sent them to Bethlehem, directing them to return to him when they had found the child. But an angel of the Lord in a dream, discovering to them the wicked designs of Herod; they returned into their own country by the other way. An angel also warned Joseph, to flee into Egypt, with the child and his mother. Herod finding himself deluded by the Magi, became exasperated, and ordered all the male children in Bethlehem, of two years old and under [rather, which had entered on their second year] to be killed, according to the time concerning which he had enquired exactly of the wise men. Vide MAGI.

In the beginning of this year, which is the first of Jesus Christ, Antipater returned from Rome, not knowing what had passed against him. He was admitted into his father's presence, but only to hear from his mouth, those reproaches which he deserved. He was loaded with chains, and imprisoned. Moreover, Herod made a new will, wherein he declared Herod Antipas, his youngest son, to be his heir. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xvii. cap. 6.

A report being spread that Herod was dead, some young people at noon-day beat down a golden eagle, which he had placed over the great portal of the temple, contrary to the law and customs of the Jews. The authors of this exploit, with forty of their followers, were seized by Herod's order, and burnt alive. Herod's diseases increased daily: his fever was not violent; but a slow internal heat wasted him. His hunger was so raging, as to be insatiable. His bowels were ulcerated; he had continual pains in his belly; his legs swelled like those of dropsical persons; certain parts, were so rotten, that worms were seen to come out of them; and he had an insupportable itch over all his body.

A little before his death, he sent for all the considerable persons in Judæa, to Jericho, threatening them with death, if they failed. When they were come, he ordered them to be confined in the Circus, and with tears constrained his sister Salome and Alexas his brother-in-law, to promise him, that directly as he was dead, they should massacre all these persons, that so the Jews throughout the land might, at least in appearance, shed tears at his death. But this diabolical desire was not executed.

After this, he received letters from Rome, informing him, that Augustus permitted him either to banish Antipater, or to kill him. This news a little revived him: but his pains returning with great violence, he wished to deliver himself from them by death. He called for a knife to pare an apple, as he had been accustomed to do, but instead of so using it, he attempted to plunge it into his body: his cousin Achiab held his hand; at the same time making a loud exclamation, which disordered the whole palace; every body supposing the king was dead. Antipater hearing this report, thought Herod was expired, and endeavoured to persuade his guards to liberate him; but the officer who had the charge of him, went and gave notice of it to Herod, who commanded him to be killed immediately. He survived his son but five days, during which interval he changed his will, and gave the kingdom to Archelaus; the Gaulonitis, Trachonitis, and Batanæa to Philip, own brother to Archelaus; and Galilee and Peræa to Herod Antipas. Thus died Herod the Great, at near seventy years of age, after a reign of six or seven and thirty years, from the time of his being declared king by the senate, and thirty-four years from his being master of Judæa by the death of Antigonus. A. M. 4001, ante A. D. 4.

II. HEROD, called Philip, Mark vi. 17, Luke iii. 1. son of Herod the Great and Mariamne, daughter of Simon the high-priest, was at first named in Herod's will as heir to his kingdom, after the deaths of Alexander and Aristobulus, and the discovery of Antipater's conspiracy: but the king having discovered, that Mariamne, this Herod's mother, was concerned in that conspiracy, he erased Herod from his will, and substituted Archelaus. Herod Philip married Herodias, grand-daughter to Herod the Great, by whom he had Salome, distinguished in the Gospel as a graceful dancer. Herod Antipas, the tetrarch, brother to Philip, having resided some time with him, while on a journey to Rome, conceived a criminal passion for Herodias, and proposed marriage to her. Herodias consented on condition that Antipas would divorce the daughter of king Aretas whom he had married long before. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xvii. cap. 6. A. D. 30.

Antipas, when returned from Rome, performed his promise, and married Herodias, his brother Herod Philip's wife. Against this incestuous marriage, John Baptist inveighed vehemently; which Herodias never forgave; but, eventually, contrived his death. Matth. xiv. Mark vi. 17. A. D. 31. Vide FRAGMENT, No. CCXXVII.

III. HEROD ANTIPAS, son of Herod the Great, and Malthace, in his father's last will was styled Tetrarch of Galilee and Peræa. His first wife was a daughter of Aretas, king of Arabia, but he dismissed her, and took Herodias, his brother Herod Philip's wife, while Philip was living. His divorce from the daughter of Aretas brought on a war with that prince, wherein he was worsted, A. D. 36; which the very Jews acknowledged, was a just punishment for John the Baptist's death. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xvii. cap. 7. As John had censured his incestuous marriage with Herodias, he ordered him to be seized, and sent him loaded with fetters, to the castle of Machærus. Antiq. lib. xviii. cap. 2. Herodias most vehemently exasperated, thought only of his destruction; fearing that Herod, not insensible to his reproaches, might eventually dismiss her. Herod Antipas entertaining the grantees of his court on his birth-day, Salome, Herodias's daughter by Philip, her first husband, danced before the king so much to his satisfaction, that he swore to grant whatsoever she should ask. Salome consulted her mother: who directed her to ask the head of John Baptist. The king was vexed, but commanded execution as she desired. Matth. xiv. 3. Mark vi. 17, &c.

Some time after, Herodias, uneasy that her brother Agrippa had the title of king, while Herod Antipas, her husband, was only tetrarch, pressed Antipas to visit Rome, and solicit an equal dignity from Caius, the emperor. But Caius having been prejudiced against Antipas, by letters from Agrippa, deprived him of his tetrarchy, and banished him to Lyons, and from thence into Spain, where he died. Joseph. de Bello, lib. ii. cap. 16. See ANTIPAS, and HERODIAS.

IV. HEROD AGRIPPA, son of Aristobulus, brother to Herodias, and grandson to Herod the Great. See AGRIPPA.

V. HEROD, king of Chalcis, brother to Agrippa Herodias, the son of Aristobulus, and grandson to Herod the Great. His first wife was Mariamne, daughter of Olympias; afterwards he married Berenice, his niece, daughter of Agrippa the Great. The emperor Claudius gave him the kingdom of Chalcis, A. D. 41. About A. D. 43, he obtained authority to inspect the temple, and the sacred money, with a power of appointing or deposing the high-priests. He deposed Simon Cantharus, and placed Joseph, son of Cani, in his room. Herod died A. D. 48. By his first wife he had a son, named Aristobulus; by his second, two sons, Berenicianus and Hircanus. This prince is not mentioned in the sacred writings.

HERODIANS, a sect of the Jews in our Saviour's time. This sect was not ancient, and could have been no earlier than the reigns of the Herods. Neither Josephus nor Philo mention it under the name of Herodians; but the Gospel does, Matth. xxii. 16. Mark iii. 6. viii. 15.

There may be eight or nine different opinions concerning the origin of this sect. Some believe that the Herodians took Herod for the Messiah; but as several Herods reigned over the Jews, they are divided in opinion which of them was so taken. The generality are for Herod the Great, son of Antipater, who died some months after the birth of Jesus Christ. He appeared at a time when all the world were in expectation of the Messiah. He was powerful, brave, and warlike. He is said to have caused the genealogical memoirs of the house of David to be burnt, in order to prevent its being proved from them that he was not of that family, from which it was well known the Messiah was to spring. Lastly, Persius, Sat. 6, ver. 180, is cited, who speaks of king Herod's festival, as celebrated at Rome among the Jews, with great illuminations.

Others thought Herod II. i. e. Antipas, tetrarch of Galilee, was the head of the Herodians. He was ambitious and politic: our Saviour, Luke xiii. 32, calls him Fox: [or JACKALL. Vide FRAGMENT, No. CCIX.]

Father Hardouin imagined that the Herodians were Platonists, whom king Herod had brought into credit in Judæa, in imitation of the Platonists of Athens, of which sect he was.

Many of the Fathers, and several commentators, assert, that the Herodians were courtiers of Herod's retinue, who to satisfy their curiosity, or to make court to their master, joined the Pharisees in tempting Jesus Christ respecting paying tribute; but it rather appears by the evangelists, that the Herodians were a Jewish sect, independent of king Herod.

Some consider the Herodians as political partizans, who favoured the dominion of Herod and the Romans over the Jews, who were zealous for their liberty, by maintaining that to pay tribute to kings established by the Romans was their duty; and these were called Herodians, or royalists, in opposition to those Jews who refused such tribute, and might properly enough be termed republicans.

Justin Martyr says, the Herodians acknowledged Herod as high-priest of their nation; which other Jews refused. Strabo, lib. xvi. tells us, that this prince assumed the high-priesthood, which his predecessors had not enjoyed. But Josephus says nothing like it; he only confesses that Herod, after the death of his brother-in-law Aristobulus, disposed at his pleasure of the high-priesthood; which, without doubt, offended all honest Israelites. But we have no proof that they, who justified Herod in this particular, composed a distinct sect.

Scaliger, and others, were of opinion, that this was a kind of fraternity instituted in honour of Herod, as there were societies of the same nature at Rome in honour of Augustus

G div. 2.

Adrian,

Adrian, and Antonine, called Sodales Augustales, Augustians, Adrianians, &c. But this fraternity or society of Augustians was not established at Rome till after the death of Augustus, consequently after that of Herod, who died before Augustus.

Dr. PRIDEAUX proves very clearly, that the Herodians were a sect of the Jews; that they had a leaven or particular doctrines, distinct from those of the Pharisees and Sadducees, against which our Saviour cautions his followers. No question but they took their sentiments from Herod the Great, since they bore his name. They were probably his creatures, or domestics, as the Syriac version calls them. This author thinks their doctrines were reducible to two heads: 1. Their belief that the dominion of the Romans over the Jews was just; and that it was their duty to submit to it. 2. That in the present circumstances they might with a good conscience follow many heathen modes and usages. It is certain these were Herod's principles, since he excused himself by pleading the necessity of the times, for doing many things contrary to the maxims of the Jewish religion. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xv. cap. 12. [and this seems to be the most probable opinion: notwithstanding the following arguments.]

We see from the Gospel, 1. That this sect was actually subsisting among the Jews in our Saviour's time. 2. That it differed from the Pharisees, Sadducees, and Essenians. 3. They were seen always in conjunction with the Pharisees. 4. They were inquisitive, whether to pay tribute to the Romans, was lawful, or not? 5. They held some dangerous principles, since our Saviour admonishes his hearers to avoid their leaven. Now I see none but the disciples of Judas the Gaulonite, in whom all these characters concur. They composed a sect, noticed in Josephus; they agreed in all things with the Pharisees; they were distinguished by their excessive love of liberty, being fully persuaded, that political obedience was due to God only. This sect was in its vigour in our Saviour's time: after the destruction of Jerusalem, when the nation was dispersed, it sunk. Judas Gaulonites appeared when all the people were taxed by order of Augustus, in the year of Jesus Christ 10, A. D. 14, Acts v. 37. (ten years after the register made at the birth of Jesus Christ.) Antiq. lib. xviii. cap. 1. Judas pretended, that true Israelites, being the people of God, should be subject to no human governors. He had many disciples, whom some called Galileans, because Gaulon is in Upper Galilee; others called them Herodians, because that city belonged to Herod Antipas. Josephus gives them no particular name; he says only, that they were followers of Judas the Gaulonite, great lovers of liberty, and held the same opinions as the Pharisees. Antiq. lib. xviii. cap. 1. de Bello, lib. ii. cap. 12. What the Gospel relates of the Herodians, agrees perfectly with the idea which Josephus gives us of the disciples of Judas Gaulonites. Jerom, Ep. ad Tit. cap. 3. makes no question but that St. Paul, in his Epistles, has these heretics in view, when he recommends submission to the secular powers established by God.

HERODIAS, daughter of Aristobulus and Berenice, sister to king Agrippa, and granddaughter to Herod the Great. Her first husband was her uncle Herod Philip, by whom she had Salome. Antiq. lib. xviii. cap. 7. Herodias having accepted the proposals of Herod Antipas, her uncle, tetrarch of Galilee, of marrying her when he returned from Rome, she removed from Philip's house into that of Antipas, together with her daughter Salome. As John the Baptist censured this incestuous marriage, Matt. xiv. 3. Mark vi. 17. Antipas ordered him to be imprisoned. Some time after, Herodias suggested to her dancing daughter, Salome, to ask John the Baptist's head. That holy man was beheaded; and Jerom relates, that this woman holding his head in her hands, pierced his tongue with her bodkin, in like manner as Antony's wife served Cicero's tongue. Hieron. in Rufin. lib. iii. cap. 11.

Herodias, mortified to see her husband tetrarch only, while her brother Agrippa, whom she had known in a state of indigence, was honoured with the title of king; persuaded her husband Antipas to visit Rome, and desire of the emperor Caius the royal title. But Agrippa, still more meanly jealous, sent his servant with letters to the emperor, importing that Herod had arms in his arsenals for seventy thousand men. Antipas, unable to deny this fact, was banished to Lyons. Caius understanding that Herodias, who accompanied her husband, was sister to Agrippa, inclined to pardon her; but she chose rather to follow her husband in the calamity which she had brought upon him, than to owe any thing to her brother's fortune. A. D. 39. See HEROD ANTIPAS, AGRIPPA, and HEROD PHILIP.

HERODION, Ἡρωδίων, song of Juno; from ἥρα Juno, and ᾠδὴν, an heroic song; or rather, the conqueror of heroes.

HERODION, St. Paul's cousin, Rom. xvi. 11. The modern Greeks tell many stories of St. Herodion. They reckon him among the seventy-two disciples and apostles; and say, that notwithstanding, out of humility he was content to be a servant to all the apostles. He was ordained priest; and afterwards bishop of Patræ, probably in Achaia. He is the same, perhaps, baps, as St. Rhodion, decapitated, they say, at Rome, the same day as St. Peter and St. Paul.

HERODION, a castle built by Herod on the spot where he had defeated his enemies in his flight. This castle was sixty furlongs from Jerusalem, and here this prince desired to be buried, says Josephus, Antiq. lib. xiv. cap. 25. lib. xvi. cap. 1. De Bello, lib. i. cap. 21. lib. v. cap. 7. It was not far from Tekoah. M. Reiland believes that Herod built another of the same name toward the mountains of Arabia, (De Bello, lib. i. cap. 16.) and, as he conjectures, beyond Jordan. For it must be confessed, that a castle built sixty furlongs, or three leagues from Jerusalem, cannot naturally be supposed to mean a fortress built toward the mountains of Arabia.

HESER, חֶזֶר, 'Aṣṣāq, village: otherwise, court, or hay. A city of Judah, built or fortified by Solomon, 1 Kings ix. 15: probably Asor, or Hazor. [as in Eng. Tr.]

HESHBON, חֶשְׁבֹן, invention, industry, or thought; from חָשַׁב chashab: otherwise, he that hastens to understand, or to build; from חָשַׁב chush, and from בָּנָה banah, to build.

[Simon thinks this name signifies the great bond, or the strong chain. I rather suppose it may be derived from the regular import of the root chesheb, to devise, imagine, or contrive machines, or implements for service. So that this title is equivalent to the "Aun Machinator," which is a well known appellation of a divinity among the ancients: the deity of ingenuity.]

HESHBON, a celebrated city beyond Jordan, otherwise Esbu, Chesbon, Chasphon, Chascor. It was, says Eusebius, twenty miles east from Jordan. Josh. xiii. 17. It was given to Reuben; but was transferred to Gad, and by Gad to the Levites. It had been conquered from the Moabites by Sihon, and was taken by the Israelites a little before the death of Moses. After the ten tribes were transplanted into the country beyond Jordan, the Moabites recovered it. Pliny, lib. v. cap. 11. assigns it to Arabia. Solomon speaks of the pool of Heshbon (Cant. vii. 4. Maccabees says, that the lake of Caspis or Heshbon was two furlongs, or 300 paces broad. 2 Macc. xii. 16.

[Jerom says it was in his time a very considerable city, situated beyond Jordan twenty miles, in the mountains of Arabia. Ptolemy places it also in Arabia. It subsists still under its ancient name.]

HESHMON, חֶשְׁמוֹן, number, or account ready, or abridged; from חָשַׁב chush, haste, and מִנִּי meni, enumeration: or silence of number, or of the portion; from חָשַׁב chashab, silence, and מַנָּה manah, portion.

[As the above explanations want still further explanation, to become intelligible, to me, at least, I must prefer Simon's derivation from the Arabic, in which language the root imports fatness, and the name, he supposes, denotes the fatness of the soil. Josh. xv. 27. the same, he says, does Hushmonah, a station of the Israelites. Numb. xxxiii. 29.

It is, however, rather unlikely that a station in the desert should be named from the fatness of its soil. As the root implies silence, cessation from action, quiescence, I would refer this title to the "Aun, or M'aux in repose:" as we say still, quiet. Perhaps, the "Vishnu reposing," of India.]

HESRAI, חֶזְרַי, 'Aṣṣāq, called Hezro, 1 Chr. xi. 37. the court, the habitation, or the hay; from חֶזֶר chazzar, court, or entry, and from חָצִיר chatzir, hay. [the Lord's protection.]

HESRAI, of Carmel, one of David's brave officers. 2 Sam. xxiii. 35.

1. HESRON, third son of Reuben, Gen. xli. 9. Head of a family, Numb. xxvi. 6. [Hezron.]

II. HESRON, son of Pharez, and grandson of Judah. Gen. xli. 12. 1 Chr. ii. 5. [Hezron.]

HETH, חֵת, Kith, trembling, or fear; from חָתַת chath, or חֲתָת chatath: Syriac, descent.

HETH, father of the Hittites, was eldest son of Canaan, and dwelt south of the promised land, at or near Hebron. Ephron, of Hebron, was of the race of Heth; and that city, in Abraham's time, was peopled by the children of Heth. Some maintain, that there was a city called Heth; but we find no traces of it in Scripture.

HETHLON, חֶתְלֹן, 'Αἰθαλῶν, fearful dwelling; from חָתַת chath, to bruise, or fear, and לֹן malon, lodging, habitation; or from לָן lun, to lodge, to pass the night: otherwise, his covering; from חָתַל chathal, to cover, to wrap up, and the pronoun an, his.

HETHLON, a city mentioned Ezek. xlvii. 15. xlviii. 1. as limiting the land of promise, north.

[The defence of the mansion, or his involution. "The mansion of security," the retreat, or shelter; inclosing those who entered it: in the Arabic implying safe concealment. It was rather in Syria Damascena than in Judea.]

HEXAPLA, is the name of a large work composed by Origen, wherein he collected all the Greek versions of Scripture, extant at that time: the LXX. Aquila, Symmachus, Theodotion, and a fifth found at Jericho, A. D. 217; with a sixth found at Nicopolis, A. D. 228. These six versions were disposed in six columns opposite to one another, that it might appear at one view, where they agreed or disagreed; and to confront them more easily with the Hebrew, Origen placed the text in Hebrew letters at the head of them, and the same text in Greek letters in two columns collateral with the six columns before mentioned. So that there were in all eight columns; two for the Hebrew text, and six for the Greek versions. There was a seventh version of the Psalms only. From these two columns of the Hebrew the work was sometimes called Octavia, by reason of the eight columns which formed it.

The loss to sacred literature of such an immense performance is very great. The ancient Fathers have preserved fragments of it. Eusebius, St. Chrysostom, Theodoret, and other Greek fathers, and among the Latins, Jerom, often cited the Hexapla, and confronted passages of Scripture according to the several versions contained in it. Drusus has given us a large volume of Fragments in 8vo. But Montfaucon has given us two volumes folio, published in 1713. To these he has added Prolegomena, wherein he explains the form and history of the Hexapla.

Origen, before his Hexapla, had composed a Tetrapla; i. e. a collection of the four principal versions of Scripture: the LXX. Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion. Tetrapla signifies four rows, or four folds, or four columns, &c.

Origen is thought to have begun his Hexapla about A. D. 231, but we cannot tell when he finished it.

HEZEKIAH, חֲזַקִּיָּה, strength of the Lord: from חֲזַק chazak, strength, and יְיָ joh, the Lord: otherwise, taken and supported by the Lord.

I. HEZEKIAH, king of Judah, son of Ahaz and Abi, born A. M. 3251, Ahaz, his father, at his birth being barely eleven years of age; which occasions much difficulty: for Scripture asserting, that Ahaz was but twenty years old when he began to reign, and that he reigned but sixteen years, it follows, that he lived but thirty-six years. Yet Scripture says, that Hezekiah was twenty-five years old when he began to reign: we must conclude, therefore, that Ahaz begat him when he was only ten years old: which is very extraordinary, but not impossible. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. II.

Hezekiah succeeded his father Ahaz, A. M. 3277, or 3278, before A. D. 726. He did what was agreeable to God. He destroyed the high places, cut down the groves, and broke the statues which the people had adored: he broke also the brazen serpent which Moses had made, because the children of Israel burnt incense to it: he ordered the great doors of the Lord's house to be opened and repaired; he exhorted the priests and Levites to purify the temple, and to sacrifice in it as formerly: which sacrifices were furnished by the king.

As the institution of the passover had been neglected, Hezekiah invited not only all his own subjects to keep it, but likewise all Israel. Some ridiculed his proposal; but many observed it: and this was a most solemn pass-over. Hezekiah took care to maintain the good regulations, which he had established in the temple, and to provide for the priests and ministers.

Some years after, Hezekiah shook off the Assyrian yoke, and refused to pay tribute: he defeated the Philistines, and destroyed their country, A. M. 3390, or 3391. 2 Kings xviii. 7. 2 Chron. xxxii. He repaired and fortified the walls of Jerusalem; laid in stores, appointed able commanders over his troops, stopped up the springs without the city, and put himself into a condition of making a vigorous resistance.

Sennacherib king of Assyria, invaded the territories of Judah, and subdued almost every town: Hezekiah observing that the kings of Egypt and Cush, with whom he had made an alliance, did not come to his assistance, sent ambassadors to Sennacherib, desiring peace.

Sennacherib demanded 300 talents of silver, and thirty talents of gold. To raise this sum, Hezekiah exhausted his treasures, and pulled off the gold plates, with which he had formerly overlaid the temple-doors. But Sennacherib having received this money, instead of quitting Hezekiah; sent three of his principal officers from Lachish, which he was besieging, to Jerusalem, summoning Hezekiah to surrender. Hezekiah sent to hear their proposals, Eliakim, Shebna, and Joah, to whom Rabshakeh, Sennacherib's officer, spoke with extreme insolence.

Hezekiah having heard of his blasphemies, rent his clothes, put on sackcloth, went to the house of the Lord, and sent to the prophet Isaiah; who comforted him. Sennacherib sitting down before Libnah, was informed that Tirhakah king of Cush, was marching against him. He went therefore, to meet Tirhakah; and sent letters to Hezekiah, telling him, not to place his confidence in his God.

Hezekiah having received these letters, went up to the temple, and spread them before the Lord; whom he intreated to deliver him from this insolent enemy. The Lord heard his prayer, and sent the prophet Isaiah to tell him, that Sennacherib should not besiege Jerusalem. The very night after this prediction, an angel of the Lord destroyed in the camp of the Assyrians, 185,000 men of Sennacherib's army; which obliged him to retire to Niniveh. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. IV.

Soon after, and in the very year of Sennacherib's invasion, the fourteenth of Hezekiah, this prince fell dangerously sick: the prophet Isaiah came to him, and said, "thou shalt die." Hezekiah zekiah turning his face to the wall, prayed to God. Isaiah was commanded to return to Hezekiah, saying, "I have healed thee, and will add fifteen years to thy life."

But Hezekiah said, by what sign shall I know, that the Lord will heal me? Isaiah answered him, would you have the shadow advance ten degrees, or retire ten degrees, on the dial of Ahaz? Hezekiah desired, that the shadow might go back ten degrees, this seeming to him most difficult; and the prophet calling on the Lord, the shadow returned ten degrees. It is very probable, that this retrogradation, which was very sensible and real in the dial of Ahaz, was caused by some reflection, or refraction of the sun's rays, without any real retrogradation of the luminary. Hezekiah after his recovery, composed a song of thanksgiving, which Isaiah has preserved, chap. xxxviii. 10, 11.

After this, Merodach or Berodach-Baladan king of Babylon, sent letters and presents to Hezekiah, because he understood that he had been sick, and knew that at the time of his cure, some great prodigy had happened at Jerusalem, 2 Chron. xxxii. 31. Hezekiah, mightily delighted with the respect implied in this embassy, shewed the envoys all his treasures, spices, rich vessels, &c. and concealed nothing from them. Isaiah afterwards told the king, that a time would come, when all he had shewn, would be removed to Babylon: and when his sons would be made eunuchs in the palace of that king. Hezekiah answered, 'the will of God be done: let peace and truth reign during my life.' This prince passed the latter years of his life in tranquillity, laid up great riches, conveyed water into Jerusalem, and died A. M. 3306, ante A. D. 698. The sacred writings praise his piety and merit; and Ecclesiasticus, has an encomium on him, chap. xlviii.

II. HEZEKIAH, second son of Neariah, descendant of Zerubbabel. 1 Chron. iii. 23.

III. HEZEKIAH, son of Shallum, opposed the Israelites, who carried a great number of their brethren of Judah into captivity; and obliged them to set them at liberty. 2 Chron. xxviii. 12.

IV. HEZEKIAH returned from Babylon with ninety eight of his family. Neh. vii. 21.

HEZION, חֶזְיוֹן, 'Azōn, vision, or prophecy; from חָזַן chazah, to see, to prophecy. [of] pleasing aspect. Grandfather of Benhadad. 1 Kings xv. 18.]

HEZIR, חֶזִיר, Xezir, hog: according to the Syriac, converted, or returned; Head of the seventeenth sacerdotal family. 1 Chron. xxiv. 15.

HEZRO, חֶזְרִי, the same as HEZRAI.

HEZRON, חֶזְרוֹן, the dart of joy; from חָץ chets, a dart, and from רָנָן ranan, a cry of joy; otherwise, division of the song; from חָצַח chat-zah, to divide, and ranan: otherwise, court; from חָצַר chatzar: or hay; from חָצִיר chatzir.

HIL

[strength, or defence, i.e. of the family, or place.]

HIDDAL, חִדָּל, or HURAI, חֲרִי 1 Chr. xi. 32, praise, or cry; from חָדַד hod, praise, and חָדַד hedad, cry; otherwise, to sharpen; from חָדַד chadad. A brave officer in David's army, 2 Sam. xxiii. 30.

[HIDDEKEL, river. See TIGRIS.]

HIEL, חִיֵּל, Khl, God lives, or the life of God; from חָיָה chajah, to live, and אֵל el, God.

HIEL, of Bethel, rebuilt Jericho, notwithstanding the predictive curse of Joshua against the person who should attempt it, of which Hiel experienced the effects; by losing his eldest son Abiram, while laying the foundations, and his youngest son Segub, when hanging up the gates. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. V.

HIERAPOLIS, Ἱερὰπολις, holy city; from ἱερόν, holy, and πόλις, a city, in Phrygia, not far from Colosse and Laodiceæ. Colos. iv. 13.

HIERONYMUS, Ἱερώνυμος, holy name; from ἱερόν, holy, and ὄνομα, a name.

HIERONYMUS, Demophon, Timotheus, and others, whom Lysias had left in Judæa, after the agreement made between the Jews and the young king Antiochus Eupator, endeavoured to oblige the Jews by their ill treatment, to break the treaty. 2 Macc. vii. 2.

HIGH PLACES, Excelsa, בָּמֹת, Bamoth. The prophets reproach the Israelites for nothing with more zeal, than for worshipping on the high places. The destroying of these high places is a commendation given but to few princes in Scripture; and many, though zealous for the law, had not courage to prevent their people from sacrificing on these eminences. Before the temple was built, the high places were not absolutely contrary to the law, provided God only was adored there, and not idols. Under the Judges they seem to have been tolerated; and Samuel offered sacrifices in several places, where the ark was not present. Even in David's time they sacrificed to the Lord at Shilo, Jerusalem, and Gibeon. But after the temple was built at Jerusalem, and the ark had a fixed settlement, it was no longer allowed to sacrifice out of Jerusalem.

The high places were much frequented in the kingdom of Israel. The people resorted sometimes to those mountains which had been sanctified by the presence of patriarchs and prophets, and by appearances of God, to worship the true God there. This worship was lawful, except as to its being exercised where the Lord had not chosen. But on these hills they often adored idols, and committed a thousand abominations in groves, and caves, and tents; whence arose the zeal of pious kings and prophets, to suppress the high places.

HILEN, a city of Judah, given to the Levites. Probably Cholon or Olon. Joshua xv. 51.

HILKIAH,

HILKIAH, חִלְקִיָּה, or חִלְקִיָּהוּ, Χελκίας, God is my portion; from חֶלֶק chelkath, and חַיִּי jah, the Lord.

I. HILKIAH, father of Eliakim. 2 Kings xviii. 18.

II. HILKIAH, son of Amaziah, a Levite of Merari's family. 1 Chron. vi. 45.

III. HILKIAH, father of Jeremiah, Jer. i. 1. Some think this Hilkiah was the high-priest, in the reign of Josiah, 2 Kings xxiii. 4, 8, 10. but this opinion wants proofs.

IV. HILKIAH, the high-priest, grandson of Shallum, and father of Azariah, who succeeded him. Under the pontificate of Hilkiah the book of the law was found in the treasury of the temple, 2 Kings xxii. xxiii. 2 Chron. xxiv. A. M. 3380, ante A. D. 624. We are of opinion, that he is the Eliakim or Joachim, in the reign of Manasseh: and when Holofernes besieged Bethulia, A. M. 3347, ante A. D. 657.

V. HILKIAH, father of the preceding Hilkiah: Baruch i. 7. 2 Kings xviii. 18, 26, 37. He lived in the reign of Hezekiah.

HILLEL, הִלֵּל, he that praises; from הָלַל hillul: otherwise, folly; from הָלַל halal: otherwise, lucifer; from הִלֵּל hellel.

I. HILLEL, a famous Rabbin, who lived, says St. Jerom, on Isaiah viii. lib. 3. a little before Jesus Christ. He was a disciple of Sameas or Schamai, and became the head of one of the most celebrated schools of the Jews. I am surprized that Josephus, who, in several places, speaks of Sameas, has said nothing of Hillel his disciple, unless he means Hillel under the name of Pollio, a famous Pharisee, friend of Herod, and master of Sameas—(Antiq. lib. xxv. cap. 1, 13.) or of Ananel, whom Herod sent for from Babylon to be high-priest. Hillel perhaps may be one or other of these; most probably Pollio. Sameas lived in the time of Hircanus, and saw the beginnings of Herod. Hillel therefore must have flourished under the reign of this prince. Antiq. lib. xiv. cap. 17.

This Rabbi was born at Babylon, and dwelt there till he was forty years of age; then he settled in Jerusalem, where he applied to the study of the law, and so much distinguished himself, that after forty years he was made head of the Sanhedrim, consequently at the age of fourscore. He lived there forty years longer, say the Jews; and according to this calculation he must have lived 120 years. He entered on his office a hundred years, as they tell us, after the taking of Jerusalem. This chronology is not exact; but the Rabbins are not very curious in this point.

They pretend that by the mother's side he descended from David, for she was of the race of Sephata the son of David and Abital; by the father's side he was of the tribe of Benjamin. All Jewish writers look on him as the most eminent among the ancient doctors of their nation: his son and grandsons discharged the office of president of the Sanhedrim with great honour, for the space of ten generations. All this depends on the credit of the Rabbins.

He was succeeded by his son Simeon, who has been confounded with old Simeon, who received our Saviour, when presented at the temple. But this conjecture is absolutely destroyed, by observing, that Hillel, having been forty years patriarch, lived about ten years after the birth of Jesus Christ; so that Simeon, if his son, could be then neither high-priest nor patriarch of the Jews, nor so far advanced in age as St. Luke intimates. The name of Hillel is not in the Scripture; and we place it here, only because it is celebrated among the Jews, and because he has been said to be the father of Simeon.

There was another Hillel very famous among the Jews, who lived, according to the Rabbins, about A. D. 240.

II. HILLEL, son of Judah the Holy, was a celebrated Rabbi among the Jews, and of great reputation even among Christians. He is thought to be the person who fixed their epoch of the creation of the world, and computed the years from thence which the Jews retain at this day. Before this period, they had used different epochs; the departure out of Egypt was the æra of some; the delivery of the law on mount Sinai, was the æra of others. Some computed from the dedication of the temple; others from the return from the Babylonish captivity; and some from the entrance of Alexander the Great into Jerusalem. But Hillel introduced the custom of reckoning their years from the beginning of the world, which has been regularly followed since the completion of the Gemara. According to the calculation made by this manner, Jesus Christ was born A. M. 3760; whereas according to our computation, he was born A. M. 4000.

The Jews are accused with having designedly abridged the chronology of the Old Testament, and the number of years before Jesus Christ, that they might the better elude the prophecies of the Messiah's coming, with which the Jews were perplexed, and particularly with the prediction of one Elias, who affirmed, that the Messiah would be born, and the law abolished, at the end of the fourth millenary of the world: for he reckoned two thousand years under the law of nature, two thousand under the law of Moses, and two thousand under the Messiah; after which the world was to end. As this tradition came from the Jews, and many of them were staggered by it, and became converts to Christianity; the second Hillel thought he

he should do essential service to his nation, in lessening the number of years from the creation of the world to the birth of Jesus Christ.

The Jews farther assert, that Hillel composed a cycle of nineteen years, whereby he reconciled the course of the sun with that of the moon, by the help of seven intercalations. He inserted a month in the third year, in the sixth, eighth, eleventh, fourteenth, seventeenth, and nineteenth years. The Jews received this cycle with so much the more readiness as he was prince of the captivity in the west: and he was always followed, till Sid reformed the calendar in Spain, by order of king Alphonso. Bartolucci, Bibl. Rabbin. tom. 2. page 416, 548. Basnage, Hist. des Juifs, tom. 2. lib. iv. cap. 5. art. 15.

Hillel reformed likewise the Tekupha, i. e. the revolution of the year, fixing the solstices and equinoxes more exactly than had been done; e. gr. the autumnal equinox had been misplaced to the 7th of October, he resettled it at the 24th of December.

He is believed to have written a famous bible with his own hand, which was preserved till the sixteenth century. Kimchi says the Pentateuch belonging to it was kept at Toledo.

Origen was acquainted with Hillel II, and frequently consulted him. Epiphanius assures us, that before his death he was converted to Christianity; that perceiving his end approaching, he sent for the bishop of Tiberias, under pretence of consulting him about his disease, as a physician; but ordering his servants out of the room, he was at his own request privately baptized. This is thought to have happened about A. D. 310 or 312.

He left a son under age in the tuition of two friends, who brought him up in the Jewish religion: he was patriarch or prince, as his father had been before him. Joseph, one of his guardians, becoming a convert to Christianity, related these particulars to Epiphanius and Eusebius of Vercell.

III. HILLEL, father of Abdon, judge of Israel. Judg. xii. 13.

HIN, הין, a Hebrew measure of capacity; containing half a seah, or the sixth part of a bath: one gallon and two pints.

The Hin was a liquid measure; as of oil, for instance, Exod. xxx. Ezek. xlv. 46, or of wine, Exod. xxix. Levit. xxiii. According to Josephus, Antiq. lib. iii. cap. 9, 10. it contained two Attic Congii. Therefore it was the sixth part of an ephah. Josephus writes, lib. iii. that they offered with an ox, half a hin of oil; in English measure, six pints 25,698 solid inches, according to the measure given by Josephus; but according to the tables, five pints 1,267 solid inches. With a ram they offered the third part of a hin, or three pints 10,469 solid inches. And with a lamb, the fourth part of a hin, or two pints 15,071 solid inches.—The prophet Ezekiel was commanded to drink an allowance of water to the quantity of the sixth part of a hin, i. e. one pint 19,672 solid inches.

HINNOM, הנום, there they are; from the adverb הן hen, there; and the pronoun אנם am, they; otherwise, their riches; from חון chun, riches, and the pronoun אנם am, theirs.

HINNOM. Gehennom, or the valley of the sons of Hinnom, so called from Hinnom. Josh. xv. 8. xxiii. 16. 2 Kings xxiii. 10. Neh. xi. 30. Jer. vii. 31. It lies east of Jerusalem, and is called also the valley of Tophet. It is believed, that the idol Moloch was worshipped here; and that a perpetual fire was maintained here in his honour. [It branched off from the valley of the brook Kidron, at Jerusalem.]

It was, say some, the common burying place of the city. Jer. vii. 32. Here was a continual burning of things offensive; and to this some of the Rabbins apply Isaiah, lxi. 24. Vide Kimchi in loc. Bath. Erubhin, fol. 19. 1.] See GEHENNA; also, the MAP of JERUSALEM.

HIPPOPOTAMUS. We do not meet with this word in the Hebrew text: but Bochart, and others assert, that the animal called in Hebrew Behemoth, Job xl. 10. בהמות תה נה, particularly denotes the Hippopotamus. We shall here give the description of this creature. The word Hippopotamus, according to its import in the Greek, signifies a river-horse. It is found principally in the Nile, the Indus, and other great rivers. [At present also, in South Africa.]

Thevenot, Voyage, part ii. cap. 72. describes the Hippopotamus after the following manner: It is of a dun colour, and resembles a buffalo very much behind; but its legs are shorter and larger. It is about the size of a camel; its muzzle like that of an ox. The body twice as large as an ox's, its head like that of a horse, its eyes and ears small, its nostrils very wide, its feet very big, and almost round, on each foot four claws, like those of a crocodile, the tail small like that of an elephant, the skin bare, and almost without hair. In its lower jaw, it has four great teeth half a foot long, two whereof are hooked, one on each side its mouth, about the size of an ox's horns: the two teeth which are strait, project out of its mouth. It was killed with musket-shot by some Janizaries, who found it upon land, where it was come to feed. They shot at it several times without piercing through its skin; but at last, being wounded in the jaw, it fell. Vide BEHEMOTH. Some are of opinion, that the species of Hippopotami, is extinct in the Nile. [They are are numerous in Abyssinia; in the upper part of the Nile.] Vide FRAGMENTS, No. LXV.

HIRAH, חִירָה, 'Εῡράς, liberty, or anger; from חִירָה chorar, to deliver, or חִירָה charah, to be angry. A Canaanite of Adullam, Judah son of Jacob, married his daughter Shuah Genesis xxxviii. 1, 2.

HIRAM, חִירָם, Χειράμ, HURAM, according to the Hebrew, elevation, or exaltation of life; from חַיָּה chajah, life, and רוּם rum, elevation; otherwise HURAM, חִירָם, their whiteness; from חִיר chur, whiteness, and אִם am, theirs; otherwise, their hole, or their liberty; from the same; otherwise, he that destroys, or anathematizes; from חִרֵם cherem. [most noble; most distinguished.]

I. HIRAM, king of Tyre, son of Abibal, mentioned by profane authors, as distinguished for his magnificence, and for adorning the city of Tyre. When David was acknowledged king by all Israel, Hiram sent ambassadors with artificers, and cedar, to build his palace. Hiram also sent ambassadors to Solomon, to congratulate him on his accession to the crown: Solomon desired of him timber and stones for building the temple, with labourers; which Hiram promised, provided Solomon would furnish him with corn and oil.

These two princes lived in mutual good understanding. Dius (apud Joseph. contra Apion, lib. 1.) who wrote the annals of Tyre, relates that they corresponded, and in Josephus's time, Hiram's letters, with Solomon's answers, were still extant. Menander of Ephesus, and the same Dius, speak of certain riddles, which these two princes proposed one to the other. Dius says, that Solomon first sent some to Hiram, which the latter was not able to solve, and therefore paid a great sum of money to Solomon; but that afterwards he explained them with the assistance of one Abdemon; and then proposing others to Solomon which he could not solve, Hiram received a much larger sum of money than he had paid. Joseph. Antiq. lib. viii. cap. 2.

After Solomon had finished all his works, he presented to Hiram twenty towns in Galilee. Hiram on viewing these places, was not pleased with them, and he called them the land of Chabul, saying, "Are these, my brother, the towns which you have given me?" See CHABUL. Scripture remarks, that Hiram lent Solomon an hundred and twenty talents of gold, (£657,000) while he was building. 1 Kings ix. 14.

II. HIRAM, son of a Tyrian father, and of a Jewish mother, of the tribe of Naphtali, according to 1 Kings vii. 13, 14. or of a Tyrian father, and a mother of the tribe of Dan, according to 2 Chron. ii. 14. Hiram was an excellent artificer in brass or copper: He made the columns called Jachin and Booz; the brazen sea, the smaller brazen basins for the priests, &c.

HIRCANUS, Ἰρκανός, the taker of the city; from קָנָה kanah, possessor, and עִיר hir, a city. But this is rather a surname borrowed from the Greeks. His proper Hebrew name was John: he was called Hircanian on occasion of some event, which to us is unknown. Vide JOHN III.

HIR-SHEMESH, חִיר-שֶׁמֶשׁ, the city of the sun; from עִיר hir, a city, and שֶׁמֶשׁ shemesh, the sun. A city of Dan. Josh. xix. 41.

HIRELING, in Moses, is taken sometimes for a labourer, or foreign servant, not a native Jew: for example, Exod. xii. 45. he forbids the stranger to eat the passover. In another place, Levit. xxii. 10. by this word is meant a hired Jew, who is not a priest: he is forbid to eat of meat that is sanctified and sacrificed to the Lord. In the gospel, the hireling is set in opposition to the true shepherd; the first neglects the sheep, the second loves and guides them carefully, John x. 12, 13.

The hirelings whom the father of the family (God) sends into his vineyard, are the prophets and apostles, Jews and Christians; the second succeed the first, and all receive their reward when their work is done. Matth. xx. 8.

The labourer, or hireling, is worthy of his hire, or wages; this is used as a proverb, Matth. x. 10. 1 Tim. v. 18.

TO HISS, expresses insult and contempt: All they, who shall see the destruction of this temple, shall be astonished and shall hiss, and say, How comes it that the Lord hath thus treated this city? 1 Kings ix. 8. Job, xxvii. 23. speaking of the wicked, says, "they shall clap their hands at him, and shall hiss him out of his place." I will make this city the subject of ridicule and scorn; "I will make it desolate and a hissing; every one that passeth thereby shall be astonished and hiss, because of all the plagues thereof." Jer. xix. 8. xlix. 17. li. 13. Lam. ii. 15, 16. Ezek. xxviii. 36. Zeph. ii. 15.

To HISS, to call any one with hissing, is a mark of power and authority. The Lord says, that in his anger he shall hiss, and call the enemy against Jerusalem. "He will hiss unto them from the end of the earth," Isaiah v. 26. He will bring them with a hiss from the remotest countries. And Isaiah vii. 18. "The Lord shall hiss for the fly," and shall bring it, "that is in the uttermost part of the rivers of Egypt, and for the bee that is in the land of Assyria." The two flies which God will bring thus with a hiss, are the kings of Egypt and Assyria, who shall pillage Israel. [Vide FRAGMENTS, No. LV. LVI. CCLXXXVI.] Theodoret and St. Cyril of Alexandria writing on Isaiah, remark, that in Syria and Palestine, those who looked after bees, drew them out of their hives, carried them into the fields, and brought them back again with the sound of a flute, and the the noise of hissing. Zachary, x. 8. speaking of the return from the Babylonish captivity, says, that the Lord will gather the house of Judah, as it were, with a hiss, and bring them back into their own country; which shews the ease and authority with which he would perform that great work.

HITTITES, חִתִּים, Χεττιμ, who is broken, or fears: or, from the Syriac, who descends.

HITTITES, Judg. i. 26. A man of Bethel went into the land of the Hittites, and built a city, and called the name thereof Luz. It is our opinion, that this man retired into the land of the Hittites, south of the tribe of Judah, and built Lusa, Elysa, or Lussa, which the geographers speak of. Josephus says, that the Jews took the city of Lussa from the Arabians. It was in memory of his native place, that this man of Bethel called his new city by the name of Lussa. The Hittites were the descendants of Heth. Ptolem. lib. v. cap. 16, 17. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiv. cap. 2.

HIVI, חַוִּי, Ἐβαιος, my life; from חָוָה chevah, life, and the pronoun 'י, מִי. Gen. x. 17.

HIVITES, or HEVIM, עִיבִים, Ἐβαιοί, wicked, bad, or wickedness; from חָוָה hava, iniquity. [Written also, in Eng. Tr. Avites, and Avim. Comp. Josh. xiii. 3. xviii. 23. Deut. ii. 23. 2 Kings xvii. 31.]

[HIVITES, those who live, or speak, or give notice: from the Syriac, adders.

This name, in the Chaldee, imports serpents; and we find people so called in many places; so many, indeed, that there is no need to enumerate them. (Ophites). Whether, as some suppose, the Hivites were Troglodytes, and dwelt in caves, and from that circumstance derived their name by comparison with serpents; or, whether they were countrymen, highlanders, mountaineers, especially in Mount Lebanon, as is indicated, Josh. xiii. 3. writers are not agreed. They might be of the widely spread serpent family and nation, yet might dwell in Mount Lebanon as their abode. Gen. x. 17. xxxiv. 2. xxxvi. 2. In Gen. xv. 15. the Samaritan and LXX. insert Hivite after Canaanite, apparently with propriety.]

HIVITES, a people descended from Hevæus, son of Canaan. They dwelt first in the country afterwards possessed by the Caphtorim, or Philistines. The Caphtorim drove out the Hivites, who dwelt from Hesperim unto Gaza, Deut. ii. 23. There were Hivites likewise at Shechem, and Gibeon, Josh. xiii. 4. in the centre of the promised land; for the inhabitants of Shechem, and the Gibeonites were Hivites, Josh. xi. 19. Lastly, there were some beyond Jordan, at the foot of mount Hermon, Gen. xxxiv. 2. Bochart is of opinion, that Cadmus, who carried a colony of Phœnicians into Greece, was a Hivite; and that his name, Cadmus, comes from the Hebrew, Kedem, the east, because he was of the eastern part of the land of Canaan. The name of his wife, Hermione, comes from mount Hermon, at the foot whereof the Hivites had their dwelling. The metamorphosis of Cadmus's companions into serpents, is grounded on the signification of the name Hivites, which in Phœnician signifies serpents. See AVIM.

HIZKI, חֲזָקִי, strong, or that takes; from חָזַק chazak, to seize, to take. HEZEKI. 1 Chr. viii. 17.

HOBAB, חֲבֹב, favoured and beloved; from חָבַב chabab, to love. [one who binds closely.]

HOBAB, son of Jethro, and brother-in-law to Moses, when departing from mount Sinai for the promised land, Numb. x. 29. said to Hobab, "we are journeying unto the place, of which the Lord said, I will give it to you; come thou with us, and we will do thee good." Hobab answered, "That he could not go, but would return into his own country." But Moses persisted, and entreated him so earnestly, that he at last complied. Some think the Kenites, who dwelt south of Judah, were the descendants of Hobab. Judg. i. 16. 1 Sam. xv. 6.

HOBAB, חֲבֹב, חֲבֹבָה, love, friendship; from חָבַב chabab: otherwise, secrecy; from חָבַה chabuh: otherwise, debtor; from חָבַה chub.

HOBAB, HOBAL, SHOBA, or SHOBAL, Gen. xiv. 15. Abraham pursued Chedorlaomer, to Hobab on the left, or north of Damascus. We are of opinion, that this is Abila, in the valley between Libanus and Antilibanus.

[In the Greek of Judith, iv. 4. it is called Choba, a den, or covert, say some: unless it might take name from some slaughter or defeat here sustained; as the Syriac root appears to denote a defeat or dispersion; with which the Arabic agrees.

As to the situation of this town, I take it for the present Habaya, which, instead of being east of Damascus, is west of that city; and a much more likely place to terminate the pursuit of the kings by Abraham, than any district beyond Damascus. It is, probably, some hollow, between mountains, which effectually secludes those who occupy it. See Hobab in the Map of CANAAN, adapted to the Book of GENESIS.]

HOD, הוֹד, praise, glory. 1 Chron. vii. 37.

HODAIAH, הוֹדִיָּה, the Lord is my praise, or praise, or confession of the Lord; from הוֹדָה hod, to praise, and יָהּ jah, the Lord. 1 Chron. iv. 9.

HODAVIAH, הוֹדִיָּה, Ὀδοῖα, Odeviah, or Odoia, the Lord is my praise; or praise, or confession of the Lord; from הוֹדָה hod, to praise.

HODAVIAH, 1 Chron. v. 24. of the tribe of Manasseh, distinguished for valour.

HODAVIAH, a Levite, father of Daniel, returned from Babylon. Ezra ii. 40.

H div. 2.

HODESH

HODESH, חֹדֶשׁ, Xódes, month; from חָדַשׁ chodesh, month; or novelty, from שָׁדַשׁ chadash. [1 Chron. viii. 9. Wife of Shabaraïm: and from the construction of the passage is the Baara of the former verse. Hadesh signifies the new moon; "fair as the moon;" very beautiful.]

HODSHI, שְׁדִישִׁי, renewing, or first day of the month: or, according to the Syriac, a present, or a new present. [In combination, Tahtim-Hodshi, 2 Sam. xxiv. 5. The descendants of Hodesh in the foregoing article, who had seven sons for sons to take name from their mother in S. S. yet we have several instances of it; as Hagarenes from Hagar: and so Abishai and Joab are called "sons of Zeruah," their mother: and, perhaps, a few others. Comp. Gen. xxxvi. 39. 2 Kings xii. 22.]

HOGLAH, חֻגְלָה, his festival, or dance; from חָגַג chagag, and הָאָה, his. Daughter of Zelophehad, of Manasseh, Numb. xxvi. 33.

HOHAM, חֹהָם, Élâu, woe to them; from הָיָה hoi, and the pronoun אֲנִי am, them: otherwise, he that troubles and disquiets; from חָמַם hum. King of Hebron, one of the five who besieged Gibeon, with Adonizedeck: hanged by Joshua's orders. Josh. x. A. M. 2553, ante A. D. 1451.

HOLÓCAUST, from the Greek ὁλόκαυστον, ab ὅλος totus, et καίω accendo, which signifies 'entirely burnt,' because all the flesh of burnt-offerings was consumed by fire upon the altar; herein these offerings differed from sacrifices for sin and other sacrifices, parts whereof were not consumed on the altar, but were reserved. The Hebrew word חָלַל halah, translated burnt-offering, signifies to go up: because the whole sacrifice, thus offered, ascends and goes up in smoke. The oldest sacrifices known to us, are burnt-offerings; and it is probable, that before the law, no others were offered; and that even the sacrifices for sin, and for thanksgiving, were Holocausts. See SACRIFICE. After the settlement of the tabernacle, or at least after the building of the temple, two lambs were offered daily as burnt-offerings on the brazen altar, one in the morning, the other in the evening: the first before all other sacrifices; the second, after all.

HÓLOFERNES, חִלְפֶּרְנֶס, strong and courageous captain; from חָיָה chai, strong, and phernes, captain, according to the Syriac. This is a Persian name, and it is difficult to find its root in the Hebrew. One might also explain it 'by he that breaks anger, or the officer of the serpent of the devil.'

HÓLOFERNES, lieutenant-general of the armies of Nebuchadonozar, king of Assyria. See NEBUCHADNEZZAR and ARPHAXAD. Nebuchadonozar sent Holofernes against Syria, at the head of a powerful army. This general passed the Euphrates, entered Cilicia and Syria, and subdued almost all these provinces, (north of Judea) every where exercising a thousand cruelties, and endeavouring to have his master worshipped as a God.

Having resolved to conquer Egypt, he advanced (southwards) toward Judæa, Judith v. when he was informed, that the Jews were preparing to oppose him; and Achior, commander of the Ammonites, of whom a body as auxiliary troops was in his army, represented to him that they were a people protected in a particular manner by Almighty God, so long as they were obedient to him; and therefore he should not flatter himself with the expectation of overcoming them, unless they had committed some offence against their God. Holofernes, provoked at this discourse, said to him, since you have acted so well the prophet, you shall perish together with the Hebrews, whose God and whose power you have so gloriously described to us. At the same time he commanded his servants to convey Achior before the walls of Bethulia; they tied him to a tree, and left him there, whether the Jews soon came and loosed him.

In the mean time Holofernes formed the siege of Bethulia; and having cut off the water, and set guards at the only fountain of the besieged near the walls, the city was reduced to extremity, and resolved to surrender, if God did not send them succour in five days. Judith being informed of their resolution, conceived the design of killing Holofernes in his camp. Dressed with the utmost magnificence, she quitted Bethulia, with her maid-servant; and being brought to the general, pretended she could no longer endure the sins and excesses of the Jews, and that God had inspired her with the design of surrendering herself.

Holofernes was enchanted with her beauty; and on a following day invited her to a great feast. But he drank so much wine, that sleep and drunkenness hindered him from satisfying his passion. Judith, who that night was left alone in his tent, cut off his head with his own sword; and returned with her servant to Bethulia, carrying away her trophy. When day-light came, the besieged made a sally on their enemies, who going for orders into their general's tent, found his headless carcase wallowing in its blood. They then discerned that Judith had deceived them, and they fled with precipitation, leaving their camp full of rich spoils: the Jews pursued them, killed many, and returned loaded with booty.

There is great diversity of opinions concerning the time of this war. Some date it before the captivity of Babylon, in the reign of Manasseh, and the pontificate of Eliakim, the high priest.

priest. Others place it after the general Babylonish captivity. Vide JUDITH. We suppose it to have happened before the captivity, A. M. 3348, ante A. D. 656.

HOLON, חֹלֹן, חֹלֶסֶן, Vulgate, Olon. A window: otherwise, profanation; from חָלָה chol: otherwise, trouble; from חָלָה chalah. Cholon, Olon, or Helon, a city of refuge belonging to the priests, in the mountains of Judah, Josh. xv. 51. xxi. 15.

[II. HOLON, a city of Moab. "The mansion of residence," i. e. the long, the preferable, residence, as Simon thinks: but, from its antiquity, appearing to be one of the cities of Canaan previous to the conquest under Joshua. I should presume it might denote "the Aun of opening," whether as a window, or rather of the orifice through which renovated mankind issued to a second existence. Aperture, or fissure, is the import of the root. Jer. xlviii. 21.]

HOLY, HOLINESS; means sometimes outward purity, [cleanliness] sometimes internal holiness: God is HOLY in a transcendent and infinitely perfect manner. He is the fountain of holiness, purity, and innocency. He sanctifies his saints, his people, his priests. He requires perfect holiness in those who approach him; and to be sanctified and honoured by his servants. He rejects all worship which is not pure and holy, whether internal or external.

The prophets called the Lord, The holy One of Israel, as if holy were synonymous with deity. The Messiah is called the holy one; "Thou shalt not suffer thine holy one to see corruption," Psalm xvi. 10. Isaiah, xli. 14. "Thy redeemer is the holy one of Israel." And in the Gospel, "I know thee who thou art; the holy one of God," Luke iv. 34. And again, "The holy thing which shall be born of thee, shall be called the son of God," Luke i. 35. Jesus Christ is called simply the holy one, "Ye denied the holy one and the just, and desired a murderer to be granted to you," Acts iii. 14. Holy is the common epithet given to the third person of the Trinity, the Holy Spirit.

The Israelites are generally called holy in Scripture, because they are the Lord's; they profess the true religion, are called to holiness, &c.—"Ye shall be a holy nation. Ye shall be holy men unto me," Exod. xix. 6. "All the congregation are holy, every one of them," Lev. xi. 44, 45. Numb. xvi. 3. We are, said Tobit to his son, filiis sanctorum, sons of a holy people. Tobit ii. 18.

From the infinite holiness of God, every thing belonging to him should be styled holy; his temple, his ministers, his solemnities, &c. &c.

Christians are declared holy, as being called to, and designed for, a more excellent holiness, and having received earnest of the Holy Spirit in a more plentiful and perfect manner. St. Luke in the Acts, and St. Paul in his Epistles, generally describe Christians under the name of saints, i. e. holy persons.

The holy is used sometimes for the temple; also for heaven, as the place of the Almighty's abode. "Behold, the blood of it was not brought in within the holy place; ye should indeed have eaten it in the holy place;" i. e. the temple, or the court of the priests, called holy, compared with the court of the people; as in Ezek. xlii. 14. "The priests shall not go out of the holy place into the outer court." And 1 Macc. iv. 36.

By holy are likewise understood in general all holy things, consecrated to God; by holy of holies, such things as are particularly consecrated to him: as the altar of burnt-offerings, Exod. xxix. 37. the perfumed oil with which Aaron anointed the altar and sacred vessels, Exod. xxx. 10. the utensils of the holy, and the sanctuary, are mentioned in the same style; as are the offerings and sacrifices reserved to Aaron and his sons, Exod. xxx. 36. Levit. ii. 3, 10. vi. 17, 25, et al.

Holy is used sometimes for heaven; the Lord send thee help from the holy, the sanctuary, from heaven. Psalm xx. 2. As for thee, O Lord, thy dwelling is in the holy. Psalm xxi. 4. He hath looked down from the height of his holy; from heaven did he behold the earth, &c. Vide HALLOW.

ADDITION.

[This article deserves further illustration; and is indeed of great consequence to a proper understanding of various passages, especially in the New Testament. In the original, as well Greek as Hebrew, two words are used, which appear under one word, holy, in the Eng. Tr. yet are not synonymous; for, one seems to import what may be called, for distinction sake, "holiness imparted," i. e. external; the other, "holiness inherent," i. e. internal:—one seems to be passive, the other active: one appertains to rites and ceremonies, the other to character: one imports a strict separation from common things of the same kind and order; whereas, the other imports a condescension extended to others, whether common or inferior.

HOLINESS BY SEPARATION.

I. Cleanliness of places. The Hebrew word Kadesh, קֹדֶשׁ, Holy, to which the Greek, ἅγιος, Holy, answers, imports the opposite to foul, filthy, defiled; i. e. CLEAN: so we have Deut. xxiii. a precept for preserving the camp from excrementitious ordure, "for the Lord walketh in thy camp, therefore shall thy camp be holy, that he see no unclean thing in thee." So Hezekiah, H 2 div. 2.

2 Chron,

2 Chron. xxix. 5. commands the Levites to "sanctify the house of the Lord," that is to say, "to carry forth the filthiness," &c. as immediately follows, throughout the passage. et al.

II. Cleanliness of persons: and this is, 1. by avoiding pollution; as, not eating unclean food: so Lev. xi. 41. "creeping things—ye shall not eat—ye shall sanctify yourselves, and ye shall be holy;" also, by removing from a dead body, Lev. xxi. 6. in the case of the priests: 2. by purifying the person and the clothes, Exod. xi. 10. 14. 22. comp. Josh. iii. 5. In Numb. v. 17, what the Hebrew reads "holy water," the LXX. read "clean water:" and this sense of free from pollution, occurs in the Targums, as expressing the import of the Hebrew Kadesh, holy; as Isaiah lxxv. 5. "I am holier,—cleaner—than thou." It is also strongly implied in the history 1 Sam. xxi. 5. "the vessels of the young men are holy;" whether we take the term vessels, literally, or figuratively.

III. Separation, or preparation, for a special purpose. So Josh. xx. 7. Eng. Tr. "and they appointed, Heb. sanctified Kadesh in Galilee," &c. The mother of Micah, Judges xvii. 3, had "wholly dedicated, Heb. in sanctifying had sanctified her silver," to make an idol. Hence the prophets Jeremiah, vi. 4, Joel, iii. 9, and Micah, iii. 5. speak of sanctifying war: Hence Kadeshah is a woman sanctified to an idol; a class well known throughout India: also, Kedeshim, of the male sex. Comp. 2 Kings x. 20. Isaiah, lxvi. 17.

IV. HOLINESS was sometimes TEMPORARY: it ceased after a special purpose had been accomplished. Moses was directed to take off his shoes, "for the place whereon thou standest is holy ground," Acts vii. 33. Exod. iii. 5. i. e. holy for the time being. Peter, 2 Epist. i. 18. speaks of the "holy mount" of transfiguration: i. e. holy for the time being. In Lev. xxvii. 14. Moses supposes that a man had "sanctified his house," and afterwards wished to redeem it: after it was redeemed, it could be no longer holy. And when persons were sanctified to qualify them for attending a sacrifice, as Jesse and his sons, 1 Sam. xvi. 5, the sanctification eventually ceased; for only David was distinguished "from that day forward." Comp. Zeph. i. 7.

V. Holiness by descent, or parentage. The first born son, inheriting from the earliest ages, the right to the priesthood of the family, was by pre-eminence and destination holy to the Lord, Exod. xiii. 2. Luke ii. 23. afterwards, among the Israelites, Numb. iii. 12, 13. the tribe of Levi was substituted, and was holy; inheriting the birthright-holiness of the first-born; the priests were more holy, by descent, as well as by office; and the High priest was most holy.

VI. In the foregoing particulars the Greek word ἅγιος uniformly answers to the Hebrew word Kadesh: it retains the same meaning, but with considerable enlargement, in the New Testament, when denoting an assembly of persons, of whatever nation, or rank, separated by profession from the heathen world; so Acts xx. 32. "to give you an inheritance among all them who are sanctified," the whole Christian community, in all parts, and all ages, of the world. Comp. xxvi. 18. Eph. v. 3. Col. 1. 27. Also, the members of a certain Christian church, or society, taken collectively, Rom. i. 7. xvi. 15. and 1 Cor. i. 2. vi. 1. 2. though individuals among them might be doubtful; or irregular, or corrupt, chap. xvii. or even criminal, as the incestuous person, chap. v. And this became a title given freely and unreservedly, by the faithful at large to each other, during many ages: nor is it wholly lost among the Greeks. The teachers of Christianity were distinguished as a holy priesthood to offer up spiritual sacrifices, 1 Pet. ii. 5; and the mystery of Christ is said to be "now revealed to the holy apostles and (new-testament) prophets by the Spirit," Eph. iii. 5; Compare titles accepted by the Greek priests, FRAGMENT, No. XXVI.

Now, if holiness be conferred for a temporary, or a special, purpose, to which it is of course, restricted, the conjugal relation, already contracted, might be sanctified specially, to, (or by) a wife, or a husband, i. e. to its purposes, duties and affections, without conferring holiness, generally: which elucidates the true import of a passage, 1 Cor. vii. 14. that has been but too often wrested from its proper sense. And, if holiness attached by descent, previous to the law, and under the law, to the very last, it might most justly attach by descent from a christian parent, as the Apostle determines:—"for the unbelieving husband is sanctified, to all the purposes of marriage, to the believing wife; and the unbelieving wife is sanctified to all the purposes of marriage to the believing husband; else were your children [i. e. of the Corinthians, though church members] unclean; whereas, now they are HOLY." It should be observed, also, that in the Jewish books the children of proselytes are called holy, בקדושה, BEKADUSHAH, as is shewn by Braunius, referred to by Schleusner, sub voce ἅγιος.

HOLINESS BY CHARACTER.

But, there is another word rendered holy by our translators, to which attention is also due, ὁσιος; the import of which may be best understood from its application in the O. T. by the LXX. Prov. x. 29. "The way of the Lord is strength to the upright; but destruction to the workers of iniquity;" it is evident from the contrast trast of ideas in the passage, that "workers of good," should stand opposed to workers of iniquity. xx. 11. "Even a child is known by his doings, whether his work be pure, and whether it be upright;" whether the intention, the bias of his mind, be benevolent. xxix. 10. "The blood-thirsty hate the upright"—the very opposite to blood-thirsty, the beneficent. We may now see the intention of the Apostle, 1 Tim. ii. 8. "I will that men pray every where, lifting up holy hands," more than αγιος, i. e. beneficent, pacific, the very contrary to "wrath and squabbling." If Christians at large should be thus kindly affectioned, much more a Christian Bishop, Tit. i. 8. who must be—φιλόξενον, the stranger's friend,—φιλάγαθον, the good man's lover, steady in his deportment, just towards all,—Όσιον, holy; much rather beneficent, extending his bounty beyond the stranger whose friend he is, or the good man of whom he is the lover, to the miserable and the distressed. The great Christian pattern is repeatedly denoted by this term: Psalm xvi. 10. Acts ii. 27. Heb. vii. 26. "Such an high priest became us who is holy"—rather, extending universally the sympathies of his compassion, his tenderness, his pity; and as such the distinguished object of prophecy;—"thou wilt not leave his soul in hell, nor suffer thine holy one—thy commissioned agent, who went about doing good—to see corruption." This term is applied a second time to the Messiah, in full conviction that it could apply to no other, as every hearer must acknowledge, Acts xiii. 35.—as Clem. Alex. exclaims, what benefits, "Όσια, do we not owe to Christ!" And though my opinion differ from that of commentators, (Comp. Dr. Campbell's Dissert. vi.) I cannot but think, that this term retains the same meaning in Rev. xv. 4, xvi. 5. Who shall not fear thee, O Lord, and glorify thy name, for thou only art Όσιος, holy (but other copies read Άγιος) benevolent towards thy people, in making thy judgments manifest against their enemies.—"Thou art righteous, δίκαιος, thou who art, thou who wast, thou who shalt be, THE HOLY, ο Όσιος, THE MOST BENEFICENT, because, on behalf of thy people, thou hast inflicted punishments on those who shed their blood. Comp. Prov. x. 29. above. And it is remarkable that this term, though implying mercy, stands connected with judgments, Deut. xxxii. 4. and with justice, Psalm cxlv. 17.]

[HOMER, a dry measure of capacity among the Hebrews, containing the tenth part of an ephah, nearly six pints. Vide Exod. xvi. 36.]

HOMAM, המאם, Εμαμ, their tumult, or their noise, from המאם amah, a tumult or noise, and the pronoun am, theirs. 1 Chron. i. 39.

HONEY. Bees are some of the smallest creatures that fly, says Ecclesiasticus, xi. 3. but the produce of them is the sweetest thing in the world. Scripture, describing a troop of enemies pursuing with obstinacy and warmth, uses the similitude of bees: "And chased them as bees do," Deut. i. 44. "Like bees they chased me in on every side," Psalm cxviii. 12.

God did not permit honey to be offered on his altars: "Ye shall burn no leaven, nor any honey, in any offering of the Lord made by fire," Levit. ii. 11. Many reasons are given for this law; as, that honey does not agree well with other things, as with roast meat, which was offered in sacrifice; and that it makes bread sour; or because bees are unclean insects; or because honey is the symbol of carnal pleasures; or lastly, to avoid the customs of the heathen, who offered honey in their sacrifices. Herodot. lib. ii. Vide Bochart, de Animal. Sacr. part 1, lib. iv. cap. 11. Vide Ezek. xvi. 18, 19.

But, though God forbids honey to be offered in sacrifice, he commands the first-fruits of it to be presented to him: these first fruits and offerings being designed for the support of the priests, and not to be offered on the altar. By the word honey, דבש debash, the Rabbins and authors of Hebrew dictionaries, understand not only the honey of bees, but likewise the honey of dates, or the fruits of the palm-tree, or the dates themselves, from which honey is extracted; and when God enjoins the first-fruits of honey to be offered to him, the first-fruits of dates seem to be meant: for we know that generally the produce only of fruits was offered.

HONEY was formerly very common in Palestine. The frequent expressions of Scripture, which import that that country was a land flowing with milk and honey, are proofs of this. Moses says, that the Lord brought his people into a land whose rocks drop oil, and whose stones produce honey. Deut. xxxii. 13. Psalm lxxxi. 16. Honey ran upon the ground in the forest, where Jonathan dipped the end of his staff in a honeycomb, and sucked it, 2 Sam. xiv. 25. Travellers observe, that it is at this day in great plenty there; and that the inhabitants mix it in all their sauces. John the Baptist fed on wild honey, found in rocks or in hollow trees, Matth. iii. 4. Children were fed with milk, cream, and honey: "Butter and honey shall be eat, that he may know to refuse the evil and choose the good." Isaiah vii. 15. This was the sweetest and most delicious substance known before sugar. God complains of Jerusalem for offering that bread, oil, and honey, to idols, which he had given to the inhabitants for nourishment. Too great a quantity of honey is hurtful to the stomach, and creates a loathing. "Hast thou found honey," says the wise man, "eat

"eat so much as is sufficient for thee, lest thou be filled therewith, and vomit it," Prov. xxv. 16. Vide FRAGMENT, No. CLXXXIII.

HONOUR. To honour, is taken not only for inward or outward respect paid to superiors, those to whom we owe particular deference and distinction, but for real services: "Honour thy father and mother," Exod. xx. 12. not only shew respect and deference, but assist them, and perform such services to them as they need. Balaam, king of Moab, said to Balaam, "I thought to promote thee to great honour, but lo the Lord hath kept thee back from honour," Numb. xxiv. 11. i. e. from reward. "Honour the Lord with thy substance, and with the first-fruits of thine increase," Prov. iii. 9. i. e. testify your respect and obedience to him.

Honour also denotes that adoration which is due to God only. "I was afraid to transfer the honour of my God to man," says Mordecai, Esth. xiii. 14. And the Psalmist, xxix. 2. "Give unto the Lord the honour due unto his name." And Malachi, i. 6. "If I be the Lord, where is my honour?" And St. Paul, "Unto the only wise God be honour and glory," 1 Tim. i. 17.

HOPE. The hope of Israel, was—the end of the Babylonish captivity,—the coming of the Messiah, and—the happiness of heaven. The Lord is the hope of the righteous; their hope shall not be confounded; the hope of the ungodly shall perish; it shall be without effect; or they shall live and die without hope. Abraham against hope believed in hope, contra spem in spem, when being advanced in years God promised him a son. The prisoners of hope, Zech. ix. 12. Vincti spei, the Israelites who were in captivity, but in hopes of deliverance.

Hope in the New Testament is generally taken for hope in Jesus Christ, hope of eternal blessings, hope of a future resurrection: "Experience produceth hope, and hope maketh not ashamed," Rom. v. 4, 5. Our hope is founded on the patience and consolation which we derive from the Scriptures. Faith, Hope, and Charity; are the treasures of Christians, 1 Cor. xiii. 13. Jesus Christ is all our hope, 1 Tim. i. 1. All our hope in this life and the next arises from his merits, his blood, his grace, his promises, and his spirit.

[Hope is distinguished from Faith by its desire of good, only; and by its reference to futurity, only: whereas Faith contemplates evil as well as good; and refers to things past, as well as to things future. (See FAITH) We are therefore, said to be "saved by hope," by the hope, or conviction, or desire, of unseen things; and we read of the "full assurance of hope," which may be taken as synonymous with cheerful and earnest expectation.

Hope, like all other graces, admits of degrees: it is sometimes feeble, but, when it is the result of experience, it is confident, and proof against shame, or hesitation; it is sometimes limited—to things near, or to things likely, but it also extends beyond this world, to possessions laid up in heaven; to glory, immortality, and eternal life. It is repeatedly connected with patience, with waiting, with expectation, with rejoicing, and with reason; for, the hope of a Christian, however it may refer to Divine things, or be founded on Divine promises, or be derived from, and promoted by, the Sacred Spirit, is yet a reasonable hope, and combines purity of heart, and life, i. e. obedience, with devout and fervent reliance on the promises and perfections of God.]

HOPHNI, חֲפֹנִי, he that covers, from חָפַף chapaph: or my fist; from חָפַן chaphen.

HOPHNI, and Phineas, sons of Eli, the high-priest, were, says the Scripture, sons of Belial, wicked and dissolute, 1 Sam. ii. 12, i. e. &c. They knew not the Lord, nor performed the functions of their ministry in the tabernacle, as they ought to have done; for when an Israelite had sacrificed a peace-offering, the son or servant of the priest came while they were dressing the flesh of it, and holding a fork with three teeth, in his hand, he put it into the pot, and what he could take up with it was the priest's portion. In like manner also, before the fat was burnt, the priest's servant came, and said to him who sacrificed, 'Give me flesh to roast, for I will have the flesh raw.' 'Let us first burn the fat, according to custom,' said he who sacrificed; but the servant replied, 'No; you shall give it me instantly, or I will take it by force.'

Rightly to understand this transgression, observe, that the text regards not burnt-offerings or sacrifices for sin, but peace-offerings, or those presented from free-will devotion; the blood whereof, the fat, the kidneys, and the caul, which covers the intestines, were offered to the Lord; all the rest of the sacrifice belonged to him who offered it: the priest's fee was the right shoulder and the breast. Moses does not say, Lev. vii. 31, 32, whether this should be given dressed or raw; but it appears from this place, 1. That it was not given to the priest till it was dressed; and, 2. that the priest had no right to demand it, till the fat had been offered on the fire of the altar.

The high-priest, Eli, was no stranger to these and other very great irregularities of his sons. verse 22. He reproved them, but so faintly, that they did not change their behaviour.

Some years afterwards, A. M. 1861, ante A. D. 1143, 1 Sam. iii. 11, 12, the Lord caused Eli and and his sons to be threatened by the young prophet Samuel. Accordingly, the Philistines having declared war against Israel, Israel lost about 4000 men: the elders of the people said, 'Bring hither the ark of the Lord, that it may save us from our enemies;' and the two sons of Eli, Hophni and Phinehas, brought the ark into the camp. But God permitted the Philistines to obtain another victory over Israel. They killed 30,000 men, including Hophni and Phinehas, and carried the ark into captivity.

HOPHRAH, הֹפְרָא, Ὁφαρῶν, an Egyptian name, whose etymology it would be in vain to seek in the Hebrew.

HOPHRAH, king of Egypt, in the time of Zedekiah, king of Judah, and Nebuchadnezzar the great, king of Chaldaea, Jer. xlv. 30. Herodotus calls him Apries, lib. ii. cap. 161, 162, 169. Zedekiah, king of Judah, weary of the Babylonish yoke, in the seventh year of his reign, made an alliance with Hophrah, king of Egypt. Ezekiel reproaches him for it in very strong terms, Ezek. xvii. 15.

In the ninth year of Zedekiah, Nebuchadnezzar came against Jerusalem, and took all the cities of Judah, except Lachish, Azekah, and Jerusalem, 2 Kings xxv. 1. 1 Chron. xxxvi. 17. Jer. xxxix. 1. iii. 4. Pharaoh Hophrah advanced to his assistance; and Nebuchadnezzar marched against him. Jeremiah foretold (chap. xxxvii. 5, 6,) that the Egyptians would return without venturing a battle against the Chaldeans, which happened accordingly. Jeremiah also prophesied, (chap. xlv. 30.) that the king of Egypt should be delivered into the hands of his enemies, as Zedekiah had been into the hands of Nebuchadnezzar. Vide also Ezekiel, (xxx. xxxi.) who describes the fall of Egypt in a very pathetic manner.

These predictions were executed, first against Apries, or Hophrah, by Amasis; afterwards against Egypt and the Egyptians by Nebuchadnezzar. Herodotus says, Hophrah was the son of Amasis, &c.

After the death of Hophrah, Nebuchadnezzar destroyed Jerusalem, then he attacked Tyre, and took it after a siege of thirteen years. During this long siege, he was reduced to great straits, and to make him amends in some sort for his losses, God said to Ezekiel, that he had given him the land of Egypt, A. M. 3432, ante A. D. 571. Ezek. xxix. 18, 20. xxx. 1, 19.

Accordingly, Nebuchadnezzar marched against Egypt, and subdued it, from Migdol, or Magdol, at the entrance of it, to Sienna, [now Assouan] at the southern extremity. He committed such ravages, that it could not recover itself in forty years. Nebuchadnezzar left Amasis in Egypt, with the title of king, but tributary and subject to him; after which he returned to Babylon, loaded with spoils.

HOR, הָר, who conceives, or shews.

[The import of this appellation is probably high, or steep: the Chaldee has a cognate root expressing exaltation, or a person's lifting himself up; and such a term would aptly express the highest or steepest mountain in its neighbourhood.]

HOR, a mountain in Arabia Petræa, on the confines of Idumæa. Here Aaron died and was buried, in the fortieth year after the departure from Egypt, A. M. 2552, ante A. D. 1452. Deut. xxxiii. 50. Numb. xx. 26. xxvii. 13.

HORAM, הֹרָם, Ἑλὰμ, their mountains, or who conceives them or shews them; from הָר chor, and the pronoun הָם am, theirs, them. The Septuagint read a ה lamed instead of a ר resh. King of Gezer; assisting the king of Lachish, he was defeated, and his country was ravaged, Josh. x. 33. A. M. 2554, ante A. D. 1450.

HOREB, הָרֵב, ἡ ἄρηθ, desert, solitude, destruction; dryness, the sword.

HOREB, a mountain in Arabia Petræa, so near mount Sinai, that Horeb and Sinai seem to be two hills of the same mountain. Sinai lies east, Horeb west; so that when the sun rises, the latter is covered with the shadow of Sinai. There are springs and fruit-trees on Horeb, but only rain water on Sinai. At Horeb God appeared to Moses in the burning bush, Exod. iii. 1, 2, 3. At the foot of this mountain Moses struck the rock, and drew water from it, Exod. xvii. 6. Elijah retired here to avoid the persecution of Jezebel, 1 Kings xix. 8. [q. was there at that time a kind of convent here?] It is said frequently, that God gave the law at Horeb, though other places expressly name Sinai; because Horeb and Sinai made in some sort but one mountain.

The rock of HOREB, whence Moses drew water. See Exod. xvii. 6, 7, and REPHIDIM; also the PLATES: VIEWS of SINAI, MAPS, &c.

HOREM, הֹרֵם, Ὁρᾶν, destruction, anathema, nets, snares, a thing devoted or consecrated to God. A city of Naphtali. Josh. xix. 38.

[It is usually said, that Hormah (vide HORMAH) derived its name from being devoted to destruction. Was Horem so devoted, or was any other kind of consecration to God adopted with respect to this city, and expressed by the same term? It is certain, that things irrevocably consecrated to God, were not therefore destroyed, but that the use of those things was continued in the divine service. In like manner, what forbids our supposing that the property of a town was vested in the national institutions for worship? that its revenues, &c. were wholly appropriated, in perpetuity, to the tabernacle, nacle, or the temple, so that they were irrevocable on the part of the nation; without including the idea of utter destruction of the thing, or place, &c. vowed to the Lord.]

[HOR-HAGIDGAD, the hill of Gadgad, or of troop, or of good fortune, &c. vide GAD. An encampment of Israel, when coming out of Egypt, Numb. xxxiii. 32, 33.

The term Hor in this text is written with ה, not with ח, which varies the import from hill, which, I conceive, it should be, to cavern, or hollow entrance, out of which some suppose a stream of water flowed. The Samaritan, and some Hebrew MSS. read with the LXX. "the hill of Gadgad." In Deut. x. 7. where our version reads Gudgodah, the Samaritan has Gad-gadah; the LXX. and Vulgate, Gadgad.

The term Gadgad is variously taken: some suppose it denotes a species of locust, which, going in troops, troop upon troop, might frequent this hill; and such critics incline to unite Gudgodah with Jotbathah, in the description of "a land of rivers of water," Deut. x. 7. Eusebius and Jerom understood the passage in this sense; our translators have taken it otherwise; but if it were a place of streams, it would also be a place of vegetation, and if of vegetation, it would of course attract troops of locusts when crossing this desert. Hiller renders it "locusts' cavern."

As this place appears to have been a hill, and the name Gadgad imports troops, might it derive its name from any kind of review here made of the Israelitish army, or any regulation of their battalions? "The hill of troops;" or of the battalia. However, possibly, it was a station for troops of robbers.]

HORI, חורי, Xorri, prince, free-man, or who is in a passion: from חרה charah. Son of Lotan, of the race of Seir, the Horite, Gen. xxxvi. 22.

HORITES, חוריים, [Libertines, or holes].

Very probably this name refers to a people of great antiquity, who dwelt in caves or holes in the sides of their mountain: they were Troglydites. Such was the custom of many early settlers, before they ventured to build cities, (and even afterwards.) Comp. Hivites. Gen. xiv. 6. xxxvi. 20, 21, 29. Deut. ii. 12, 22.]

HORITES, an ancient people, who dwelt in the mountains of Seir, beyond Jordan, Gen. xiv. 6. They had princes, and were powerful before Esau conquered their country. The Horites and the Edomites seem afterwards to have composed but one people. They dwelt in Arabia Petrea and Arabia Deserta, south-east of Judæa. Deut. ii. 1. xliii. 2. and Judg. v. 4.

The Hebrew חורי, Chori or Chorim, translated Horites in Genesis, is used in an appellative sense in other passages of Scripture, signifying heroes, great and powerful men. Probably the Greeks derived from hence their heroes, as they derived Anax, a king, from Anak, the giant, and his sons. 1 Kings xxi. 8, 11. Neh. ii. 16. iv. 14. v. 7. vi. 17. vii. 5. xiii. 17. Isaiah xxxiv. 12.

HORMAH, חרמה, Ḥarama, which is lifted up: from רם ramam, or רום rum: otherwise, to reject: from רמה ramah.

HORMAH, חרמה, Ḥormah, Bethalarma, or as Arma; for the Vulgate takes them for two different cities: destruction, anathema.

[Harma, a place in Boeotia, was so named from an evacuation to which it had been subjected. Comp. Bochart, Canaan, p. 473.]

HORMAH, HERMA, HARMA, or ARAMA; it should be written Chorma, or Cherma, חרמה anathema. Judg. i. 17. Numb. xxv. 3. called Zephath before the Hebrews named it Hormah. What occasioned that denomination, was this: the king of Arad, a Canaanite, who dwelt south of the Land of Promise, having attacked the Hebrews, put them to flight, and took a very rich booty: hereupon the Israelites engaged by vow to devote every thing belonging to the king of Arad, and entirely destroy it. Vide CHEREM, or ANATHEMA. It is very probable this vow was not executed till after Joshua entered the Land of Promise. Among the kings overcome by him, we find a king of Herma, or Horma, and king of Arad or Arad. Josh. xv. 30. xix. 4. Hormah belonged afterwards to the tribe of Simeon.

[HORNET, a kind of large wasp, which has a powerful sting. We learn from Deut. vii. 20. and Josh. xxiv. 12. that the Lord drove out the Canaanites before Israel by means of this insect. A friend has suggested, that possibly this hornet was the zimb of Ethiopia, before which neither man nor beast can subsist:—without affirming this, I think it likely that the account of the zimb in FRAGMENTS, Numbers LVI. CCLXXXVI, may illustrate the manner in which the Canaanites were expelled their country; and if this insect were one of the plagues of Egypt, as I have supposed, no reason appears why it should not be in the hand of Providence, a very effectual plague on the Canaanites. N.B. The Israelites, in the sandy wilderness, would escape the violence of this creature.]

HORNS. The Hebrews, by horns, sometimes understood an eminence, or angle, a corner, or a rising. My beloved has a vineyard, situated on a horn of the son of oil, i. e. on an eminence, or corner of a rich and fertile mountain. Isaiah, v. 1. By horns of the altar of burnt-offerings, many understand the angles of that altar; but there were also horns or eminences at these angles. Exod. xxvii. 2. xxx. 2. Vide the PLATES, ALTARS; and FRAGMENT, No. CXXVIII.

Horn

Horn signifies likewise glory, brightness, rays; for example, the face of Moses was encompassed with horns, i. e. it was radiant, or, as it were, horns of light issued from it. Vide FRAGMENT, No. CXXII.

As the ancients frequently used horns to hold liquors, vessels containing oil, and perfumes, are often called horns, whether made of horn or not. Fill thine horn with oil, says the Lord to Samuel, and anoint David, 1 Sam. xvi. 1. Zadok took a horn of oil out of the tabernacle, and anointed Solomon, 1 Kings i. 39. Job called one of his daughters Keren-ha-phuc, Horn of Antimony, Cornu stibii, or horn to hold antimony [or Stibium], with which the women of the East adorn their eyes. Job xlii. 14.

The principal defence and strength of many beasts is in their horns; whence, in Scripture, the horn is a symbol of strength. The Lord exalted the horn of David; the horn of his people; he breaketh the horn of the ungodly; he cutteth off the horn of Moab; he cutteth off, in his fierce anger, all the horn of Israel; he promises to make the horn of Israel to bud forth; to re-establish the honour of it, and restore its former vigour. Moses, comparing Joseph, says, he has horns like those of a rheem, or rhinoceros. The sacred authors frequently express victory in words like the following: thou shalt toss them into the air with horns; thou shalt disperse them as a bull disperses every thing that comes before him with his horns, &c. See the PLATES: RHINOCEROS, and explanation.

Kingdoms and great powers are often described by the symbol of horns, 1 Macc. vii. 46. In Dan. vii. viii. horns represent the power of the Persians, of the Greeks, of Syria, and of Egypt. The prophet describes these animals as having many horns, one whereof grew from another; which should not surprise us, since in the East there are rams which have many horns. Vide FRAGMENT, No. CLXVII. and plate.

In 1 Maccabees, ix. 1. the wings of an army are called its horns.

HORON, or ORONAIM, a city of Arabia, from whence came Sanballat, Nehem. ii. 10. &c.

HORONAIM, חֲרֹנַיִם, Ἄρωμαι, anger, rage; from חָרָה charah: otherwise, hole, cave; from חֹר chur. Liberty, according to the Syriac. A town of Moab, Isaiah xv. 5. Josephus, Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 23. xiv. cap. 2.

HORSE, a beast well known, but not so common among the Hebrews till Solomon's time, as afterwards. Before that time we find no horsemen mentioned in the armies of Israel. God forbids their kings to keep many horses, Deut. xvii. 16. The judges and princes of Israel generally rode on mules (as David did) and asses.

Solomon is the first king who had many horses; but we do not read that he made any military expeditions. He received his horses from Egypt, and every set cost him more than six hundred shekels: about ninety pounds.

HORSES, consecrated to the sun. We read, 2 Kings xxiii. 11. that Josiah took away the horses which the kings of Judah, his predecessors, had consecrated to the sun. The sun was worshipped over all the East, and the horse was consecrated to that deity, who was represented as riding in a chariot, drawn by the most beautiful and swiftest horses in the world, and performing every day his journey from East to West, to enlighten the earth. See PLATES: India. No. 1. B. and No. 3. CORINTH No. 25. SARDIS No. 11. In Persia, and among the Massagetæ, horses were sacrificed to the sun. Herodot. lib. i. cap. 55.

Placuit equo Persis radiis Hyperione cinctum;
Ne celerè detur victima tarda Deo.

OVID FAST. lib. viii.

Xenophon, Cyropæd. lib. viii. describes a solemn sacrifice of horses to the sun: they were all of the finest breed, and were led with a white chariot, crowned, and consecrated to the same God. We may believe that the horses which Josiah removed from the court of the temple, were appointed for the like sacrifice.

The Rabbins inform us, that these horses were every morning harnessed to the chariots dedicated to the sun, which are mentioned in the same book; and that the king, or some of his officers, got up and rode to meet the sun at its rising, as far as from the eastern gate of the temple, to the suburbs of Jerusalem. Rabb. Salom. et Kimchi.

Others are of opinion, that these horses were statues of wood, stone, or metal, erected in the temple in honour of the sun. Others, that they were horses which none were permitted to ride, or to yoke; but were like those which Julius Cæsar set at liberty, after his passage of the Rubicon,—free. Suet. in Julio. The Persians had such horses, as well as the ancient Germans. Those belonging to the Persians were streaked, or pyed; [pye-bald] those of the Germans were all white. [Herodian calls them Διὸς ἵπποι. The Romans thought it an irreligious insolence in Camillus to use white horses in his triumph, Livy, lib. v.] They were never employed in any ordinary use, and people took presages of futurity from their neighings and their motions.

HOSAH, הוֹסָה, Ὡσα, he that relies on, or he that protects.

[A town of Asher, Josh. xix. 29. The refuge, or place of safety, when fled to for security.]

HOSAI, הוֹסַי, Ὡσαι, seeings, from חָזָה chazah, to see. A prophet in the time of Manasseh, king of Judah, 2 Chron. xxxiii. 19. The Jews
I div. 2. are are of opinion, that Hosai and Isaiah are the same person; the LXX. take Hosai in a general sense for prophets and seers; the Syriac calls him Hanan; the Arabic Saphan.

HOSANNA, הוֹשַׁנָּה, Hosannah, Hoshiah-na, Save me, I pray: from יוֹשָׁה jashah, to save, and נָא na, I pray you: otherwise, save me, now.

HOSANNA, is a form of blessing, or wishing well. At our Saviour's entrance into Jerusalem, when the people cried Hosanna, their meaning was, Lord preserve this son of David; heap favours and blessings on him.

[HOSANNA-PROCESSION. MR. HARMER, Obs. vol. iii, p. 37, has a thought, that in our Lord's triumphal entry into Jerusalem, "the people scattered rose leaves in the way as he went." However, to say no more, though rose leaves might possibly be attainable at that early season, yet rose trees hardly grew in the public way; and besides, this does not give any reason of the exclamations of hosanna, nor does it appear to be connected with them. But I find in Mr. DAVID LEVI's "Lingua Sacra," under the article (ערב) oreb, the following information, extracted from the Talmud.

"The willow (used in the Feast of Tabernacles), is of the foundation of the prophets; i. e. the prophets instructed the people in the proper form and manner thereof, as it was delivered by tradition; and which, having been forgot, was restored by the prophets. Hence we meet in Rabbinical Hebrew, with the phrase "the precept of the willow, on Hosanna the Great." This is the seventh day of the Feast of Tabernacles, when each person has (carries) a branch of willow, and in the prayer of the day, frequently makes use of the word HOSHANA! i. e. save, we beseech thee;—whence the willows used at that time are called the "Hoshanuth."

If this be correct, we see that the people applied to our Lord, a custom with which they were well acquainted, and which indeed formed an annual ceremony. Observe, that the evangelists Matthew xxi. 8. Mark xi. 8. do not say what kind of trees were cut down by the people, but, "they cut down branches from the trees (supply willow trees, if you please, if then in season, or) such as were nearest at hand, to answer the purpose; and strewed these branches in the way [or, were they palm-leaves, or branches? Matthew uses the word κλάδος, a branch of any kind, but Mark says, στροβίλος, frondes, perhaps directly meaning palm-branches. John says, xii. 13, that "much people hearing that Jesus was coming to Jerusalem, went out (of Jerusalem—doubtless,) to meet him, carrying, τὰ βῆλα, "branches of palm trees."]

The people, therefore, as they were used to do on Hosanna the great, formed a procession; and those in the leading division of it, cried, "Hosanna! blessed be the king of Israel, who cometh in the name of the Lord. Peace in heaven! Glory in the highest!" to which those who brought up the rear, answered, "Blessed be the kingdom of our father David, that cometh in the name of the Lord! Hosanna in the highest!" [i. e. the great Hosanna] as we have been used to shout at our feast of tabernacles."

Does not this history appear under this elucidation to be a clearer reference of the feast of tabernacles to the Messiah than heretofore? a reference that was in some degree wanted. And are not the shouts of the multitude strong indications of what they so earnestly looked for—a king to deliver them from their present bondage? Did the prophets hint at such a king, to be expected, when they appointed the willows of the great Hosanna? Is this the covert meaning of the rulers of the synagogue, "hearest thou what these children say? in allusion to a king whom we expect; which they refer to thee?" And is this the import of our Lord's answer, "yea; did you never hear the remark, that children will tell the truth when men will not; that when men are afraid, or incredulous, the mouths of babes and sucklings may strongly proclaim due and proper praise?" Was our Lord's action of driving the intruding dealers from the temple an act of royalty, coincident with these acclamations, and national ideas, which on this occasion he thought proper to exert, and to which those concerned thought proper at this time to submit, as unable to foresee how far the popular feeling might extend.]

HOSEA, הוֹשֵׁה, Saviour, or safety; from יוֹשָׁה jasha.

I. HOSEA, the first name of Joshua, son of Nun. The Greeks call him Ause, or Ausem. See JOSHUA.

II. HOSEA, son of Beeri, the first of the minor prophets. Epiphanius, de vita Prophet. says, Hosea was of the town of Belemoth, in Issachar, which is probably Beelemon, towards Esdraelon. The Rabbins say, Beerath was his father, mentioned 1 Chron. v. 6. prince of the tribe of Reuben, when Tiglath-pileser carried some of the tribes of Israel into captivity. So that Hosea was of Reuben, and native of Beelmeon, beyond Jordan. This prophet lived in the kingdom of Samaria, and his prophecies for the most part regard that state.

He prophesied under the reigns of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah; and under Jeroboam II. king of Israel. If he prophesied in the reigns of all these princes, he must have lived very long; for there are an hundred and twelve years from the beginning of of Uzziah's to the end of Hezekiah's reign. Add twenty years for his age when he began to prophesy, this will make him above a hundred and thirty; or, if we take ten years from Uzziah, and ten from Hezekiah, there will remain a hundred and twelve. In Hosea's prophecies, we find nothing which proves that he prophesied so long; and why should his prophecies be dated in the title by the reigns of the kings of Judah, when he did not live under their dominion? It is therefore very probable, that this title is not Hosea's, but that the true beginning of this prophet's work, is, The beginning of the word of the Lord by Hosea. In our opinion, he began about the end of Jeroboam II. king of Israel.

St. Jerom, and many others, believe Hosea to be the oldest prophet, whose writings are in our possession. He saw the first captivity of the four tribes, carried away by Tiglath-pileser; and the extinction of the kingdom of Samaria, by Salmaneser. Jerom insists, that he prophesied even afterwards.

In the beginning of Hosea's prophecy we read, that the Lord directed him, "To take unto him a wife of whoredoms, and children of whoredoms;" i. e. to marry a woman who had formerly lived a debauched life, but who after her marriage should retire from all bad conversation.

Many interpreters, shocked at the irregularity of Hosea's marriage with a loose woman, have thought this was only a parable; that the prophet called the wife whom he married, a prostitute, only with design of awakening the attention of the Israelites; or, that this was transacted in a vision. But the sequel of Hosea's narration shews sufficiently, that this marriage was real, though figurative as to the things it symbolized: so St. Basil, Theodoret, St. Austin, &c. Vide FRAGMENT, No. XLI.

III. HOSEA, son of Elah; the last king of Israel, A. M. 3265, ante A. D. 739. Having conspired against Pekah, son of Remaliah, king of Israel, he killed him, and seized his dominions. He did evil in the sight of the Lord, but not equal to the kings of Israel, who preceded him; i. e. say the Jewish doctors, he did not restrain his subjects from going, if they would, to Jerusalem, to worship; whereas the kings of Israel his predecessors had forbidden it, and placed guards on the road, to prevent it. 2 Kings xv. 30.

Salmaneser, king of Assyria, having intelligence that Hosea meditated a revolt, and had concerted measures with So king of Egypt, to shake off the Assyrian yoke, he marched against him, and besieged Samaria. The city was taken after a siege of three years, in the ninth year of Hosea's reign; and was reduced to a heap of ruins. A. M. 3282, ante A. D. 722. The king of Assyria removed the Israelites of the ten tribes to countries beyond the Euphrates. 2 Kings xvii. 3, 6.

The chronology of Hosea's reign is extremely perplexed, by the inconsistency of certain dates. It is said 2 Kings xv. 30. that Hosea began to reign in the twentieth year of Jotham, son of Uzziah—(This was the fourth of Ahaz; for Jotham his father died four years before, having reigned only sixteen years. 2 Kings xv. 32, 33.) but chap. xvii. 1. it is said, that Hosea began to reign in the twelfth of Ahaz; also, 2 Kings xv. 27. allows Pekah to have reigned but twenty years. Notwithstanding, if the last year of Pekah and the first year of Hosea concur with the twentieth of Jotham, (2 Kings xv. 30.) Pekah must have reigned twenty-two years, since Jotham began to reign in the second year of Pekah. To reconcile these differences, it may be said, that Hosea conspired against Pekah in the twentieth year of that prince, which was the eighteenth of Jotham's reign: It was two years longer before Hosea made himself master of Pekah's dominions, and was acknowledged king of Israel; i. e. in the fourth year of Ahaz, and the twentieth of Jotham. Lastly, in the twelfth year of Ahaz, he reigned quietly over all Israel, according to chap. xvii. 1. See Usher, and the Commentators.

HOSHIAIAH, הוֹשִׁיָּא, Asaias, the Lord is my saviour, or let the Lord save, or salvation of the Lord; יָשָׁח מִי yashah, saviour, and הוֹשִׁיָּא the Lord. Father of Jezeaniah, a principal Jew of Jerusalem. Nehem. xii. 32.

HOSHAMA, הוֹשָׁמָה, ὁσάμα, who is heard, who hears, or who obeys; from שָׁמַע shamah. Son of Jeconiah. 1 Chron. iii. 18.

HOSPITALITY, has always been much in esteem among civilized people. In Homer, and the ancient Greek writers, we see with what respect they treated their guests. They believed that the Gods sometimes visited this world, disguised like travellers, and observed the conduct of mankind. Their apprehensions of despising some god instead of a traveller, induced them to receive strangers with respect, and the rights of hospitality were esteemed most sacred and inviolable.

Scripture furnishes several instances of hospitality exercised by the patriarchs. Abraham received three angels, invited them, pressed them, served them himself, and stood in their presence; Sarah his wife superintended the kitchen, and baked bread for his guests, Gen. xviii. 2, 3, &c. Lot waited at the city gate to invite guests. When the inhabitants of Sodom intended to insult his guests, he went out to them, reasoned with them, exposed himself to their fury, and offered rather to subject his own daughters to their brutality, than his guests, 12 div. 2 Gen.

Gen. xix. 1, 2, 8. The same almost is observable in the old man of Gibeah, who had received the young Levite, and his wife, Judg. xix. 16, 17. St. Paul, Heb. xiii. 2. uses Abraham's and Lot's example to encourage the faithful to exercise this virtue, saying, that they who have practised it, have been well rewarded in the honour of receiving angels under the form of men. The primitive Christians considered one principal part of their duty as consisting in the exercise of this virtue. Our Saviour tells his apostles, that whoever received them, received him himself; and that whoever should give them but a glass of cold water, should not lose his reward, Matth. x. 40, 41. He also describes himself as saying to the wicked, at the day of judgment, "Go, ye cursed, into everlasting fire: I was a stranger, and ye received me not . . . and in as much as ye have not done it unto the least of mine, ye have not done it unto me." St. Peter, 1 Epist. iv. 9. requires the faithful to use hospitality to their brethren without murmuring and complaint. St. Paul, in several of his Epistles, recommends hospitality; particularly to bishops. Writing to Timothy and Titus, where he describes the duties and qualities of a bishop, he does not forget hospitality, 1 Tim. iii. 2. and Tit. i. 8. Let no one he made a bishop, who does not exercise hospitality, says St. Gregory the Great, Ep. ad Joan. Episc. And if the bishop does not receive all strangers into his house, he is inhuman: Episcopus, nisi omnes receperit, inhumanus est, says St. Jerom. Ep. ad Ocean.

The primitive Christians were so ready in discharging this duty, that the very heathen admired them for it. They were hospitable to all strangers, but especially to those of the same faith and communion. Believers scarcely ever travelled without letters of communion, which testified the purity of their faith; and procured them a favourable reception wherever the name of Jesus Christ was known. It is our opinion, that the two minor epistles of St John may be such kind of letters of communion and recommendation, [certainly, that addressed to Gaius. Comp. also, 1 Cor. iii. 1.

HOTHAM, חותם seal, or enclosure. Son of Heber, of Asher, 1 Chron. vii. 32.

HOTHIR, הוֹתִיר, excellent, or posterity, or that which remains; from יתיר, jathar. Son of Heman, head of the twenty-first family of the Levites. 1 Chron. xxv. 4, 28.

HOURS. The ancient Hebrews did not divide the day by hours, but into four parts; morning, noon, the first evening, and the last evening. The night was divided into three parts, night, mid-night, and the morning watch. The words Hours in the Septuagint, signifies the seasons of the year; as in Homer and Hesiod.

In the books of Moses and other Hebrew writings, Hour is used for the time, or season. In Daniel, we find the word Schaata, which is translated Hour, and may be derived from the verb scaah, which signifies to cease, to be at rest.

The books of Daniel, Tobit, and Judith are the earliest wherein we find the word hour, used to signify a part either of day or night. Daniel iv. 16. says, he was about an hour considering king Nebuchadnezzar's vision. Tobit, xi. 14. tells us, he continued about half an hour in very great pain. Also, xii. 22. that after the angel Raphael had discovered himself, they prostrated themselves for about two hours. Judith vii. 18. declares that the people of Bethulia spent many hours in crying to the Lord. The Hebrew text does not mention particularly hours, but only lines or degrees on Ahaz's dial; however it is certain that the division of the day into parts is the matter there in question. Ahaz is much more ancient than Daniel, Tobit, or Judith. Vide FRAGMENTS, No II. CII. CCLXIII. and the PLATES.

But of what length were the hours mentioned in these books, the sacred writers do not inform us, and there is no Chaldee or Syriac author remaining, of sufficient antiquity to explain them. The Greeks knew nothing of the origin of hours among foreign nations, and trace it no higher among themselves than the time of Anaximenes or Anaximander, in the reign of Cyrus, toward the end of the Babylonish captivity. This author had travelled into Chaldaea, and might have brought from thence the manner of dividing the day by hours. Herodotus says expressly, that the Greeks received from the Babylonians the use of the gnomon and dial. And Xenophon introduces Euthydemus, saying, that the sun discovers to us the hours of the day, and the stars the hours of the night. Aristophanes speaks likewise of the gnomon or index, and of hours. He makes one of his actors ask, what time is it by the sun-dial? See DIAL.

The result of what we have said is; that the use of time-measures, or sun-dials, and the distribution of the day into hours, is more ancient in the east, than among the Greeks; that the author of the invention is not known, and that we cannot tell in what manner the ancient Babylonians, Chaldeans, and Hebrews, divided their hours of day and night.

In the New Testament we see very clearly the day divided into twelve equal hours, after the manner of the Greeks and Romans, Matt. xx. 3, 4, 5. These hours were equal to each other, but unequal with respect to the different seasons of the year. The twelve hours of the longest longest day in summer were much longer than those of the shortest day in winter. The first hour was that which followed sun-rising, or our six o'clock in the morning, at the equinox. The third hour was answerable to nine o'clock in the morning, at the equinox; the sixth hour at all times to noon, &c. In the New Testament we observe likewise the night to be divided into four watches, which custom the Jews received from the Romans. Vide FRAGMENTS, loc cit.

[HOUSE, vide FRAGMENT, No. XLIII. for house as signifying a family, power, or a party.]

[HOUSE, a dwelling. Vide FRAGMENT, No. CCIV. and PLATE.

The Reader is referred to the FRAGMENTS, for a variety of information respecting the forms, distribution, and construction, of houses in the east; and especially, to the account given by Dr. SHAW. This article, therefore, will only hint at some differences between Eastern houses, and our own, which are necessary to be recollected and understood, when we read sundry passages of holy Scripture, as

(1.) The purpose of a house being for dwelling, and that of tents being the same, though a tent is not properly speaking a house, yet, in common language, it is so called in the East: and the word beit—(Heb. beth.) is applied to either of these kinds of dwellings. On the same principle the tabernacle of God, though only a tent, is sometimes called the temple—i. e. the residence of God.

(2.) The houses of the poorer class of people, are very bad constructions, of mud walls, reeds, and rushes; whence they become apt comparisons to the fragility of human life. Beside this, as mud, slime, or at best unburnt brick, is used in forming the walls of houses, the expression, Job xxiv. 16. "of digging through houses," is easily accounted for: as is the behaviour of Ezekiel, (chap. xii. 5.) who dug through such a wall in the sight of the people—whereby, as may be imagined, he did little injury to his house, notwithstanding which, the symbol was very expressive to the beholders.

(3.) The houses of the middling classes of people, shew no appearance of easy circumstances on the outside; they seldom have any windows, by which they might see, or be seen, toward the street.

(4.) The houses of the rich are also plain, almost blank, on the outside: they seldom exceed two stories, in height, whatever space of ground they occupy. All houses in the East are flat roofed; and their roofs are used occasionally for walking upon, to enjoy the fresh air, the prospect, &c. and for sleeping upon.

(5.) Royal palaces are called houses: David walked on the roof of the king's house, 2 Sam.

xi. 2. Zimri, burned the king's house over him. 1 Kings xvi. 18.

(6.) The temple of the Lord, notwithstanding its magnificence, is called a house; being considered as the residence, dwelling, or habitation of the Deity. Vide the discourse of Solomon at its consecration: and in many other places.

(7.) Heaven is considered as the house of God, John xiv. 2. "In my Father's house are many mansions;" where we observe a remarkable implication—Mansions are great, noble, hereditary dwellings, among men, abounding with conveniences, &c.—"My Father's house—his ordinary residence—contains many of what the sons of men esteem capital residences—Mansions."

(8.) The prison wherein Joseph was confined, he calls "this house;" and very properly, as in all probability it was part of a considerable edifice: prisons in the east being often in royal palaces. See also Jeremiah's prison in the house of Jonathan the scribe. Jer. xxvii. 15, 20.

(9.) The grave is the house appointed for all the living;" Job. xxx. 23. Isaiah xiv. 18.

(10.) House is taken for family: The Lord plagued Pharaoh and his house. Gen. xii. 17. What is my house, that thou hast brought me hitherto? 2 Sam. vii. 18. So Joseph, Luke. i. 27. ii. 4. was of the house of David—but more especially he was of his Royal lineage, or family; and, as I conceive, in the direct line, or eldest branch of the family; so that he was next of kin to the throne, if the government had still continued in possession of the descendants of David.

(11.) House is taken for kindred, 1 Tim. v. 8. it is a Christian's duty to provide first for those of his own house, his family, his relatives.

(12.) House is taken for the body, 2 Cor. v. 1. "If our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved," if our bodies were taken to pieces, by death. The comparison of the body to a house, is used by Mr. HARMER to explain the similes, Eccl. xii. and is illustrated by a passage in Plautus, Mostell. Act. i. Scene 2.

(13.) The church of God is his house, 1 Tim. iii. 15. "how thou oughtest to behave thyself in the house of God, i. e. the church of the living God." In the same sense, Moses was faithful in all the house of God, as a servant, but Christ as a son over his own house; whose house are we (Christians:) but this sense may include that of household; persons composing the attendants, or retainers, to a prince, &c.

Is not this intimate reference of house or dwelling, to the adherents, intimates, or partizans of the householder, the foundation of the simile used by the apostle Peter, chap. ii. 52. "Ye christians, christians, as living stones are built up into a spiritual house?"—

(14.) House is taken also for the name of a place: as "roll thyself in the dust, O inhabitant of Aphrah, in the house of Aphrah, i. e. of dust—rather in Beth-Aphrah, i. e. in the town or district so called: and some have supposed that the house of Zechariah, Luke i. 40. was Beth-Zechariah, the name of a town. So we have Beth-lehem, the house of bread, and others. Vide BETH. Probably, these are remains of the names of places, where in the times of the old Canaanites their temples had stood; which having attracted towns around them, for the convenience of their worshippers, the towns remaining after the temples were destroyed, nevertheless retained their former descriptive appellations.

Houses sold, if situated within a walled city, might be redeemed, within one year after the sale, Lev. xxv. 29. If not redeemed within that time, they were alienated in perpetuity.

Houses were subject to an appearance compared to the leprosy in the human body, and called "the plague of the leprosy," Lev. xiv. 36. As we have no such distemper in our houses, in this climate, we are altogether at a loss to explain the nature of this malady. Was it like the dry rot in our timber buildings? or like the salt-petre incrustations, on some of our walls? I remember Dr. Sydenham, writing an account of the great plague in London, A. D. 1666, mentions spots of various colours, green and brown, being found on the plaster walls of some of the rooms, wherein the sick lay; those rooms being too much closed up, and deprived of the free access of air.—Could any such distemper be the plague, or leprosy, in the house?

In the East, many families inhabit one house; whence the necessity of caution against contentions. For IVORY houses, see IVORY.

The upper rooms of a house are usually the more capacious and airy—so our Lord held his passover in a large upper room, Mark xiv. 15. In such a room the apostles held their assemblies, Acts i. 13.]

[HOUSEHOLD. It should be observed that in the N. T. there are two Greek words which our translators have equally rendered house and household; as, in their day, usage did not separate them. The first, οἶκος, signifies the immediate family of the householder; the other, οἰκία, includes his servants, also: and they are not interchanged, in respect to persons, in the original. Hence we never read of οἰκία as being baptized, but of οἶκος, only; the children following their parents, in this rite; but not the servants their proprietor, master, or mistress.]

HUKOK, or Hukkuk, חֻקִּים, ἱκκῶκ; engraving:

from חֻקִּים chakak: otherwise statutes, laws, from חָק chok.

[HUKOK, a portion appointed by regulation; an allotment, as, we may say, under an enclosing act. Appointment is the import of the root. Prov. viii. 29. It was on the confines of Asher and Naphtali.

Some think it is the same with Helkath, Josh. xix. 25. xxi. 31. A city of Asher; the same probably as that of Naphtali, Josh. xix. 34. yielded to the Levites, and assigned for a city of refuge. 1 Chron. vi. 75.]

HUL, חוּל, 'Oul, pain, infirmity, bringing forth children, sund, or expectation; from חוּל חוּל cholal, or חוּל chol. [Commotion, apprehension.]

HUL, or Chul, son of Aram, Gen. x. 23. Josephus calls him Otrus, and places him in Armenia. We find several traces of this name in that country, as the cities of Cholana, Colimna, Col-sa, Olane, Coluatha, &c.

HULDAH, חוּלְדָּה, the World. [Perhaps weasel; as the masculine choled is taken.]

HULDAH, a prophetess, wife of Shallum; consulted by Josiah concerning the book of the law which had been found in the treasury of the Temple. See JOSIAH. The time of Huldah's death we know not, but the discovery of the book of the law, was A. M. 3380, ante A. D. 623. 2 Kings-xxii. 14. 2 Chron. xxxiv. 22.

[HULWAN, "is a town of the mountains. All its walls are of clay and stone. Its air is warm; and here are many fig-trees." Ibn Haukal p. 170.

"Holwan is a well inhabited and pleasant town. There are few more considerable in Irak. Snow falls there; and on the mountains in its vicinity there is at all times snow." Ib.

We have supposed Hulwan to be the Calneh of Gen. xi. 10. built by Nimrod. The character of the country, as given by this Arabian writer, renders the choice of such a situation very likely. Vide CALAH.]

HUMILITY, is the virtue of Christ and Christians. It consists in low thoughts of ourselves, founded on the knowledge of our unworthiness, and our dependance on God for every thing. Learn of me, for I am meek and lowly in heart, says our Saviour, Matth. xi. 29. God giveth grace to the humble, says St. Peter, 1 Epist. v. 5.

Erasmus had a considerable dispute concerning the word humilitas in the hymn Magnificat. Luke i. 48. Quia respexit humilitatem ancilla suæ, which in this place signifies, says he, the humble and low estate [English translation] only of the Blessed Virgin; so that humilitas in this passage would be equivalent to humiliatio or vilitas. He was opposed by certain monks, to whom he replied in his Colloquy, entitled Medardus. It is plain humilitas does not always signify the virtue of humility, but occasionally a poor, mean, dejected state; or the timorous, diffident, and modest thoughts which that condition inspires.

not

To humble signifies often to afflict, to subject, to beat, to subdue. Humiliatus est Moab: the Moabites were humbled, their force was broken; they were depressed. Percussit David Philistæos, et humiliavit eos: he conquered the Philistines, and subdued their power, 2 Sam. viii. 1. Humiliavit calumniatorem: God shall humble the slanderer, or oppressor, Psalm lxxi. 4. he shall load him with confusion, he shall pull him down. Oculus superborum humiliabit: thou wilt humble, confound, or cover the proud with shame, Psalm xvii. 27. &c.

To humble a virgin, or a woman taken in war, signifies to pollute her honour, Deut. xxi. 14. xxii. 24, 25. Lament. v. 11. Mulieres in Sion humiliaverunt. Ezek. xxii. 10. Immunditiam menstruata humiliaverunt in te.

ADDITION.

[HUMILITY though it be not overmuch in favour among men, yet has many excellent things said of it in Scripture: "Before honour is humility," Prov. xv. 33. "By humility, and the fear of the Lord, are riches, and honour, and life," Prov. xxii. 4. Humility is a virtue seated in the mind; and is in fact, a settled and permanent disposition of the mind; perhaps it may often be best distinguished by contrast with its opposites, pride, and haughtiness. But though humility be an internal quality, yet it shews itself in external actions, and is very expressively alluded to, by the apostle Peter (1 Epist. v. 5.) "be clothed with humility"—as with an outer, defensive, garment, tied closely upon the wearer:—implying, that the humility of Christians, should constantly be manifested in their deportment, and behaviour: should constantly envelope every other grace, or excellence, or amiable quality, which they may possess, or practise; as a surtout envelopes inner garments;—like a strong covering, bound around them, and attached to them, by the firmest connections; by connections proof against temptations, calamities, or far more dangerous adversaries—prosperities.

On Luke i. 48. it may still be queried, whether the "low estate" of the Virgin, refer to her disposition of mind, or to her situation, in life? The word (ταπεινωσις) occurs also, Acts viii. 33. "In his humiliation his judgment was taken away," Also, Philip iii. 21. "who shall change the body of our abasement—'vile body'—to the likeness of his glorious body. And James i. 10. "Let the humbled, abased, brother, glory in his exaltation; but the rich brother in that he is abased—humbled, made low." Now in this passage, it should seem clearly to refer to a disposition of mind; for no man is called to rejoice in loss of wealth, or of property:—but he may well and wisely rejoice in receiving a humble disposition of mind, as a divine grace—or which is imparted by divine grace—and which will lead him to think less vainly, less superciliously of his riches than heretofore, and to value them less. Moreover, if the poor brother is to rejoice in attaining that state which this person is to rejoice at quitting, then there seems to be a contradiction in the spirit of the precepts; but, as one brother may possess a mind exalted by divine grace, yet continue poor in the world; so another brother may possess a mind humbled by divine grace, notwithstanding the temptation to which his worldly riches subject him. This is indeed impracticable to man, but practicable to God! If this sense of the word be admitted, it does not follow from the use of it in the Virgin's song, that her station in life is described by it, determinately, and exclusively, whatever Erasmus might insist on.

That there may be a vicious or bastard kind of humility, or that humility may exceed in degree, or in object, should appear from the apostle's caution, Col. ii. 18, against an over-weening wilful humility, which might refer to the agents of God, what should be referred only to God himself. This kind of supposititious humility has its origin in real pride, "being vainly puffed up of a fleshly mind"—swelled by carnal and inadequate conceptions, and fancies, totally misbecoming the subject.]

HUMTAH, חמטא, lizard, or snail; from חמט chomet. A city of Judah, Josh. xv. 54. Themath, or Thamath, is mentioned in the Greek, 1 Sam. xxx. 29. and St. Jerom speaks of Thabatha, the place of St. Hilarion's nativity, five miles from Gaza, south, Vita S. Hilaronis. Nicephorus, who calls it Thebasa, places it fifteen miles from Gaza, Hist. Eccl. lib. ix. cap. 15. I should believe that it is Athmatha or Humtah.

HUNTING, To hunt. Hunting is a kind of apprenticeship to war, and an imitation of the hazards and occurrences of the chase. Nimrod was a mighty hunter before God, Gen. x. 9. He was a warrior, a conqueror, a tyrant, who subdued free people, and who put to death those who would not submit to his dominion. The prophets sometimes express war by the name of hunting. "I will send for many hunters," says Jeremiah, "and they shall hunt them from every mountain, and from every hill, and out of the holes of the rocks." Jer. xvi. 16. He speaks of the Chaldeans or Persians, who hunted, i. e. subdued the Jews, and held them under their dominion. Some are of opinion that that these hunters are the Persians, who set the Hebrews at liberty; and in a more elevated sense, the apostles, who are, as it were, hunters, that endeavoured to take men with their preaching. Ezekiel, xxxii. 30. speaks likewise of the kings, who were persecutors of the Jews, under the name of hunters.

The psalmist thanks God for having delivered him from the snares of the hunters, Ps. xci. 3. Micah complains, vii. 2. that every one lays ambushes for his neighbour, and that one brother hunts after another to destroy him. Jeremiah, Lament. iii. 52. represents Jerusalem as complaining of her enemies, who have taken her like a bird in their nets. See DOGS.

HUPHAM, חֻפָּם, 'Oḥām, their bed, their covering, from חָפַף chaphaph, and the pronoun הָם am, theirs. [protection, or skreen.]

HUPHAM, or HUPPIM, son of Benjamin, Gen. xli. 21. head of a family, Numb. xxvi. 39. —Also, a son of Ir, 1 Chr. vii. 12, 15.

HUPPAH, חֻפָּה, a bed: otherwise, coverings; from חָפַף chaphaph: or, his shore, or his harbour; from חָפַף choph, and the pronoun הָם ah, his. A priest, whose family was the thirteenth class appointed by David. 1 Chron. xxiv. 13.

HUPPIM, חֻפִּים 'Hupim. Vide HUPHAM, ante.

HUPPIM, son of Machir, 1 Chron. vii. 15.

HUPPIM, son of Benjamin. See HUPHAM.

HUR, חֹר, 'Qor, liberty; from חֹרִים chorim: or whiteness, hole, cavern; from חָרַר chur.

I. HUR, son of Caleb, son of Esron, different from Caleb son of Jephunneh. Hur, if we believe Josephus, was husband to Miriam, sister of Moses. Others say, he was his son; we know few particulars concerning his life: but by the little which Scripture relates, we see that Moses had a great regard for him. When Moses had sent Joshua against the Amalekites, he went up the mountain with Hur and Aaron, Exod. xvii. 10. and while he lifted up his hands in prayer, Aaron and Hur supported his arms, to prevent their growing weary. And when Moses, ascended mount Sinai, to receive the law, he referred the elders, if any difficulty should arise, to Aaron and Hur, Exod. xxiv. 14. Hur was the father of Uri, and Uri was the father of Bezaiel. Vide FRAGMENT, No. I.

II. HUR, a prince of Midian, killed in an encounter between Phineas and the Midianites, Numb. xxxi. 8.

HURAI, חֹרַי, 'Oupi, called Haddai, 2 Sam. xliii. 30. דַּלְעֵת daleth, being put for רֶשֶׁת resh: from the same as Hur. A hero belonging to David's army, 1 Chron. xi. 32.

HURAM, חֹרָם 'Asqām, their liberty, their whiteness, their hole, or their cavern; from חָרַר. Son of Ehud, of Benjamin, 1 Chron. viii. 5.

HURI, חֹרִי, 'Sepi, who is in anger; from חָרַר charah: otherwise, liberty, hole, cavern; see HUR. Son of Jaroah, of the tribe of Gad, father of Abihail. 1 Chron. v. 14. N. B. Not of Abigail; with whom some have confounded her.

[HUSBAND, a married man; the HOUSE-BAND, or band which connects the whole family, and keeps it together: but Johnson refers it to the Runick, house-bonda, master of the house; nevertheless, several of his instances seem allied to the sense of binding together, assembling into union: so we say, to husband small portions of things; meaning, to collect and unite them, to manage them to the greatest advantage, &c. which is, by associating them together; making the most of them, not by dispersion, but by union.

A man who is betrothed, but not actually married, was esteemed a husband, Matth. i. 16, 20. Luke ii. 5. A man lately married was privileged from going out to war, Deut. xx. 7. xxiv. 5. yet we have in Homer, &c. instances of young men slain, whose brides waited for them at home; or, who had plighted their troth to their spouses, but, were never more to see them!

The husband is described as the head of his wife, and as having controul over her conduct, so as to supersede her vows, &c. Numb. xxx. 6, 7, 8. As the guide of his wife's youth, Prov. ii. 17. Sarah called her husband Abraham lord, and this title was continued long after, Hosea ii. 16. [Baali, my lord.] The apostle Peter seems to recommend this title as implying great respect, as well as affection, 1 Peter ii. 6. Perhaps it was rather used as an appellation in public than in private. Our own word, master, (and so correlatively mistress) is sometimes used by married women when speaking of their husbands; but the ordinary use of this word to all persons, and on all occasions, deprives it of any claim to the expression of particular affection, or respect; which, nevertheless, very probably was in former ages implied by it, or connected with it; as it still is in the instances of proprietors, chiefs, teachers, and superiors, whether in civil life, in polite arts, or in liberal studies.]

[HUSBANDMAN, one whose profession and labour it is to cultivate the earth; to dress it, to render it fertile, and to manage it to the greatest advantage. This is the most noble and most ancient of all professions; it was begun by Adam, resumed by Noah, and has been always the most comfortable state of human life.

God is compared to a husbandman, John xv. 1. Ye are God's husbandry, says the apostle, 1 Cor. iii. 9. and the simile of land carefully cultivated, or of a vineyard carefully dressed, is often used in the sacred writings. The art of husbandry is from God, says the prophet Isaiah, xxviii. 24—28, and the various operations of it are each in their season. The sowing of seed, the waiting for harvest, the ingathering when ready, the storing up in granaries, and the use of the products of the earth, afford many points of comparison, of apt figures, and similitudes in Scripture. The course of husbandry in the East differs from that among us, and requires much allowance for the difference. Vide THRESHING, FRAGMENTS, No. XLVIII, and the CALENDAR of PALESTINE, No. CCCCLIV.]

HUSHAI, the Archite, David's friend. Being informed of Absalom's rebellion, and that David was obliged to fly from Jerusalem, he met his king and friend on an eminence without the city, with his clothes rent, and his head covered with earth. David told him, that if he went with him, he would be a burden to him; but that he might do him important service, if he remained, and pretended to be in Absalom's interest, in order to defeat the counsel of Ahithophel.

Hushai therefore returned to Jerusalem, and saluted Absalom as king. Absalom answered, Do you use your friend in this manner? why are you not with David? Hushai said, I will be with him, whom the Lord hath chosen; whom this people even all Israel have acknowledged. After this, Hushai, by defeating the counsel of Ahithophel, and gaining time for David, to whom he sent advices, was the cause of Ahithophel's suicide, and of Absalom's miscarriage. We know not the end of Hushai. A. M. 2981, ante A. D. 1023.

HUSKS, Keparia, siliqua, shells, or husks, as of peas or beans. The prodigal son, oppressed with want, and pinched by hunger, desired to feed on the husks, given to the hogs, Luke xv. 16. But the most learned interpreters are of opinion, that the Greek word Keratia signifies Carob Beans, the fruit of a tree of the same name. There was a sort of wine or liquor greatly used in Syria drawn from it, and the lees of it were given to the hogs. The Greeks and Latins both name these Carob-beans Ceratia; and Pliny, as well as the Vulgate, calls them Siliqua.

This fruit is common in Palestine, Greece, Italy, Provence, and Barbary: it is suffered to ripen and grow dry on the tree; the poor eat it, and cattle are fattened with it. The Carob-tree is of a middle size, full of branches, and abounding with round leaves, an inch or two in diameter. The blossoms, are little red clusters, with abundance of yellowish stalks. The fruits are flat cods from half a foot to fourteen inches long, and an inch and an half broad: they are brown at top, sometimes crooked, composed of two husks, which are separated by membranes into several cells, containing flat seeds something like those of Cassia. The substance of these husks is filled with a sweetish honey-like kind of juice, not unlike that of the pith of Cassia. In all probability the crooked figure of this husk occasioned its being called in Greek, Keratia, which signifies little horns.

[HUZZAB, molten, a queen of the Assyrians: perhaps rather the image of a deity, in the character of a dove (vide DOVE) whose followers should coo like doves, as they went in procession. Nahum ii. 7. Vide FRAGMENT, Nos. CCLXVIII. CCLXIX.]

HYACINTH, by this word we understand, 1. a precious stone; 2. a sort of flower; and, 3. a particular colour. The flower hyacinth is not spoken of in Scripture, but the colour, and the stone of this name are.

The hyacinth stone, or jacinth: The spouse, says Cant. v. 14. that her beloved's hands were as gold rings set with hyacinths; and St. John, Rev. xxi. 20, says, that the eleventh foundation of the heavenly Jerusalem is of a hyacinth. There are four sorts of hyacinths. The first is something of the colour of a ruby; the second is of a gilded yellow; the third of a citron yellow; the fourth of the colour of a granite. The Hebrew of Canticles instead of hyacinth, reads the stone of Tarshish, תַּרְשִׁישׁ. It is mentioned Exod. xxviii. 20. We do not well know what stone it is, but the generality explain it of the Chrysolite. [It is thought to be the yellow topaz of modern travellers] Of the hyacinth colour, Moses often speaks, Ex. xxv. 4. תְּכֵלֶת, Techeleth, according to the most learned interpreters, was an azure blue, or very deep purple, like a violet colour. This colour was dyed with the blood of a shell-fish, in Latin, Murex, in Hebrew, Chilson. See FRAGMENTS, No. CCXXXV.

HYÆNA, a wild beast. The Hebrew, Leviticus, xi. 6. and Job xxx. 29, &c. reads, The daughter of the hiena, (Bath-Haïana), instead of Struthio, as the Vulgate. The same in several ral other places of the Hebrew, where it is generally translated Struthio, the ostrich; though it is not clear, that this is its true signification. See OSTRICH; also FRAGMENT, No. CXIV. PLATES, and NATURAL HISTORY.

It is certain that Bath-Haiana, or the daughter of the hiana, is a bird; Moses enumerates it among birds, prohibited. But the animal known to us by the name of hyæna, is a quadruped almost as large as a wolf: whose hair is rough, and its skin spotted, [some are streaked]. Hyænas were formerly produced at Rome in the public games, and they are represented on ancient medals.

Bochart, and Ludolph in his history of Ethiopia, maintain that the hyæna is called Tzeboa, צבוא, in the Hebrew. Jeremiah speaks of it, chap. xii. 9. The Vulgate renders, "Mine heritage is unto me as a speckled bird." The LXX. "Mine heritage is unto me a cave of the hiena." The Hebrew may very well bear the sense of the Vulgate; but Bochart affirms, that the word hait, translated bird, signifies in general all sorts of wild beasts; and that Tzeboa, which is rendered tinged with divers colours, signifies the hiena, so named on account of its spots, and the variety of its hair. Vide BIRD.

Pliny speaks of the hyæna, but describes it in a fabulous manner: Nat. Hist. lib. viii. cap. 30. lib. xviii. cap. 8, as, that it changes its sex every year, being one year male, and the next female; and that from its eyes are taken precious stones, called hyæne. Aristotle and Elian say, that it makes dogs dumb with its shadow; that it imitates the speech of mankind, and deceives them, endeavouring to draw them out of their houses, and devour them. They add that it has feet like a man's, and no vertebrae in the neck.

Busbequius, in his travels to Amasia, p. 76. says the hyæna is almost like a wolf, but not so tall. That its hair is like that of a wolf, except in being more bristling, and marked at certain distances with great black spots. It has no length of neck, but is forced to turn itself quite round, when it would look behind. It is very cruel and voracious; drags dead bodies out of their graves, and devours them: instead of teeth, has one continued bone in the jaw. It is said to imitate the voice of a man, and by this it often deceives travellers.

As to the daughter of the haiana, which is a bird, whose use is forbid by Moses, the Scripture account of it, may lead us to discover it. We learn from Job and Micah, that this was a mournful bird, which in its pinings made a great noise. "I am a brother to dragons, or crocodiles, and a companion to the daughters of the hiana." Isaiah, xiii. 21. and Jeremiah,

l. 39. speaking of the destruction of Babylon, say, it will become a retreat for wild beasts, for dragons, and for the daughters of the hiana. Isaiah, xxiv. 18. repeats the same thing, speaking of the destruction of Bozra the capital of Edom. Jeremiah, Lament. iv. 3. intimates, that this bird is extremely cruel. "The dragons, or crocodiles, give suck to their young ones, but the daughter of my people is become as cruel as the daughter of the hiana in the wilderness."

It has been the opinion of several interpreters, that this was the little, or the great, owl; a melancholy, mournful, solitary bird, whose cry was piercing and disagreeable; but I do not know on what authority they can accuse it of cruelty. The cruelty wherewith Jeremiah reproaches this bird, agrees very well with the ostrich, which forsakes, it is said, its eggs and its young. Vide the FRAGMENT loc cit.

HYMENÆUS, Ὑμέναιος, nuptial, or marriage, or the God of marriage.

HYMENÆUS, was probably a citizen of Ephesus, converted by some of the early discourses of St. Paul. He fell afterwards into the heresy which denied the resurrection of the body, and said, it was already accomplished: 2 Tim. ii. 17. St. Austin, in Joan. Homil. 19. thinks, that the error of such opinions consisted in saying, there was no resurrection beside that of the soul, which by faith, profession, and baptism is revived from sin to grace. St. Paul informs Timothy, A. D. 63, that he had excommunicated Hymenæus, and given him over to Satan, 1 Tim. i. 20. Two years afterwards Hymenæus engaged with Philetus, in some new error, 1 Tim. ii. 17. We know nothing of the end of Hymenæus.

HYMN, from the Greek, hymnos. A religious song or poem. The word is used as synonymous to canticle, song, or psalm, which the Hebrews scarcely distinguish, having no particular term for a hymn, as distinct from a psalm or canticle. St. Paul requires Christians to entertain one another with psalms and hymns, and spiritual songs. St. Matthew says, that Jesus Christ having supped, sung a hymn, and went out. He recited the hymns or psalms which the Jews were used to sing after the passover; which they called the Hallel: i. e. the Hallelujah-Psalms.

HYPOCRITE, from the Greek, ὑποκριτής, one who feigns to be what he is not, one who puts on a false person, like actors in tragedies and comedies. It is generally applied to those who assume appearances of a virtue, without possessing the reality. Our Saviour accused the Pharisees of hypocrisy. In the Old Testament, the Hebrew שןן caneph, which is rendered hypocrite, counterfeit, signifies likewise a profane, wicked wicked man, a man polluted, corrupted, a man of impiety, a deceiver. Jeremiah, iii. 1. xxiii. 15. uses the word caneph to express the infection, the pollution of the land of Judah, caused by the sins of its inhabitants. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. LXVIII. and the PLATE, HYPOCRITE.

HYSSOP, אֶסוֹב, Esob, a herb generally known, often mentioned in S. S. It was commonly used in purifications as a sprinkler. For example, God commanded the Hebrews, when they came out of Egypt, to take a bunch of hyssop, to dip it in the blood of the paschal lamb, and sprinkle the lintel and the two side-posts of the door-way with it. Sometimes they added a little scarlet wool to it. Moreover, in the purification of lepers, they dipped a bunch composed of hyssop, branches of cedar, and scarlet wool, in water mingled with the blood of a bird, and with it sprinkled the leper.

Hyssop shoots out abundance of suckers from one root only; is hard in substance, and grows about a foot and a half high. At distances on both sides its stock, it pushes out longish leaves, which are hard, odoriferous, warm, and a little bitter. The blossom of it is on the top of the stem, of an azure colour, and like an ear of corn. There are two sorts of it, the garden hyssop, and the mountain hyssop.

A brook on the other side of the Jordan, whose spring is in the mountains of Gilead. It falls into the Jordan pretty near the sea of Tiberias, south. Near this brook the patriarch Jacob met the angel, with whom he wrestled. It separated the land of the Ammonites from the Golanitis, and that of Og king of Bashan. Gen. xxxii. 1, 2 to 23.

JABESH, יבש dryness; otherwise, confusion, shame; from בוש bosh.

[The name Jabesh is supposed to have been derived from the dryness of its soil; perhaps the waters ran off very rapidly from the declivity of the mountains of Gilead, where this town was situated.]

JABESH, father of Shallum, the fifteenth king of Israel, or of Samaria, 2 Kings xv. 10.

II. JABESH, a city in the half-tribe of Manasseh beyond Jordan, generally called Jabesh-Gilead because situated in Gilead, at the foot of the mountains so named. Eusebius places it six miles from Pella, towards Gerasa; consequently it must be east of the sea of Tiberias. Jabesh Gilead was sacked by the Israelites, because it refused to join in the war against Benjamin, Judges xxi. 8. Nahash king of the Ammonites, laying siege to Jabesh, proposed hard conditions to the inhabitants, from which Saul delivered them, A. M. 2909, ante A. D. 1094. [Vide FRAGMENT, No. CXLI.] They ever after shewed great gratitude to Saul and his family; they carried off the bodies of Saul and his son Jonathan, which the Philistines had hung upon the walls of Bethsan, and buried them honourably at their city, 1 Sam. xxxi. 11.

JABEZ, יעבץ, Iaβic, sorrow or trouble; from רבצ chatsab, by a transposition of the letters.

JABEZ. In 1 Chron. iv. 9, 10, his piety is commended. Some think him to be the son of Cos, or Kenaz, which opinion is probable.

II. JABEZ, the name of a place. 1 Chr. ii. 55.

JABIN, יבין, he that understands, he that builds; from בנה binah, to understand, or בנה banah, to build.

I. JABIN, king of Hazor, in the northern part of Canaan, Josh. xi. 1, 2, 3, &c. Amazed at the conquests of Joshua, who had subdued the south of Canaan, he engaged with other kings in the northern part along the Jordan, and on the Mediterranean, and in the mountains, in a league offensive and defensive. These kings and their troops rendezvoused at the waters of Merom. Joshua marched against them, attacked them suddenly, defeated them, and pursued them to great Zidon, and the valley of Mizpeh. He lamed their horses, burnt their chariots, took Hazor, and killed Jabin, about A. M. 2555.

II. JABIN, king of Hazor, oppressed the Israelites twenty years, from A. M. 2699, to 2719. Judg. iv. 1. &c. Sisera, his general, was defeated by Barak at the foot of Mount Tabor; the Israelites fortified themselves against Jabin, and at last subdued him.

JABNEH, יבנה, Iaβνδ, he that builds, or understands. See JAMNIA.

[JABNEH, or JABNIA, a city of the Philistines, 2 Chron. xxvi. 6. called Jamnia, 1 Macc. iv. 15. and Jamneia, chap. v. 58. 2 Macc. xii. 8.

The situation of Jamnia may be gathered from the passage last cited, as being not far from Joppa. The following is Dr. Wittman's account of Yebnah, which appears to be the ancient Jabneh.

"Yebna is a village about twelve miles distant from Jaffa; in a fine open plain, surrounded by hills and covered with herbage. A rivulet formed by the rains supplies water.

It is conjectured that the rock Etam, where Samson was surprised by the Philistines, was not far from Yebna.

North east of Yebnah is a lofty hill, from which is an extensive and pleasing view of Ramla, distant about five miles. On sloping hills of easy ascent, by which the plains are bordered, Yebna, Ekron, Asdod, and Ashkalon, were in sight." Comp. 2 Chron. xxvi. 6.]

JACHAN, יעכן, Ioaχαν, he that bruises or presses, or that takes away and rejects the foundation; from יחק jahah, to reject, &c. and כן cen, foundation. Of Gad, 1 Chron. v. 13.

JACHIN, יכין, he that strengthens and makes steadfast; from כן cun.

JACHIN, fifth son of Simeon, went down into Egypt with his father, and was head of a family. Gen. xlvii. 10. Numb. xxvi. 12.

II. JACHIN, head of the twenty-first family of priests, 1 Chron. xxiv. 17.

III. JACHIN, the name of a pillar placed at the porch of Solomon's temple. It was of brass, four inches thick, eighteen cubits high, and twelve cubits in circumference, i. e. the shaft, 1 Kings vii. 15, 21. Jer. lii. 21. But 2 Chronicles. iii. 15, 17. states the two pillars as only 35 cubits high; whence it is thought they were each but seventeen cubits and an half high. Eighteen Hebrew cubits make 30 feet 9 inches; twelve cubits, make 20 feet 6 inches. On the top of each pillar was a crown, or capital, five cubits high. 1 Kings vii. 16. Jerem. lii. 21. These are reckoned but three cubits, 2 Kings xxv. 17, and four cubits, 1 Kings vii. 19. i. e. including the the ornaments, the rose and the lily at the top—four cubits; or excluding those ornaments—three cubits. The entire crown or capital, measured five cubits. Jachin signifies stability; Boaz signifies firmness.

JACOB, אֶבְרָהָם, he that supplants or undermines: otherwise, the heel; from אָכַב hakab. [In the Greek written Ἰακωβ. Matth. i. 16. Luke iii. 34. and Ἰακωβος, James i. 1.]

JACOB, son of Isaac and Rebekah, born A. M. 2168, ante A. D. 1836. He was twin-brother to Esau. At his birth, he held his brother Esau's heel; for this reason he was called Jacob, q. the heeler, one who heels, or strikes up, his adversary, Gen. xxv. 25. This was a kind of prognostic of his future conduct in life. While Rebekah was pregnant, Isaac consulting the Lord concerning the struggling of these twins in her womb, God declared that Rebekah should have two sons, who should become two great people; but that the elder should be subject to the younger. Jacob was meek and peaceable, living at home; Esau was more turbulent, fierce, and passionately fond of hunting. Isaac was partial to Esau, Rebekah to Jacob.

One day Jacob having prepared a mess of pottage, Esau returning weary from hunting, desired his brother to give him some; but Jacob refused, unless Esau would give up his right of seniority to him, which he did.

Long after this, the two brothers being seventy seven years of age, and Isaac their father an hundred thirty-seven, (A. M. 2245, ante A. D. 1750.) Isaac fell into a languishing indisposition; and believing his death to be near, he called Esau, whom he considered as his eldest son, bade him hunt some venison, and dress it, as he knew he liked, and then he would give him his last blessing. Isaac's sight was become dim with age, and his wife Rebekah, who had heard his commands to Esau, substituted Jacob: who by such guile procured the prophetic blessing intended for his brother, to whom Isaac surprised, and vexed, could now give only an inferior blessing, and foretel inferior advantages to his posterity.

From this time Esau bore a secret hatred to Jacob, and said, the time of mourning for my father is near, and then I will get rid of my brother. Isaac, hereupon, gave Jacob his blessing, and directed him to go into Mesopotamia, and marry one of his uncle Laban's daughters. Jacob departed privately, and coming after sunset to a certain place, he took one of the stones which he found there, which he used for a pillow, and fell asleep. In a dream he saw a ladder resting on the earth, but reaching to heaven; he saw likewise angels of God ascending and descending by it. The Lord standing at it, said to him, "I am the Lord God of Abraham thy father, and the God of Isaac; to thee and thy posterity I will give the land whereon thou liest; and all nations shall be blessed in thee."

Jacob awaking said, "The Lord is surely in this place, and I knew it not." Rising early, he took the stone upon which he had rested his head, set it up as a monument, poured oil upon it, and called the place Bethel, the House of God, intreating God's protection and favour. He then proceeded to Haran in Mesopotamia. His uncle Laban (Rebekah's brother) had two daughters, the eldest named Leah, the younger Rachel. Jacob agreed with Laban to serve him seven years, as a dowry [or purchase, Vide Downy] for Rachel as his wife; but Laban cunningly gave Leah to Jacob instead of Rachel. The next morning Jacob complained violently to Laban of this deception; but agreed to serve him another seven years for Rachel, whom he preferred to Leah. Jacob had four sons by Leah; but Rachel seeing she had no children, gave her servant Bilhah to Jacob, who by her had Dan and Naphtali, whom Rachel looked on as her own. Leah likewise gave her servant Zilpah to her husband, who brought Gad and Asher. After this Leah had Issachar and Zebulun, and Dinah, a daughter. At last the Lord remembered Rachel, and gave her a son, whom she called Joseph.

Jacob's family becoming numerous, and his term of service to Laban being expired, he desired to return into his own country with his wives and children. But Laban, who had prospered by his services, wished him to continue. Jacob offered to serve six years longer, provided he might receive the increase of his flocks, that should be of different colours, or speckled, [perhaps pye-balled] and brown. Such fleeces being of the smallest value, Laban willingly accepted these conditions, and that very day they separated the flocks, according to this agreement; and placed a distance of three days journey between them.

But the Lord intending to reward Jacob suggested to him in a dream, an art, whereby to produce sheep and kids of different colours. This was, to place among the watering places where his cattle came, while they were in heat, green branches, with the bark partially peeled. This artifice had nothing in itself supernatural. We know that animals which receive lively impressions from surrounding objects, generally conceive and produce young with some spot of that colour which had affected them. This is the common opinion: St. Jerom, St. Austin, and St. Isidore of Seville, have followed and supported ported it: but St. Chrysostom, Theodoret, and some others, have been of opinion, that this with its effect, was something above mere nature.

Jacob acquired so much property that Laban with his sons became jealous of him, and the Lord in a dream bid him return into his own country, and assured him of divine protection. Jacob having informed his wives, he found them disposed to accompany him. He took his wives, therefore, his children and his cattle, and had performed three days journey before Laban was aware of his departure. He immediately pursued, and overtook Jacob on the seventh day of his pursuit, on the mountains of Gilead. He complained in rough terms of this flight, without taking leave of him, but, added, especially, "Why have you robbed me of my gods?" for Rachel had had taken Laban's Teraphim without her husband's knowledge. Vide TERAPHIM.

Jacob answered "I was afraid lest you should forcibly detain your daughters. And as for the robbery, upon whom you find your gods, he shall be put to death." Rachel by concealing the images disappointed all the search of her father: and Jacob in his turn complained to Laban of the treatment he had experienced. All ended in swearing an eternal alliance between them: and they set up a heap of stones on the mountain of Gilead, as a monument of their friendship. Jacob going on toward Canaan arrived at the brook Jabbok, east of Jordan.

In the mean while Esau had settled in the mountains of Seir, south of where Jacob now was. Jacob fearing lest his brother might retain his former resentment, believed it convenient to win him by presents and submissions. He sent him, therefore, notice of his arrival. Esau, informed of his coming, advanced with four hundred men to meet him. Jacob, fearing he had some evil design, to appease him, sent forward to meet him, as presents, goats, sheep, camels, cows, she-asses and their foals. After all his people had passed the brook Jabbok, Jacob remained alone on the other side, and behold an angel, in the form of a man, wrestled with him till the morning, when seeing he could not prevail against Jacob, he touched the hollow of his thigh, which immediately withered, and Jacob became lame. (Some believe that he continued lame all the rest of his life: others, that he recovered soon afterwards, and, whereas we read in the Vulgate, that Jacob came to Salem, they translate, he arrived safe and sound, on the other side of Jordan.) The angel said, Let me go, for the dawn begins to appear: but Jacob answered, I will not let thee go, unless thou givest me thy blessing. The angel asked him, what was his name? He replied, Jacob. And the angel said, Hereafter thou shalt no more be called Jacob, but Israel. But when Jacob asked him likewise his name, he said, Why dost thou ask my name? And he blessed him there. Jacob therefore called this place Peniel, saying, I have seen God face to face, yet my life is preserved.

Jacob perceiving Esau advancing toward him, went forward, and threw himself seven times on the earth before him. Leah and Rachel did the same with their children. The two brothers tenderly embraced each other, and Jacob prevailed on Esau to accept his presents. Esau returned home, and Jacob came to Succoth beyond Jordan. Here he dwelt some time; afterwards, he passed the Jordan, and came to Salem, a city of the Shechemites, where he set up his tents, having purchased part of a field for the sum of an hundred Kesita's (See KESITA.) or an hundred lambs, or pieces of money, of the children of Hamor Shechem's father.

While Jacob abode in Salem, his daughter Dinah was ravished by Shechem (See DINAH.) Her brothers Levi and Simeon, sons of Jacob, took a crafty and very severe revenge, by killing the Shechemites, and pillaging their city. Jacob, dreading the resentment of the neighbouring people, retired to Bethel, where God appointed him to stay, and to erect an altar. In preparation for the sacrifice which he was to offer there, he commanded his people to purify themselves, to change their clothes, and to reject all the strange gods, which they might have brought out of Mesopotamia. These he took, and hid them under an oak near Shechem. He came happily to Bethel, sacrificed there, and the Lord appearing to him, renewed his promises of protecting him, and of multiplying his family.

After he had performed his devotions, he took the way to Hebron, to visit his father Isaac, who dwelt hard by, in the valley of Mamre. In the journey Rachel died in labour of Benjamin, and was buried near Bethlehem. Jacob erected a monument for her, Gen. xxxv. 16, 17. and proceeding to Hebron, pitched his tents at the tower of Eder. He had the satisfaction to find his father Isaac living, and that good patriarch lived twenty-two years with Jacob. Jacob and Esau paid the last duties to him. Gen. xxxv. 29.

About ten years before the death of Isaac, Joseph was sold by his brethren. (See JOSEPH.) Jacob, believing he had been devoured by wild beasts, was afflicted in proportion to his tenderness for him. He passed about twenty-two years mourning for him, till Joseph discovered himself to his brethren in Egypt, Gen. xliii. xlv. xlv. (Joseph was sold A. M. 2276. The first year of famine was A. M. 2296. Jacob sent his sons into Egypt A. M. 2297. Joseph declared declared himself to his brethren, and sent for Jacob into Egypt in 2298.) Being informed, that Joseph was living, Jacob awakened, as it were, from slumber, and said, "It is enough; Joseph my son is yet alive, I will go see him before I die.

On his arrival in Egypt, he sent Judah to inform Joseph, and desire him to come to the land of Goshen, as had been agreed. Joseph hastened thither, and they embraced with tears. Joseph presented him to Pharaoh. Jacob having wished this prince all happiness, Pharaoh asked him his age. He answered "The time of my pilgrimage is an hundred and thirty years; few and evil have my years been, in comparison of the age of my fathers."

Jacob lived seventeen years in Egypt, from A. M. 2298 to 2315. About that time falling sick, Joseph, with his two sons Ephraim and Manasseh, visited him. Jacob fervently blessed him, adopted Ephraim and Manasseh; directed that they should share the land of Canaan, which God had promised him at Bethel; and calling the children to his bed side, he embraced and blessed them. Joseph placed them on each side of his father, Ephraim on Jacob's left, and Manasseh on his right hand. But Jacob, directed by the spirit of prophecy, crossing his hands laid his right hand on Ephraim's head, and his left on Manasseh's. Joseph, supposing he was mistaken, would have changed the disposition of his hands; but Jacob answered, "I know what I do, my son." Thus he gave Ephraim the pre-eminence over Manasseh; and, in fact, the tribe of Ephraim was always more powerful than Manasseh; and, after Judah, was the most considerable tribe in Israel. Jacob also foretold to Joseph, that God would bring his posterity back into the land of Canaan, which was promised to their fathers, adding, I leave thee one portion above thy brethren, which I took from the Amorite with my sword, and my bow.

Some time after this Jacob called all his sons together to give them his last prophetic blessing. He requested to be buried in the cave over against Mamre, where Abraham, Sarah, Isaac, and Rebekah were buried; and then he laid himself down and died. Joseph embalmed him after the manner of the Egyptians, and there was a general lamentation for him in Egypt seventy days. After which, Joseph and his brethren, with the principal men of Egypt, carried him to the burying-place of his fathers, near Hebron.

The author of Ecclesiasticus has in few words eulogized Jacob. Ecclus. xli. 25, 26.

The Mahometans maintain that Jacob, the father of the twelve patriarchs, from whom issued the twelve tribes, was a prophet, and that all the prophets descended from his race, except Job, Jethro, Moses's father in law, and Mahomet. They believe farther, that the royal power continued in his family till the time of John the Baptist and Jesus Christ. Vide FRAGMENTS, Nos. CXXIII. CCCXXXIV. CCCXXXV.

JACOB'S WELL, or Fountain, near Shechem; here our Saviour conversed with the woman of Samaria, John iv. 6. Jacob dwelt near this place before his sons slew the Shechemites. Old travellers speak of a church dedicated to St. John the Baptist, built in the form of a cross over Jacob's well or fountain, apud Reland. Palest. tom. ii. page 1008, 1009. The well was in the church before the altar. It was said, that the bucket was still there which the woman of Samaria used; and the sick came thither to drink out of it, and to recover their health.

II. JACOB, father of Matthan, and grandfather of Joseph. Matth. i. 15.

*JACOB*AH, יַעֲקֹב, 'Iakebā. 1 Chron. iv. 36.

[From the same root as Jacob: but, from what cause this name was given does not appear: the ה parazogic should seem to imply very tripping, or cunning, supplanting, &c.]

JADA, דַּע, knowing, skilful. Son of Onam, and father of Jether and Jonathan. 1 Chron. ii. 28, 32.

JADAU, יָדַי, 'Iadaī, my hand; from יָד jad, a hand: otherwise, my praise; from יָדָה jadah, praise, and יָי, my. Son of Nebo, one of those who separated from their wives. Ezra x. 43.

JADDUA, יָדַע, or JADDUS, who has knowledge; from יָדָה, jadah, to know.

JADDUA, or JADDUS, high priest of the Jews in the time of Alexander the Great, (Vide ALEXANDER) A. M. 3665 to 3982, seventeen years, says Eusebius. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xi. cap. 8. Some critics believe, that what Josephus relates of Alexander and Jaddus, is mere fable. Rab. Azarias, in Meor en aim. 3 par. et alii quidam.

JADIAEL, יָדַעֵל, called ASHBEL, Gen. xli. 21. Science, or knowledge of God; from יָדָה jadah, science, &c. and אֵל el, God. Son of Benjamin, 1 Chron. vii. 6.

JADON, יָדֹן 'Iadōn, he that judges, or pleads; from יָדָה don, or dun: otherwise, his hand; from יָד jad, and the pronoun יָ an, his. The Septuagint read Jaron; יָרֵשׁ, for יָדֵלֶת.

JADON, so Josephus, Antiq. lib. viii. cap. 3. calls the prophet who was sent to Jeroboam at Bethel, when he dedicated his golden calves. 1 Kings xiii. Scripture does not name this prophet, but interpreters believe with Josephus, that this was the prophet Iado. See Ido.

JAEL, יָעַל, he that ascends; from יָעַל halah to ascend; otherwise, יָעַל, from יָעַל jahalah.

JAEL, or JAHEL, wife of Heber the Kenite. She killed Sisera, general of the Canaanitish army army, who having fled to her tent, and sleeping there, Jael took her opportunity, and drove a large nail through his temples with a hammer, A. M. 2719, ante A. D. 1285. Judges iv. 17, 21.

[Why this woman violated the sacred rights of hospitality, by murdering her guest, does not appear. Scripture hints at the relation of this family to Moses by Hobab, and no doubt but Hobab, and this family, had received many advantages by means of Israel; for so Moses promised, "we will surely do thee good." Nevertheless, we must consider the secluded and sacred nature of the women's tent in the East, (vide FRAGMENT, No. XXV,) and that the victor would not have intruded there; we must also consider the implied pledge of security in the food Jael had given to Sisera, which in the East is of considerable solemnity, (vide FRAGMENT, No. CXXX.)—By way of apology, the Rabbins tell us, that the words, "at her feet he bowed, he fell," &c. chap. v. 27. imply, that he attempted rudeness to her; and that to resist such violation, she had recourse to "the workman's hammer." But it should be remembered, that a fugitive, as Sisera was, would have had little inclination for such an adventure at such a time; and it appears clearly that fatigue and sleep overpowered him. It is probable, 1. that Jael had herself felt the severity of the late oppression of Israel by Sisera; 2. that she was actuated by motives of patriotism, and of gratitude toward Israel; 3. the general character of Sisera might be so atrocious, that at any rate his death was desirable. We see an instance of a conduct much the same in its principles, in the case of Judith, whose anxiety for the deliverance of her people led her to the employment of artifice to accomplish her purposes.]

JAGUR, גִּיר, stranger, or traveller; from גָּר ger: otherwise, he that fears, or assembles; from גָּר gur. A city of Judah, Josh. xv. 21. its situation we do not know; it lay in the south.

JAH, one of the names of God; which is compounded with many Hebrew words: as Adonijah, Halleluiah, Malachia; i. e. God is my Lord, praise the Lord, the Lord is my king, &c.

JAHATH, יָחַת, to bruise, or astonish; from חָתַת chathath.

JAHATH, a Levite of Gershom's family, son of Libnah, 1 Chron. vi. 20.

II. JAHATH, a Levite of Merari's family; surveyor of the workmen employed by Josiah in repairing the temple, 2 Chron. xxxiv. 12.

JAHAZ, יָחָז, or JAHOZ, or JAHAZA, Josh. xiii. 18. Quarrel, dispute; from יָחָז natzah; or the going out of the Lord; from יָחָז going out, and יָחָז, the Lord. [Simon thinks this imports a land sunk and round, from the Arabic; and, with the הַ paragogic, a depression to the very ground, a declivity; so that it is derived from the nature or form of the place it describes.]

JAHAZ, a city beyond Jordan, near to which Moses defeated king Sihon: it was given to Reuben, Deut. ii. 32. The same city probably as Jahzah, situated to the north, near Ar, the capital of Moab. It was given to the Levites, 1 Chron. vi. 78.

JAHAZAH, Josh. xxi. 36: given to the Levites of Merari's family.

JAHAZIAH, יָחָזִיָּה, vision of the Lord; from יָחָז chazah, to see, and יָהּ jah, the Lord. Son, or inhabitant, of Tikvah; for so the word son is often taken, as sons of Sion; and so daughters of Jerusalem, &c. Ezra x. 15.

JAHAZIEL, יָחָזִיאֵל, 'Izēl, he that sees God, or vision of God; from יָחָז chazah to see, and אֵל el, God. Vulgate, Jaziel, 1 Chron. xvi. 6.

JAHAZIEL, a brave man who joined David. 1 Chron. xii. 4.

II. JAHAZIEL, son of Hebron, 1 Chron. xxiii. 19.

JAHDAL, יָחַדָּל, 'Adl, with me, or I am alone; from יָחַד jachad, and the pronoun יָ, me: otherwise, sharp; from יָחַד chad: or that rejoices; from יָחַד chadah: or my unity, according to the Syriac. 1 Chron. ii. 47.

IAHDIEL, יָחַדִּיאֵל, unity of God; from יָחַד jachad, one alone: otherwise, joy of God; from יָחַד chadah, joy: otherwise, point of God; from יָחַד chadah, point, and אֵל el, God: according to the Syriac and Hebrew, renewing of God. Head of a house, 1 Chron. v. 24.

IAHDO, יָחַדּוֹ, he alone, or he himself; from יָחַד jachad, and the pronoun וֹ, him: otherwise, his joy; from יָחַד chadah, joy: otherwise, his point from יָחַד chadah; according to the Syriac, his novelty. Son of Buz. 1 Chron. v. 14.

JAILEEL, יָחַלֵּל, 'Aχl, who waits on God; from יָחַל jichel, to wait: or who prays to God; from יָחַל chalah; otherwise, God that begins; from יָחַל chulal, to begin. Or JALEL, third son of Zebulun, Gen. xli. 14. head of a family, Numb. xxvi. 26.

JAHMAI, יָחַמַּי, 'Iam, he that warms, or is warm; from יָחַם jacham. Son of Tola, and grandson of Issachar, 1 Chron. vii. 2.

JAHZAH, see JAHAZ. In the LXX. written 'Iazā in Joshua, and 'Iaza in Chronicles.

JAHIZEEL, יָחִיצֵאֵל, God that divides; from יָחַץ chatzah: or that divides into half; from יָחַץ chatzi: or that makes haste; from יָחַץ chush, to hasten, and אֵל el, God. Of Naphtali, Gen. xli. 24. head of a family, Numb. xxvi. 48.

JAHZERAH, son of Meshullam, and father of Adiel, 1 Chron. ix. 12.

JAIR, יָאִיר, who diffuses brightness, or who is enlightened; from יָאִיר, to enlighten.

I. JAIR, of Manasseh possessed beyond Jordan the whole country of Argob to the borders of Geshur and Maachathi, Judg. x. 3. He succeeded ceeded Tola in the government of Israel, and was succeeded by Jephthah. His government continued twenty two years, from A. M. 2795 to 2817. Comp. Numb. xxxii. 41. Deut. iii. 14. Josh. xiii. 30. 1 Kings iv. 13. 1 Chr. ii. 22. and FRAGMENT, No. CCCXXIX.

II. JAIR, son of Shimeï, and father of Mordecai, Esth. ii. 5.

III. JAIR, or JAIRUS, chief of the synagogue at Capernaum. His daughter falling dangerously sick was healed by Jesus. Matt. ix. 18. Mark v. 22. Luke viii. 41.

JAIRUS, 'Ιαῖρος, from JAIR, Mark v. 22.

JAKIM, יָקִים, 'Iakim, who raises himself; from יָקָם kum: or who confirms, from the same. Chief of the twelfth family of the twenty four classes of priests. 1 Chron. viii. 19. xxiv. 12.

JALON, יָלֹן, who remains, or who murmurs; from יָלַן lun. Son of Ezra. 1 Chron. iv. 17.

JAMBRES, 'Ιαμβρῆς, or MAMBRES, the sea with poverty; from יָם jam, the sea, and the conjunction בֶּ beth, in, with, and שָׁר rash, poor. This is an Egyptian word, and its etymology is not to be deduced from the Hebrew.

JAMBRES, a magician who opposed Moses in Egypt. See JANNES.

JAMBRI, 'Ιαμβρά; who makes bitter; from מָרַר, marar: otherwise, who revolts or changes; from מָרָה marah. A man of power in the city of Medaba, beyond Jordan. 1 Macc. ix. 36, 37. See JONATHAN IX.

JAMES, 'Ιάκωβος, the same import as Jacob.

I. JAMES, surnamed major, or the Elder, to distinguish him from James Minor, the younger [shorter?] brother to St. John the Evangelist, and son to Zebedee and Salome. Matt. iv. 21. He was of Bethsaida in Galilee, and left his property, to follow Christ. His mother Salome, was one of those women who occasionally attended our Saviour in his journeys. She desired one day, that her two sons James and John might be seated at his right hand in his kingdom: but Jesus replied, that was only in the appointment of his heavenly Father, Matt. xx. 21. James and John, before their vocation, were fishermen, with Zebedee their father; nor did they quit their profession till our Saviour called them. Mark i. 18, 19. They were witnesses of our Lord's Transfiguration, Matth. xvii. 2. and when certain Samaritans refused to admit Jesus Christ, James and John wished for fire from heaven to consume them, Luke ix. 54. For this reason, it is thought the name of Boanerges, or sons of thunder, was afterwards given them.

Some days after the resurrection of our Saviour, James and John went a fishing in the sea of Tiberias, where they saw Jesus. They were present at the ascension of our Lord. St.

PART XIV. Edit. IV.

James is said to have preached to all the dispersed tribes of Israel: but for this there is only report. His martyrdom is related Acts xii. 1, 2, cir. A. D. 42, or 44, for the date is not well determined. Herod Agrippa king of the Jews, grandson to Herod the Great, seized and executed James at Jerusalem. Clemens Alexandrinus, apud Euseb. lib. ii. cap. 9. informs us, that the man who brought St. James before the judges was so affected with his constancy in confessing Jesus Christ, that he too declared himself a christian, and was condemned, as well as the apostle, to be beheaded. As they went to the place of execution, this man asked forgiveness of James; who deliberated a little with himself whether he should treat him as a brother; but after a short pause, he embraced him, and said, "Peace be with you:" after which their heads were struck off.

The Greeks observe his festival April 30, the Latins July 25. Epiphanius, Hæres. 58. cap. 4. says, James as well as John continued in single life, never had their hair cut, never bathed, wore only a single tunic and a linen cloak, and, never ate fish or flesh. The Spaniards pretend that this saint is the first apostle of their country, and that his body was brought thither soon after his death; of which they produce no good proofs. They say, too, that his relics have been in great repute and reverence in that country ever since the ninth century. See the Martyrologies of Ado, Usuard, and Notker.

II. JAMES Minor, surnamed the brother of our Lord, (Gal. i. 19. Joseph. Ant. lib. xx. cap. 8.) and bishop of Jerusalem, was son of Cleopas (otherwise Alpheus) and Mary sister to the Blessed Virgin; consequently he was cousin-german to Jesus Christ. He was surnamed the Just, for the admirable holiness and purity of his life. By Clem. Alex. et Hegesipp. apud Euseb. Hist. lib. ii. cap. 1. he is said to have been a priest, and to have observed the laws of the Nazarites from his birth, eating or drinking nothing capable of intoxicating; he never cut his hair, never ate any thing that had life, used no bathing, nor oils, wore no sandals or woollen clothes, but only a linen cloak and tunic. The very great respect paid to his virtue was the reason, they say, of his having a very extraordinary privilege, viz. liberty of entering the Holy Place [court?] of the Temple. St. Jerome assures us, that the Jews so greatly esteemed St. James, that they strove to touch the hem of his garment. The Talmud relates several miracles said to be wrought by James, the disciple of Jesus the Carpenter; among others, that he being called to cure a Jew, named Eleazar, who had been bit by a serpent, a rabbi maintained that he ought not to suffer himself to be healed in the name of Jesus Christ. While they were deliberating, Eleazar died. Baron. An. 63.

Our Saviour appeared to James Minor eight days after the resurrection, 1 Cor. xv. 7. He was appointed bishop of Jerusalem; and we are assured by Eusebius, lib. ii. cap. 1. and Epiphanius, Hæres. 29. et. 78. that he wore a plate of gold on his forehead, as a mark of his episcopacy, with the name of God in all probability inscribed on it, in imitation of the Jewish high-priests. St. James was at Jerusalem, and was considered as a pillar of the church, when St. Paul first came thither after his conversion, Gal. i. 18. A. D. 37. In the council of Jerusalem, A. D. 51. St. James gave his vote last; and the result of the council was principally formed on what St. James said, who, notwithstanding he himself observed the ceremonies of the law, with his church, com. Gal. ii. 11, 12, was of opinion, that such a yoke was not to be imposed on converts from among the heathen. Acts xv. 13.

The progress which the gospel made alarmed the chief of the Jews. Ananus, son of Annas the high-priest, mentioned in the gospel, undertook to put St. James to death. To this end he chose the time when Festus, who had been governor of Judæa, being dead, and Albinus his successor, not yet arrived, the province was without a governor, Euseb. lib. ii. cap. 23. Ananus therefore, and the principal Pharisees, convening James before their assembly publicly, represented to him that the people were led into error concerning Jesus Christ as the Messiah; but that it was in his power to convince them of this mistake, since every one was ready to believe whatever he should declare on that subject. They made him therefore go up into one of the galleries of the temple, that he might be heard by the whole multitude, assembled from all parts to keep the passover. They cried out to him from below, "Tell us, thou just man, what we should believe concerning Jesus, who was crucified." He answered with a loud voice, "Jesus the son of man, whom you speak of, is now seated at the right hand of the Supreme Majesty, as Son of God, and must one day come, borne upon the clouds of heaven." At these words many gave glory to God, crying out, Hosanna! But the Pharisees and doctors exclaimed, "What, is he whom we call the Just, likewise mistaken!" and going up to where he was, they threw him down from thence. He did not die of this fall, but kneeling on the ground, he prayed for his enemies; who hereupon by Ananus's order began to stone him; at last a fuller dispatched him, by giving him a blow upon the head with the long pole, which he used in the business of his trade. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xx. cap. 8.

He was buried near the temple, in the place where he had suffered martyrdom, and where a monument was erected for him, which was much celebrated till Jerusalem was destroyed by the Romans. The wisest of the Jews very much disapproved the murder of St. James, and the passionate behaviour of Ananus, whereof they made great complaints to king Agrippa, and to Albinus the Roman governor of the province; the latter of whom by his letters threatened to punish his temerity; and Agrippa divested him of the high-priesthood which he had exercised only three months. Josephus is cited (Origen contra Celsum, lib. i. Euseb. lib. ii. cap. 23. Hieron. de Viris illustr. ex. Josepho, apud quem non leguntur hodie verba ab Origen. et Euseb. laudata.) as affirming, that the war which the Romans made against the Jews, and all the following calamities were imputed to the death of this just man. The ancient heretics forged writings, which they ascribed to St. James, the brother of our Lord. But the church acknowledges his epistle, only, as authentic; and this is the first of the seven epistles, called canonical. It is our opinion, that he wrote it a little before his death, A. D. 62. In this he contends principally against the abuse which many made of St. Paul's principle, that faith and not works justifies before God. St. James strongly maintains the necessity of good works. Although this epistle is directed to the Jews of the dispersion, it is thought he wrote it in Greek, because he cites the Scripture according to the LXX. Besides, Greek was at that time the common language of almost the whole East.

We have besides, the Preparatory Gospel of St. James, which the eastern people are well acquainted with. See Fabricius [or Jones's] Apocryphal books of the New Testament, p. 66. likewise a Liturgy under his name [both spurious.]

[It is very difficult to compose a satisfactory history of James the less. The opinion seems to gain ground that he was so called on account of his stature, such being the import of the word τὸ μικρὸν, which is not a comparative, but a positive "the little." His relation to Jesus, as "the Lord's brother," has been accounted for by ancient writers, by supposing him to be a son of Joseph by a former wife; or, that Joseph raised up seed to his brother (Alpheus) according to the law, so that he was the son of Alpheus, legally, though of Joseph, naturally. He certainly was not a priest, since the N. T. is silent on that particular: and it is not likely of any son of Alpheus: consequently, it is not credible that James should have any special privilege in respect to entering the more sacred part of the temple, or the sanctuary, or that the

the Pharisees should ask his opinion about the divine mission of Jesus. Nevertheless, it may be true that he was highly respected, and that Ananus and his partizans might injure their credit among the people by putting him to death: which, however, they would hardly dare to do within the sacred precincts.

But, it may be observed, that some parts of the temple were not, strictly speaking, sacred; as, where the council met; where doves were sold, &c. and as to stoning, compare John viii. 59. x. 22—31.

It is likely, that James was a very correct observer of the Mosaic institutions, and distinguished as such; which probably, contributed to his preservation during many years at Jerusalem; and shews the prudence of those who desired him to preside in the Christian church there; as he would be least offensive to the Jewish rulers, though an Apostle; nor would he detract from the reputation of the national rites, &c. among his own people.

As to the Epistle of James, the reasons for placing it so late, are not without reply; and it might be argued from its contents, as well as from its omissions, that it may agree with a much earlier date; but, the enquiry is too extensive and minute for this place.]

JAMIN, יָמִין, the right-hand, or who is at the right-hand: otherwise, the south. Second son of Simeon, head of a family. Gen. xlv. 10. Numb. xxvi. 12.

JAMLECH, יָמֶלֶךְ, he that rules; from מָלַךְ malac. Head of the Simeonites. 1 Chr. iv. 34.

JAMNIA, יָמְנִיא, God is my right hand, or who builds, or who understands; reading it Jabnia. See JABNEH.

JAMNIA, JEMNAA, or JABNEH, JAMNE, JAMNI, or JANNES, a maritime town in Palestine, between Azotus and Joppa, which has a pretty good haven: it is not read in the Hebrew, but in the Greek, Josh. xv. 4. where Jamnai, near Ekron is placed among the cities of Judah. Uziah king of Judah took it from the Philistines, 2 Chron. xxvi. 6. Josephus, Antiq. lib. v. cap. 1. says it was given to the tribe of Dan. We read, 2 Macc. xii. 9. that the port of Jamnia was 240 furlongs from Jerusalem.

JANNOR, 'Ανανίας, or 'Ηλίας, the light of the sea; from נֹר or, light, and יָם jam, the sea: or, right hand of the light; from יָמִין jamin, the right hand, and נֹר or, light. Judith viii. 1.

JANIA, יָנִי, יָנִי, who speaks, or, who answers: from נָהַם hanah: otherwise, affliction, misery; from נָהַם hani, otherwise, impoverished. Of Gad, 1 Chron. v. 12.

JANNA, or JANNE, son of Joseph, and father of Melchi, Luke iii. 24.

JANNÆUS. Vide ALEXANDER JANNÆUS.

JANNES, 'Ιαννης, from Janna, or Janai.

JANNES, and JAMBRES, or, as Pliny calls them, lib. xxx. cap. 1. Jamne and Jotape, two magicians, who, says St. Paul, 2 Tim. iii. 8, resisted Moses in Egypt. The paraphrast Jonathan, on Numb. xxiii. 22, says they were the two sons of Balaam, who accompanied him to Balak, king of Moab. They are called by several names, in several translations; by the Septuagint, Φάρμακοι, poisoners, and Επαυδοι, enchanters; by Sulpitius Severus, Chaldeans, i. e. astrologers; by others, sapientes and malefici, wise men,—(i. e. so esteemed among the Egyptians)—philosophers, and witches.

Artapanus tells us, that Pharaoh sent for magicians, from Upper Egypt, to oppose Moses. Ambrosiaster or Hilary the Deacon, on 2 Tim. iii. 8, says, they were brothers. He cites a book intitled Jannes and Mambres, which is likewise quoted by Origen, and ranked as apocryphal by pope Gelasius, Dist. 15. Some of the Hebrews (Vide Buxtorf Lex Thalmud. et Fabric. de Apocryph. V. T.) call them Janes and Jambres; others, Jochana and Mamré, or Jonas and Jombros. Jerom translates their names Johannes and Mambres; and there is a tradition they say, in the Talmud, that Juhanni and Mamré, chief of Pharaoh's physicians, said to Moses "Thou bringest straw into Ephraim, where abundance of corn grew;" q. d. To bring your magical arts hither, is to as much purpose as to bring water to the Nile, [Vide FRAGMENT, No. XXXVIII.] Some say, their names are the same as John and Ambrose. Some will have it, that they fled away with their father; others, that they were drowned in the Red Sea with the Egyptians; others, that they were killed by Phinehas in the war against the Midianites.

Numenius, cited by Aristobulus (apud Euseb. Prep. lib. ix.) says, that Jannes and Jambres were sacred scribes of the Egyptians, who excelled in magic, at the time when the Jews were driven out of Egypt.

These were the only persons whom the Egyptians found capable of opposing Moses, who was a man whose prayers to God were very powerful. These two men, Jannes and Jambres, were alone able to frustrate the calamities which Moses brought upon the Egyptians. Pliny, lib. xxx. cap. 1. speaks likewise of the faction or sect of Magicians, whereof he says Moses, Jannes, and Jocabel, or Jotapa, were heads. By this last word he meant probably the patriarch Joseph, whom the Egyptians considered as one of their most celebrated sages. The Mussulmen have several particulars to the same purpose.

Their recital supposes, that the magicians wrought no miracle, but only played conjuring tricks, in which they endeavoured to impose on the eyes of spectators. Moses, however, expresses himself as if Pharaoh's magicians really operated the same effects as he himself; so that Pharaoh and his whole court were persuaded, that the power of their magicians was equal to that of Moses, till those magicians not being able to produce lice, as Moses had done, were constrained to own that the finger of God was therein. Exod. viii. 18, 19. Till then they had acknowledged nothing divine or supernatural in the miracles of Moses. And it is agreed, that by magic and juggling tricks, evil angels and sorcerers, may sometimes very nearly imitate true miracles. We question if God may at any time permit the devil and wicked men to work true miracles; but we know he will never permit those who with sincerity seek after truth, to be ultimately deluded by such misrepresentations; but the falsehood, error, malice and disorder which the devil introduces will sooner or later be discovered. See MIRACLE.

JANOHAH, יָנֹחַ, Ἰανᾶχ, who rests or abides; from נוּחַ nuach: otherwise, who leads and guides; from נָחַח nachah.

JANOHAH, a city of Ephraim, on the frontiers of the half-tribe of Manasseh. Josh. xvi. 6. Eusebius places a town called Jano, twelve miles from Schechem or Naplouse in the Acrabatenē; and another three miles from Legio, south.

JANUM, יָנוּם, he that sleeps; from נָם to sleep. A city of Judah, Josh. xv. 53.

JAO, or JAVE, or JABE, diminutives of Jehovah, the incommunicable name of God, the name with four letters, which the Hebrews out of respect, or rather superstition, do not pronounce. See JEHOVAH. The Samaritans pronounce Javi or Jabi, after the manner of the Greeks, who pronounce B like a V consonant.

[These letters JAO occur very frequently on Abraxas, and other talismans of Egypt; and even on those of certain sects which have passed among writers for Christian.]

JAPHĀ, a city of Galilee, near Jotapata, according to Josephus. Probably the city called Japhia, Josh. xix. 12. belonging to Zebulun.

JAPHETH, יָפֶֿתֿ, he that persuades, or extends; from פָּתָה pathah: or handsome; from יָפָה japhah. [enlargement: or ENLARGER.]

JAPHETH, son of Noah, commonly named the third in order of Noah's sons: but improperly, for Japheth was born in the five hundredth year of Noah; and Moses says expressly, that he was the eldest of Noah's sons, according to the LXX. and Symmachus. Moses also says, that Ham was the youngest, Gen. ix. 24. "When Noah knew what his youngest son had done."—Lastly, Moses says, Gen. xi. 10. that Shem two years after the deluge was but 100 years old : he was not born, therefore, till the 502 year of Noah : so that Japheth was evidently the eldest.

His descendants possessed all Europe, the islands in the Mediterranean, Asia Minor, and the northern parts of Asia. Noah, when blessing Japheth, said, "God shall enlarge Japheth; and he shall dwell in the tents of Shem; and Canaan shall be his servant," Gen. ix. 27. This was accomplished when the Greeks, and after them, the Romans, subdued Asia and Africa, where were the dwellings and dominions of Shem, and of Canaan.

The sons of Japheth were Gomer, Magog, Madai, Javan, Tubal, Meshech, and Tiras, Gen. x. 5. "They peopled the isles of the Gentiles, and settled in different countries, each according to his language, family, and people." We are of opinion, that Gomer was father of the Cimbri, or Cimmerians; Magog of the Scythians; Madai of the Macedonians, or of the Medes; Javan of the Ionians and Greeks; Tubal of the Tibarenians; Meshech, of the Muscovites, or Russians; and Tiras, of the Thracians. See their respective articles. By the Isles of the Gentiles, the Hebrews understood the islands of the Mediterranean, and all other countries whither they could go by sea only, as Spain, Gaul, Italy, Greece, Asia Minor, &c.

Japheth is known in profane authors under the name of Iüpetus. The poets, (Hesiod, Theogonia) make him father of heaven and earth, or of Titan and the earth. His habitation was in Thessaly, where he became celebrated for his power and violence. He married a nymph named Asia; by whom he had four sons, Hesperus, Atlas, Epimetheus, and Prometheus, who are all very famous among the ancients. The Greeks believed, that Japheth was the father of their race, and they acknowledged nothing more ancient than him; whence the proverb "As old as Japheth." It is very probable likewise, that Neptune is a memorial or transcript of Japheth. There is some resemblance in the name, but much more in the character; Neptune is god of the sea, as Japheth is lord of the isles. Saturn divided the world among his three sons, Jupiter, Pluto, and Neptune; thus Noah distributed the earth among Shem, Ham, and Japheth. Jupiter is Ham, Pluto is Shem, and Japheth is Neptune. See Bochart, M. Huet, F. Morin, &c. Vide FRAGMENT, No. XIX. also, CCLXX. No. 10. and PLATE.

Beside the seven sons of Japheth above-mentioned, the LXX. Eusebius, the Alexandrian Chronicle, and Austin give him an eighth, called Etiza, who is not named either in the Hebrew or in the Chaldee. The Arabians likewise give to Japheth a son, not mentioned in this place, viz. Cozar, who fled, say they, to the banks of the Wolga, where he built a city, and gave it his own name. Some authors maintain, that the ten tribes carried into captivity by the Kings of Assyria, went into the land of Cozar, as far as Tartary and China. But the Hebrews assert, that Cozar was only the grandson of Japheth by Togarma. This is in Josephus ben Gorion.

Arnohius the younger, on Psalm civ. says, that Japheth possessed the river Tigris, and 200 countries or provinces, which spake twenty-three languages; which languages, joined with those of the sons of Shem and Ham, make in all seventy-two.

The Mussulmen place Japheth among the prophets sent by God: they believe him to be Noah's eldest son, and that his father after the deluge gave him the provinces which lie east [west?] and north of the mountains on which the ark rested. Before Japheth departed to settle the country given him for his inheritance, Noah gave him a stone, which the eastern Turks call Giudé Tasch and Senk-Jede, upon which he wrote the great name of God; by virtue whereof, he who possessed this stone might bring down rain from heaven at his discretion. This pretended stone has been long preserved in the Mogul's country. D'Herbelot, Bibl. Orient. Vide FRAGMENTS Nos. XIX. XX.

The eastern people affirm Japheth to have had eleven male children; namely, 1. Gin, or Nin, or Tchin, father of the Chinese. 2. Seklah, father of the Sclavonians, or ancient Chalybes. 3. Manshüge, father of the Goths and Scythians, otherwise called Gog and Magog, or Jagjouge and Magiouge. 4. Gomari or Gomer, whom we believe to be father of the Cimbri and Germans. 5. Turk, the founder of the Turks. 6. Khalage, a race of Turks. 7. Khozar, from whom the Kozarians are descended. 8. Ros or Rous, father of the Russians or Muscovites. 9. Soustan. 10. Gaz. 11. Tarage, from whom came the Turcomans. The sooner to people their country, Japheth married his eleven sons to their own sisters. In effect, the northern provinces are supposed to have been first peopled.

JAPHETH. Judith ii. 25. speaks of a province called Japheth;—from Cilicia to the borders of Japheth, toward the south. We know of no province south of Cilicia peopled by Japheth. Wherefore some would read Jephthath, or Jephthati, instead of Japheth. Others read Japha, or Jaffa, which is Joppa. We must confess that we know not what this Japheth is.

JAPHIA, יָפִיעַ, 'Iaphi, which enlightens, appears, or shews; from יָפַע yapha: otherwise, which groans; from פָּחַח pahah. [splendid, illustrious; or rather, perhaps, conspicuous, seen from afar, being situated on a mountain. A city of Zebulon. Josh. xix. 12.]

I. JAPHIA, king of Lachish, killed by Joshua, with Adoni-zedeck; Josh. x. 3.

II. JAPHIA, a son of David, 2 Sam. v. 15.

JAPHLET, יָפֶלֶט, 'Iaphlet, he that delivers, or drives away; from פָּלַט phalat. Son of Heber, descended from Achor. 1 Chron. vii. 32.

JAPHLETI, a town on the frontiers of Benjamin and Ephraim. Josh. xvi. 3.

JAR, or JAIR, a Hebrew month, which answers to April, O. S. the eighth month of the civil year, the second month of the sacred year. It consisted of twenty-nine days. On the tenth day of this month the Jews mourn the death of Eli the high-priest, and his two sons Hophni and Phinehas. They who could not observe the passover in the month Nisan, kept it in the month Jar, Numb. ix. 10, 11. On the fifteenth of this month, God sent a prodigious quantity of quails to the Hebrews in the wilderness. On the sixteenth the manna began to fall. On the eighteenth began the wheat harvest in Judea, 33 days after the passover. On the twenty-third a festival in memory of the purification of the temple, by Judas Maccabæus, 2 Macc. xiii. 51. On the twenty-ninth the death of the prophet Samuel.

JARAH, יָרָה, 'Irah, he that spoils and makes naked, or that scatters, from יָרָה harah: otherwise, forests, or honey-combs; from יָעַר jahar: otherwise, to awaken, from יָעַר hur. The Septuagint read יָרָה for יָרָה. Son of Ahaz, of Saul's family. 1 Chron. ix. 42.

JARAMOTH, יָרָמוֹת, 'Ieramoth, eminences; from יָרָם rum: otherwise, he that fears death; from יָרָה jarah, to fear, and מָוֶת maveth, death: otherwise, he that deceives or rejects death; from יָרָה jarah, to cast, and רָמָה ramah, to deceive.

JARAMOTH, a city of Issachar, given to the Levites the sons of Gershom: it was a city of refuge, Josh. xxi. 20. The same probably as Rameth, or Ramoth, Josh. xix. 29.

JARAMOTH, Jarmuth, or Jerimoth, a city of Judah. Joshua killed the king of it, Josh. x. 5. St. Jerom places Jarmuth four miles from Eleutheropolis, near Esthaol; and speaking of Jarmuth, he says, that Jarmutha, the same probably as Jarmuth and Jerimoth, is ten miles from Eleutheropolis, in the way to Jerusalem. There must be a mistake in one of these passages.

JARED, יָרֵד, he that descends: otherwise, he that rules or commands; from יָרָד rud. Son of Mehalaleel, and father of Enoch, at the age of 162 years; he died aged 962. Gen. v. 18, 19.

JARHA, יָרְחָא, 'Iarha, moon, or month; from יָרַח jerach: otherwise to blow; from יָרַח rich.

JARHAH, an Egyptian, Sheshan's slave. His master gave him his daughter Ahlai in marriage, by whom he had Attai. 1 Chron. ii. 34, 35.

JARIB, יָרִיב, he that multiplies; from נָבַב nabab:

nabab: otherwise, he that fights, disputes, or pleads: from רב rub. Son of Simeon. 1 Chron. iv. 24. Another of the same name, Ezra viii. 16. comp. 1 Macc. xiv. 29.

[JAREB, revenger. Comp. JERUB-BAAI.

JAREB, king of Assyria, by whom the ten tribes were carried captive, Hos. v. 13. x. 6. Is this name that of a king, or of an idol?—1. We know that the kings who carried away Israel were named Tiglath-pileser, and Salmaneser; was Jareb a second name to either of these?—2. It was common among the heathen to call their idols kings: vide FRAGMENT, No. CCLXXXII, in which case the name would signify the avenging king, or king of punishment, the Jupiter horkios of the Greeks, vide FRAGMENT No. CCLXXVII. ad fin.]

JAROAII, ירוח 'Iapsh, which breathes; from רוח ruach: otherwise, moon, or month; from ירח jarach; otherwise, to smell; from ריח rich. Son of Gilead. 1 Chron. v. 14.

JASHEN, ישן, old, ancient, or that sleeps.

JASHEN, 2 Sam. xxiii. 32. 1 Chron. xi. 34. called Hashem, the Gizonite: the father of some valiant men in the reign of David.

[JASHER, Book of, vide BIBLE.]

JASHOBEAM, ישבוע, the people that sits, or he that sits with the people; from ישב jashab, to sit: or the conversion, the return of the people; from שוב shub, to be converted, to return: otherwise, breathing or respiration of the people; from נשם nashab: otherwise, captivity of the people; from שבה shabah, to be captive, and עַם am, the people.

I. JASHOBEAM, son of Zabdiel; he commanded twenty four thousand men, who did duty in king David's court in the month Nisan. Some believe him to be Jashobeam son of Hachmoni. Hachmoni signifies the wise; Zabdiel perhaps was his true name, and Hachmoni a surname. 2 Sam. xxiii. 8.

II. JASHOBEAM, son of Hachmoni, captain over thirty men in David's army. He lifted up his spear against 300 men, whom he killed. He was one of the three heroes, who broke through the enemies' camp to procure water for David from the spring of Bethlehem. 1 Chron. xi. 16, 17.

The Hebrew of the second book of Samuel, which speaks of Jashobeam, runs literally thus: "He who sate in the throne of wisdom, the head of the three, Adino of Ezri, who lifted up his spear against eight hundred men, whom he slew." But the text of Chronicles, which is the parallel passage, imports as follows: "Jashobeam a Hachmonite, chief of the thirty, he lifted up his spear against three hundred, whom he slew at one time." The difference between the texts might persuade one, that these persons are different; but how are these matters to be reconciled? Jashobeam is the son of Hachmoni, he kills three hundred men; he is chief of the thirty. Adino, on the contrary, is head of the three, and kills eight hundred men. Notwithstanding, when we examine the thing nearly, it appears, that the difference proceeds only from some letters which are read differently in these texts. I would therefore correct the text in the second book of Samuel thus: "Jashobeam son of Hachmoni, head of the thirty, he lifted up the wood of his spear against three hundred men whom he slew." The Septuagint read, Jeshbaal son of Techemani, was head of the three. This is Adino the Eznite, who drew his sword against eight hundred. In the Roman edition, Jebothe the Canaanite, head of the three, &c. We cannot see from whence they took Adino the Eznite, which is entirely superfluous in this place.

[This has been accounted for, by supposing that Jashobeam, the Hachmonite, died during David's life, and that Adino, the Eznite, was appointed in his place. Comp. 2 Sam. xxiii. which literally rendered, imports, "these are the names of the mighty men whom David had—he who sits in the seat of the Tachmonite [i. e. of Jashobeam the Hachmonite] who was chief among the captains, he is Adino, the Eznite;"—who perhaps, is the Adino, son of Shiza (1 Chr. xi. 42) chief of the Reubenites, who had thirty under him. Shiza might be the name of his family; Eznite that of his country.]

III. JASHOBEAM, the Korhite, a brave man who joined David. 1 Chron. xii. 6.

JASHUB, ישב he that remains, or sits down; from ישב jashab: otherwise, he that shall return; from שוב shub, to come back, to return.

I. JASHUB, of Issachar, chief of a family. Numb. xxvi. 24.

II. JASHUB, or Shear-Jashub, son of Isaiah. Isai. vii. 3. Shear Jashub signifies the remainder shall return. The prophet by giving his son this name, intended to shew, that the Jews, who should be carried to Babylon, would return.

JASHUBI-LEHEM, or BETHLEHEM. 1 Chron. iv. 22. [Bread, i. e. fertility, shall return.]

JASON, יאסון, he that cures; or that gives medicines; from the Greek ἰατρικὴ, health, or cure. The same as Jesus, Saviour.

I. JASON son of Eleazar, sent to Rome by Judas Maccabæus, to renew the alliance with the Romans.—A. M. 3842, ante A. D. 162. 1 Macc. viii. 17.

II. JASON, a Jew, native of Cyrene, who wrote in five books the history of the persecutions, which the Jews suffered under Antiochus Epiphanes and Eupator. These five books were abridged by a Jew, whose name we are not acquainted quainted with. His work has been preserved, and is the second book of the Maccabees; but the original of Jason is lost. Both were written in Greek. It is believed, that the abbreviator of Jason has added something at the end of the second book of Maccabees. We do not know exactly the age either of Jason or of his abbreviator.

III. JASON, high-priest of the Jews, and brother to Onias III. a man of unbounded ambition, who scrupled not to divest his brother of the high-priesthood, in order to seize that dignity himself, sacrilegiously purchasing it of Antiochus Epiphanes, a most impious prince, and the greatest enemy to the Jews. The history of Jason is differently related by the second book of Maccabees and Josephus (Antiq. lib. xii. cap. 4. ad finem.) the latter says, that at the death of Onias III. Jason his brother took possession of the high-priesthood, excluding his nephew Onias IV. son of Onias III. the lawful heir. Jason obtained a confirmation of his priesthood, thus usurped, from Antiochus Epiphanes, by offering him a large sum of money. But Antiochus growing dissatisfied with Jason, dispossessed him, and put his brother Menelaus in his place, who bought the high-priesthood at a higher price. Thus the three brothers, Onias III. Jason and Menelaus successively possessed this great dignity, while Onias IV. to whom of right it belonged was obliged to flee into Egypt, where he built the temple Onion.

In 2 Macc. iv. 18. this matter is related differently. We read there that Jason, growing uneasy to see the priesthood too long enjoyed by his brother Onias III. offered a large sum of money to Antiochus Epiphanes, to purchase this dignity; which he obtained and held, A. M. 3830 to 3832. Jason afterwards sent to Antiochus one Menelaus, of the tribe of Benjamin, brother to Simon, governor of the temple; this Menelaus prevailed so effectually with Antiochus Epiphanes, by money, that he procured the high-priesthood for himself; and Jason was divested of it. Jason was a man of no religion, but did all he could to abolish the worship of God in Jerusalem, and to prevail with the very priests to adopt the religion of the Greeks. He is to be considered as the first cause of all the misfortunes of the Jews under Antiochus Epiphanes. During Menelaus's usurpation Jason concealed himself in the country of the Ammonites, 2 Macc. iv. 26. but, some time after, Epiphanes going into Egypt, and a report spreading that he was dead, Jason, with a thousand men, entered Jerusalem, notwithstanding the resistance of the citizens. Menelaus fled into the citadel, and Jason began to treat the inhabitants as those of a place taken by storm. But the rumour of the king's death being contradicted, he fled a second time into the country of the Ammonites. At length Aretas king of the Arabians, endeavouring to seize him, he fled into Egypt, and not believing himself secure there, he sought refuge at Lacedemon, a city in alliance with the Jews, to whom the Lacedemonians said they were related. There he died, and his body remained without burial, none in the place having any compassion for him, or paying him the last offices, which are not refused even to strangers.

IV. JASON, mentioned Romans xvi. 21. was St. Paul's host at Thessalonica. Jason hazarded his life to preserve him during a sedition in that city, Acts xvii. 7. He was related to St. Paul:—Jason and Sosipater my kinsmen. The Greeks make him bishop of Tarsus in Cilicia, and give him the title of apostle. They honour him April 28 or 29.

JASPER, in Latin, in Greek Jaspis, in Hebrew, Jaspe, is commonly taken for a precious stone; but we have already observed, that the Hebrews themselves do not know the true signification of the names of precious stones. They who please may consult Lewis de Dieu on Exodus xxviii.

JATHNIEL, יתניאל, gift, or recompence of God; from יתן thanah, and אל el, God. Son of Meshelemiah, 1 Chron. xxvi. 2.

JATTIR, יתיר, יתר, which excels, or which remains; from יתר jathar: otherwise, that examines and searches; from יתר thur: otherwise, a cord, or line.

JATTIR, a city of Dan, Josh. xv. 48 afterwards given to the Levites of Kohath's family, Josh. xxi. 14. Eusebius says, that Jattir, or Jether, or Jethira, is situated in the district of Daroma toward the city of Malatha twenty miles from Eleutheropolis. Probably it is Ether or Athar.

JAVAN, יָוָן, Iowân, he that deceives or makes sorrowful; from יָאָן aven; otherwise, clay, dirt, from יָבֵן javen, or javan; [or rather Iowan, for so the LXX. and Josephus write it: the Hindoos pronounce it Yowana. A dove?

Simon supposes it means soft, tender. It evidently describes the Grecians, Isaiah, lxvi. 19. Mason, in Hist. Crit. Reip. Lit. tom. iv. p. 56. thinks it means destrable, wished for, but this derivation he fetches from as far east as China!! Vide GREEKS.]

JAVAN, fourth son of Japheth, father of the Ionians, or Greeks, as well those settled in Greece, as those in the islands, and on the continent of Asia Minor, properly called Ionians. But anciently, the people of Macedonia, Attica, Bœotia, and Achaia, were called likewise Ionians. Homer, in his hymn to Apollo, calls the inhabitants inhabitants of Delos, Ionians: and the Scholiast on Aristophanes says, that the barbarians call all Greeks, Ionians. Javan was father of Elishah, Tarshish, Kittim, and Dodanim.

[JAVELIN, a kind of long dart, or thin spear, thrown as a missile weapon at the enemy.]

JAZER, זָעַר, assistance, or he that helps; from זָרַע azar, to help. Num. xxxii. 35.

JAZER, a city beyond Jordan, given to Gad, and afterwards to the Levites, Josh. xxi. 39. xiii. 25. It lay at the foot of the mountains of Gilead, near the brook Jazar, which falls into the Jordan.

JAZIZ, זִז, brightness; from זָרַז ziz; according to the Syriac, departure, retreat. A Hagarite, who had the principal care of David's flocks. 1 Chron. xxvii. 31.

IBEX, a wild goat, which is very swift, and runs up steep rocks. See 1 Sam. xxiv. 2. The Hebrew word Joale, occurs also, Job xxxix. 1. Psalm ciii. 18. Prov. v. 12. Bochart from Arabian authors, thus describes this creature; it is a kind of wild goat that lives on steep rocks; it has large horns, which bend backwards as far as its buttocks, so that it leaps from the highest precipices, and falls upon its back without hurting itself, because the horns break the blow. See the PLATES, and NATURAL HISTORY.

IBHAR, יְבָרַח or Jebahar, election, or he that is chosen; from בָּרַח bachar to chuse. Son of David. 1 Sam. v. 15.

IBIS, יְבִישָׁי, an unclean bird, common in Egypt, Levit. xi. 17. Strabo, lib. xxii. says it is like a stork; that some are black, and others white. The Egyptians worshipped these birds, because they devour the serpents, which otherwise would over-run the country. The Hebrew Janeschoph, translated Ibis, may come from Nescheph, darkness; for which reason Junius and Bochart, instead of the Ibis, understand an owl. The Syriac renders it swan, and the Arabic, Nisus, a sea-eagle.

It is agreed, that the Ibis ranks among the storks. The white Ibis is a real stork; the black, which is properly the Ibis, is peculiar to Egypt; and some say that it cannot live elsewhere. At a distance it seems to be all black, but closely examined the feathers are found to be mixed with green and blue, blended with purple. The belly and sides under the wings are white; its beak is large, about eighteen inches long, strong, and of a scarlet colour; as are its legs and feet. Its neck is a foot or fourteen inches long, its body and breast are as large as those of a goose. When its head is under its wings, it has the form of a heart. [Vide PLATE, ALTARS, to FRAGMENT No. CXXVIII. where several of these birds are given from ancient Egyptian paintings.]

The white Ibis inhabits all parts of Egypt, but the black is met with only about Damietta. It was a capital crime to kill one, though inadvertently. Cambyzes king of Persia acquainted with this superstition, placed some of these birds before his army, while he besieged Damietta. The Egyptians not daring to shoot against them, nor consequently against the enemy, suffered the town to be taken, which was the key of Egypt. Polyen, lib. vii. Stratagem. The Ibis not only eats the flying serpents, or Saraphs, but continues to kill them after it is sated. It eats likewise the eggs of serpents, and carries them to its young, which are very greedy of them. After the death of an Ibis, the Egyptians embalmed it, and made a kind of funeral for it. [Several mummies of the Ibis have been found in Egyptian sepulchres, apparently sacred.]

It is very remarkable of this bird, that although it is a water-fowl, and lives principally about the Nile, yet it never enters the water, nor does it swim. The use of gylsters is said to have been learned from the Ibis. It generally builds its nest upon palm-trees to avoid the cats. The ancients asserted, that it conceived at its beak, and even laid its eggs that way, but these are fables. Solin. cap. 34. Aldrovandus relates, that the flesh of the Ibis is red like a salmon's, that it is sweet, its skin very hard, and smells like wild fowl. See the NATURAL HISTORY.

IBLEAM, יְבֵלֵאם, Ἰαβλαὰμ, old age of the people; from בָּלָה balah, to grow old, to decay; otherwise, production of the people; from יְבֹל jebul, and עַם ham, the people; otherwise, which swallows them up; from בָּלַע balah, and the pronoun אֵם am, them; [hatred of the people, or flowing of the people; or, buddings of the people, or swallowings of them. Josh. xvii. 11.]

Simon supposes that this name imports an absorption of the people. i. e. by victory.]

IBLEAM, a town in the half tribe of Manasseh, on this side Jordan. Probably the Bileam of 1 Chron. vi. 70. given to the Levites of Kohath's family. Its situation is not known.

IBNEIAH, יְבִנְיָה, Ἰεγνιας, building of God; from בָּנָה banah; or filiation of God; from בֶּן ben, a son; otherwise, understanding of God; from בִּינָה binah, and אֵל el, God. Son of Jeroham, 1 Chron. ix. 8.

IBRI, עֲבֵרִי, Ἰβρι. See HEBER.

IBRI, son of Merari, a Levite. 1 Chr. xxiv. 27.

IBZAM (JIBSAM, Eng. Tr.) יִבְשָׁן, Ἰβσάν, he that perfumes; from בִּשְׁם beshem: or, their drought; from יָבֵשׁ jabesh, to be dry; or, their shame; from בֹּשׁ bosh, to blush with shame, and אֵם am, their. Son of Tola, 1 Chron. vii. 2.

IBZAN, אֲבִיזָן, father of the buckler, or the buckler duckler of the father; from אב father, and צזן a buckler.

IBZAN, of Judah, eighth judge of Israel, was of Bethshan, or Scythopolis. He succeeded Jephthah A. M. 2823. He died at Bethlehem, after seven years government. Judg. xii. 10.

ICHABOD, אִכְבֹּד, Ἰχάβωθ, where is the glory? from אֵיךְ etc, where: or Wo to the glory; from אֵי, or אֵי oi, misfortune, or alas! and כְּבֹד cabod, glory. Son of Phineas, and grandson of Eli, the high priest. His mother was delivered of him at the moment when she heard the fatal news of the ark's being taken, 1 Sam. iv. 19.

ICONIUN, Ἰκόνιον, coming, from ἵκω, I come.

ICONIUM, at present Cogni, the capital of Lycaonia in Asia Minor. St. Paul coming to Iconium A. D. 45, converted many Jews and Gentiles, Acts xiii. 51. xiv. 1, &c. but some unbelieving Jews excited a persecution against him and Barnabas.—St. Paul undertook a second journey to Iconium, A. D. 51.

IDALAH, יְדֹאלָה hand of the oath, or of the curse; from יד jad, a hand, and אלה alah, to swear: according to the Syriac and Hebrew the hand of God. A city of Zebulun, Josh. xix. 15. Some call it Jetala; Heb. Jadala; LXX. Nabal; Syriac, Aral.

IDBASH, יִדְבַּשׁ, honey, or sweet; from דָּבַשׁ debash: or hand of confusion: from יד jad, a hand, and בָּשׁוּשׁ bosh, shame.

IDDO, אִדּוֹ. Ἀδδαῖ, his vapour, his death, or his cloud; from אֵד ed, vapour, and the pronoun וָאוּ vau, his.

I. IDDO, chief of the Nethinim, in captivity in Casiphia, Ezra viii. 17. Ezra sent to them, inviting them to return to Jerusalem.

IDDO, יָדוֹ, his hand, his power, or his praise; from יד jad, a hand, or יָדָה jadah, praise, and וָאוּ o, his.

II. IDDO, chief of the half-tribe of Manasseh beyond Jordan, 1 Chron. xxvii. 21.

IDDO, עֵדוֹ, his witness, his ornament.

III. IDDO, son of Levi, 1 Chron. vi. 21.

IV. IDDO, father of Benachiah, and grandfather to the prophet Zechariah. Zech. i. 1. In Ezra v. 1. vi. 14. Zechariah is called son of Iddo.

V. IDDO, a prophet of Judah, who wrote the history of the kings Rehoboam and Abijah. It seems by 2 Chron. xiii. 22. that he had entitled his work Midrasch or Enquiries. Probably he likewise wrote prophecies against Jeroboam, son of Nebat, 2 Chron. x. 2. Josephus and others are of opinion, that Iddo was sent to Jeroboam, at Bethel, and that it was he who was killed by a lion, 1 Kings xiii. Joseph. Antiq. lib. viii. cap. 3.

VI. IDDO, son of Ahinadab, governor of Mahanaim. 1 Kings iv. 14. The English version reads, Ahinadab son of Iddo had Mahanaim; and herein it agrees with the Hebrew and LXX.

IDOL. The Greek Εἰδωλον, Eidolon, signifies in general a representation, a figure. It is always taken in Scripture in an ill sense, for representations of heathen deities, whether men, stars, or animals; whether figures in relievo, imbossed, or painting, of what matter or nature soever. God forbids all sorts of idols, or figures and representations of creatures, formed or set up with intention of paying superstitious worship to them. "Thou shalt not make to thyself any graven image, nor the likeness of any thing in the heavens above, or in the earth beneath, or in the waters under the earth; thou shalt not bow down to them nor worship them." Exod. xx. 3, 4.

The heathen had idols of all sorts, and of all kinds of materials, gold, silver, brass, stone, wood, potter's earth, &c. Stars, spirits, men, animals, rivers, plants, and elements were the subjects of them. Some nations worshipped a rough stone. The Arabians, says Maximus Tyrius, adored a great square stone. Before Mahomet they had in great veneration a certain black stone, which at this day is fastened in the wall of the temple at Mecca, and is kissed very devoutly by the Mahometans. The Mahometans speak of an idol called Soura, which they say was worshipped in the time of Noah, before the Deluge. D'Herbelot, Bibl. Orient. page 827. They adored likewise spears or lances, great beams of timber, fire, animals, the sun, moon, stars, earth, flowers, plants, trees, and fountains. Barbarous people, such as the ancient Gauls, and Germans, had scarcely any other gods.

It is well known what the ancient idols of the Egyptians were; because many are come down to us. They were mostly ill-fashioned figures of animals; or symbolical figures compounded of man and some animal, as the head of a dog on the body of a man; the head of a cat on that of a woman; oxen, spar-hawks, ravens, serpents, insects, the very herbs of the gardens, in this country received divine honours. See MOLOCH, CHEROSH, BAAL-PEOR, DAGON, HIGH-PLACES, SAMARITANS: also, PLATES, EGYPT.

[IDOLS. We have reason to think, that many more idols are mentioned in Scripture than have been usually supposed by interpreters. The true nature of those which are mentioned, might employ a more considerable investigation than is convenient in this place.

A partial notion of the idols worshipped in many towns of the East may be gathered from the MEDALS of those towns respectively; but we know that many others were worshipped in these towns; and especially, in the great cities; and in the country villages also, to which

A complete list of idols in S.S. is a desideratum. Many appear to be Hindoo.]

IDOLATRY, superstitious worship paid to idols and false gods. This word is taken in general for all impious, superstitious, and sacrilegious worship. The learned are not agreed about the origin of idolatry. The book of Wisdom, xiii. 13, 14. xiv. 15. xv. 7, 8. proposes three causes of it: first, the love of a father, who having lost his son in an advanced age, to comfort himself, causes divine honours to be paid to him. Secondly, The beauty of works engraved. Thirdly, The skill of an artificer in potter's-earth, who consecrates a statue of his own making, as if it were a deity. They who believed that man was formed by chance, imagined, that by degrees he instituted a religion of which fear and superstition were the first causes:

Primus in orbe Deos fecit timor,

Man under the disturbance of mind, proceeding from his fears, forged imaginary deities, says Lucretius. de Rerum Natura, lib. v.

The most knowing in this matter are persuaded, that the first objects of idolatrous worship were the sun, moon, and stars. Their brightness, beauty, and usefulness, induced men to ascribe divine virtue to them, and afterwards to worship them. Others have believed, the most ancient idolatry respected angels. At first honour was shewn them, because of the excellency of their nature, and the assistance we receive from them: afterwards a sort of worship, but subordinate to that of God, was paid them. Lastly, they were adored as Gods. After this, some imagined that angels belonged to the stars, and planets, as rulers of them and their influences: and so the worship paid to them, was insensibly transferred to the sun, moon, and stars.

Vossius, who examined this matter with care, maintains, (Tract de Idolat, lib. i. cap. 1.) that men began first to depart from the worship due to God, by rendering divine honours to the two principles of good and evil. Mankind observing, that the world abounded with good and evil, yet unwilling to suppose that the supreme God, who is all goodness, should be the author of evil, invented two deities of equal power, to whom they allotted contradictory offices. The first principle, the author of good, created the world; the second principle, the author of evil, diffused evil throughout it. To the worship of these two principles succeeded that of spirits, particularly of demons: afterwards that of the souls of heroes, and illustrious persons.

If we enquire the true cause of idolatry, we must seek it in the depravity of man's heart, in his ignorance, vanity, pride, love of pleasure, his fondness of sensible things, his libertinism, his brutal passions; the irregular and excessive affection of lovers; the mistaken tenderness of a father for his child, or of a wife for her husband; extravagant respect of subjects for their prince, or of children for their parents; excessive gratitude for benefits and services received from certain persons; admiration of the great qualities of creatures, or of persons who had rendered themselves illustrious; one or many of these causes, joined with the indelible idea conceived by man of a Divinity, induced him to pay superstitious respect, worship, and adoration to what he loved, esteemed, or honoured to excess.

If we ask at what time this disorder began, some of the rabbins say, that the descendants of Cain had introduced it into the world before the flood. They believe Enos to have been the inventor of it; and in this sense they explain Gen. iv. 26. which, according to the Hebrew, may be thus interpreted, Then the name of the Lord was profaned by giving it to idols; but the old Greek interpreters, and St. Jerom understood it otherwise. The LXX. translate, "Enos placed his confidence in calling on the name of the Lord." Aquila, "Then people began to call on the name of the Lord." The Vulgate, "Enos began to call on the name of the Lord." The eastern people make no doubt, but that idolatry was common before the deluge, and it is but too probable, that the inundation of wickedness intimated in the expression, All flesh had corrupted its way, included impiety of worship, as well as the infamous irregularities of incontinence, and violence.

Josephus, Antiq. lib. i. and the generality of the fathers, seem to have been of opinion, that after the deluge, idolatry soon became the prevailing religion; for wherever we cast our eyes after the time of Abraham, we see only a false worship. Abraham's forefathers, and Abraham himself, were engaged in it: "Your fathers dwelt on the other side of the flood in old time, even Terah the father of Abraham, and the father of Nahor, and they served other gods. Now therefore fear the Lord and serve him in sincerity and in truth, and put away the gods which your fathers served on the other side of the flood, and in Egypt," Josh. xxiv. 2, 14.

Epiphanius believes that Serug, the grandfather of Terah, first introduced idolatry after the deluge. Others believe it was Nimrod, who instituted the worship of fire.

The Hebrews had no peculiar idolatry; they imitated the superstitions of others; but do not appear appear to have been inventors in this matter. When they were in Egypt, they worshipped Egyptian deities; in the Wilderness they worshipped those of the Canaanites, Egyptians, Ammonites, and Moabites; in Judæa those of the Phœnicians, Syrians, and other people around them. [But, not in Babylon; nor after the Babylonish captivity.]

Rachel in all probability had adored idols at her father Laban's, since she carried off his Teraphim, Gen. xxxi. 30. Jacob, after his return from Mesopotamia, required his people to reject the strange gods from among them, and the superstitious pendants worn by them in their ears, which he hid under the turpentine-tree near Sichem.

Jacob kept his family to the worship of God while he lived; but after his death part of his sons worshipped Egyptian deities: Put away the gods which your fathers served in Egypt, said Joshua to the Israelites. Amos, v. 25, 26, informs us, that during their sojourning in the wilderness, they carried with them the niches of their gods, the tabernacle of Moloch, and images of their idols: to which Stephen alludes Acts vii. 42. Vide FRAGMENT, No. CCXIII. Moses said to them, "cast ye away every man the abominations of his eyes, and defile not yourselves with the idols of Egypt."

Under the government of the judges they often fell into infidelity. Gideon, after he had been favoured by God with so particular a deliverance, made an Ephod, which ensnared the Israelites in unlawful worship, Judg. viii. 27. Micah's Teraphim are well known, and the worship of them continued in Israel till the dispersion of the people, Judg. xvii. 5. xviii. 30, 31. Lastly, "The children of Israel did evil in the sight of the Lord, and served Baalim. They forsook the Lord God of their fathers, and followed other gods: of the gods of the people that were round about them; and bowed themselves unto them: and they forsook the Lord and served Baal and Ashtaroth," Judg. ii. 11.

Under the government of Samuel, Saul, and David, the worship of God seems to have been pure in Israel. There was corruption and irregularity of manners, but little or no idolatry. [There certainly was open or concealed idolatry, in Saul's family; as appears from the names given to his sons—Ish-baal, or Ish-bosheth, &c.] Solomon, seduced by complaisance to his strange wives, caused temples to be erected in honour of their gods, and impiously himself offered incense to them. 1 Kings xi. 5, 6, 7. He adored Ash-taroth, goddess of the Phœnicians, Moloch, god of the Ammonites, and Chemosh, god of the Moabites.

Jeroboam the son of Nebat, who succeeded

Solomon in Israel, set up golden calves at Dan and Bethel, and made Israel to sin. Hereupon the people, no longer restrained by royal authority, worshipped not only these golden calves, but all the deities of the Phœnicians, Syrians, Ammonites, and Moabites.

Under the reign of Ahab this disorder reached its height; the impious Jezebel endeavoured to extinguish the worship of the Lord, by persecuting his prophets, (who as a barrier still retained some of the people in the true religion) till God, incensed at their idolatry, at last abandoned Israel to the kings of Assyria and Chaldæa, who transplanted them beyond the Euphrates.

Judah was almost equally corrupted. The descriptions given by the prophets of their irregularities and idolatries, their abominations and lasciviousness on the high-places, and in woods consecrated to idols, strike us with horror, and discover the corruption of the heart of man. Judah was led into captivity at several times. After their return from the Babylonish captivity we do not find the Jews any more reproached with idolatry. They expressed much zeal for the worship of God; and except some transgressors under Antiochus Epiphanes, 1 Macc. i. 12, &c. the people kept themselves clear from this sin.

[IDLE, IDLENESS. This word is capable of at least two senses; 1. of an inevitable vacation from employment, or want of being set to work from lack of opportunity; so we read, Matth. xx. 3, 6, "Why stand ye here all the day idle?—The answer is very sufficient; we are willing to work, but "no man hath hired us." 2. Of a criminal inattention to work, labour, duty, &c. when it ought to be discharged. Exod. v. 8. 17. Prov. xix. 15. and this idleness is a great evil; so we read 1 Tim. v. 13. "they learn to be idle, and not only idle but tattlers, and busy bodies," &c. N. B. The remedy for such idleness is, "let them not eat," 2 Thess. iii. 10.

This leads us to the true import of our Lord's words, Matth. xii 36. "men shall give account for every idle word:" meaning that emptiness which tends to injury, that inconsiderate discourse which is not only void of advantage, but is hurtful, pernicious. The Rabbins have a proverb, that "the spirit of God never resides in a light head, nor with idle words;" i. e. unseemly discourse banishes the Holy Spirit. They say also, "Against idle discourse a man must stop his ears," as they do at hearing of blasphemy. In short, vain words, lies, follies, are what is meant by idle words. The LXX. use this Greek word to translate the Hebrew word which signifies lying, Exod. v. 9. Hosea xii. 1. Micah i. 14. Hab. ii. 3. Zeph. iii. 13: and the Latins employ the word useless to the same purport. Velleius Paterculus, lib. ii. says, the assassination of Clodius was a useless example, exemplo inutili, facto salutari. Cicero and Livy call a pernicious citizen, Civem inutilem; to which we may add Horace :

Vel nos in mare proximum
Gemmas et lapides aurum et inutile
Summi materiam mali, Mittamus.

CARM. lib. iii. Ode 24.

In the sense of idle, as a relaxation from labour, the best of men have their idle times, and their idle words; in the sense of idle, as vain, pernicious, impious, the worst of men only, indulge idle discourse, and indolent, wasteful idleness. Comp. Tit. i. 12. 2 Pet. i. 8.]

IDOX, 'OX, or Ox, which bruises the grain; from דִּישׁ dish; otherwise, joyful, agreeable, Judith viii. 1. Judith's grandfather.

IDUMÆA, יְדוּמָא, red, human. Vide Edom.

IDUMÆA, or EDOM, a province of Arabia: derives its name from Edom, or Esau, who there settled in the mountains of Seir, in the land of the Horites, south-east of the Dead Sea. His descendants afterwards spread throughout Arabia Petræa, and south of Palestine, between the Dead Sea and the Mediterranean. During the Babylonish captivity, when Judæa was almost deserted, they seized the south of Judah, and advanced to Hebron; therefore when we speak of Idumæa, we must carefully distinguish the time. Under Moses and Joshua, and even under the kings of Judah, the Idumæans were confined to the east and south of the Dead Sea, in the land of Seir, toward the gulph of Elath. Afterwards Idumæa extended more to the south of Judah. The capital of East Edom, or Idumæa, was Bozra, situated towards Edrai; the capital of south Edom was Petra, or Jectael. We are not the only persons, nor the first, who have distinguished the land of Idumæa into east and south, with relation to Palestine. Strabo, Brocard, Bonfrere, Adricomius, Torrie, and others, have done the same.

IDUMÆANS, or Edomites, descendants of Edom or Esau, son of Isaac, and elder brother of Jacob. They had kings long before the Jews. They were first governed by dukes or princes; and afterwards by kings, Gen. xxxvi. 31. They continued independent till the time of David, who subdued them, in completion of Isaac's prophecy, that Jacob should rule Esau, Gen. xxvii. 29, 30. The Idumæans bore this subjection with great impatience, and at the end of Solomon's reign, Hadad the Edomite, who had been carried into Egypt during his childhood, returned into his own country, where he procured himself to be acknowledged king, 1 Kings xi. 22. But very probably, he reigned only in East Edom; for Edom south of Judæa continued subject to the kings of Judah till the reign of Jehoram son of Jehoshaphat, against whom it rebelled, 2 Chron. xxi. 8. Jehoram attacked Edom; but did not subdue it. Amaziah, king of Judah, took Petra, killed 1000 men, and compelled 10,000 more to leap from the rock, on which stood the city of Petra. 2 Chron. xxv. 11. But these conquests were not permanent.

Uzziah king of Judah took Elath on the Red Sea, 2 Kings xiv. 22. But Rezin king of Syria, retook it. Some think, that Esar-haddon king of Syria, ravaged this country, as hinted Isaiah xxi. 11, 12, 13, and xxxiv. 6. Holofernes subdued this, as well as other nations, round about Judæa. Judith iii. 14. When Nebuchadnezzar besieged Jerusalem, the Idumæans joined him, and encouraged him to raze the very foundations of that city. This cruelty did not long continue unpunished. Nebuchadnezzar, five years after the taking of Jerusalem, humbled all the states around Judæa, and particularly Idumæa. John Hircanus entirely conquered this people, and obliged them to receive circumcision and the law. They continued subject to the later kings of Judæa till the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans. They even came to assist that city when besieged, and entered it in order to defend it: they did not however continue there till it was taken, but returned into Idumæa loaded with booty.

What was the ancient religion of the Idumæans we cannot tell. It is credible, that in early ages they adored the true God, whose worship Esau had learned in his father Isaac's house. Job, whom we believe to have been an Idumæan, as well as some of his friends, also adored the true God. They had rejected circumcision, when John Hircanus conquered them. [Rather, their mode of circumcision was not allowed as true circumcision, by the Jewish zealots. Comp. Jer. ix. 25.] Josephus speaks of an Idumæan city called Kosé. Costobarus, of the most ancient and illustrious family of Idumæa, was descended from the ancient priests of the god Kosé. Epiphanius says, that the Arabians of Arabia Petræa and Idumæa worshipped Moses, out of regard to the prodigies which God wrought by his means: Chosé in Hebrew signifies a Seer or prophet; a quality which agrees perfectly with Moses. The Scripture neither reproaches the Idumæans with idolatry, nor mentions their idols. Prophane writers, who have noticed the religion of the Arabians, have, without doubt, confounded the Idumæans with them among whom they dwelt.

[The IDUMÆANS, says Strabo, lib. xvi. are Nabatheans: but being cast out for a sedition, they joined themselves to the Jews, and embraced their laws, JEALOUSY. Waters of JEALOUSY, which women were obliged to drink, who were suspected of adultery by their husbands. Vide Numb. v. 17, 18, &c. We see no example in the bible of any woman tried by the waters of jealousy. The way of divorce which was open, was shorter and more easy. It is frequently said in Scripture, that God is a jealous God. Idolatry is a kind of fornication and adultery in those who have the knowledge of God.

JEARIM, יְרִים woods, forests; from יָרַר jahar. Mount Jearim is mentioned, Josh. xv. 10, as a boundary of the inheritance of Judah. Mount Jearim may denote a woody mountain, or that on which the city of Balah, otherwise Kirjath-Jearim was situated.

JEBUS, יָבוּס, which treads under foot, or contemns; from בִּוֶּס bus, contempt, [or tumbling, rolling: or cradle, i. e. from its rocking.

Simon thinks that bus, treading, is suffering from a victorious enemy, yet, this name, Jebus, implies strength; and certainly Jebus was a strong city. The holy city, is said Rev. xi. 2. to be trod under foot by the Gentiles forty-two months. Is this any allusion to the name?]

JEBUS, son of Canaan, and father of the Jebusites, Josh. xv. 63. who dwelt in Jerusalem, and round about, in the mountains. This people was very warlike, and retained Jerusalem till David's time. 2 Sam. v. 6, &c.

JEBUS, otherwise Jerusalem. See JERUSALEM. Josh. xviii. 28. Jebus was founded by Jebus, or Jebusæus, son of Canaan, and father of the Jebusites. Judg. xix. 11.

JECAMIAH, יְקַמִּיָּה Ἰακεμία, resurrection, or confirmation of the Lord; from קָם kum, to raise up, to confirm, to support, and יָה jah, the Lord. Son of Jeconiah, 1 Chron. iii. 18.

JECOLIAH, יְכֹלִיָּה consummation of the Lord; from כָּלָה calah, to consume: otherwise, power of the Lord; from יָכֹל jacol, to have power, and יָה jah, the Lord. Mother of Amaziah, king of Judah, 2 Kings xv. 2.

JECONIAH, יְכֹנִיָּה Ἰεχωνίας, preparation of the Lord; from כָּן cun, to prepare: otherwise, steadfastness; from the same, and יָה jah, the Lord. Son of Jehoiakim, 1 Chron. iii. 16.

JEDIAIAH, יְדִיעָיָה Ἰεδιας, science, or knowledge of the Lord; from יָדַע jadah, to know, and יָה jah, the Lord. 1 Chr. ix. 10.

JEDIAIAH, יְדִיָּה Ἰεδιας, hand, or praise of the Lord; from יָד jad, a hand, or יָדָה jadah, praise, and יָה jah, the Lord.

1. JEDIAIAH, son of Harumaph, of the family of the priests, Neb. iii. 10.

II. JEDIAIAH, a priest, returned from Babylon with 793 of his brethren, Ezra ii. 36.

III. JEDIAIAH, signed the covenant, Ezra x. 43.

IV. JEDIAIAH, head of the second class of priests, 1 Chron. xxiv. 7.

JEDIAEL, יְדִיָּאֵל Ἰεδιαῖλ, God is my knowledge, or the knowledge of God; from יָדָה jadah, knowledge, and אֵל el, the Lord.

JEDIAEL, a brave man in David's army, who abandoned Saul's party. 1 Chron. xi. 45. xii. 20. He came to David at Ziklag, and always served him faithfully. Jediael was of Manasseh.

JEDIAH, the Meronothite, had the care of David's flocks, 1 Chron. xxvii. 30.

JEDIDAH, יְדִידָה Ἰεδιδα, well-beloved or amiable; from יָדָה jadad, or יָדִיד jedid; otherwise, his hands; from יָד jad, a hand, and the pronoun הָ ah, his. Daughter of Adaiab, of Boscath, mother to king Josiah, 2 Kings xxii. 1.

JEDUTHUN, יְדֻתָּן his law, from דָּת dath and אָן an, his: or, who gives praise; from יָדָה jadah, to praise, and נָתַן nathan, to give.

JEDUTHIUN, a Levite of Merari's family: one of the four great masters of music belonging to the temple. He is the same as Ethan. Some of the psalms are said to have been composed by him, as Psalm lxxxix. Entitled, of Ethan the Ezrahite; also xxviii. lxii. lxxvii. under the name of Jeduthun. Some believe, that David having composed these psalms, gave them to Jeduthun and his company to sing; and therefore they go by his name. But certain psalms with the name of Jeduthun, seem to have been composed during the captivity, or after it; consequently the name of Jeduthun prefixed to them, can imply only that some of his descendants, or Jeduthun's class, composed [or sung] them, long after the death of the famous Jeduthun, their ancestor.

JEEZER, יְעִזֶר Ἰεζερ, island of assistance; from אֵי ai, an island, and עָזַר hazar to help: otherwise, isle of entrance, or of the court; from אָזַר hazarah: otherwise, to the help, or to the court; from אָזַר hazar, misfortune. This name is a corruption from אֲבִיעֶזֶר Abiezer, the help of my father. Son of Gilead, chief of a family, Numb. xxvi. 30.

[JEGAR-SAHADUTHA, the heap of witness.

This name was given by Laban to a heap, or circle of stones, (vide PLATES: GILGAL; and FRAGMENT, No. CXLVI.) which was erected by him and Jacob, in witness of an agreement made between them, Gen. xxxi. 47, &c. This term is Chaldee, and it is usually said, that it proves the Chaldee language to be already different from the Hebrew, or why should Laban vary vary the appellation? it might be so; but, we should remember that Jacob gave two names to this place "Galeel, and Mizpah;" might not Laban do the same? varying the term, as Mizpah differs from Galeed: for it does not appear that when speaking afterwards Laban uses the Chaldee words, Jegar sahadutha; but the Hebrew words which Jacob used, "this (gal) heap be witness, and this (mizpah) pillar be witness." So that in these instances he certainly retained his Hebrew.]

JEHALELEEL, יְהִלֵּל, Ἰαλοληλ, or Jaleleel, according to the Vulgate, who praises God; from הִלֵּל hillel, to praise: otherwise, brightness, or light of God; from hillel, and אֵל el, God. Son of Caleb, 1 Chron. iv. 16. 2 Chr. xxix. 12.

JEHAZIEL, יְהִיזִיאל, he that sees God; or vision of God; from חָזַק chazak, to see, and אֵל el, God. Son of Hebron, 1 Chron. xii. 4.

JEDEIAH, יְדֵיָהוּ, Ἰδαία, one only Lord; from יָדָה jachad: otherwise, the joy of the Lord; from חֵדָה chadah, joy: otherwise, the point of the Lord; from חָדָד chadad, a point, and יָה jah, the Lord; or, according to the Hebrew and Syriac, the renewing of the Lord. A Levite, son of Shabael, 1 Chron. xxiv. 20.

JEHEZEKEL, one of the twenty-four families of priests; the twentieth in rank appointed for the temple service. 1 Chron. xxiv. 16.

JEHIAH, יְהִיָּה, Ἰακία, the Lord lives; from חָיָה chajah, to live; and יָה jah, the Lord. A Levite who assisted in carrying the ark when David removed it from the house of Obed-edom, 1 Chron. xv. 24.

JEHIED, יְהִיֵּד, Ὀῦδ, or Jun, he that praises. A city of Dan, Josh. xix. 45.

JEHIEL, יְהִיֵּל, God has taken, or hunted him away; from יָחַל jahak: otherwise, God is my heap; from יָה hi, a heap, and אֵל el, God. A Scribe, 2 Chron. xxvi. 11.

JEHIEL, יְהִיֵּל, God lives; may God live; from חָיָה chajah, and אֵל el, God. 1 Chr. xv. 18.

IEHOADAH, יְהוֹדָה, Ἰοδὰ, assembly of the Lord; from עָדָה edah, assembly: otherwise, testimony; from הָדָה had: otherwise, spoil, or prey; from הָדָה had: otherwise, ornament, or passage; from חֲדָה hadah, and יָה jah, the Lord. Son of Ahaz, 1 Chron. viii. 36.

IEHOADAN, יְהוֹדָן, delights of the Lord; from הָדָן hadan, pleasure, and יָה jah, the Lord: or the time of the Lord, according to the Hebrew and Syriac. Mother of Amariah, 2 Kings xiv. 2.

JEHOAHAZ, יְהוֹאָחָז, prize, or possession of the Lord; from חָזַק achaz, possession, and יָה jah, the Lord: or the Lord that sees; from חָזַק chazak, to see. Son of Josiah, 2 Kings xxxiii. 34.

JEHOAHAZ, יְהוֹאָחָז, he that takes, or possesses, or sees; from חָזַק achaz, to possess, or חָזַק chazak, to see. Father of Joash, 2 Chr. xxxiv. 8.

I. JEHOAHAZ, son of Jehu, king of Israel, succeeded his father A. M. 3140, ante A. D. 856. He reigned seventeen years, 2 Kings xiii. He did evil in the sight of the Lord, like Jeroboam son of Nebat, wherefore the anger of the Lord delivered Israel during all his reign to Hazael king of Syria, and Benhadad son of Hazael. Jehoahaz, overwhelmed with so many misfortunes, prostrated himself before the Lord; and the Lord heard him, and sent him a saviour in Joash his son, who re-established the affairs of Israel, and secured his people from the kings of Syria. Of all his soldiers Jehoahaz had only 50 horsemen left, 10 chariots, and 10,000 foot; for the king of Syria had defeated them, and made them like the dust of the threshing-floor. Notwithstanding, neither punishment nor mercy was sufficient to prevail with the Israelites to forsake their evil ways. Joash the successor of Jehoahaz was more fortunate than his father, but not more pious.

II. JEHOAHAZ, otherwise Shallum son of Josiah king of Judah. Jer. xxii. 11. Josiah dying of his wounds at Megiddo, Jehoahaz succeeded him, 2 Kings xxiii. 30, 31, 32. though he was not Josiah's eldest son. He was twenty-three years old when he began to reign, and he reigned about three months, A. M. 3395, ante A. D. 609.

Necho king of Egypt, returning from his expedition against Carchemish was provoked that the people of Judah had placed this prince on the throne without his participation; he sent for him to Riblah in Syria, divested him of the kingdom, loaded him with chains, and sent him into Egypt, where he died. Jer. xxii. 11, 12. Jehoaikim or Eliakim his brother, was made king in his room. Ezekiel, xix. 2, 3, intimates that Jehoahaz gave Necho battle, and lost it. "What is thy mother? a lioness: she lay down among lions, she nourished her whelps among young lions. And she brought up one of her whelps: it became a young lion, and it learned to catch the prey, it devoured men. The nations also heard of him, he was taken in their pit, and they brought him with chains into the land of Egypt." Jehoahaz is visibly denoted by this young lion. The rabbins believe, that he raised an army, and marched even into Egypt, to revenge the death of his father Josiah.

There is a considerable difficulty in the chronology of this prince's reign. In 2 Kings xxiii. 31. we read, "That he was twenty-three years old when he began to reign, and he reigned three months in Jerusalem." His brother Jehoiakim succeeded him, being twenty-five. 2 Kings xxiii.

xxiii. 36. The generality of commentators conclude from hence, that the people placed Jehoahaz on the throne without following the natural order of succession, he not being the eldest son of Josiah. The reason of this preference is not known, but it seems unquestionable. Others assert, that Jehoahaz, otherwise Shallum, was Josiah's eldest son; and allege, that Jehoahaz was indeed carried to Riblah three months after his being made king of Judah, but that the sacred writer did not acknowledge the throne of Judah to be vacant till after his death, which was two or three years after his deposition; and that then Jehoiakim his younger brother had attained the age of twenty-five; during the imprisonment of Jehoahaz, his brother Jehoiakim being considered as his deputy.

Others place an interregnum of nine months between the two kings Jehoahaz and Jehoiakim, and suppose farther, that the years of Jehoahaz are full, but the years of Jehoiakim are begun only: this expedient completes the two years which Scripture gives Jehoiakim over his elder brother Jehoahaz. But without fatiguing ourselves in forming dubious systems of chronology, it were better to confess, that Jehoahaz was younger than Jehoiakim, and that the people without regard to age, placed the younger son of Josiah on his throne, for reasons which Scripture has not thought proper to record. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. II. XLV.

JEHOASAH, יהואש the fire of the Lord; from אש ah, fire: otherwise, victim of the Lord; from אשה ishe, victim, and יה jah, the Lord. Son of Ahaziah, 2 Kings xi. 21.

JEHOIACHIN, יהויכין ἰωακίμ, preparation, or strength of the Lord; from כן cun, to prepare, and יה jah, the Lord.

JEHOIACHIN, son of Jehoiakim king of Judah, and grandson of Josiah, reigned but three months over Judah. 2 Kings xxiv. 8. 2 Chron. xxxvi. 9. Some believe that he was born about the time of the first Babylonish captivity, A. M. 3398, when Jehoiakim or Eliakim his father was carried to Babylon. Jehoiakim returned from Babylon, and reigned till A. M. 3405, when he was killed by the Chaldeans in the eleventh year of his reign. Jehoiachin, otherwise Joachim or Coniah succeeded him, and reigned alone three months and ten days; but he reigned ten years in conjunction with his father. By this distinction, 2 Kings xxiv. 8. is reconciled with 2 Chron. xxxvi. 9. In the second book of Kings it is said he was eighteen years of age when he began to reign; whereas in the Chronicles it is said he was but eight; i. e. he was but eight years old when he began to reign with his father, but he was eighteen when he began to reign alone.

The Kings and Chronicles intimate, that the people set up Jehoiachin, or that they acknowledged him as king in his father's room. But Josephus, Antiq. lib. x. cap. 9. says, Nebuchadnezzar gave him the kingdom; and some months after, fearing he might revolt, to avenge the death of his father Jehoiakim, he repented, and sent an army against him, which besieged him in Jerusalem. But Jehoiachin, who was good and just, would not expose the town on his account: he sent his mother and his nearest relations as hostages to Nebuchadnezzar's generals, having first received a promise and an oath from them, that they would not injure the town or the hostages; but they did not keep their word, and before the year's end, Nebuchadnezzar ordered his generals to send Jehoiachin to Babylon, with his mother, his friends, and all the youth and trading part of the city. King Jehoiachin, his mother Nehushta, and his principal counsellors, (all of whom Nebuchadnezzar imprisoned) were carried to Babylon, with 10,832 persons.

The book of Kings is shorter, and differs from Josephus. It says, that the king of Babylon first sent his generals and his army to open the siege of Jerusalem, and afterwards was himself present at it: that king Jehoiachin went out of the city with his mother, his princes, servants, and officers, and surrendered to Nebuchadnezzar; who took away the riches, and all the best inhabitants of Jerusalem, to the number of 10,000, leaving only the poor; taking the king, the queen, &c. 7000 men of war, 1000 good artificers, and all that were capable of bearing arms. Comp. FRAGMENTS, No. CCCXXVII.

Whether in the 10,000 the subsequent 8000 are to be comprehended, we cannot tell. It is credible, that Nebuchadnezzar's view in transporting to Babylon, omnem artificem et clusorem, all the good workmen in iron, gold, silver, wood, &c. was to fill the city of Babylon, which he had embellished and enlarged; this likewise was his aim in bringing whole nations from their own countries to Babylon, or Babylonia, which he intended to make the most beautiful and flourishing country in the world.

Jeremiah, xxii. 24, mentions Jehoiachin as a very bad prince, whose sins had incurred the indignation of God. "As I live, saith the Lord, though Coniah, the son of Jehoiakim, were the signet upon my right hand, yet would I pluck thee thence, &c. Thus saith the Lord, Write ye this man childless, a man that shall not prosper in his days: for no man of his seed shall prosper, sitting upon the throne of David, and ruling any more in Judah." All this was executed; Jehoiachin succeeded in none of his designs. He was taken and carried to Babylon, where where he died. But it is believed that he repented, and that God treated him with mercy; for Evilmerodach, Nebuchadnezzar's successor, used him honourably, took him out of prison, spoke kindly to him, and placed his throne above the throne of other princes, at his court. 2 Kings xxv. 27. Jer. lii. 31.

The words, Write this man childless, cannot be taken literally, since we know that Jehoiachin was the father of Salathiel, and other children, enumerated 1 Chron. iii. 17, 18. and Matt. i. 12. But the Hebrew word translated childless is taken likewise for one who has lost his children, who has no succession, or heir. In this sense, Jehoiachin son of a king, and himself a king, was as a man without issue, since no son succeeded him in his kingdom; for neither Salathiel, who was born and died in captivity, nor Zerubbabel, who returned from Babylon, nor any of Jehoiachin's descendants sat on the throne of Judah. [and this is fairly implied in the words "no man of his seed, i. e. posterity, shall prosper:" so that it appears he might have seed; but no one who should enjoy the royal dignity. The passage should be rendered, "Write this man SUCCESSORLESS."] We do not know the year of his death.

[JEHOIADA, יְהוֹיָדָה, known of the Lord, or approved of the Lord. This appears to have been a common name among the Hebrews; as we have several instances of it.

JEHOIADA, father of Benaiah, 2 Sam. viii. 18.

II. JEHOIADA, son of Benaiah, grandson of the former, 1 Chron. xxvii. 34.

III. JEHOIADA, a priest, 2 Kings xi. 4.

IV. JEHOIADA, another priest, Jer. xxix. 26.

V. JEHOIADA, leader of the Aaronites, 1 Chron. xii. 27.

VI. JEHOIADA, by Josephus called Joadus, succeeded Azariah in the high-priesthood, and was succeeded by Zechariah. In 1 Chron. vi. 9. 10. Johanan and Azariah, seem to be confounded with Jehoiada and Zechariah. See ATHALIAH and JOASH. This high-priest, with his wife Jehoshabath, rescued Joash, son of Joram, king of Judah, then but one year old, from the murderous violence of Athaliah; and concealed the young prince in the temple. After seven years, he set him on the throne of David. 2 Kings xi. xii. and 2 Chron. xxiii. xxiv.

While Jehoiada lived, and Joash followed his advice, every thing succeeded happily. The high-priest formed a design of repairing the temple, and collected considerable sums in the cities of Judah: but the Levites did not acquit themselves of this commission, with due diligence till after the king was of age, and the prince and the high-priest united their authority in promoting this design. 2 Kings xii. and 2 Chron. xxiv. 5, 6. &c.

Jehoiada left a son Zechariah, who was high-priest after him, and was put to death by Joash, with an ingratitude, which has loaded his memory with eternal ignominy. 2 Chron. xxiv. 20, 21. See JOASH and ZECHARIAH. Jehoiada died aged one hundred and thirty, A. M. 3160, ante A. D. 834. He was buried in the sepulchre of the kings at Jerusalem; a distinction due to those services which he had rendered to the king, the state, and the royal family. 2 Chron. xxiv. 15.

JEHOIAKIM, יְהוֹיָכִים, the resurrection, or confirmation of the Lord; from תְּקוּמָה the-kumah, resurrection, and יְיָ jah, the Lord.

JEHOIAKIM, or ELIAKIM, brother and successor of Jehoahaz king of Judah, was made king by Necho king of Egypt at his return from an expedition against Carchemish, 2 Kings xxiii. 34, 35, 36. A. M. 3395, ante A. D. 609. Necho changed his name from Eliakim to Jehoiakim, and set a ransom on him of an hundred talents of silver, and ten talents of gold. To raise this money, Jehoiakim laid heavy taxes on his people. Jehoiakim was twenty-five years old when he began to reign, and he reigned eleven years at Jerusalem. He did evil in the sight of the Lord, and Jeremiah (xxii. 13, 14, &c.), reproaches him with building his house by unrighteousness, with oppressing unjustly his subjects, with keeping back the wages of those whom he had employed; with having his heart and his eyes turned to avarice and inhumanity, and with following his inclination to barbarities and wicked actions. The same prophet informs us, that he sent men to bring the prophet Urijah out of Egypt, whither he had fled; that he put him to the sword, and left him without burial. Jer. xxvi. 23.

For these and other crimes, the Lord threatens him with an unhappy end. He shall die, says Jeremiah, xxii. 18, 19, and shall be neither mourned for nor regretted. "He shall be buried with the burial of an ass, drawn and cast forth beyond the gates of Jerusalem." Jehoiakim, after about four years subjection to the king of Egypt, fell under the dominion of Nebuchadnezzar king of the Chaldeans. This prince having recovered what Necho had taken on the Euphrates, came into Phœnicia, and Judea, subdued Jerusalem and subjected it to the same burdens and conditions which it suffered under the king of Egypt, 2 Kings xxiv. 1, 2. Jehoiakim was taken, and Nebuchadnezzar put him in fetters, intending to carry him to Babylon; but he restored him to liberty, and left him in his own country, on condition of his paying a large tribute.

Thus Daniel and Jeremiah are reconciled with the Kings and Chronicles. 2 Chron. xxxvi. 6.

6. according to the Hebrew, says, that Nebuchadnezzar bound Jehoiakim in chains to carry him to Babylon; and Daniel relates, that the Lord delivered Jehoiakim into the hands of Nebuchadnezzar; that that prince carried to Babylon great part of the vessels belonging to the house of God, with some captives, among whom were Daniel and his companions; but he does not say that Jehoiakim was carried thither. The books of Kings and Chronicles tell us, that Jehoiakim reigned eleven years at Jerusalem. 2 Kings xxiii. 36. 2 Chron. xxxvi. 5. Jeremiah says, that Nebuchadnezzar retook Carchemish from Necho king of Egypt, in the fourth year of Jehoiakim; and elsewhere, that the first year of Nebuchadnezzar agreed with the fourth of Jehoiakim.

All these chronological marks evince, that Nebuchadnezzar did not come into Judæa till A. M. 3399, which is the fourth year of Jehoiakim: that Jehoiakim was not carried into Babylon, but was put in chains in order to be removed thither, yet afterwards was set at liberty, and left at Jerusalem; lastly, that Jehoiakim was four years subject to Necho, before he became tributary to Nebuchadnezzar.

In the fourth year of Jehoiakim, Jeremiah having dictated to Baruch the prophecies which he had pronounced till that time, Baruch read them, the year following before all the people in the temple, Jer. xxxvi. 1.—26—32. Jehoiakim was informed of this, and ordering this book to be brought to him, it was read to him, and to all the great men about him. The king was in his winter apartment, in November, and there was a fire on the hearth burning before him. After three or four columns had been read, Jehoiakim cut the book with the secretary's penknife, and threw the rest into the fire, disregarding the remonstrances of Elnathan, Delaiah, and Jeremiah. The reading of this book did not affect either Jehoiakim, or his people; and instead of being converted, he gave orders for seizing Jeremiah and Baruch: but the Lord concealed them.

Then the Lord commanded Jeremiah to have his prophecies again written down, and he pronounced terrible menaces against Jehoiakim, of which the king soon experienced the truth. Three years after this he rebelled against Nebuchadnezzar, who sent troops of Chaldeans, Syrians, Moabites, and Ammonites, who ravaged all the country, and carried 3320 Jews to Babylon, in the seventh year of Jehoiakim, A. M. 3401. Four years afterwards Jehoiakim himself was taken, slain, and thrown into the common sewer, as Jeremiah had predicted. He was succeeded by his son Jehoiakin, A. M. 3405, ante A. D. 599.

PART XIV. Edit. IV.

JEHOIARIB, יְהוֹיָרִיב Joarib, or Joarim; Vulgate Joarib. The Lord exalted, or the exaltation of the Lord; from רוּם rum, to exalt, and יָה jah, the Lord. Head of the first family of priests established by David, 1 Chron. xxiv. 7. From this illustrious family the Maccabees descended. 1 Macc. ii. 1.

JEHORAM, יְחֹרָם, exaltation of the Lord; from רוּם rum, elevation: or rejected of the Lord; from יָרָה jarah, to reject, and יָה jah, the Lord.

JEHORAM, son and successor of Jehoshaphat king of Judah. 2 Kings, iii. 2, 3, &c. Born A. M. 3080. His father associated him in the kingdom, A. M. 3112. He reigned alone after the death of Jehoshaphat, A. M. 3116, and died according to Usher, in 3119, ante A. D. 885. He married Athaliah, daughter of Omri, who engaged him in idolatry, and sins, which produced misfortunes throughout his reign. Jehoram being settled in the kingdom, began with the murder of all his brothers, whom Jehoshaphat had removed from public business, and placed in the fortified cities of Judah, with good pensions. God, to punish Jehoram's impiety, permitted the Edomites to revolt: for since the reign of David they had been subject to the kings of Judah, A. M. 3115, ante A. D. 889. 2 Kings, viii. 20, 21. and 2 Chron. xxi. 8, 9. Jehoram marched against them and defeated their cavalry. Nevertheless, the Edomites from that time continued free.

About this time Libnah, a city of Judah, rebelled likewise. The Philistines and Arabians ravaged the territories of Judah, plundered the king's palace, carried away his wives and his children, so that he had none remaining except Jehoahaz the youngest. Beside this, God afflicted him with a cruel dysentery, which tormented him two years, and brought him to his grave. The people refused to pay him the same honours as they had paid his predecessors by burning spices over their bodies. He was buried in Jerusalem, but not in a royal sepulchre, A. M. 3119, ante A. D. 885.

JEHOSADAK, יְחִזְקִיָּה, the just Lord, or the justice of the Lord; from צַדִּיק tsadik, just, and יָה jah. Son of Seraiah, 1 Chron. vi. 14.

JEHOSHABEATH, יְהוֹשָׁבֶעֱת, See JEHOSEBA; otherwise, the Lord changes the hour; from יָה jah, the Lord; and שָׁבַח jashab, change, and נָח heth, time. 2 Chron. xxii. 11.

JEHOSHAPHAT, יְהוֹשָׁפָט, God judges, or the judgment of the Lord; from שָׁפַט shaphat, to judge, and יָה jah, the Lord.

I. JEHOSHAPHAT, son of Ahilud, secretary to David and Solomon, 1 Kings iv. 3.

II. JEHOSHAPHAT, son of Paruah, Solomon's superintendent in Issachar, 1 Kings iv. 17.

III. JEHOSHAPHAT, king of Judah, son of Asa.

Asa. He ascended the throne when aged thirty-five, and reigned twenty-five years. He prevailed against Baasha king of Israel; he placed good garrisons in the cities of Judah and of Ephraim, which had been conquered by his father. God was with him, because he was faithful. He demolished the high places and groves. In the third year of his reign he sent officers, with priests and Levites, throughout Judah, with the book of the law, to instruct the people. God blessed the zeal of this prince. He was feared by all his neighbours. The Philistines and Arabians were tributaries to him. He built several houses in Judah in the form of towers, and fortified several cities. He generally kept an army of 1,000,000 men, without reckoning the troops in his strong holds. This number seems prodigious for so small a state as that of Judah; and probably but one quarter of these troops did service at a time. [q. enrolled militia only?]

Scripture reproaches Jehoshaphat on account of his alliance with Ahab king of Israel, 1 Kings xxii. and 2 Chron. xviii. Some time afterwards he went to visit Ahab, at Samaria; and Ahab invited him to march with him against Ramoth-Gilead. He consented, but asked first for an opinion from a prophet of the Lord. Afterwards going into the battle in his robe, the enemy took him for Ahab, but he crying out, they discovered their mistake; and Jehoshaphat returned safely to Jerusalem. The prophet Jehu, son of Hanani, reproved him smartly for assisting Ahab, 2 Chron. xix. 1, 2, 3, &c. Jehoshaphat repaired this fault by the regulations, and good order which he established in his dominions, both as to civil and religious affairs, by appointing honest and able judges, by regulating the discipline of the priests and Levites, and by enjoining them to perform punctually their duty. After this, the Moabites, Ammonites, and Meonians, people of Arabia Petræa, declared war against Jehoshaphat, 1 Chron. xx. 1, 2, 3, &c. A. M. 3108, ante A. D. 896. They advanced to Hazazon-Tamar, otherwise Engedi. Jehoshaphat went with his people to the temple, and put up prayers to God. Then Jahaziel, son of Zechariah, by the spirit of the Lord encouraged the king, and promised, that the next day he should obtain a victory without fighting. Accordingly, these people being the next day assembled against Judah, quarrelled, and killed one another; so that Jehoshaphat and his army had only to gather their spoils.

Some time after this, Jehoshaphat agreed with Ahaziah, king of Israel, jointly to equip a fleet in the port of Ezion-gaber, on the Red Sea, in order to go to Tarshish, 2 Chron. xx. 35, 36. Eliezer, son of Dodovab, of Mareshah, came to Jehoshaphat, and said to him, "Because thou hast made an alliance with Ahaziah, God hath disappointed thy designs, and thy ships are shattered." This prince continued to walk in the ways of the Lord: Nevertheless, he did not destroy the high-places; and the hearts of the people were not directed entirely to the God of their fathers. Jehoshaphat died after reigning twenty-five years, and was buried in the royal sepulchre. His son Jehoram reigned in his stead, A. M. 3115, ante A. D. 889. 2 Chron. xxi. 1, 2, &c. and 1 Kings xxii. 42.

JEHOSHAPHAT, The Valley of. The prophet Joel, iii. 2, 12, says, "the Lord will gather all nations in the Valley of Jehoshaphat, and will plead with them there." Abenezra is of opinion, that this valley is the place where king Jehoshaphat obtained a signal victory over the Moabites, Ammonites, and Meonians of Arabia Petræa (2 Chron. xx. 1, 2, 3, &c.) toward the Dead Sea, beyond the wilderness of Tekoah; which after that event was called the Valley of blessing, 2 Chron. xx. 26. Others think, that the valley of Jehoshaphat lies between the walls of Jerusalem, and the mount of Olives, and that the brook Kidron runs through it. [Vide the MAP of JERUSALEM.] St. Cyril of Alexandria, on Joel iii. says, that this valley is but a few furlongs distant from Jerusalem. Lastly, some maintain, that the ancient Hebrews had named no particular place the valley of Jehoshaphat; but that Joel intended generally the place where God would judge the nations, and will appear at the last judgment in the brightness of his Majesty. Jehoshaphat in Hebrew, signifies the judgment of God. It is very probable, that the valley of Jehoshaphat, i. e. of God's judgment, is symbolical, as well as the Valley of Slaughter, in the same chapter. From this passage the Jews and many Christians, have been of opinion, that the last judgment, will be solemnized in the valley of Jehoshaphat. [Others expect that much slaughter and fighting will yet take place in this valley: doubtless in the time of the croisades many men of various nations fell in battle here.]

JEHOSHEBA, יְהוֹשֻׁבַע, Ἰωσαβὰς, who is replenished and filled with the Lord; from שָׁבַע, to satisfy: or oath, or seventh of the Lord; from שְׁבַע, oath, or seventh, and יָה, the Lord.

JEHOSHEBA, or, JEHOSHABEATH, daughter of Joram, and sister of Ahaziah king of Judah; she married Jehoiada the high-priest: she saved Joash, then but a year old, from the fury of Athaliah, who murdered all the princes of the royal family. 2 Kings xi. 1, 2, 3. See JOASH, JEHOIADA, and ATHALIAH.

JEHOVAH, יְהוָה, self-subsisting; from הָיָה, to be.

JEHOVAH, the name of God, ineffable and mysterious, mysterious, which God did not declare before Moses: I appeared, says he, to Abraham, and to Isaac, and to Jacob, by the name of God Almighty, Al-Shaddai; but by my name Jehovah was I not known to them. Shaddai signifies the self-sufficient (or all bountiful), Jehovah signifies the self-existent, he who gives being and existence to others. When God declared to Moses, that he had not made known his name Jehovah, he did not mean, that former patriarchs had been ignorant of him, as God the Creator, the Self-existing; but, that he had not revealed this name, which so well expresses his nature, and by which he would afterwards be invoked. It is true, Moses uses this name when speaking of times prior to this appearance, as Gen. iv. 26. the sons of Seth called themselves by the name of Jehovah; and Gen. xiv. 22. Abraham swore and lift up his hand to Jehovah. And lastly, the Lord said to Abraham, I am the God Jehovah that brought thee out of Ur of the Chaldees, &c. Gen. xv. 7. But the reason is, that Genesis was written after God had revealed this name to Moses. He uses it in that book by way of anticipation, and because, at the time when he wrote, the Jews used the name Jehovah; i. e. He followed the custom of his own time, not that of the patriarchs. Vide ABRAHAM, VII. ad fin.

When we pronounce Jehovah, we follow the multitude, for we do not know correctly the manner in which this name of God should be pronounced. It is written with jod, י hé, ה vau, ו hé, and comes from the verb haiah, he has been. The ancients expressed it differently. Sanchoniathon writes Jevo; Diodorus Siculus, Macrobius, Clemens Alexandrinus, Jerom, and Origen, pronounce Jao; Epiphanius, Theodoret, and the Samaritans Jabé or Jaré: we find likewise Jahoh, Javo, Jaou, Jaod. Lewis Capellus is for Javo; Drusius for Javé; Mercer for Jehevah; Hottinger for Jehva. The Moors called their God Jaba, which some believe to be Jehovah. The Latins probably took their Jovis or Jovis Pater, from Jehovah. It is certain that these four letters may likewise be expressed by Javo, Jaho, Jaon, Jevo, Jave, Jekvah, &c. and that the ancient Hebrews were not unacquainted with the pronunciation of it, since they recited it in their prayers, and in reading their sacred books.

But the Jews, after the captivity of Babylon, out of superstitious respect for this holy name, left off the custom of pronouncing it, and forgot the true pronunciation of it. I am of opinion, that the LXX. were accustomed not to pronounce it, since they generally render it Kyrios [as our English] the Lord. Origen, Jerom, and Eusebius, testify, that in their time the Jews left the name of Jehovah written in their copies with Samaritan characters, instead of writing it in the common Chaldee or Hebrew characters, which shews their veneration for this holy name, and their fear lest strangers should discover and misapply it. [And is no bad authority in favour of the Samaritan character as being the original Hebrew.] These precautions, notwithstanding, did not hinder the heathen from misapplying it frequently. Origen, contra Celsum, lib. i. informs us, that they used it in their exorcisms and charms against diseases. Clemens Alexandrinus, Stromat. lib. v. relates, that those Egyptians who were permitted to enter the temple of the sun, carried the name of Jaou about with them. Trallian gives us some magic verses against the gout, wherein is the name of Jas or Jaath.

Philo, de Vita Moysi, lib. iii. says, that after the punishment of the blasphemer, who was stoned to death in the wilderness, Lev. xxiv. 15, &c. God published a new law by Moses, importing that, Whoever curseth the Lord, he shall surely be put to death. Thus the LXX. and Theodoret read the passage; whereas the Hebrew and Vulgate read, "Whosoever curseth his Gods (Elohim), shall bear the punishment of his sin: and he that blasphemeth the name of the Lord shall surely be put to death." Philo adds, that this law of Moses is profoundly wise, and that the first part of his ordinance forbids blaspheming the false gods of the Gentiles; and the second requires, that the name of God should not be used unseasonably; that it is a crime deserving death for any man to use this holy name negligently, or to adorn and fill up discourse. Josephus expresses himself with the same reserve concerning the name of God. He says, that God having appeared to Moses in the burning bush, revealed his name to him, which he had never discovered to any man, and I, says he, am not permitted to mention.

The Jews say, that after their return from the captivity, the name of God was pronounced only once a-year, in the temple, on the great day of expiation; moreover, a noise was purposely made, when the high-priest pronounced it in the presence of a few chosen disciples, who might hear him without the people's hearing him. But after the destruction of the temple, they forbore entirely from pronouncing it; for which reason the true pronunciation of it is lost. The Jews never mention the sacred name of Jehovah, but substitute Adonai, or Elohim. St. Jerom has imitated them by translating Exodus vi. 3. I have not discovered to them my name Adonai, instead of, my name Jehovah. The modern Hebrews tell us, that Moses by virtue of the word Jehovah engraved on his miraculous rod, performed all the prodigies related of him; and that Jesus Christ, by the same virtue, wrought all his miracles, having while in the temple, stolen the ineffable name, which he put into his thigh between the skin and the flesh. They add, that we might be able to do as much as they did, if we could attain the perfect pronunciation of this name. They flatter themselves that the Messiah will teach them this mighty secret. The Tetragrammaton [or four-lettered name] is called by Josephus, τα ἱερὰ γράμματα, το φρικτὸν ὄνομα Θεῶν—the sacred letters—the shuddering name of God.” And Caligula in Philo swears to him and the ambassadors his associates, by the God who was to them ἀκατανόμαστος—of unknown (unpronounceable) name.

The Jews believe, that whoever knows the true pronunciation of Jehovah, or the name with four letters, the Tetragrammaton, cannot fail of being heard by God; that if they have not the happiness to be heard at this day, it is owing to their ignorance of the true pronunciation; that Simon the Just, the high-priest, was the last who was acquainted with it; that after his death the number of profane persons increasing, and abusing this divine name, others forbore to pronounce it, and substituted a name composed of twelve letters, which the high-priest pronounced when blessing the people. Tarphon, a famous rabbin (believed to be the Tryphon, against whom Justin Martyr argues in his dialogue), relates, that one day drawing near the priest to hear his benediction, he perceived that he did not pronounce distinctly the twelve letters, only muttering while the Levites sung; that this proceeded from the multitude of profane persons, to whom it was not prudent to discover this sacred name. The Talmud denounces terrible curses against those who pronounce it; they scruple even the attempt; and pretend that angels have not this liberty.

The very Heathen seem to have had some knowledge of this great, ineffable name. We have an oath in Pythagoras's golden verses, By him who has the four letters; Τετρακτύς. Vide Selden, de Diis Syr. Syntag. 11. cap. 1. On the frontispiece of a temple at Delphi was inscribed (says Eusebius, Præpar. lib. xi. cap. 11. Plutarch, Tract. de Eu. inscrip. forib. templi Delph. tom. 2. page 384.) ΘΟΥ ΑΡΤ. The Egyptians on one of their temples inscribed, I AM. The Heathen had names of their Gods, which they did not dare to pronounce. Cicero produces an example in his catalogue of Heathen deities, de Nat. Deorum, lib. iii. Lucan says, the earth would have trembled had any one pronounced them :

Compellendus erit quo nunquam terra vocato
Non concussa tremuit, Pharsal, lib. vi. 744.

The name of Romulus was written in the public records like that of Jehovah among the Jews, with the four consonants which compose it. But this, not so much out of respect, as out of fear lest any one should call away the tutelary gods of their city, says Pliny, lib. xxviii. cap. 2. Constat ideo occultum (nomen) in cuius Dei tutela Roma esset, ne qui hostium simili modo evocarent.

The Jewish cabalists have refined very much on the name Jehovah. They remark, for example, that in Genesis, Moses calls God Elohim, while speaking of the creation of the world; but after he had finished the creation, he calls him Jehovah, meaning, say they, that in the beginning God seemed, in some sort, imperfect, while producing beings by parts, but after he had concluded his work, he took the name of Jehovah, which is a name of infinite perfection. To this they refer the words, Deut. xxxii. 4. The work of the Rock is perfect, or rather the work of God, this almighty Rock, is perfect.

The letters which compose this adorable name abound with mysteries. Jod, the first letter, denotes the thought, the idea of God; to this light no man can approach; the eye of man hath not seen, nor the mind of man comprehended it; of this Job spoke, Seeing it is hid from the eyes of all living, &c. The Hé, the last of the four letters, discovers the unity of God and the creator. From thence issue the four rivers of Paradise, i. e. the four majesties of God, which the Jews, call Shekinah.

The name of God includes all things: He who pronounces it shakes heaven and earth, and inspires the very angels with terror. A sovereign authority resides in this name; it governs the world; other names and surnames of the deity are ranged about it, like officers and soldiers about their king and general; from this they receive their orders, and this they obey. This is the fountain of graces and blessings; the channel through which God's mercies are conveyed to men. He who knew all the mysteries of God's name, would be ignorant of nothing in all the ways of his justice and providence.

The Mussulmen frequently use the name Hu, or Hou, which has almost the same signification as Jehovah, i. e. He, who is. They place this name in the beginning of their rescripts, passports, and letters patent; they pronounce it often in their prayers; some repeat it so frequently, and so vehemently, crying out with all their strength, hou, hou, hou, that at last they are stunned, and fall into fits, which they call extasies. But their great name of God is Allah, which they pronounce often, and in which they have great confidence. They say that by virtue of this name, Noah made the ark float up and down down as he pleased; that Japheth engraved it on a precious stone, which he left to his sons; and by the help of this he could bring down rain when he thought proper. By this very name they say Jesus Christ wrought his miracles. Among the Arabians, and all Mahometans, the name Allah corresponds with the Elohim and Adonai of the Hebrews, and even with that of Jehovah, which is called ineffable.

[It would be waste of time and patience to repeat all that has been said on this incommunicable name: it may not be amiss, however, to remind the reader, that although it signifies the state of being, yet it forms no verb. 2. It never assumes a plural form. 3. It does not admit an article, or take an affix. 4. Neither is it placed in a state of construction with other words; though other words may be in construction with it, (as in the following appellations.) It seems to be a compound of יה, the Essence, and ירה, existing i. e. always existing; whence the word Eternal, appears to express its import; or, as it is well rendered, Rev. i. 4. viii. 17. He who is, and who was, and who is to come; i. e. ETERNAL, as the schoolmen speak, both a parte ante, and a parte post. Comp. John viii. 58. It is usually marked by an abbreviation י, in Jewish books, where it must be alluded to. It is also abbreviated in the term, יה Jah, which the reader will observe enters into the formation of many Hebrew appellations.]

[JEHOVAH JIREH, JEHOVAH will see, or JEHOVAH will see to it, or JEHOVAH will provide for it, Gen. xxii. 14. But it should be observed, that most modern interpreters take this word passively, "shall be seen;" and the LXX also, have taken this word passively in verse 15. I incline to think, that Abraham used this expression, and gave this name to this place, in such a manner that at this day, i. e. in after ages, (as at the time when this history was composed, or, when Ezra revised the copy,) it became usual to say; "In this very identical mountain Jehovah shall appear—shall be seen: this is where we expect his appearance." Consider the building of the temple of Solomon nearly adjacent; (if not on the very spot,) where "the Lord had chosen to put his name," Deut. xii. 5. 1 Kings xiv. 21. 2 Chron. xii. 13. Consider also the crucifixion of Jesus, at, or near, perhaps on, this very spot. I apprehend that many such titles not only commemorated (past) facts, but predicted (future) expectations.]

[JEHOVAH NISSI, JEHOVAH my banner, Ex. xvii. 15. The principles of this expression have been examined in FRAGMENT, No. CCXVIII. Does this appellation also look backward, Jehovah has been my banner; and forward, Jehovah shall be my banner, or standard?]

[JEHOVAH SHALOM. JEHOVAH of peace, Judg. vi. 24. Gideon gave this name to an altar which he built in a place where an angel of Jehovah had appeared to him, and had saluted him by saying, Peace be to thee. Probably this name may be taken 1. To Jehovah of peace, i. e. taking peace for general welfare—to the Divine Protector. 2. As the words are usually rendered, Jehovah shall send peace, i. e. we expect prosperity under the auspices, &c. of Jehovah. Apparently, the phrase became in after ages a kind of proverbial saying, as probably was the case with all these remarkable titles, which are come down to us: for what else has been their preservation, when so many thousand other titles have perished?]

[JEHOVAH SHAMMAH, JEHOVAH is there: rather, the settlement, station, residence of Jehovah, i. e. God's town; Jehovah's town. This name Ezekiel gives to a future holy city, which he describes in the close of his prophecy, chap. xlvi. 35.]

[JEHOVAH TZIDKENU.—JEHOVAH our righteousness, Jer. xxiii. 6. xxxiii. 16. In the first of these passages we read of a branch, a king, called the Lord our Righteousness; in the second passage we read, "This is the name wherewith she [Jerusalem] shall be called, the Lord our Righteousness." Now, the impropriety of calling a female, she, by the name of the Lord, masculine, is apparent; and the words is the name are supplied in this place, by our translators; but the word name is in the original in the former passage: where the words are, and this his name is which they shall call him, Jehovah our righteousness: but in the latter passage the words are, literally, and this he shall call to her, Jehovah our righteousness; which perhaps ought to be supplied, and this [prosperity] because, or inasmuch as he shall proclaim to her (לָהּ) or for, about, over, before her, Jehovah our righteousness.]

JEHOZABAD, יְהוֹזָבָד, portion of the Lord; from זָבָד zabad, portion, and יָה jah, the Lord.

I. IEHOZABAD, son of Shomer, one of the murderers of Joash king of Judah, 2 Kings xii. 21. A. M. 3165, ante A. D. 839.

II. JEHOZABAD of Manasseh, one of David's gallant officers. 1 Chr. xii. 4. 20. [Jozabad.]

III. JEHOZABAD, son of Obededom a Levite, a porter of the tabernacle, 1 Chron. xxvi. 4.

IV. JEHOZABAD, general of Jehoshaphat's army, 2 Chron. xvii. 18.

JEHOZADAK, יְהוֹזָדָק, the just Lord, or, Lord of justice; from צָדִיק, tzadik, just, and יָה jah, the Lord.

JEHOZADAK, son and successor of Seraiah, high-priest of the Jews, 1 Chron. vi. 14, 15.

Ezra

Ezra iii. 2. It does not appear that he ever exercised the high-priesthood. - He died at Babylon. But his son Joskua or Jenu, returned from the captivity, and assumed that dignity, after rebuilding the temple, Ezra iii. 2. viii. 2. x. 18, &c. A. M. 3468, ante A. D. 536.

JEHU, היהו, himself; from the pronoun הוא hwa: otherwise, who exists; from היהוה havah.

I. JEHU. The prophet Jehu, son of Hanani, was sent by God about A. M. 3073 or 3074, ante A. D. 931 or 932, to Baasha king of Israel, to predict punishment for his misdeeds, 1 Kings, xvi. 1. 4. "Him that dieth of Baasha in the city, shall the dogs eat; and him that dieth of his in the fields, shall the fowls of the air eat." The Vulgate adds, that Baasha incensed at this liberty of Jehu, put him to death: but the Hebrew says only, "Jehu having declared to Baasha what the Lord had pronounced against him, and that the Lord would treat his house as he had treated the house of Jeroboam; for this he slew him." It is not expressly mentioned whether Baasha slew Jehu, or the Lord slew Baasha. What makes the latter more credible, is, that about thirty years after the death of Baasha, we see again Jehu, son of Hanani, sent by God with reproaches to Jehoshaphat king of Judah, 2 Chron. xix. 1, 2, &c. Certainly, if Jehu had been put to death by Baasha, he could not have appeared so long afterwards before Jehoshaphat. Some insist, that there were two persons named Jehu, sons of Hanani: but I should choose to say, that in the first passage the death of Baasha, not that of Jehu, is intimated; rather than multiply persons without necessity. It is said, 2 Chron. xx. 34. Now the rest of the acts of Jehoshaphat first and last, behold they are written in the book of Jehu, son of Hanani, who is mentioned in the book of the Kings of Israel. "From whence it appears, that the prophets employed themselves in recording the transactions of their times, and that what Jehu had written of this kind, was thought worthy to be inserted in the Memoirs, wherein the several events were registered, which daily happened in every prince's reign." See Theodor. Prefat. in 1 Reg.

II. JEHU, son of Jehoshaphat, and grandson of Nimshi, captain of the troops of Joram king of Israel, was appointed by God to reign over Israel, and to punish the sins of the house of Ahab. The Lord had ordered Elisha to anoint Jehu, 1 Kings xix. 16. which order was executed by one of the sons of the prophets, 2 Kings ix. 1, 2, 3, &c. The Lord declared his will to Elisha concerning Jehu, A. M. 3097, ante A. D. 907; but Jehu was not anointed till A. M. 3120, ante A. D. 884, twenty-three years after the order given to Elisha. Jehu was at Ramoth-

Gilead, besieging the citadel of that place, with the army of Israel, when a young prophet entered, who took him aside from among the officers, and when they were alone in an apartment, poured oil on his head, and said, "Thus saith the Lord, I have anointed thee king over Israel, thou shalt extirpate the house of Ahab, and avenge the blood of the prophets shed by Jezebel." The prophet instantly opened the door and fled; Jehu returning to the officers, they inquired what might be the business? He declared to them what had passed. Whereupon they rose up, and each taking his cloak, they made a kind of throne for Jehu, and sounding the trumpets, cried, "Long live King Jehu."

Joram, king of Israel, was at Jezreel under cure for wounds received in besieging Ramoth. Jehu ordered that no one should leave the army, which he quitted instantly, in order to surprise the king at Jezreel. Joram sent to meet him an officer, and a second; at last Joram came himself, riding in his chariot, with Ahaziah, king of Judah, who also was in his chariot; and they met Jehu in the field of Naboth of Jezreel.

Joram asked him, "Is it peace, Jehu?" and he answered, "What peace, so long as the whoredoms of thy mother Jezebel and her witchcrafts are so many?" Joram immediately turning, said to Ahaziah, "We are betrayed." Jehu drew his bow, smote Joram between his shoulders, and pierced his heart. Then he commanded his body to be thrown into the portion of Naboth the Jezreelite, to fulfil the prediction of the prophet Elijah. Vide AH-AZIAH.

Jehu went afterwards to Jezreel, where was Jezebel. As he entered the city, Jezebel, who was at a window, said to him, "Can he who has killed his master hope for peace?" Jehu, lifting up his head, and seeing her, commanded two or three eunuchs, who were above, to throw her out of the window, which they did, and she was trampled to death under the horses' feet; her corpse was devoured by dogs; so that when Jehu sent to have her buried, they found only parts and bones. 2 Kings x. Vide FRAGMENT, LIII. After this, Jehu commanded the inhabitants of Samaria to slay all the late king's children, and to send him their heads; then he slew all Ahab's relations and friends, the great men of his court, and his priests, who were at Jezreel.

After this, proceeding to Samaria, he met the relations of Ahaziah king of Judah, going to Jezreel to salute the king and queen's children, of whose death they were ignorant. Jehu ordered, to massacre them all, forty-two. A little farther, he found Jehonadab, son of Rechab, Rechab, and taking him into his chariot, he said to him, "Come with me, and see my zeal for the Lord." At Samaria, he slew all who remained of Ahab's family, not sparing one. Then assembling the people there, he said, "Ahab paid some honours to Baal, but I will pay him greater, collect now all the ministers, priests, and prophets of Baal, for a great festival." When they were all in Baal's temple, he commanded to give them all habits, and to take particular care, to exclude strangers. After which he ordered his people to slay them every one. The statue of Baal was pulled down, broken, and burnt; the temple itself was destroyed, and made a privy.

The Lord promised Jehu that his children should sit on the throne of Israel to the fourth generation. But Scripture accuses him of following the sins of Jeroboam, son of Nebat; and the prophet Hosea, i. 4. threatens him, Yet a little while, and I will avenge the blood of Jezreel on the house of Jehu, &c. Jehu had indeed been the instrument of God's vengeance on the house of Ahab, but in what he had done he had been impelled by the spirit of animosity, and ambition; He had followed his own passion, rather than the will of God. He had not kept within due bounds. God therefore while he rewards his obedience, punishes his injustice, ambition, idolatry, and the blood unjustly spilt by him. He reigned twenty-eight years over Israel, and Jehoahaz his son reigned in his stead. 2 Kings x. 35, 36. The four descendants of his family who governed after him, were Jehoahaz, Joash, Jeroboam II. and Zechariah. The reign of Jehu was perplexed with war against Hazael king of Syria, who ravaged the frontiers of Israel, and wasted the whole country beyond Jordan, and the tribes of Manasseh, Gad, and Reuben. We do not know when this war commenced; probably early in Jehu's reign, when Hazael, having intelligence that Jehu had quitted Ramoth-Gilead, fell upon this country, and subdued it.

III. JEHU, fourth son of Rehoboam, king of Judah, and Abihail, 2 Chron. xi. 19.

IV. JEHU, son of Obad, 1 Chron. ii. 38.

JEHUBBAH, יְחֻבָּה, יְחֻבָּה, secret, hidden; from חָבַה chaba: otherwise, friendship, affection; from חָבַב chabab. 1 Chron. vii. 34.

JEHUCAL, יְחֻכָּל, every thing of the Lord; from כָּל calal, all; or perfection and consummation of the Lord; from calal, and יָהּ jah, the Lord. Son of Strelemlah, Jer. xxxvii. 3.

JEHUD, יְהוּד, he that praises.

[A city of Dan. Josh. xix. 45.

A celebrated city, or a celebrating city. The first refers to itself; the latter may refer to divine worship. Or we may express it in English "praise."]]

JEHUDI, יְהוּדִי, God is my praise. Son of Nathaniah, Jer. xxxvi. 14.

JEHUDIJAH, יְהוּדִיָּה, the praise of the Lord. Wife of Ezra, 1 Chron. iv. 18.

JEIEL, יְעִיֵּל, God has taken or driven him away; from יָחַהּ jahah. 2 Chron. xxvi. 11.

I. JEIEL, a Levite of Gibeon. 1 Chr. ix. 35.

II. JEIEL, of Reuben, 1 Chron. v. 7.

JEKAMEAM, יְקָמֵעַם, יְקָמֵעַם, Vulgate, Jecmaan; resurrection, or confirmation, or vengeance of the people; from קָמַם kum, and חָמַם ham, the people. Fourth son of Hebron. 1 Chron. xxiii. 19.

JEKAMIAH, יְקָמִיָּה, resurrection, or confirmation of the Lord; from קָמַם kum, to rise; and יָהּ jah, the Lord. Son of Shallum, of Caleb's family, 1 Chron. ii. 41.

JEKUTHIEL, יְקוּתִּיָּהּ, God is my hope; or the hope of God; from יָהּ kavah, to hope, to wait for; otherwise, assembly of God; from the same, and אֵל el, God.

JEMIMA, יְמִמָּה, handsome as the day; from יָמָה jom, the day. Daughter of Job, Job xlii. 14.

JEMINI, יְמִינִי, יְמִינִי, my right hand, or which is on the right hand; from יָמִין jamim, the right-hand.

JEMINI This word is generally placed for Benjamin. Thus it is said that Gera, father of Ehud, was son of Jemini, i. e. of the tribe of Benjamin. Judg. iii. 15. And of Saul, it is said, he was son of a man of Jemini, i. e. of the tribe of Benjamin, 1 Sam. ix. 1. The land of Jemini is the land of Benjamin, 1 Sam. ix. 4. This name Jacob gave his son, whom Rachel called Benoni, or the son of my sorrow. Vide BENJAMIN.

JEPHTIAH, יִפְתָּה, he that opens, or he [God] will open, from פָּתַח pathach, to open. [Comp. יִפְתָּה, and יִפְתָּה-עַל, which are from the same root, and signify opened by God.]

JEPHTHAH, judge of Israel, successor to Jair. Was a son of Gilead by one of his concubines, Judg. xi. 1, 2. vide CONCUBINE. Gilead, having married a lawful wife, and having had children by her, these children drove Jephthah from his father's house. Jephthah, retired into the land of Tob, where he became captain of a band of rovers. At this time the Israelites, beyond Jordan, being pressed by the Ammonites, desired assistance from Jephthah, offering him the command. Jephthah reproached them with their injustice to him when he was forced from his father's house; but agreed to succour them, provided that at the end of the war they would acknowledge him for their prince. A. M. 2817, ante A. D. 1187.

Jephthah having been acknowledged prince of Israel, in an assembly of the people, sent to the king of the Ammonites, saying, "Why art thou come to ravage my country?" The Ammonite, nite answered, "Because when Israel came out of Egypt he seized my country," &c.

Jephthah, filled with a divine spirit, began to assemble his troops, and went over all the land of Israel beyond Jordan. He also vowed to the Lord, that if he were successful against the Ammonites, he would offer up a burnt offering, and whatsoever should first come out of his house to meet him. Jephthah vanquished the Ammonites, and ravaged their land: but as he returned to his house, his only daughter came out to meet him, with timbrels and dances, and thereby became the subject of his vow.

The tribe of Ephraim, jealous of Jephthah, passed the Jordan in a tumultuous manner, complained, that he had not invited them to share in this war, and threatened to fire his house. Jephthah answered, that he had sent to desire their assistance, but they did not come. Jephthah did more than reply, he assembled the people of Gilead, gave the Ephraimites battle, and defeated them. The conquerors made themselves masters of the fords of Jordan, and when an Ephraimite desired to go over, the Gileadites asked, "Art thou an Ephraimite?" If he replied, "No;" they said, pronounce then Shibboleth, (which signifies an ear of corn) but if instead of Shibboleth, he said Sibboleth, without an aspiration, he was immediately killed. 42,000 men of Ephraim fell on this occasion.

We know nothing more in particular concerning Jephthah; he judged Israel six years, and was buried in Mizpah, in Gilead, Judg. xii. 7. St. Paul, Heb. xi. 32. places him among the saints of the Old Testament, whose faith had distinguished them. The fable of Iphigenia, daughter of Agamemnon, seems to have been borrowed from the history of Jephthah, and his daughter.

JEPHTHAH'S VOW. There is something so extraordinary in Jephthah's vow, that notwithstanding Scripture mentions it in clear terms, yet difficulties perplex commentators.

The Spirit of the Lord came upon Jephthah, says the Sacred writer, Judg. xi. 29, 30, 31, &c. and he passed over Gilead and Manasseh; no doubt to gather troops, and form an army against the Ammonites. "And he made a vow, unto the Lord, and said, If thou shalt without fail deliver the children of Ammon into my hands, then it shall be, that whatsoever cometh forth of the doors of my house to meet me when I return in peace from the children of Ammon, shall surely be the Lord's, and I will offer it up for a burnt offering."

Observe, he does not say,—the first thing, the first animal, but—the first person: he does not say, barely, that he will vow, consecrate, or offer him to the Lord, but adds that he will offer him up.—Eum holocaustum offeram Domino. This is the true meaning of the text, and the fathers so explained it.

Yet, notwithstanding, modern interpreters translate thus. "And the thing which shall go forth out of the doors of my house when I return in peace from making war with the Ammonites, that shall be the Lord's, and I will offer it up to him for a burnt-offering." Jephthah, say they, vows to God whatever should come forth to meet him, whether man or beast, but not in the same manner: i. e. if it be a man or woman, I will consecrate him (or her) to the Lord; if it be an unclean animal, for example, a dog, I will kill him, or redeem him. Would he have dared, say they, to have offered a dog? Could Jephthah be ignorant, that the sacrifice of human victims was odious to God? Would not the principal men of the nation, and the priests, have opposed such a sacrifice? Supposing that Jephthah had devoted his daughter, was he ignorant of the law which allowed him to redeem her for a moderate sum of money? "He who shall have vowed his life to the Lord, shall pay the price that shall be ordained: a man fifty shekels; a woman thirty," &c. Lev. xxvii. 2, 3.

It may be replied, 1. That they who allege this, wrest the meaning of the text, which says expressly, "He who should come out to meet him should be the Lord's, and should be offered up for a burnt sacrifice." He speaks of a person, not of a beast. 2. No one pretends to justify either this precipitate vow of Jephthah, or his literal execution of it: it is allowed, that this vow was not according to knowledge, and that God did not require such a victim. He had done much better had he asked forgiveness, and imposed on himself, with the advice of the high-priest, &c. some penalty proportioned to his fault. 3. The redemption of things devoted which the law permits, is not of things devoted by anathema, but of such only as are devoted simply; in the former case they are not redeemable. "No devoted thing that a man shall devote unto the Lord, of all that he hath, both of man and beast, . . . shall be sold or redeemed . . . none devoted which shall be devoted of men shall be redeemed; but shall surely be put to death." Lev. xxvii. 28, 29.

The fathers and many learned commentators have made no difficulty to own, that Jephthah did really offer up his daughter for a burnt-sacrifice. Josephus, Antiq. lib. v. cap. 9. expressly says he did, συγχωήσας δε τὸν κατὰ προσηρμένον χρόνον μετὰ τούτων διελθόντα θύσας τὴν παῖδα ὡλοκάντωσα. The Chaldee paraphrast says, "He sacrificed her without consulting the high-priest; and that if he had consulted him, he would have redeemed his daughter with a sum of money." St. Ambrose, de Offic. lib. iii. cap. 12. deplores the cruelty of Jephthah's promise, and the rigorous execution of his vow. St. Austin, Qu. 49. in Judic. disapproves the conduct of Jephthah, and says, that in this particular he did what was forbid by the law. Fecit quod ex lege vetabatur, et nullo speciali jubebatur imperio. St. Jerom believes, that God permitted the performance of it, to punish this imprudent father for his temerity: ut qui improspecte voverat, errorem votorum in filiae morte sentiret. Contra Jovinian. lib. i.

St. Chrysostom, Homil. 14 ad. pop. Antioch. observes, that God by his all-wise providence permitted this father really to put his daughter to death, thereby to restrain those who might be too easily induced to make such promises: to inspire men with circumspection, and to restrain them from rash vows and contracts. Justin the Martyr, and Theodoret, looked on this action in the same view. Others, not satisfied with supposing the sacrifice of Jephthah's daughter to be a certain fact, have approved and praised it. The author of Questions to the Orthodox, printed in Justin's name, doubts not but that his piety, which induced him to sacrifice his daughter, engaged the apostle to place him among the righteous. St. Jerom, Ep. ad Julian. expresses himself after the same manner: Jephthe obtulit filiam virginem, et idcirco in enumeratione sanctorum ab Apostolo ponitur. He says, on Jer. cap. xvii. That if the sacrifice be not laudable, at least the spirit and intention deserve approbation: Non sacrificium placet, sed animus offerentis. St. Ambrose does not accuse him for having executed his promise; but pities him for being under such an unhappy necessity, as not to be able to fulfil his vow, but by parricide: Non possum accusare virum, qui necesse habuit implere quod voverat; sed tamen miserabilis necessitas, quæ solvitur parricidio. St. Thomas acknowledges, that the faith and devotion, which inclined him to make this vow, proceeded from God, and that this was the Apostle's motive for placing him among the righteous; but that which quite spoiled his action was his suffering himself to follow his own particular motion, in executing what he had too rashly promised.

[After all, this matter depends on the acceptance of a single particle, taken for either AND or OR (LXX.) for the same Hebrew particle, ו, may signify either:—q. d. "Whatever comes to meet me, I will devote to the Lord—OR—I will offer him up a burnt-sacrifice."—Otherwise, we may read—"Whatever comes to meet me I will devote to the Lord; AND i. e. ALSO, I will offer up to him a burnt-sacrifice:"—or, "AND I will offer up to him that which comes out of my house:" as CALMET, before.

We ought farther to notice that Jephthah's rashness had time to cool—since his daughter went two months into the country to bewail her virginity—(where, observe, it is not said her sacrifice), i. e. her consecration to God, which obliged her to remain single, without posterity, &c. Moreover, the Israelite women went yearly four times to mourn for—rather WITH—the daughter of Jephthah: to lament her seclusion from the world, and the hardship of her situation, cut off from domestic life and enjoyment. Now, if in the course of two months nobody could have suggested to Jephthah a ransom for his daughter, yet surely she must have been alive, though dead to him and his family (she being his only child) and to the world by her seclusion, if the Israelite women went to condole with her, (or, to gossip with her, to prolong discourse, as the word signifies, Judges v. 11.)

Observe, also, it is not said afterwards, that he sacrificed her, but, "he did with her according to his vow:" it is added, she knew no man: now, if she were sacrificed this remark is frivolous; but if she was consecrated to perpetual virginity, this idea coincides with the visits of the Israelitish women. Were there at this time women attendants at the tabernacle? as CALMET always supposes:—Did she join their company?

JEREMIAH, son of Hilkiah, of a priestly family, native of Anathoth, a village of Benjamin, Jer. i. 1. Before his birth, he was destined to be a prophet. When God first sent him to speak to the kings and princes, the priests and people of Judah, he excused himself, alleging his youth. This was in the fourteenth year of his age; and the thirteenth year of Josiah. A. M. 3375, ante A. D. 629. He prophesied till after the destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldees, A. M. 3416, and he died, as is believed, in Egypt, two years after.

Jeremiah preached viva voce, till the fourth year of Jehoiakim king of Judah. When God called Jeremiah to the prophetic ministry, he discovered to him, that he should suffer much from the Jews; but at the same time he promised to make him as a wall of brass against the kings, princes, and people of Judah. He likewise shewed him, under the figure of a branch of an almond-tree, and that of a pot heated by fire blown up by a vehement north wind, that Judea was threatened by a very great and near calamity, from the Chaldeans. Jer. i. 11, 12, &c. We may say, that this is the general subject of his prophecies. They turn on the sins of Judah, and their punishment by Nebuchadnezzar.

The prophet begins with a sharp invective against the disorders of Judah, during the first years of Josiah's reign, wherein these prophecies were pronounced, and before that prince had reformed his dominions; which he did in the eighteenth year of his reign. See chap. ii. iii. iv. v. vi. vii. viii. &c. During this time Jeremiah endured great persecutions, 2 Kings xxiii. 4, 5, 6, &c. His very relations and fellow citizens of the little town of Anathoth, threatened to kill him if he continued prophesying. But he threatens them, too, that they should perish by the sword, or by famine, chap. xii. xiii. xiv. xv. xvi. There was a famine at this time in the land, as one effect of divine wrath. About this time, God forbade the prophet from taking a wife, and having children in Jerusalem, from entering any house of mirth and feasting, or any house of mourning, to comfort those in sorrow.

It is our opinion, that under the reign of Shallum son of Josiah, Jeremiah received God's orders to go to a potter's house (chap. xvi. xvii.

xviii.) where he observed a pot which broke in the potter's hands, who immediately made another of the same clay; Jeremiah represented this as an indication of Judah's reprobation, in whose place God would raise up another people. To render this prophecy more striking, he was commanded to take an earthen pitcher, and to break it before the priests and elders of the people in the valley of Hinnom. From hence he went up to the temple, where he confirmed all he had said. Pashur, captain of the temple, seized and confined him in a prison belonging to the temple, till the next day. Then he told Pashur, that he, his sons, and his friends, should be carried into captivity.

Jehoiakim king of Judah, having succeeded Shallum, Jeremiah told him, chap. xxii. that if he would be steadfast in fidelity to God, there should still be kings of Judah in his palace, with all the lustre of their dignity; but if he persevered in his irregularities, God would reduce that palace to a wilderness. As Jehoiakim, instead of reforming, abandoned himself to cruelty and avarice, and to raising of costly buildings, Jeremiah threatens him with a miserable death, deprived of the honours of burial. He farther foretels against Coniah, brother of Jehoiakim, that he should be delivered to the Chaldeans, and never should any prince of his family sit on the throne of Judah, chap. xxiii. Shallum reigned about three months. Jehoiakim was put in his place the same year, A. M. 3394. The prophecies of Jeremiah against Jehoiakim may have been pronounced A. M. 3395.

About this time Jeremiah going up to the temple foretold its destruction: hereupon the priests seized him, and declared he deserved to die. The princes being come thither to judge him, Jeremiah undauntedly told them that he had said nothing but by God's order; and that unless they were converted, they would soon see the accomplishment of his menaces. This affected some of his judges; they dismissed him, and justified him by the example of the prophet Micah, who had foretold the same event under king Hezekiah, without suffering for it.

Before the fourth year of Jehoiakim, Jeremiah had prophesied against several people bordering on Judæa (chap. xlv. xlvii. xlviii. xlix.) against the Egyptians, Philistines, Tyrians, Phœnicians, Edomites, Ammonites, Moabites; against Damascus, Kedar, Hazor, &c. (for Jeremiah was appointed prophet of the Gentiles; Prophetam in Gentibus dedit; as St. Paul was "apostle of the Gentiles.") The prophet threatens all these people that they should drink the cup of God's wrath. This prophecy was not perfectly fulfilled till after the destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans.

In the fourth year of Jehoiakim, Nebuchadnezzar besieged Jerusalem, took Jehoiakim and others, among whom was Daniel. He designed to carry them all to Babylon; but he set Jehoiakim at liberty, and sent the other captives thither. In this year Jeremiah positively foretold the captivity of the Jews, and its duration for seventy years, after which God would punish the Chaldeans and Babylonians in their turn.

In this year likewise, the prophet was ordered to write what had been revealed to him, from the thirteenth year of Josiah, to this time, chap. xxxvi. He dictated his prophecies to Baruch, and directed him to read them in the temple, himself being in fetters by the king's command. Baruch, in the fifth year of Jehoiakim went to the temple, and on the great day of expiation read before the concourse of people the unwelcome predictions of Jeremiah. The king was informed of all, and Baruch was examined concerning the manner, wherein this volume was dictated by Jeremiah. The king heard three or four columns of it read; then, being angry, he cut it with a pen-knife, and threw it into the fire, commanding Baruch and Jeremiah to be seized. Jeremiah received orders to dictate a second time to Baruch what was thus burnt; and God added many new things.

Jeremiah one day, by God's order, brought the Rechabites into the temple, and presented wine to them. They declined drinking it, saying, that Jonadab, their ancestor, had forbid them; also, that he allowed them to lodge in tents only, adding, that necessity alone had impelled them to enter the city, the Chaldeans being masters of the country, and not suffering them to live there. From this circumstance we judge, that this was during the siege of Jerusalem, in the seventh and last year of Jehoiakim. Jeremiah took occasion from this to reproach the Jews with their little submission to God's laws, while the Rechabites shewed so much to the orders of their ancestor. Comp. JEHOADAB.

Some little time after, Jehoiakim was taken, killed, and thrown by the Chaldeans into a common sewer. His son Jehoiachin succeeded, and reigned three months only: he too was taken by the Chaldeans, and carried captive to Babylon. Zedekiah succeeded Jehoiachin.

The countries of Moab, Ammon, Edom, Tyre, and Sidon, sent ambassadors to Zedekiah in the beginning of his reign. To each of these ambassadors, Jeremiah gave a yoke to carry to their masters, with orders to tell them from God, that whosoever should refuse submission to Nebuchadnezzar, should be compelled to it. Jeremiah said the same to Zedekiah: and as the prophet wore bonds and yokes on his neck, hinting to the Israelites their approaching captivity, Hananiah, a false prophet, laid hold of these, and breaking them publicly, said, "Thus will the Lord break the yoke which Nebuchadnezzar would impose on the Jews." As Jeremiah was retiring, God secretly directed him to return, and tell Hananiah, that "instead of the wooden yoke which he had broken, king Nebuchadnezzar would put on them (the Jews) another of iron: and since you (Hananiah) abuse the name of God with your lies, you shall die before the end of this year." Accordingly, he died within two months.

We are of opinion, that in the reign of Zedekiah, Jeremiah received God's orders to go to some cavern near the Euphrates, and hide there a linen girdle. Some time afterwards he returned to the same place, and found the girdle all rotted; prefiguring God's desertion of Judah, which heretofore he had valued as a girdle. In the fourth year of the same prince, Seraiah, Baruch's brother, being sent to Babylon, probably to desire of Nebuchadnezzar the restitution of the vessels belonging to the temple, Jeremiah gave him his prophecies against Babylon, with directions to read them to the captive Jews; then to fasten them to a stone, and throw them into the river Euphrates, chap. l. li. 1, 2—59, 61, 62. Jeremiah wrote again to the same captives, by Gemariah, whom the king sent to Babylon, advising them to settle in that country, to build houses and marry there, because their captivity was to last seventy years. Shemaiah, at Babylon wrote to Zephaniah, one of the chief priests, and reproved him for permitting Jeremiah to write these things. Zephaniah read the letter to Jeremiah, and this prophet wrote again to the captives of Babylon, and foretold to Shemaiah, that he should die in captivity, and that neither he, nor any of his posterity, should see the deliverance of Judah.

While Nebuchadnezzar was besieging Jerusalem, in the tenth year of Zedekiah, Jeremiah, who was continually prophesying adversities, was imprisoned in the court of the place. Hanameel, son of Jeremiah's uncle, visited the prophet, and told him, that the right of redeeming a certain field at Anathoth was his. Jeremiah bought the field, sealed the writings, and paid the money for it. He committed the writings to Baruch, to keep them, because, added he, the time will come, when this land will be again cultivated and inhabited. Vide FRAGMENT, No. LXXX.

During the siege, the king and the inhabitants of Jerusalem liberated their slaves, because it was a Sabbatical year; but Nebuchadnezzar having left the siege, to oppose the king of Egypt, who advanced to its relief, the king and people seized their slaves again, regardless of their word, or of the law of God. Jeremiah hereupon threatened them terribly. After the siege was suspended, his liberty was given him, and Zedekiah, sent to him, recommending himself to his prayers. The prophet sent the king word, that Nebuchadnezzar would return against the city, that he would take it and reduce it to ashes. When he was retiring to Anathoth, the place of his nativity, the guards seized him, as a deserter, and the princes threw him into a dungeon, where his life was in great danger. Zedekiah some time afterwards released him from this place, and ordered bread for him every day while there should be any in the city.

Nebuchadnezzar returning to the siege of Jerusalem, and this prophet continuing to foretell calamities, the great men of Jerusalem complained to Zedekiah, who permitted them to do what they pleased with Jeremiah. They let him down into a muddy well where the prophet must have soon perished, if Ebedmelech had not informed the king, who commanded him to be taken out; but he was kept in the court of the prison till the city was taken.

Jeremiah with other captives was carried to Ramath; but as Nebuchadnezzar had charged Nabuzaradan, his general, to give Jeremiah his liberty, Nabuzaradan gave him the choice of going to Babylon, or staying in Judæa. The prophet chose the last, and went to Gedaliah at Mizpah. Here they lived in security, when Ishmael, son of Nethaniah, murdered Gedaliah.

Johanan having got together as many Jews as he could at Bethlehem, they consulted Jeremiah, whether they should stay in Judæa, or retire into Egypt, chap. lxii. The prophet desired time to consult God; after ten days he answered them, that if they went into Egypt, they would there perish by the sword, famine, and pestilence; if they continued in Judah, God would preserve them. The principal of the people asserted, that this answer proceeded not from God, but from Baruch, to divert them from going into Egypt. They resolved therefore to go thither, and compelled Jeremiah and Baruch to accompany them. Here this prophet uttered several predictions against the Jews and Egyptians—that Nebuchadnezzar would invade the country; he described the very place where he would erect his throne;—and he threatened the king of Egypt, that God would give him into the hands of the Chaldeans, as he had given Zedekiah.

Several of the ancients maintain, that Jeremiah was put to death at Taphnis in Egypt, by the Jews, who were enraged at his menaces and reproaches; and they explain Heb. xi. 37. They were stoned, as relating to his death. Some rabbins think he returned into Judæa; others that he died in Babylon. Beside the book of his prophecies, we have his Lamentations in five chapters, which are mournful songs, composed on occasion of those calamities which befel Jerusalem by the Chaldeans. This opinion we think is the best founded. Others think Jeremiah composed these songs on the death of king Josiah. It is certain that he wrote Lamentations on that subject, 2 Chron. xxxv. 25, but they have not come down to us. He is said likewise to be the author of Psalm cxxxvii.; and some assert that he with Ezekiel, composed Psalm lxv. Some authors affirm that he compiled the two books of Kings; because the last chapter of Jeremiah is the same with the last chapter of the second book of Kings. But the reason is, the last chapter of Jeremiah was taken from the second book of Kings, as a supplement to his prophecy. There are citations in 2 Maccabees ii. 3, from writings of Jeremiah, which were extant A. M. 3880, ante A. D. 124. The fathers often cite Baruch under the name of Jeremiah, because Baruch is generally mentioned at the end of his master's prophecies.

It is said, 2 Macc. xv. 13, that Jeremiah appeared after his death to Judas Maccabæus with that holy high-priest Onias, and gave him a sword of gold, very bright and glittering, saying, "Take this holy sword, the gift of God, with which thou shalt wound the adversaries." At the same time Onias shewing him Jeremiah, said, "This is a lover of the brethren, who prayeth much for the people and for the holy city."

The Alexandrian chronicle relates, that Jeremiah when in Egypt, foretold to the priests, that their idols would be overthrown by an earthquake, when the Saviour of the world should be born, and lying in a manger; from that time they had a virgin represented with a child lying in a manger, and paid divine honours to it. King Ptolemy asking the priests the reason of this, they told him what Jeremiah had prophesied. The Chronicle adds, that Alexander the Great visiting this prophet's tomb, and being informed of his predictions concerning his person and conquests, ordered his body to be removed to Alexandria; and a magnificent monument to be erected for him. John Moschus, in his Pratum Spirituale, chap. 17. likewise relates this circumstance; adding that Jeremiah was very much honoured in that part of Alexandria called Tetraphylus.

Eupolemus, cited in Eusebius, offers some particulars of the life of Jeremiah, of equal uncertainty. We read 2 Macc. ii. 4, 5, 6. that Jeremiah having taken the sacred fire, concealed it in a cistern, where, when the Jews returned from the captivity, they found only some muddy water, which however became enflamed when poured poured on the altar; also that he removed the tabernacle and the ark to mount Nebo, and hid them in a cave, where they remain to this day.

Ecclesiasticus, xlix. 7. in the encomium on this prophet, seems to draw his character from the persecutions he endured. St. Jerom observes, that Jeremiah's style is lower and more neglected than some others of the prophets (Isaiah's for example). This he ascribes to this prophet's birth and education at Anathoth, a village, or little country town. Other critics discover a sublimity, and greatness, in his style. Grotius thinks with reason, that his talent lay principally in touching and exciting the tender passions. In this kind the Lamentations are a master-piece.

[Perhaps, prolonged odour, "Scented town," At least, we are sure that this city produced balsam, honey, cypress trees, myrobalans, roses, and other odoriferous plants. It was also known as the city of palm trees; and this character, derived from its situation, was likely to be expressed in its name. Deut. xxxiv. 3.]

JERICHO, a city of Benjamin, about seven leagues from Jerusalem, and two from Jordan. Josh. xviii. 21. Josephus Antiq. lib. iv. 5. says, that in the territory of this city were not only many palm-trees, but likewise the balsam-tree. The valley of Jericho was watered by a rivulet which had been formerly salt and bitter; but was sweetened by the prophet Elisha, 2 Kings ii. 19. Jericho was the first city in Canaan, taken by Joshua. Josh. ii. 1, 2, &c. He sent spies thither, who were received by Rahab, and preserved from the king of Jericho. See RAHAB.

Joshua received God's orders to besiege Jericho, soon after his passage over Jordan, and perhaps on the evening before, or on the very day of the first passover, which the Hebrews celebrated in Canaan. Josh. vi. 1, 2, 3, &c. The manner of the siege was very extraordinary.

God commanded them once a day for seven successive days to march round the city. The soldiers marched first (probably beyond the reach of the enemies' arrows,) after them the priests, the ark, &c. On the seventh day they marched seven times round the city; and at the seventh, while the trumpets were sounding, and all the people shouting, the walls fell down. The first day the Rabbins say, was, (our) Sunday, and the seventh the sabbath-day. During the first six days the people continued in profound silence; but on the seventh Joshua commanding them to shout, they all exerted their voices; and the walls being overthrown, they entered the city, every man in the place opposite to him.

This city being cherem (see CHEREM, or ANATHEMA,) they set fire to it, and consecrated all the gold, silver, and brass. Then Joshua said, Cursed be the man before the Lord, who shall rebuild Jericho. Hiel of Bethel, about 537 years afterwards, rebuilt it. 1 Kings xvi. 34. He lost his eldest son, Abiram at laying the foundations, and his youngest son Segub, when he hung up the gates. Vide FRAGMENT, No. V.

However we are not to imagine, that there was no city of Jericho till the time of Hiel. There was a city of palm trees, the same probably as Jericho, under the judges, under Eglon king of Moab. Judg. iii. 13. David's ambassadors, who had been insulted by the Ammonites, resided at Jericho till their beards were grown again, 2 Sam. x. 4, 5. There was therefore a city of Jericho, but it stood in the neighbourhood of the original Jericho. Doubdan, Voyage de la Terre Sainte, cap. 37. Josephus distinguishes these two places, when he says, de Bello, lib. v. cap. 4. that in his time near ancient Jericho, which was destroyed by Joshua, there was a fountain which abounded with water. But after Hiel of Bethel had rebuilt old Jericho, no one scrupled to dwell there. Herod built a very beautiful palace at Jericho. Our Saviour wrought miracles at Jericho; here he invited himself to Zacchæus, &c.

The Rose of JERICHO is mentioned Eccclus. xxiv. 18. Quasi plantatio Rosa in Jericho, with approbation, and in the writings of travellers; though we may well question whether what Scripture calls the rose of Jericho, be what the moderns understand by that name. Several virtues are ascribed to it, without foundation. E. gr. If it be left some time in water, it opens, and blows; out of the water, it closes again; and this in all seasons of the year. See BALSAM-TREE.

[In FRAGMENT No. V. we ventured to associate Jericho with other towns producing abortion: we then omitted the testimony of Josephus, who who says, Ant. lib. v. cap. 1. "Near Jericho is a very plentiful spring—it riseth near the old city—of which spring there is a report, that in former times it did not only make the fruits of the earth and of the trees to decay, but also the offspring of women; and was universally deleterious, &c. but this was amended by Elisha, &c. and these waters have now so great a virtue in them, that wherever they are conveyed, they produce very speedy ripeness."

To these observations on the nature of the soil of Jericho, we may add, that the Rabbins mention another place in the mountains of Judah, which they call Caphtar-decaraim, because, "unless the women departed from this town to some other place, they could not bring forth male children,"—meaning, they were liable to abortions. Hieros. Taanith, fol. 69. 1.

Strabo, lib. xvi. mentions the groves of palm trees, and other garden plants; the royal court, the paradise for balsam, &c. at Jericho.

Jericho was the second city in Judea: in its royal palace Herod died; it had also a hippodrome and an amphitheatre. There is a tradition, says the Jerusalem Talmud, Taanith, fol. 67. 4. that there were at least twelve thousand priests, at Jericho, ready to supply any deficiency that might occur at Jerusalem. Comp. Luke x. 31, 32.

The wheat at Jericho was gathered before the first fruits at Jerusalem; as the productions of this neighbourhood were much forwarder in respect of ripeness.

Some have supposed that the Pannag of Ezek. xxvii. 17. is the balsam which grew at Jericho; but others think Pannag is Panicum.

D'Arvieux thus describes the state of Jericho; in his time, A. D. 1659. "After having travelled a quarter of a league in the plain, we encamped near to the gardens of Jericho, by the side of a small brook; and while our supper was preparing, we walked in the gardens, and among the ruins of Jericho. This very ancient city is now desolate, and consists of only about fifty poor houses, in bad condition, wherein the labourers who cultivate the gardens shelter themselves. The plain around is extremely fertile; the soil is middling fat; but, it is watered by several rivulets, which flow into the Jordan. Notwithstanding these advantages, only the gardens adjacent to the town are cultivated.

"We saw here abundance of those trees which are called in Arabic Zacoun; they are furnished with thorns like Acacias, and resemble bushes. They bear fruits the size of large plums; the stone of which resembles a rough sided melon. These are pounded, and the kernel yields an oil, which is a kind of balsam, perfectly good against bruises, cold tumours, nervous contractions, and rheumatisms.

"We visited the fountain of the prophet Elisha, which for many ages has furnished water for the gardens; it was formerly bitter, but was healed by that prophet. The head of this water is enclosed in a bason of a triangular shape, of which each side is about three fathoms in length. It is lined with wrought stone, and is even paved in parts. There are two niches in one of its sides, which is higher than the others, and an orifice by which the water issues in a stream sufficient to turn a mill. It is said that several sources discharge themselves into the same bason; but their depth prevents them from being explored.

"We found in this bason fishes of middling size, and cray-fish, which are so tame, that they come to the edge of the bank so soon as they perceive any body sitting there and eating. The country people have used them to this familiarity, by always giving them a share of their food. It is extremely strictly forbidden to Christians to fish for them, or to frighten them. The Greeks would infallibly excommunicate whoever should transgress in this instance. Adjoining to this bason is a fig tree, of as great dimensions, and as well furnished with branches and foliage as can possibly be seen. Were it not for the shadow of this tree the water in the fountain would be so heated as not to be drinkable. The peasants who labour in the environs come here to make their meals, in the season of the heats; which are altogether extraordinary in this country.

"In returning to our tents we passed by some ruins on the side of a hill, where is a cistern and some buildings, with a channel which conveys to the Jordan the waters of a spring which issues on the mountains of Quarantania."

Volney adds but little to this account. "Jericho is now called Raha, or Eriha; it is six leagues N. E. of Jerusalem, and stands in a plain six or seven leagues long by three wide, around which are a number of barren mountains that render it extremely hot. The thorns of the zakkoun, are four inches long, with leaves like those of an olive tree, but narrower, greener, and prickly at the end; its fruit is a kind of acorn without a calix, under the rind of which is a pulp, and then a nut. The oil sells very dear; and is the sole commerce of Raha." Trav. vol. ii. p. 322.

"The brook of Elisha," says Dr. Shaw, "which flows from the mountain of Quarantania, and waters the gardens of Jericho, together with its plantations of plum trees (the Zacoun) and date trees, hath its banks adorned with several species of brook-lime, lysimachia, water cresses, betony, and other aquatic plants; all of them very like those that are the produce of England.

And

And, indeed, the whole scene of vegetables, and of the soil which supports them, hath not those particular differences and varieties, that we might expect in two such distant climates." P. 369. fol. edit. Maundrell calls Jericho, "a poor nasty village of the Arabs." Chateaubriand says, "At present there are neither roses nor palm-trees at Jericho."]

JERICON, JERCON, or JARKON, a town of Dan. Josh. xix. 46. Me-jarkon, signifies the waters of Jarkon. This place was near Joppa.

JERIEL, יִרְיָאֵל, Irsayal, fear, or vision, or projection of God. See JERIAH. 1 Chr. vii. 2.

JERIMOTH, יִרְמִיָּה eminences; from יָרָם ramam: otherwise, he that fears, that sees, that rejects death: from יָרָה, (see Jeriah) and מוֹת maveth, or muth, death. A city in the south of Judah. See JARMUTH.

JEREMOTH. There were several persons of this name, but we know nothing of their lives. See 1 Chron. vii. 17. viii. 14. xxiii. 13. xxiv. 30. xxv. 4, &c.

JERIOTH, יִרְיָעוֹת, curtains; from יָרָה jeriah: or, confused cries; from יָרוֹחַ ruoh, or יָרִיחַ riah: or ruptures; from יָרָחַ raah. 1 Chr. ii. 18.

JEROBOAM, יִרְבֵּעַם, he that rejects or opposes the people; from יָרָה jarah, to reject: or cause, or dispute of the people; from יָרָב rub, to plead, to dispute: otherwise, that multiplies the people; from יָרָב rabab, to multiply, and חָם ham, the people.

I. JEROBOAM, son of Nebat, who made Israel to sin, is often characterized in Scripture, as author of the schism and idolatry of the ten tribes; he was son of Nebat, and of a widow named Zeruah: and was born at Zereda, in Ephraim. Jeroboam was bold and enterprising. Solomon gave him commission to levy the taxes of Ephraim and Manasseh. One day when Jeroboam went out of Jerusalem, going alone into the country, the prophet Ahijah met him wearing a new cloak. 1 Kings xi. 29. There were only these two in the field. Ahijah taking his cloak, rent it in twelve pieces, and said to Jeroboam, Take ten to thyself; for the Lord will rend the kingdom of Solomon, and give ten tribes to thee. See FRAGMENT, No. CLIX.

Jeroboam, already disaffected, began to incite the people to revolt. But Solomon having intelligence of his designs, Jeroboam fled into Egypt, and there continued till the death of Solomon. Rehoboam, behaving in a haughty and menacing manner, ten of the tribes separated from the house of David; and Jeroboam returning from Egypt, these ten tribes invited him among them to a general assembly, in which they appointed him king over Israel. He fixed his residence at Shechem.

Jeroboam forgetting the fidelity due to God, who had given him the kingdom, resolved to make two golden calves, in imitation probably of the god Apis, to place one at Dan, the other at Bethel. "Henceforth," said he, to his people, "go no more to Jerusalem."—Vide CALF, GOLDEN.

He appointed a solemn feast on the fifteenth day of the eighth month, to dedicate his new altar, and consecrate his golden calves; and himself went up to the altar to offer incense and sacrifices. 1 Kings xiii. At that time a man of God (generally believed to be the prophet Iddo), came from Judah to Bethel by God's direction, and seeing Jeroboam at the altar, he cried, "O Altar, Altar, thus saith the Lord; a child shall be born to the house of David, by name Josiah, and upon thee shall he sacrifice the priests of the high-places, who now burn incense upon thee: he shall burn men's bones upon thee," &c. The king, who was standing by the altar, stretching out his hand, commanded the prophet to be seized: but the hand he so stretched out, became withered, and he could not draw it back. The altar immediately was broken, and the fire with the ashes fell on the ground. Then the king said; "Pray to God, that he may restore my hand." The man of God besought the Lord, and the king's hand was restored.

An event so extraordinary, did not recover Jeroboam from his impiety. This was the sin of Jeroboam's family, and the cause of its extirpation. He died after a reign of twenty-two years; Nadab his son succeeded him.

II. JEROBOAM the second, king of Israel, was son of Jehoash. He succeeded his father, A. M. 3179, ante A. D. 825. He reigned forty-one years. He walked in the evil ways of Jeroboam son of Nebat. 2 Kings xiv. 23. His reign was long and happy. He restored the kingdom of Israel to its splendour, from which it had fallen under his predecessors, he reconquered those provinces and cities which the kings of Syria had usurped, and he extended his authority over all the countries beyond Jordan, to the Dead Sea.

The prophets Hosea, Amos, and Jonah, prophesied under Jeroboam II. We see by their writings, that in his reign, idleness, effeminacy, extravagance, and injustice, polluted Israel; that the licentiousness of the people in point of religion was extreme; that they not only frequented Dan and Bethel, the golden calves, but Mizpah in Gilead, Beersheba, Tabor, Carmel, Gilgal, and wherever God had at any time appeared to the Patriarchs; also, almost all the high-places in Israel. Not that they always worshipped idols there; but they exposed themselves to disorders, by frequenting assemblies of so much licentiousness. In his reign several articles of the ceremonial monial law were observed in Israel. The first fruits and tythes were paid; the feasts and sabbaths were observed; and Nazarites were consecrated. See Amos, chap. ii. iv. v. viii.

JEROHAM, יְרוֹחַם pitiful; from רָחַם rechem: or well-beloved, from the Syriac. 1 Chr. vi. 27.

JERUBBAAL, יְרֻבְעָל, he that disputes, or defends Baal, or that revenges the idol: otherwise, let Baal defend his cause; from רֹב rub, to dispute, plead, or defend, and בַּעַל baal, an idol. Gideon's surname, after he had destroyed Baal's grove, and his father had said it was Baal's business to avenge it. Judg. vi. 31, 32. See GIDEON.

JERUBESHETH, יְרֻבְשֶׁת, Ἰεροβᾶσῃ, Jerobesheth, let the idol of confusion defend itself: from רֹב rub, to struggle, to plead, and בֹּשׁ bosh, shame; or בִּשְׁת bosheth, idol, infamous. A play of words on Jerubbaal.

JERUEL, יְרוּעַל, fear of God, or vision of God; from יָרָא jarah, to fear; or רָאָה raah, to see, and אֵל el, God. [Called the valley of Berachah, or blessing; between Engaddi, and Tekoa. 2 Chron. xx. 26.] King Jehoshaphat obtained a great victory over the Ammonites, Moabites, &c. in the wilderness of Jeruel: west of the Dead Sea in the south of Judah, not far from Ziz.

JERUSALEM, יְרוּשָׁלַיִם, Ἱερουσόλυμα, vision of the perfect; or of the pacific; from רָאָה to see, or vision; and שָׁלוֹם shalom, peace, or perfection.

JERUSALEM, called anciently Jebus or Salem. Some call it Solyra or Ierosolyra; the Hebrews called it Jeruschalaim or Jeruschelem: q. the vision of peace, or the possession, or inheritance of peace. [Or perfect, or consummate vision: otherwise, perfect, or consummate fear. Simon thinks "the possession of peace," or "the peaceful possession." Josh. x. i.—In the dual form, implying an upper and lower town. In the Chaldee, this termination is rather plural than dual, implying several divisions.

The Rabbins say this name is compounded of Jirch and Shalem. The first was the name given by Abraham to the place where he purposed to sacrifice his son; the latter, say they, was the name given to the royal station of Melchizedek, i. e. Shem: now, God being unwilling to offend either of these patriarchs, by adopting one name only, he combined them; whence, Jeru-Shalem. Berish. Rabba, sect. ix. Aruch, in Jerusalem.]

Joshua (xviii. 28.) gave Jerusalem to Benjamin. He slew the king of Jerusalem in the famous battle of Gibeon; yet it appears from other passages, that the Jebusites continued to hold it till David's time, 2 Sam. v. and it is said expressly, that the children of Benjamin did not drive the Jebusites out of Jerusalem, Judg. i. 21.

Jerusalem being on the frontiers of the two tribes of Benjamin and Judah is sometimes referred to one, sometimes to the other; Benjamin had most right to it by Joshua's division; and Judah might claim it by right of conquest, having twice subdued it; first under the Judges, afterwards under David.

After the Lord had declared his choice of Jerusalem for the place of his habitation, and temple, it was considered as the metropolis of the Jewish nation, as belonging to all Israel in common, and not properly either to Benjamin or to Judah. Joseph. de Bello, lib. iii. cap. 5. iv. cap. 6.

The city of Jerusalem was built on hills, and was encompassed with mountains, Psalm cxxv. 2. in a stony and barren soil, and was about sixty furlongs in length, says Strabo, lib. xvi. Adjacent to Jerusalem, were the fountains of Gihon and Siloam, and the brook Kidron; also the waters of Ethan, which Pilate conveyed through aqueducts into the city. Joseph. de Bello, lib. ii. cap. 15. The ancient city Jebus, which David took from the Jebusites, was not large. It stood on a mountain, south of that whereon the temple afterwards stood. Here David built a new city, which he called the city of David, wherein was the royal palace.

Between these mountains lay the valley of Millo, which David and Solomon filled up to join the two cities, 1 Kings ix. 15, 24. xi. 27. After the reign of Manasseh, there is mentioned another city, called the Second, inclosed with walls by that prince. 2 Chron. xxiv. 22. xxxiii. 14. and 2 Kings xxii. 24. The Maccabees considerably enlarged Jerusalem on the north, inclosing a third hill. Josephus speaks of a fourth hill called Bezetha, which Agrippa joined to the former. This new city lay north of the temple, along the brook Kidron. Wherefore Jerusalem had never been so large, as when it was attacked by the Romans. It was then thirty three furlongs in circumference: nearly four miles and an half. Josephus informs us, that the wall of circumvallation, which Titus made, was thirty-nine furlongs; or four miles, eight hundred seventy-five paces. Others admit a much larger extent. See Villalpandus for the affirmative; and Reland for the negative, Palæstin. tom. 2. lib. iii. Vide the MAPS of JERUSALEM.

It is a general opinion, that Melchisedek was king of Jerusalem; but there is some difficulty in this. Jerom thinks that the Salem, of Melchisedek, was a village near Scythopolis, where the ruins of that prince's palace were visible in his time; Ep. ad Evangelicum, Gen. xiv. 18. The author of the Paschal Chronicle says likewise, that he saw the village where was formerly house of God. 1 Macc. i. 62. Things continued thus for three years. Judas Maccabæus having defeated Nicanor, Gorgias, and Lysias, went up to Jerusalem, purified the temple, and restored the sacrifices. 1 Macc. iv. 36, &c.

The year following, Antiochus Eupator was received by Judas Maccabæus in Jerusalem, after peace had been concluded between them. This prince honoured the temple; and made presents to it. But before he left the city, he gave directions for pulling down the wall between the temple and the citadel, which secured the holy place from the attempts of the Syrians. This citadel, which kept Jerusalem dependent on the kings of Syria, stood twenty-six years, from A. M. 3836 to 3862, when it was demolished by Judas Maccabæus.

Antiochus Sidetes after he had ravaged the open country of Judea, compelled Hircanus to retreat to Jerusalem, where he besieged him, 4 Macc. ii. but meeting with a vigorous resistance, he incamped at the distance of two furlongs, from the temple, toward the north, and erected a hundred and thirty towers, on which he placed soldiers, to drive away all who defended the walls. As they were carrying on the sap, they discovered the foundations of them to be laid on wood; Antiochus therefore set fire to it, which threw down a great part of the wall: but the besieged appeared on the breach, and stopped their enemies. At the same time Hircanus made a vigorous sally on the besiegers, and compelled Antiochus to retreat; after which Hircanus burnt the towers.

Jerusalem enjoyed pence till the reign of Hircanus and Aristobulus, sons of Alexander king of the Jews. Hircanus, as the eldest, had been acknowledged king; but stupidity and laziness rendering him unfit to reign, Aristobulus his brother made himself master of the kingdom, and after Hircanus had been on the throne three years, he obliged him to relinquish it, having overcome him in a battle near Jericho, and forced him in the temple, A. M. 3938, ante A. D. 66. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiv. cap. 1.

Aretas king of the Arabians, having undertaken to restore Hircanus, and besieging Aristobulus in Jerusalem, the two brothers addressed themselves to Pompey, then in the east, desiring his protection. Pompey undertook to re-establish Hircanus, and to exclude Aristobulus; he attacked Jerusalem, took it, entered the temple, and went into the sanctuary; but touched nothing in that holy place. He left great treasures there, and above all admired the attachment of the priests to their religious services, which neither the alarms of the siege, nor the sword of the conqueror, could induce them to interrupt. The day after the temple was taken, he commended it to be purified, and sacrifices to be offered. A. M. 3940, ante A. D. 64. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiv. cap. 8. de Bello, lib. i. cap. 5.

Some years after, Julius Cæsar, at the request of Hircanus, and in consideration of his services in Egypt, permitted him to rebuild the city walls. The decree was prepared at Rome, and no sooner was it brought to Jerusalem, but Antigonus set people to work, and it became very suddenly as strong as it had been before. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiv. cap. 17. As the city was considerably enlarged afterwards, king Agrippa enclosed the new town with walls; but Narsus, præfect of Syria, representing this to the Emperor Claudius, the emperor forbade his proceeding. Josephus says that had he been suffered to go on, he had made the walls so high and so strong, that no human power could have forced them. Tacitus, Hist. lib. v. cap. 12. remarks, that when Titus besieged Jerusalem, it included two great hills fortified with very strong walls, not drawn in a straight line, but with angles in and out, and towers; so that the enemy who attacked them, might lie open on the sides, and expose his flanks to the besieged. Duos colles immensum editos claudebant muri per artem obliqui, ac introrsum sinuati ut latera oppugnantium ad ictus patescerent. This was the good and ancient way of fortifying places, according to Vitruvius, lib. i. cap. 2. and Vegetius, de Re Mil. lib. iv. cap. 2.

Antigonus, son of Aristobulus, supported by the Parthians, some years after attacked his uncle Hircanus in Jerusalem. Herod and Phasael defended the city: but Hircanus and Phasael going to treat with Pacorus, the king of Parthia's son, they were both seized and loaded with fetters. Herod was forced to leave the city and save himself by flight. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xv. cap. 24, 25. de Bello, lib. i. cap. 11. He went to Rome, where, by the interest of Mark Antony and Cæsar, he procured the title of king from the senate. He returned to Palestine, and being assisted by Sosius, who commanded in Syria, he besieged Antigonus in Jerusalem, A. M. 3966, and 3967, who surrendered after a siege of five months. Archelaus, son and successor of Herod the Great, being exiled, Judæa was reduced into a province, under the governor of Syria. The Romans kept a garrison in the citadel Antonia, till the last rebellion of the Jews, which begun by their besieging this fortress, wherein they forced and destroyed the Roman garrison. The year following, A. D. 70, Titus besieged the city, burnt it, and reduced it to a wilderness. Josephus, de Bell. Jud. lib. vii. cap. 18. remarks, that Titus, after he had taken Jerusalem, commanded his soldier to demolish it, except three of the largest and most beautiful towers; these he was desirous of preserving as a monument of the valour and power of the Romans. The towers were those of Phasaël, Hippicus, and Mariamne. He likewise left standing, the city wall on the west side, to serve as a rampart to the Roman camp and troops. All the rest of the city was levelled, so that they who had never before seen it, could scarcely persuade themselves that it had been inhabited.

The Jewish authors assure us, that Turnus Rufus, or rather Terentius Rufus, whom Titus left in command, ploughed up the ground on which the temple had stood, that none might ever after rebuild it. The Roman laws indeed prohibited the rebuilding of places where this ceremony had been performed, without first obtaining permission from the senate: but it is believed, that the ground on which the temple stood was not ploughed up till after the revolt of the Jews under Adrian. Some are of opinion, (Hieron. in Zach. cap. viii.) that Jerusalem was not so totally destroyed but that some inhabitants remained there; whether amid the ruins, with the Roman troops, or near them; or in private dwellings.

St. Epiphanius affirms, that the house whither the Apostles retired after the ascension of Jesus Christ, and in which they received the Holy Ghost, was preserved; together with seven synagogues, near it, on mount Sion. Besides, we know the names of several bishops of the Hebrew race, who governed the church of Jerusalem, to Adrian's time, when a bishop was chosen from among the uncircumcised.

Eusebius, Demonstrat. Evan. lib. vi. goes farther than Epiphanius; for he insists that Titus preserved half the city, agreeably to the prediction of the prophet Zachary, xiv. 2. "Half of the city shall go forth into captivity, and the residue of the people shall not be cut off from the city:" meaning, that one portion of the city should be left, and that the whole should not be razed to the foundations till the time of Adrian. St. Jerom maintains, that mount Moriah, where the temple had stood, and Sion, where the palace had been, were left entire by Titus. Hieron. & Cyril. in Zach. xiv. All which is founded only on what Josephus says, of Titus's leaving that part of the wall standing, which enclosed Jerusalem on the west (which has been interpreted to include half the city) with the towers Phasaël, Hippicus, and Mariamne. It is farther presumed, with reason, that the tenth legion, which was appointed to the town, did not continue there alone; but that houses were preserved for their lodgings, and some families of Jews for their service.

The Rabbins pretend that God wrought continual miracles in the temple, and city of Jerusalem, such as, 1. No woman ever miscarried by smelling the meats sacrificed in the temple, or by eating to excess of them. 2. Flesh, placed on the altar, never corrupted, though left there several days without being consumed by the fire; which sometimes happened, when the quantity of victims was unusually great. 3. That the high-priest never contracted any pollution, the night before the great day of expiation. 4. The rain never extinguished the fire of the altar. 5. The wind did not hinder the smoke from rising like a pillar towards heaven. 6. There never was any defect or putrefaction in the manna preserved in the golden omer, nor in the shew-bread. 7. The Israelites never found themselves too much crowded in the court of the temple, let the assembly there be ever so numerous. 8. No one ever failed to get a lodging at Jerusalem, where he might lie. 9. Jerusalem never ceased to be holy after its consecration by Solomon: nothing that happened to it after that time was capable of profaning it.

They affirm farther, that this city was common to all the tribes; that it was not subject to the law, which required all murder committed within the confines of any tribe to be expiated by the sacrifice of a young heifer. No house in it belonged to him who had bought it, as his property. None was allowed to have gardens or orchards within the compass of the city; and when dead bodies were removed from one place to another, they were not permitted to be carried through the city, lest they should pollute it. There were but two sepulchres in the city, that of David, and that of Huldah, which had been built by the old prophets. These remarks are all taken from the Rabbins, whose exactness however is not always unexceptionable.

The Orientals, as well as the ancient Jews, call Jerusalem the Holy City, and sometimes the Holy House, by reason of the temple. Vide FRAGMENT, No. Llv. They call it likewise Thia, a corruption of Ælia, the name given it by the emperor Adrian. They affirm that Jerusalem was built by Melchisedek son of Shem, who removed thither the body of Adam, which had been kept by Noah in the ark. They also maintain, that it is situated in the centre of the habitable earth, according to the psalmist, "Thou hast wrought salvation in the midst of the earth." Psalm lxxiv. 12.

Mahomet, in the early years of his sect, commanded all Mussulmen to turn towards Jerusalem, at their devotions; and after his death, the generality of his companions were for burying him in that city. They believe, that the stone which Jacob anointed in his way to Mesopotamia nia was removed to Jerusalem, and placed on the mountain where Solomon's temple stood. After the ruin of that temple, the Christians built a magnificent church in the place; and the Turks becoming masters of the city, Omar, one of their caliphs, built a mosque near the same stone, to which, of all places of devotion frequented by them, next to those of Mecca and Medina, they principally go in pilgrimage; and their pilgrimages to Mecca having been interrupted by the incursions of the Carmates from the year 317 to 339 of the Hegira, the Mussulmen went to Jerusalem, and there performed their devotions. [Omar's Mosque still exists; and is one of the noblest specimens of Arabian architecture extant.]

The Cadi Gemaliddin, son of Vustel, writes that passing through Jerusalem in his way to Egypt, he saw Christian priests carrying glass bottles full of wine, and placing them on the Sakra, that is to say, on Jacob's stone, near to which the Mussulmen have built a temple.

ADDITION.

The history of Jerusalem, after the destruction of the city by Titus, presents little other than a series of struggles and desolations. The same persuasion, that it was the peculiar residence of Deity, and therefore could not be taken, continued to influence the Jewish nation with expectations of recovering it. Many of the Jewish Christians returned to the desolated city; and were suffered to inhabit it. But, in the time of Adrian, [A. D. 134 to 179. See ADRIAN, and БАР-СНОЧЕВА.] the Jews of Judea and the neighbouring countries rebelled; and this emperor completed the destruction of whatever could remind the Jews of their former polity. He forbade them from entering the city, on pain of death. He built a new city, which he named Ælia Adria Capitolina [See the PLATES: MEDALS of JERUSALEM.] He erected several temples to Heathen Divinities; and especially one very magnificent to Jupiter. He placed the figure of a hog over the gate leading to Bethlehem; and did his utmost to obliterate the memorials of Christianity as well as of Judaism. This state of things continued till the time of Constantine, the first Christian Emperor, (A. D. 306; died, 337;) notwithstanding occasional commotions under Antoninus, Septimus Severus, and Caracalla. Helena, mother of Constantine, built many churches in Judea, and in Jerusalem, about A. D. 326. Julian, who, after his father, succeeded to the empire of his uncle Constantine, endeavoured to rebuild the temple, but his design (and that of the Jews, whom he patronized) was frustrated, A. D. 363.

A. D.

501. Under Justinian, the Jews again revolted.

613. Jerusalem was taken by Cosroes, king of the Persians; who slew 90,000 of the inhabitants, and demolished, to the utmost of his power, whatever they (the Christians) had venerated.

627. Heraclius defeated Cosroes. Jerusalem recovered by the Greek Emperor.

636. Jerusalem taken from the Christians, by the Caliph Omar, after a siege of four months. He was assassinated here.

868. Ahmed, a Turk, sovereign of Egypt, conquered Jerusalem; but it was retaken by the caliphs of Bagdad, in 905.

936. Mahomet Ikschid, another Turk, sovereign of Egypt, subdued Jerusalem.

984. Ortok, a Turk of another race, took Jerusalem from the Egyptians; and left it to his family: after some years they were expelled by Mostali, caliph of Egypt.

1076. Meles Schah, a Seljuide Turk, took the Holy city: but, the descendants of Ortok, recovered possession of it; which they held till 1076, when they lost it to the Fatemites.

1099. Jerusalem was taken by the Crusaders, under Godfrey of Bouillon, (July 15.) who was elected king. He was succeeded by his brother Baldwin, who died 1118. [See their tombs, in the PLATE Chapel of the RENT in THE ROCK.] Having no son, Baldwin's eldest daughter Melisandra, conveyed the kingdom into her husband's family.

1188. Saladin, sultan of the East, captured the city; assisted by the treachery of Raymond, count of Tripoli, who was found dead in his bed, on the morning of the day in which he was to have delivered up the city. It was restored in 1242, to the Latin princes, by Saleh Ismael, emir of Damascus: they lost it in 1291, to the sultans of Egypt, who held it till 1382. Selim, the Turkish sultan, reduced Egypt and Syria including Jerusalem, in 1517. His son Solymán built the present walls in 1534. It continues under the Turkish dominion.

Thus we see that Jerusalem was destined to be subject to a neighbouring power, either from the North or from the South.—Amidst so many revolutions and destructions, it may well be supposed that few of its early antiquities retain their original appearance, or remain in a state to be recognized. Some have been continued by means of reparations, and restorations, by which the very heights and dimensions of the ground are changed. The Mounts Sion and Moriah are greatly levelled from what they once were; and only the places around the city, as the Mount of Olives, the Brook Kedron, &c. retain their former character.

For further particulars, see the various Plates referring to these places;—the PLANS of JERUSALEM, of the HOLY SEPULCHRE, of the TEMPLE, &c.; also, the MEDALS, &c. with their Explanations.]

[JERUSALEM, the New. This city furnishes, also, a metaphorical application of its name, in an exalted and spiritual sense. The first hint of this in the N. T. occurs, Gal. iv. 25, where the Apostle refers to the formation of the Hebrew nation into a Church state, by the giving of the law from Sinai; under which terrific and slavish dispensation, the "Jerusalem that now is," says he, "continues; but the Jerusalem above is free, which is the mother of us all,"—Gentiles as well as Jews (perhaps, Πάντων-μήτηρ, the UNIVERSAL MOTHER)—the formation of all mankind, as it were, (not of a single nation) into a Church state, beginning at Jerusalem, the city of peace; though properly originating in Heaven, the seat of the Celestial Jerusalem, the mansion of complete and uninterrupted tranquillity.

The metaphor is resumed, and enlarged by the writer of the Revelations; who describes a new Jerusalem—after the destruction of the former city, by Titus, Rev. iii. 12, "the city of my God, the new Jerusalem, which cometh down out of heaven, from my God." It appears, here, by its coming down from heaven, to refer to the Christian establishment, or church, which now had taken place of the Jewish. But, the same writer afterwards employs it in a still superior sense, chap. xxi. "And I saw a new heaven, and a new earth: for the first heaven and the first earth were passed away—and I saw the Holy City, new Jerusalem." This he describes at large, verse 10, et seq. in a strain of oriental metaphor, that can only agree to the celestial state; similar allusions to certain parts of its decorations, occur in Isaiah liv. 11. and in Tobit xiii. 16.

This Celestial city—called the Holy city, and the great city—had no temple, nor other peculiarities of the Jewish service; and the whole description of it, the dimensions, the parts, and the properties of it, are symbolical in the highest degree. The new Jerusalem on earth should be carefully distinguished from the new Jerusalem in heaven, in explaining this book; nor should it be forgot, that much of the scenery in it is conceived in the spirit of one who had been familiar with the courts, altars, &c. of that Jewish Jerusalem, and temple, of which he had lived to witness the destruction.]

JERUSHA, יְרוּשָׁה, he that possesses the inheritance; from יָרַשׁ jarash: otherwise, exiled, banished, rejected; from יָרַח jarah. Mother of Jotham, son of Uzziah, king of Judah. 2 Kings xv. 33.

JESAIAH, יֵשַׁעְיָה, 'Ισαΐα, salvation of the Lord; from יָשַׁע jashah, to save, and יָה jah, the Lord. Son of Pelatiah. 1 Chron. iii. 21.

JESHAIAH, יֵשַׁעְיָה, 'Ισαΐα, salvation of the Lord; from יָשַׁע jashah, to save, and יָה jah, the Lord. Son of Jeduthun, head of the eighth family of the Levites appointed for temple service. 1 Chron. xxv. 3.

JESHANA, יֵשָׁנָה, he that sleeps, or grows old; from יָשַׁן jashan: otherwise, he that changes; from שָׁנָה shanah. A city of Ephraim, 2 Chron. xiii. 19. the same perhaps as Zin, Num. xxxiv. 4. Eusebius and Jerom place Zin seven miles from Jericho, north.

JESHARELAH, יֵשָׁרְאֵל, 'Ισραήλ, or 'Ισραηλα, God that prevails: or he that surmounts God; from שָׁרַח sharah, to surmount or govern: otherwise, uprightness of God; from יָשָׁר jashar: or song of God; from שֹׁר shur, a song, and אֵל el, God. The seventh of the twenty-four families of Levites. 1 Chron. xxv. 14.

JESHEBIAB, יֵשֶׁבֶב, habitation, residence of the father; from יָשַׁב jashab, habitation, &c. otherwise, captivity; from שָׁבָה shabah: otherwise, conversion, or return of the father; from שָׁב shub, and אָב ab, father. Chief of the fourteenth family of priests. 1 Chron. xxiv. 13.

JESHER, יָשָׁר, 'Ισάρι, just, equitable: or, he that sings, that regards, or governs; from שֹׁר shur. Son of Caleb and Azubah, 1 Chr. ii. 18.

JESHIMON, יֵשִׁימֹן, solitude, desolation; from יָשַׁם jasham.

JESHIMON. Probably the same as Hesmona, Asemona, Esem, Esemon, and Esemona, a city in the wilderness of Maon, belonging to Simeon: in the south of Palestine, and even in Arabia Petræa. See 1 Sam. xxiii. 24. Joseph. Antiq. lib. vi. cap. 14. reads the wilderness of Simeon, instead of—the wilderness of Maon, where Jeshimon was situated.

JESHISHAI, יֵשִׁישַׁי, Σοῦσις, old, ancient; from יָשַׁשׁ jashash: otherwise, a present; from יָשַׁי shai: otherwise, he that rejoices; from יָשַׁשׁ shush. Of Gad, son of Jachdo. 1 Chr. v. 14.

JESHOAIAH, יֵשׁוּעָה, 'Ιεσῴα, the Lord that presses, or humbles; from יָשַׁח jeshac, to humble: or, meditation of the Lord; from שָׁח shuach, to meditate, and יָה jah, the Lord. 1 Chr. iv. 36.

JESHUA, יֵשׁוּעַ, ΣΑΥΙΟΥΡ, Saviour.

JESHUA, a city of Judah. Neh. xi. 26. Also, a Levite, 2 Chr. xxx. 15.

JESHUI, son of Saul. 1 Sam. xiv. 49.

[JESHURUN, upright, or righteous. See on the book of JASHER, article BIBLE.]

Translators

Translators differ in their ideas of this word, some rendering it, the just, or upright; others the beloved, others exchange it for Israel, or taking it as a diminutive, render it "little Israel." I am not satisfied with either. The upright, or righteous, seems contradictory to the charge of "waxing fat and kicking."—This ingratitude belongs not to the upright. Neither is it likely that little Israel should be used as a word of endearment to the person, &c. guilty of this misbehaviour; nor that Israel, in its little state, would thus behave, since this is the effect of being pampered. More probably, it rather expresses fullness, completeness, a state of sleekness: so we read, chap. xxxiii. 5. Moses was king in Jeshurun—say, the full congregation, the whole body, when the heads of the people, and tribes of Israel were assembled together; he was superior over them all: coincidentally, the sleek, the full-fed, the plump, he whose sides were made even, smooth—straight, (as the word denotes) by fatness—he kicked, &c. The idea of made straight, by fatness, in opposition to a lean, emaciated carcase, &c. appears to be plausible; moreover, the idea of the full body of Israel seems to be applicable where this word occurs, Deut. xxxiii. 26. Isaiah xlv. 2.]

JESIMIEL, יְשִׁמְיֵאל, the Lord has named me; from יָשָׁם shem, a name: otherwise, admiration, astonishment; from שָׁמַם shamam, and אֵל el, God. 1 Chron. iv. 36.

JESSE, יֵשׁוּ, Yesai, to be, or who is; from יָשָׁה jesh: otherwise, my present; from יָשָׁה shai.

JESSE, son of Obed, and father of David, Eliab, Abinadab, Shammah, Nethaneel, Raddai, and Ozem. David was the youngest son; but became the most illustrious. Ruth iv. 17, 22. 1 Chron. ii. 13. Matth. i. 5.

JESUL, יֵשׁוּעַ, Yeshu, who is equal, proper, placed; from יָשָׁה shavah: otherwise, flat country. Third son of Asher, head of a family. Numb. xxvi. 44. Comp. Gen. xlv. 17.

JESUS, יֵשׁוּעַ, THEOTZ, SAVIOUR. Vide JOSHUAH.

JESUS-CHRIST, son of God, the Messiah, and Saviour of the world, the first and principal object of the prophecies, who was prefigured and promised in the Old Testament, was expected and desired by the Patriarchs; the hope and salvation of the Gentiles; the glory, happiness, and consolation of Christians. The name Jesus, or, as the Hebrews pronounce it, Jehosuah, or Joshua, יְהוֹשֻׁעַ Jehosuah; Gr. Ἰησοῦς, signifies, he who shall save. No one ever bore this name with so much justice, nor so perfectly fulfilled the signification of it, as Jesus Christ, who saves from sin and hell, and hath merited heaven for us by the price of his blood.

The angel Gabriel had six months before foretold to Zechariah the birth of his son, John the Baptist, the forerunner of the Messiah, when God sent the same angel to Nazareth, a town of Galilee, to Mary, a virgin, espoused to Joseph, of the tribe of Judah, and family of David. Luke i. 28. Gabriel announced to her the operations of the Holy Spirit, within her: and as a sign of his veracity, informed her of the conception of her ancient cousin Elizabeth; whom Mary went immediately to visit. Vide ANNUNCIATION.

Towards nine months after this, an edict of the emperor Augustus, enjoined all persons in Judæa, to be registered in the place of their birth, or from whence they derived their descent. Luke ii. 1, &c. Joseph being of the tribe of Judah, and family of David, with Mary his espoused wife, went to Bethlehem; while waiting there, Mary was delivered of a son, in the stable where they were obliged to lodge, there being no room in the inn (or caravanserai) of the town. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. XXIII. CCLXI. Whether our Saviour was born the very night on which the Blessed Virgin arrived at Bethlehem, or some days after, has been questioned. The common opinion is, that he was born that very night: but the text of the gospel, which says, "that while they were there, she brought forth her first-born," certainly favours the contrary opinion, and seems to imply that they waited at Bethlehem some time; till their turn came to be enregistered.

The night of his birth he was visited by shepherds, who were informed of that circumstance by an angelic host.

On the eighth day, at his circumcision, he was called Jesus. Quickly afterwards there came wise men from the east to Jerusalem, seeking the new-born king of the Jews: saying that a star had denoted his birth to them. Herod, then at Jericho, under cure for the disease whereof he died (Joseph. Antiq. lib. xvii. cap. 8. de Bello, lib. i. cap. 21.), being informed of this enquiry, sent for the priests, and asked them were the Christ should be born?—They answered at Bethlehem. Then, enquiring diligently at what time the star had appeared to the wise men, he bid them go and find out the new king; and directly as they had seen him, come and inform him, that he too might worship him. The star conducted them to Bethlehem, and to the place where the child was. Here they adored Jesus, offered their presents, and being divinely warned, in a dream, perhaps the same night, of Herod's evil disposition, they returned by the other way into their own country. [i. e. South of the Dead Sea, instead of North of it.]

Forty days after the birth of Jesus, the time of Mary's purification being come, she went to the temple at Jerusalem, to present her first-born son, son, and to offer those sacrifices, which the law prescribed for women after lying-in. Luke ii. 22, &c. The good old man Simeon, filled with the Holy Ghost, came that instant into the temple; and taking Jesus in his arms, gave thanks to God, saying, "he should die contented, since he had seen that Saviour, the expectation of Israel." There was also a pious widow, named Anna, in the temple; who also praised God, and reported the birth of the Messiah.

After this, Joseph and Mary preparing to return to Nazareth, an angel warned Joseph in a dream, to fly with Jesus into Egypt. Now Herod understanding that the wise men were returned home, and fearing this new-born king might deprive him of his crown, he sent orders to slay all the male children under two years old in Bethlehem, and its confines. He died soon after, and Archelaus his son succeeded him. Joseph now returned into Judæa from Egypt, but when he understood that Archelaus reigned there, he chose rather to go to Nazareth, (in Galilee) out of the dominion of Archelaus. Here Jesus Christ dwelt, subject to Joseph and Mary, working at his father's trade, who was, as is generally believed, a carpenter, till the thirtieth year of A. D. which was the thirty-third year of the true age of Jesus.

Jesus, at the age of twelve years accompanied his parents to Jerusalem, to celebrate the passover, Luke, ii. 42—52. Joseph and Mary returning to Nazareth, and believing Jesus to be in the company, went a day's journey, not suspecting his absence; but in the evening, they sought him in vain. They went back the next day to Jerusalem, where they found him in the temple, sitting among the doctors, asking them questions, and hearing them. He returned with them to Nazareth.

After a long interval, of which we have no authentic memoir, John the Baptist, son of Zechariah, having lived to the age of thirty-two in the wilderness, came into the country about Jordan, preaching repentance, and proclaiming the long expected Messiah, as then present among the Israelites. A. M. 4032, A. D. 31. Matt. iii. 13, &c. Luke iii. 1—22.

Multitudes resorted to John, to be baptized; Jesus went to him also, but John, who by the Holy Spirit discovered him, said, "Rather should I receive baptism from thee." Jesus answered, "Suffer it to be so now; it is necessary, that I should thus fulfil all righteousness." John therefore baptized him. Jesus being come out of the water, while praying, the heavens were opened, and the Holy Ghost descended like a dove upon him, and a voice came from heaven, saying, "Thou art my beloved Son, in thee I am well pleased." Matt. iii. 13. Luke iii. 21, 22, &c.

After this, Jesus was led by the spirit into the wilderness, to be tempted of the devil; all whose temptations he piously withstood. See the history, Matth. iv. Luke iv.

Shortly after, when John was baptizing at Bethabara beyond Jordan, Jesus passed that way in his return from Galilee. John seeing him, said to two of his disciples, "Behold the Lamb of God, who beareth away the sins of the world!" Hereupon these two disciples, went with Jesus to his lodging, and continued that day with him. Toward evening, Andrew, having found his brother Simon, brought him to Jesus, who said, "Thou art Simon son of Jona (or Joanna;) thou shalt be called Cephas," (i. e. Stone, or Rock,—Peter). The next day, Jesus departed for Nazareth, accompanied by Andrew, Peter, and that other disciple, who first went with Andrew to visit Jesus, and whom some think was Bartholomew, or James son of Zebedee. Jesus on the way, met Philip; Philip followed him, and lighting on Nathanael, told him, "they had found the Messiah, in Jesus of Nazareth." Nathanael answered, "Can any good thing come out of Nazareth?" Philip replied, "come and see." Jesus saw Nathanael coming to him, and said, "Behold an Israelite indeed, in whom is no guile!" Nathanael answered him, "whence knowest thou me?" Jesus replied, "before Philip called thee, I saw thee under the fig-tree." (It is conjectured, that Nathanael was there at the time alluded to by Jesus, praying and beseeching God to discover the Messiah to him.) Then Nathanael answered him, "I see evidently, that thou art the Son of God, the king of Israel."

From Bethabara, Jesus went to Cana in Galilee, where being invited to a marriage-feast, with his mother and disciples, he changed water into wine, and wrought his first public miracle, John ii. 1—12. From thence he went to Capernaum, where he continued some days with his mother and his disciples, because he proposed to celebrate the passover at Jerusalem.

CHRIST'S FIRST PUBLIC PASSOVER.

Being come into the temple, he drove out the money-changers, and the sellers of beasts and birds for sacrifice. John ii. 13—21. When questioned as to his authority, he answered, "Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up again:" by which he alluded to his death and resurrection. While at Jerusalem, Nicodemus came by night to visit him: Jesus discoursed to him of baptism and regeneration; declared himself to be the light of the world, and the son of God from heaven. Nicodemus did not very readily understand these mysteries, but the sequel shews, that his faith and conversion were solid and real. John iii. 1, &c. From

From Jerusalem, Jesus went and resided in Judæa, and in the country about Jordan; where he began to baptize by his disciples; being himself employed in preaching. The number of those who resorted to him, was so great, that the disciples of John the Baptist grew jealous, and hinted their uneasiness to their master. But John answered, "He is the bridegroom, and I am only the friend of the bridegroom. John iii. 29.

John the Baptist being imprisoned by Herod the Tetrarch, (A. D. 31. Luke iii. 20.) Jesus fearing lest the Pharisees should induce Pilate to seize him also, on pretence, that he was too much followed by the people, retired to Galilee, which was part of Philip's Tetrarchy, where Pilate had no power. In the way he stopped near a small village called Sychar, inhabited by Samaritans: he sat down, greatly fatigued, near Jacob's well, and sent his disciples into the town to purchase provisions. In their absence, a woman of the place came to draw water; Jesus desired her to let him drink; and a very interesting conversation ensued.

The woman going to the town expressed her opinion of Jesus, and the Samaritan inhabitants came and invited him to enter their city. Jesus continued there two days, and many believed on him. John iv. 43.

On his arrival in Galilee, he preached in the synagogues. At Nazareth, he applied to himself the passage of Isaiah, lxi. 2. which describes the Messiah. The people of Nazareth admired his manner and doctrine, but were scandalized at the meanness of his descent, &c. He told them, that no prophet was honoured in his own country; that God was sovereign in dispensing his favours; and indeed, that he had formerly preferred heathen to native Israelites, and might do the same again. This liberal discourse so incensed the Nazarenes, that they led him to the top of a mountain, on which their city was built, designing to throw him down headlong; but Jesus passing through the midst of them retired to Capernaum.

He went a second time to Cana; where, an officer belonging to King Herod came, desiring him to cure his son, who was sick at Capernaum. Jesus told him he might return, his son was healed. On his way home, his servants met him, with the good news of his son's recovery, which began at the moment of our Saviour's telling him his son was cured, John iv. 46. Some days after, on the sea of Tiberias, Jesus called a second time, to more stated attendance on him, Peter and Andrew his brother, who were then employed in fishing. A little farther, he called the two brothers James and John, sons of Zebedee, who were likewise in their vessel. Matth. iv. 18, 19, 20, &c.

On a sabbath-day in the synagogue of Capernaum, he healed one possessed with a devil; at Simon's house, he cured his mother-in-law of a violent fever, Mark i. 21—29. Towards evening, all who had any sick persons, brought them to the door of the house, where Jesus was, and he healed them. The next day early in the morning, he retired alone into a desert place to pray. Peter and the other disciples sought him; and told him, that the multitude were eager to find him. But he carried them through the cities and villages of Galilee, where he preached the kingdom of God. His reputation spread throughout Syria; and sick were sent to him from all quarters. Matth. viii. 23, &c.

At his return from his journey, he went again to Capernaum, and being pressed with the multitude which attended to hear him, he entered into Simon Peter's ship, and from thence taught the people, who stood on the shore. He directed Peter to launch out into the deep, and let down his nets for a draught. Peter obeyed, and took so large a quantity of fish, that his nets broke. From thence Jesus went to the lake of Genesareth, and called Matthew, (otherwise Levi,) a publican, to follow him. See MATTHEW.

CHRIST'S SECOND PASSOVER.

While at Jerusalem, whither he went to celebrate the passover, Jesus cured one sick of the palsy, who had been thirty-eight years waiting at the pool of Bethesda. This cripple carrying his bed on the sabbath-day, caused scandal to the Jews, who receiving information that Jesus had commanded it, resolved on his death, as a blasphemer; also, a destroyer of the law, because he had declared that God was his father, John v. 1—47. Departing from Jerusalem, he passed through corn fields on a sabbath-day, and his disciples rubbed the almost ripe ears of corn within their hands, designing to eat the corn. The Pharisees complained of this to Jesus as a violation of the sabbath; but he justified their conduct by David's example, who in his necessity ate the shew-bread taken from before the Lord, 1 Sam. xxi. 4, 5, 6. and by that of the priests, who worked in the temple on the sabbath-day, &c.

The next sabbath-day, in the synagogue of Capernaum, he cured a man whose hand was withered. The Pharisees being exasperated, confederated with the Herodians, (see HERODIANS) to procure the death of Jesus. Our Saviour withdrew from Capernaum, to the sea-coast of Tiberias, whither a crowd of people followed to hear him, and to be cured of diseases, Matt. iv. 22. Overwhelmed with the multitude, he crossed the sea, and retired alone to a mountain, where he passed the night in prayer. The next morning morning he came down, chose twelve of his disciples to be Apostles, i. e. messengers: and, being seated on a rising ground, he began to instruct them and the people, by his admirable sermon on the mount. Matt. v. vi. vii.

After this discourse, a leper was presented to him, whom he healed, and enjoined to shew himself to the priests.

He returned to Capernaum, where a centurion, a gentile, prevailed on the principal Jews of the city, to intreat Jesus to restore one of his servants to health. The centurion observing, that Jesus was hastening toward his house, went himself, and told him "he did not esteem himself worthy to receive him under his roof, but if he would only speak the word, his servant would be healed." Jesus admired his faith, and cured his servant. Matt. viii. 5, 13. Jesus went from Capernaum to Naim, where he raised from the dead a widow's son, whom the people were carrying to his grave, Luke vii. 10—50. When come into the city, a Pharisee, named Simon, invited him to dine with him; and while at table, a woman of the place, of loose conduct, came and washed his feet with her tears, and wiped them with her hair. Simon was offended at this; but Jesus convinced him of her repentance and love.

After Jesus had gone through Galilee he returned to Capernaum, where he was so oppressed with the crowd, that he had scarcely time to eat. His relations, informed of the throng about him, came to disengage him, saying, He was beside himself. Mark. iii. 20, 21. [ὁρῶν ἑαυτὸν; He over-does himself: whether his mental or bodily strength: literally, he out-goes himself.] Some translate, He fainted away; others, He lost his wits; or, He went out of his own house, like one fit to be confined and bound, or, He was as it were in a trance, like one under a violent enthusiasm. He cured one possessed with a devil, who was both blind and dumb. Matt. xii. 22. The Pharisees, whose envy was raised by the many wonders he performed, said "He casts out devils in the name of Beelzebub, prince of the devils." They also required a prodigy from heaven. But Jesus told them he would give them no other than that of the prophet Jonas, i. e. the miracle of his glorious resurrection; not that of his ascension. Vide FRAGMENTS, Nos. CXV. CXLVII. CCCCLXX., &c.

Toward evening, after he had delivered certain parables, he went into a ship, to pass over the sea of Tiberias, but in the night he fell asleep, and a storm rising, the vessel was in danger. The disciples therefore awoke Jesus, who commanded the winds, and immediately the sea was calm. Matt. viii. 23. Luke viii. 23.

Jesus landed in the country of the Gergasenes, PART XV. Edit. IV.

east of the sea which he had crossed. Here were two famous demoniacs, one of them possessed by a legion of devils: he met Jesus, and the devils complained by him, that Jesus came to torment them before their time. They besought him not to send them into the abyss, but rather into a herd of swine feeding near the place. Jesus suffered them, and immediately the swine (about 2,000) ran violently down a precipice into the sea of Tiberias. The Gergasenes frightened, entreated Jesus to quit their country. He re-crossed the sea, and was scarcely come ashore, when Jairus a ruler of the synagogue at Capernaum desired him to cure his only daughter, of twelve years old. As he was going to Jairus's house, a woman who had an issue of blood, was cured by touching secretly the hem of his garment. Soon after Jairus was informed that his daughter was dead. But Jesus encouraged him; and restored the child to life. Matt. ix. 18, 19—26. Luke viii. 49—56.

Going to Nazareth two blind men earnestly begged to be restored to sight: They followed Jesus into a house, and he granted them their restoration. Mark vi. 1, 2, &c. Matt. ix. 27—31. He cured one possessed with a devil, who was dumb. He preached in the synagogue, and was admired by all. Soon after, he sent his disciples through the country, to proclaim the approach of the kingdom of God; he sent them two by two with power to perform miracles; but forbade them to carry provisions, arms, or change of raiment. He directed them to visit the houses of persons in repute for virtue, to abide there, without changing lightly their habitation, and to receive there such entertainment as they were pleased to give.

One day he crossed the lake Gennesareth (or sea of Tiberias), and retreated to a mountain, but the crowd followed him by land, and came to the same mountain, in the desert of Bethsaida. Jesus coming down from his retreat, cured the sick presented to him, and taught the people. The apostles represented to Jesus, that it was time to dismiss the people into the villages to buy provisions. Jesus answered, "Give them food." They excused themselves by the impossibility of compliance; whereupon, understanding they had five loaves and two fishes, he made the people sit down on the grass, and supplied them with food, plentifully. The fragments being gathered up, filled twelve baskets. Their number was about five thousand men. Mark vi. 37.

In the evening, he compelled his disciples to re-pass the sea in a ship, while he continued on the mountain in prayer. The apostles having a contrary wind all night, instead of proceeding to Bethsaida, as they proposed, were driven for the coast of Tiberias or Capernaum; the next morning, 'ere day-break, they discovered themselves to be five and twenty or thirty furlongs from the shore. They then saw a man walking on the sea near them. Taking it for an apparition, they were terrified: but Jesus removed their fears, by telling them, it was he. Peter asked leave to walk on the water, but alarmed, and beginning to sink, he cried out, "Lord save me." Jesus supported him by the hand; and the disciples took Jesus into their ship. Matt. xiv. 13—34. Mark vi. 47—53. John vi. 16—21.

The multitude came on this side of the sea to find Jesus, who during the interval was gone to Capernaum. He exhorted them to labour for the meat which perisheth not; told them he was the true bread from heaven; that his flesh was meat indeed, and his blood was drink indeed. This discourse being figurative, occasioned his being deserted by many disciples; but Peter testified that he was the true Christ, and protested the constancy of the apostles. John vi.

JESUS CHRIST'S THIRD PASSOVER.

As the feast of the passover drew near, Jesus prepared to visit Jerusalem. The evangelists do not inform us what he did there. John says only, that the miracle of multiplying the five loaves was wrought a little before the feast of the passover. John vi. 4, 5.

Being near Sidon, a Phœnician or Canaanitish woman desired him to cure her daughter: as she continued her urgency, the apostles desired him to send her away. He replied, I am not sent but to the lost sheep of Israel; meaning that his favours were not intended for gentiles, such as the Phœnicians. When returned to the house, this woman, not discouraged, threw herself at his feet, and besought him on account of her daughter. Jesus answered, It is not just to give the childrens' bread to dogs. True, Sir, said she, yet the dogs eat the crumbs under their master's table. Jesus admired her faith, the readiness of her turn of words, and complied with her desire. Matt. xv. 22—38.

He continued his journey towards Sidon; and returning by the springs of Jordan, went through Decapolis beyond the sea of Tiberias, where he cured a man who was deaf and dumb. He retired to a mountain in private, and continued there three days. When he came down, he found abundance of sick people; whom he cured. Then he ordered seven loaves and some small fishes, to be distributed among the multitude (four thousand). They were all satisfied, and seven baskets were filled with the fragments.

Jesus immediately embarked for Magdala, in Dalmanutha, (See DALMANUTHA), towards the springs of Jordan. While there, certain Pharisees and Sadducees came and asked a sign from heaven. He referred them, as he had referred others, to that of Jonah: and to the prophecies. He afterwards took shipping on the sea of Tiberias, and came to Bethsaida, where he cured one who was blind. He foretold to his disciples his sufferings at Jerusalem; and said to the multitude, "If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, take up his cross, and follow me.

Six days after this he took three of his apostles, Peter, James, and John, into a high mountain apart (which some believe was mount Tabor) where, while at prayer in the night-time, he suddenly appeared surrounded by great glory and splendor. The apostles, who were asleep, awakened by the brightness of this light, were witnesses of their master's transfiguration. They saw Moses and Elias with him, who spoke of his sufferings, ascension, &c. at Jerusalem. Peter said to Jesus, "Lord, let us make three tabernacles, one for thee, and two others for Moses and Elias." Scripture observes, that Peter was so transported as not to know what he said. Moses and Elias soon disappeared, and the apostles heard a voice, saying, "This is my beloved son, in whom I am well pleased, hear ye him." Matt. xvii. 1—9. Mark ix. 1—8. Luke ix. 28—36. Comp. 2 Peter i. 16—21.

They found the other disciples in dispute with the scribes, on their inability to cure a young man, who was dumb, lunatic, epileptic, and possessed with a devil. Directly as Jesus appeared, the whole company respectfully met him, and the young man's father importuned him to cure his son; which Jesus did. Matt. xvii. 19, 21. Mark ix. 18—29.

He continued to preach throughout Galilee, carefully preparing his apostles for his death and passion, by frequently foretelling his sufferings; but they did not comprehend his meaning. When Jesus and Peter came to Capernaum, the receivers of the two drachms, or half-shekel per head, which every Jew paid annually to the temple, asked Peter whether his master would pay them? Jesus prevented Peter, before he could mention it to him, shewing, that as the son of God he was not obliged to pay this tribute. Nevertheless, he directed him to go to the sea, and throw in his line, and the first fish which he should take, would furnish what was necessary to pay for both of them. Peter accordingly went, and the first fish he took had a stater or shekel of silver under his tongue, Matt. xvii. 24—27. By this time the other disciples arrived, and having had a smart dispute by the way, they asked Jesus which of them should be greatest in the kingdom of heaven? Our

Our Saviour, who knew what had passed among them, told them, that to become first they should endeavour to place themselves last; and taking a little child, said, that if they desired admission into the kingdom of heaven, they should become like that child, Matt. xviii. 1—5. adding, that the least of those, who believed in him, was not to be despised. He afterwards delivered rules how to treat our brethren when they offend us; and Peter asking him, how often he was to forgive his brother? whether seven times? Jesus replied, "not seven only, but seventy times seven." He added the parable of the servant, to whom his master had forgiven the sum of ten thousand talents, but who refused to have compassion on one of his fellow-servants, that owed him only one hundred pence. Matt. xviii. 10.

Jesus, in the last year of his life, intending to keep the feast of Pentecost at Jerusalem, sent his disciples before him, to preach in those places wherein he designed to follow them, giving them powers of curing the sick, and dispossessing devils. Having sent one of his apostles into a Samaritan village, to prepare a lodging for him, they would not receive him. James and John, sons of Zebedee, asked him, whether they should call for fire from heaven upon that village? But Jesus told them, "he was come not to destroy, but to save mankind." Luke ix. 51—56. Vide JAMES I.

Our Saviour proceeding to Jerusalem, lodged with two sisters, Martha and Mary, at Bethany, about two miles from Jerusalem. Martha was very diligent in preparing entertainment for him and his retinue, while Mary sat at his feet, and heard his word. Martha complained of this to Jesus, but he answered her, "Martha, thou art concerned about many things; whereas one thing only is necessary: and Mary hath chosen the better part, which shall not be taken away from her." Luke x. 38—42. As he was on the Mount of Olives over-against Jerusalem, his disciples desired of him a form of prayer in imitation of John Baptist, who had given one to his followers. Jesus again gave them the Lord's prayer, and discoursed to them on the qualities and power of prayer. Jesus having cured one possessed, who was dumb, the Pharisees again accused him with expelling devils by the power of Beelzebub. He confuted their calumny, by remarking that such a principle would divide and destroy the kingdom of Satan. He began to inveigh against the Pharisees with much severity, which advanced to still greater sharpness at an entertainment to which he was invited by a Pharisee, where it was taken ill that he sat down to table without washing his hands. Luke xi. 14—28—36. He delivered much instruction to the people and his disciples at this Pentecost. Luke xi. 38—54. xii. xiii.

While he was at Jerusalem, some of the Pharisees told him, that Herod designed to put him to death. Jesus answered, "Go tell that fox, behold, I cast out devils, and I do cures to-day and to-morrow, and the third day I shall be perfected." Hinting by this ambiguous mode of expression, that his life was drawing near its close, and that neither Herod nor any other should, or could, hinder him from accomplishing its purpose. [also, at his resurrection.]

Returning from Jerusalem, he came to Capernaum, where, while dining with a Pharisee, one sick of a dropay was presented to him for cure. The Pharisees watched him, whether he would cure on that day, it being the sabbath. He healed the sick, and appealed for the propriety of this benevolence to their own conduct, saying, "If one of your cattle should fall into a ditch on the sabbath-day, would you not on that day drag it out?" Having likewise remarked with how much avidity and vanity persons invited to this entertainment secured the first places at the table, &c. he gave them excellent lessons of modesty, humility, and charity. [and true politeness.] Luke xiv. 1—14.

He then made a progress in Galilee, and returning to Capernaum, he did not disdain to act, converse, and eat with publicans and sinners. At this the Pharisees murmured: but he related the parable of a man, who had a hundred sheep, and having lost one, left the ninety-nine; sought that which was gone astray; and brought it to his house again, rejoicing: likewise, the parable of the prodigal son; which is to the same purpose. Luke xiv. xv.

He designed to visit Jerusalem at the feast of tabernacles, which this year. A. D. 32. (of Jesus Christ 35), fell on October 13. He went thither through the country beyond Jordan: and in the way gave instructions to the people and to his disciples, concerning the use of temporal goods; also concerning scandal, divorces, alms, and other duties, Luke xvi. xvii. In the mean time those of his relations who did not believe in him, solicited him to shew himself at Jerusalem, to manifest himself to the world. Jesus told them, they might go thither without delay, but that his time was not yet come. In fact, the feast was half over when he appeared in the temple and began to teach. The Jews admired his doctrine, which he declared to them was not restrictively his own; but his heavenly Father's also. There was abundance of talk about him, and many different opinions concerning him; some affirming that he certainly was the Messiah, others maintaining the contrary.

On the last day of the feast, Jesus cried in the temple, "If any man thirst, let him come to me and drink, and out of his heart shall flow rivers of living water." These discourses en-creased the contradiction of opinions concerning him. The priests maintained stiffly that he could not be a prophet, because he was of Galilee. The people were so struck with his miracles, that they were ready to admit, not only his being a prophet, but his being the Messiah. Jesus passed this night on the Mount of Olives. John viii. 1—11. The next day he returned to the temple, and the Pharisees brought to him a woman who had been surprised in adultery; and asked him, what they should do with her? Jesus wrote on the ground, as if too busy to attend to them, but slightly rising up, he said, "He that is without sin among you, let him cast the first stone." Then he resumed his writing; not appearing to notice their conduct. They took this opportunity, one by one, to slink away, from around him. Jesus said to the woman, Hath no man condemned thee to instant execution?—Neither do I: Go and sin no more." Vide ADULTERY.

The next day, Jesus saw in a street, a man who had been blind from his birth. His disciples asked him, whether this affliction were a punishment of his own, or of his parents' sins. Jesus told them, of neither; but, that the works of God should be manifested in him. Then spitting on the ground, he made a kind of clay, rubbed the blind man's eyes with it, and bid him go and wash them in the pool of Siloam. He went thither, and returned perfectly cured. This miracle made a great noise, because the blind man was well known; he was brought to the Pharisees, and examined how he had been cured. He told them. Now the cure being wrought on the sabbath-day, the Pharisees maintained, that Jesus could be no true prophet because he violated the sabbath. The blind man asserted resolutely, that Jesus was a good man, and a prophet; so they drove him out of the temple, [some think they even excommunicated him]. The next day Jesus met him, and said, "Dost thou believe on the Son of God?" The blind man replied, "Who is he?"—"THOU HAST SEEN HIM," said Jesus, i. e. notwithstanding thou wast born blind; thou art now favoured with a sight of him. And immediately he threw himself at our Lord's feet. John ix. 1, &c.

After this, Jesus returned into Galilee: but determined to be present at the feast of the dedication of the temple, (1 Macc. iv. 42.) which was celebrated this year December 22. Journeying through the midst of Galilee and Samaria, as he came near to a certain village, ten lepers stood at a distance, and cried, Jesus, Master! Have mercy on us! He said, go, shew yourselves to the priests. As they were going, they discerned that they were healed. But only one of them, a Samaritan, turned back to Jesus, to thank him.

While he was in the temple, the Pharisees asked him, when the kingdom of God should come? Jesus answered, it would not come with pomp and much external notice; but that it was an internal principle. On this occasion he instructed his apostles concerning vigilance, assiduity in prayer, and humility, in the parable of the Pharisee and the publican, who prayed in the temple.

As Jesus was walking in the temple, in Solomon's porch, the Jews said, "How long wilt thou keep us in suspense? If thou art the Christ, tell us." "I have already told you, said he, but ye do not believe me: the works that I do, prove my mission. If ye were my sheep, ye would believe me; or at least my father; and my father and I are one." Then they took up stones to stone him, pretending he had blasphemed, because he made himself God. He said to them, "Is it not written, I said ye are gods? If therefore they to whom God speaketh are styled gods, how can ye say I blaspheme, because I call myself the Son of God, when God hath actually sent me and sanctified me?" He escaped from them, and departed from Jerusalem, to Bethabara beyond Jordan, where he abode about a month. Many of the Jews came to him, and believed on him; saying, John the Baptist did not perform one miracle, whereas Jesus has wrought many. John x. 34—42.

While he was beyond Jordan, Lazarus, brother to Martha and Mary, fell sick; and a messenger informed Jesus of it. He answered, his disease would not issue in death, but in the manifestation of God's power: so he continued two days longer in the same place. In the mean time, Lazarus died. Then he told his disciples that Lazarus was dead; and set forwards for Judæa, though dissuaded from it by his disciples. When arrived at Bethany, he found Lazarus had been buried four days. Martha met him, and said, "Lord, if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died." Jesus assured her he should rise again, Mary likewise coming soon after, Jesus sympathized with the tears of the sisters, desired to be conducted to the grave, ordered it to be opened, called Lazarus with a loud voice, and raised him from the dead. This miracle made a great noise in Jerusalem; being performed in the neighbourhood of that city, and witnessed by many Jews from thence; insomuch that the priests concluded, that it was necessary to put Jesus to death, [with Lazarus, also.] But our Saviour retired to Ephraim on the Jordan, where he abode to March 24, which was the fourth of Nisan. John xi. 45.

CHRIST'S FOURTH PASSOVER.

Jesus set out for Jerusalem. He forewarned his disciples of what was to befall him there; but it was a mystery they did not comprehend. At Jericho, a blind man, who knew of his arrival, solicited the gift of sight from him, and obtained it. Near the city he saw a publican called Zaccheus, who had climbed up into a sycamore tree, that he might have a better view of him over the crowd; Jesus invited himself to lodge with him, and Zaccheus transported with this honour, became benevolent, and made full restitution of whatever he might have been supposed to have overcharged in his office. Luke xviii. xix. Jesus the next day quitting the city, restored two blind men to their sight, one of whom was Bar-Timæus. Comp. Matt. xv. 29—44. Mark x. 46—52.

Jesus came to Jerusalem some days before the passover, but did not appear so soon in the temple. Six days before this festival, while he was at table in Bethany, in the house of Simon, surnamed the Leper, Mary, Lazarus's sister, poured a box of very precious spikenard on our Saviour's feet, and wiped them with her hair. The disciples, and particularly Judas Iscariot, grumbled at this liberality, as wrong placed, and muttered that it had been better to have sold this perfume, and to have given the money to the poor. Jesus defended Mary, saying, that what she had done was a prelude to the embalming of his dead body, [which he foresaw would not indeed be anointed for that purpose; though it might be covered with spices; and though ointments might be prepared for it.]

The next day, Monday, March 30th, (Nisan 10) five days before the passover, Jesus went early from Bethany, to Jerusalem: near Bethphage he sent two of his disciples, directing them to bring him an ass, that he might make his entry into Jerusalem, in order to fulfil a prophecy, Zech. ix. 9. He entered the city, therefore, as it were, in triumph, followed by a multitude, shouting (those who went before) Hosanna to the son of David!—and those who came behind, Blessed be the king of Israel! who cometh in the name of the Lord. He went to the temple amid these acclamations, and drove out those who sold doves, and the money-changers, who sat there for the accommodation of strangers, who came from remote provinces to Jerusalem, and wanted the current coin of the place. He likewise cured the blind and the lame, in this holy place; and the priests and Pharisees taking exception at the acclamations in his honour, he told them, "that if the children were silent, the stones in the street would shout aloud." Matt. xxi. 1—15. Mark xi. 1—11. Luke xix. 29—46. John xii. 12—19.

In the evening he retired to Bethany; the next day, Tuesday, March 31, going in the morning early to Jerusalem, he was hungry, and advanced toward a fig-tree to look for fruit, but finding nothing on it but leaves, he cursed it; and the tree began to wither. See FRAGMENTS, No. LXVII. CCLX. and PLATE. In the temple, he again drove out the merchants. The priests and elders sought to seize him, but they feared the people, who admired his discourses. He again retired to Bethany.

On Wednesday, April 1, returning with his disciples to Jerusalem, they noticed the withered fig-tree; and remarked it to Jesus. This day while he was in the temple, the chief priests and elders asked him, by what authority he set up for such a reformer? He in his turn asked them, whether the baptism of John, was human or divine? Unwilling to own its divinity, yet fearing to call it an imposture, they answered, "they could not tell." Why, then, said Jesus, I do not tell you my authority. Math. xxi. 24.

Addressing afterwards the priests, doctors, and Pharisees, he proposed some parables to them, suggesting that God was about to reject them, because of their infidelity and misconduct, and to call the Gentiles into his church. Such is the parable of the two sons, sent into the vineyard by their father, one of whom said he was going, but did not go; the other at first refused, but afterwards went: also, that of the husbandmen, who in the vintage season, used the servants ill, who were sent by the owner for his rent, and who killed his son: and, lastly, the parable of the feast, to which the persons invited would not come; but strangers were collected from all quarters, and were brought to partake of it. Math. xxi. 28—46. xxii. 1—22. Luke xx. ix. 26.

After this, the Herodians, the Sadducees, and the Pharisees, came one after another and proposed captious questions to him. The Herodians asked him, if it were lawful to pay tribute to Cæsar? Jesus being shewn a piece of money stamped with the impression of Cæsar, said they ought to give to Cæsar the things that were Cæsar's, and to God the things that were God's. [Vide FRAGMENTS, Nos. XXVIII. XCII]. The Sadducees asked, whose wife a certain woman would be after the resurrection, as she had successively been married to seven brothers? Jesus told them, that at the resurrection there would be no marriage: consequently, no special property of wives and husbands. The Pharisees demanded which was the greatest commandment of the law? He answered, the first and principal was, the love of God; the second, the love of our neighbour. After this he inveighed severely against the Pharisees, their hypocrisy, and the abuses they patronized.

Towards

Towards evening, as Jesus was going out of the temple, his disciples observed to him the strength and the beauties of this edifice, with the rich presents belonging to it. Jesus replied, that the time would come, when the temple should be so entirely destroyed, that one stone should not remain upon another. When he was withdrawn from the city, to the mount of Olives, over against the temple, they enquired, when they should see the accomplishment of his predictions concerning the ruin of the temple? Then he described the siege of Jerusalem by the Romans, (which happened about thirty-four years after,) and told them, that the generation then in being should behold this melancholy event! At the same time leading their minds to the great catastrophe of the world, and its inhabitants. After this he proposed some parables, whose tendency was to keep them vigilant; as that of the servant set over his fellow-servants, who used them ill, and followed his diversions during his master's absence; but was punished for his wicked conduct:—that of the five foolish and the five wise virgins;—that of the patron who distributed money to his servants, to trade with during his absence, and who at his return, rewarded the faithful and diligent, and punished the idle. He concludes, that so it will be at the last judgment.

This day, Jesus told his disciples, that the passover was to be celebrated in two days, and that the son of man should be delivered into the hands of his enemies, and be crucified. This day, the priests took their resolution of seizing Jesus, and putting him to death; and Judas Iscariot engaged to deliver him to them, on receiving thirty shekels; about £3. 8s. 6d. or at most £4. 10s.

Thursday, April 2, Jesus came not in the day time that we know of, to Jerusalem, at least nothing is related of it by the evangelists. He sent Peter and John thither to prepare a room, and accommodations for celebrating the passover. In the evening he came into the city, and went to the house, where Peter and John had provided; and sitting down to table with them, predicted, that one of them should betray him.

He expressed also his great desire of eating this passover with them; after which, he instituted the Sacrament of his body and blood; and, to cure his disciples of their passionate inclination for pre-eminence and distinction, he rose from table and washed their feet; exhorting them to imitate him, and to consider as their true dignity, the showing all manner of respect and deference to each other. Judas having received a sop, by which he was marked to John, rose from table, transported by the evil spirit.

Jesus further discoursed concerning humility, union and charity, which his disciples ought to maintain among themselves, and the confidence they should place in Providence, and in his kindness for them. He promised, also, another Comforter; and told Peter, that he would deny him that very night before the cock crew. Having repeated an hymn of thanksgiving, he went out of the city with them: enlarging, as he went, on their union to him, on his approaching sufferings, death, and resurrection; on the scandal which his death would occasion; on their flight, on Peter's denial, and on the descent of the Holy Spirit: which demonstrated that he foreknew all things, and that he suffered death in perfect coincidence with his own will.

Having passed the brook Kidron, he came to Gethsemane, where was a garden, into which he went with his apostles. As he had frequently been here, Judas perfectly knew the place. Leaving his apostles to wait for him, he took Peter, James, and John with him further into the garden. Here he became extremely sad; "his soul was sorrowful even unto death." "Stay here," said he, "watch and pray, lest ye enter into temptation." Going about a stone's cast from them, he fell on his knees, then prostrating himself on the earth, he said, "Father, all things are possible to thee: if thou be willing, remove this cup from me; nevertheless, not my will, but thine be done." An angel from heaven comforted him, and being in this agony, he continued his prayer, and his sweat was, as it were, drops of blood falling to the ground.

He rose three times from prayer, and coming to his disciples, he as often found them sleeping. The third time he told them, his betrayer was near, and that it was proper to meet him. Judas now entered the garden with a company of soldiers, to whom he had given this signal, "Seize him whom I shall kiss, and convey him away safely." He therefore drew near to Jesus to kiss him. Jesus said to him, "Judas, betrayest thou the Son of man with a kiss?" Then advancing toward the soldiers, he said, "Whom do ye seek?" They answered, "Jesus of Nazareth." Jesus said, "If ye seek me, let these go." Then they took Jesus, and bound him. Peter drew his sword, and struck one of the high-priest's servants; he aimed at his head, but he only cut off his ear: Jesus touched his ear, and cured him; saying to Peter, "Put up thy sword; for those who take the sword, perish by the sword."

Jesus was carried first before Annas the father-in-law of Caiaphas. Annas had been high-priest: and Caiaphas was so, actually, that year. Annas questioned Jesus concerning his doctrine and disciples. Jesus told him, he had taught nothing in secret; and that all the Jews were witnesses of his doctrine. One of the high-priest's servants smote him on the face, saying,
"Answerest

"Answerest thou the high-priest so?" Jesus said to him, "If I have spoken evil, bear witness of the evil; but if well, why smitest thou me? Annas remanded Jesus to Caiaphas, who probably dwelt in the same house.

Caiaphas having sent for the priests and doctors of the law (the Sanhedrim), ordered Jesus before them. They sought evidence against him, that might convict him of a capital crime, but they could find none strong enough. At last, a man was produced, who had heard him say, That in three days he would destroy the temple of God, and in the same time build another. This testimony was neither exact, nor sufficient to condemn a man to death. All this time Jesus continued silent; whereupon Caiaphas adjured him in the name of the living God, to declare, whether he were the Christ? Jesus confessed it; adding, that he would come one day on the clouds, at the right hand of his Father, to judge mankind. At these words, the high-priest rent his clothes, exclaiming, "What need we witnesses? ye have all heard his blasphemies: what think ye?" they answered, He deserves to die. All this passed in the night.

At day-light the priests, the senate, and the doctors, again assembled, and asked Jesus if he were the Christ,—the Son of God? They adjudged him to death. But as the Romans had deprived them of the power of life and death, they could not condemn him in form, or order his execution; but they carried him before Pilate the governor, to whom they insisted, 1. That Jesus was a disturber of the public peace. 2. That he taught the unlawfulness of paying tribute to the emperor. 3. That he called himself Christ, and Son of God. Pilate examined him; and asked him, if he were the Messiah, or king of the Jews? Jesus answered, "that indeed he was a king, but his kingdom was not of this world: nor dangerous to the state."

As the Jews, the accusers of Jesus, did not enter the judgment-hall, or Pilate's house, lest they should be polluted, because they intended that evening to eat the passover; Pilate, after having examined Jesus, went out to them, declaring he found nothing in him that deserved condemnation. Notwithstanding which declaration, they clamoured against him with great vehemence; but Jesus replied not a word. Pilate being informed that Jesus was a Galilean, sent him to Herod, king (or tetrarch) of Galilee, who was then at Jerusalem. Herod had long desired to see Jesus, of whom he had heard many wonders, and proposed to him several questions, to which Jesus made no answer: which so surprised and provoked Herod and his court, that in derision they covered him with a scarlet robe, meaning to insult his royalty; and sent him back to Pilate.

Pilate having again examined Jesus, declared to the Jews, that as neither he nor Herod had found any thing in him, which deserved death, he should be content with ordering him only to be scourged, and so dismiss him.—But, he gave them their choice of this Jesus, or Jesus Barabbas (a most notorious villain and murderer, under sentence of death), it being customary to grant them the life of some criminal at the passover: they chose Barabbas, and cried out "Crucify Jesus." Pilate having made one more attempt to deliver the innocent, overpowered with their cries and threats, and fearing sedition, he ordered water to be brought, in which he washed his hands, told them, that he cleared himself of the guilt of his death, and gave him up to them. It was about the third hour, or nine o'clock in the morning, when the governor thus determined. Jesus was put into the hands of the Roman soldiers, in order to be executed. They first insulted him, by deriding his title of king; they cast an old purple cloak around him, placed a crown of thorns on his head, and a reed, as a substitute for a scepter, in his hand; and mimicking a salutation and homage, they spat in his face, and struck him on the head with a cane.

After this, they laid (a part of) his cross on him, and conducted him to Calvary, a little hill north-west of the city. As Jesus was extremely faint, and the cross was heavy, the Roman soldiers, meeting one Simon, pressed him to assist in carrying it. When he came to Calvary, they offered Jesus wine mingled with myrrh, or gall, to drink; but having tasted it, he would not drink. They nailed him to the cross which they raised between two thieves; one on the right hand, the other on the left. He prayed for those who crucified him. [About eleven o'clock, or twelve, i. e. at noon. Luke xxiii. 44.]

Pilate commanded his sentence of condemnation to be affixed on his cross in these terms, "JESUS OF NAZARETH, King of the Jews." The Jews would have persuaded him to alter this to "pretended King of the Jews:" but he refused. The soldiers parted his garments among them; but for his coat they cast lots, being unwilling to cut it, because it had no seam, but was made in the loom, all of one piece. The magistrates, priests, people, and the very thieves themselves who were crucified close to him, insulted him. Nevertheless, one of the thieves rebuked his companion, confessed his own guilt, acknowledged the innocence of Jesus, and desired to be remembered by him, when he came in his kingdom. Jesus promised him, that he should be that day with him in paradise. Mary the mother of Jesus, Mary the wife of Cleophas, and Mary Magdalene, with John the Evangelist, were were then standing near his cross. Jesus said to his mother, referring to John, Woman, behold thy Son! and to John, he said, Behold thy mother! From that time John kept her as his mother.

About noon, the sun was covered with darkness which continued till the ninth hour, or three o'clock in the afternoon. At the ninth hour the darkness abated, and Jesus cried with a loud voice, "My God, my God, unto what hast thou forsaken me?" The soldiers gave him vinegar in a sponge to drink; and when he had tasted it, he said, "It is finished!" Then he bowed his head, and dismissed his spirit. That instant the earth trembled, the adjacent rocks were rent, graves were opened, the substantial veil of the temple, was rent from the top to the bottom. The Jews being unwilling that the bodies should remain on the cross the next day, which was the great day of the sabbath, or passover, desired Pilate that their legs might be broken, to hasten their death; and that they might be taken down. But Jesus being already dead, they brake not his legs; but to make sure of his being truly dead, one of the soldiers with a spear pierced his side, and forthwith there issued blood and water. [from his heart.]

Toward the evening, Joseph of Arimathea, a disciple of Jesus, and a senator of distinction, requested from Pilate, permission to receive the body of Jesus, to bury it before sun-set: for it was the evening before the sabbath, the rest whereof began at sun-set. Pilate having first enquired whether Jesus were truly dead, consented; and Joseph having a garden close by, wherein, in a rock, he had cut a tomb intended for himself, he placed the body of Jesus in this unfinished sepulchre, closing the entrance with a great stone. The priests fearing lest the disciples of Jesus should purloin his body, placed guards there, and sealed up the sepulchre. The next day, being the great sabbath-day, every one rested, according to the law; but after sun-set, when it was allowable to engage in business, and buy any thing, the holy women who had seen that our Saviour's body was put hastily into the tomb, and who purposed to embalm it further, bought drugs and spices for that purpose. The next day, early in the morning, before it was light, they went toward the garden. But Jesus, who had submitted to the bonds of death for so long time as he thought proper, had now awaked from his confinement, and was risen; and the soldiers, who witnessed his resurrection, returned into the city, in a state of confusion and alarm.

These women coming to the sepulchre, saw there two persons clothed in white, who said to them, "Fear not. Ye seek Jesus of Nazareth, who was crucified; he is not here, he is risen; come and see the place where he lay." Mary Magdalene hastened to Jerusalem, and told some of the apostles, that their master's body was missing. Peter and John ran to the sepulchre; John arrived first, but did not enter the sepulchre. Peter entering it, saw the linen-clothes in which the body of our Saviour had been wrapped, and the napkin which had covered his head, all carefully folded up. John likewise saw them, and believed; and they returned to Jerusalem. Mary, who was come again to the sepulchre, stooping down to look within the grotto, saw two angels there, one at the head, the other at the foot of the sepulchre, who said to her, "Why weepest thou?" She answered, "They have carried away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid him." Turning herself backward, she discerned Jesus, and said to him, "If thou hast borne him hence, tell me where thou hast laid him, that I may take him away." Jesus said unto her, "Mary!" Immediately she knew his voice, and threw herself at his feet to kiss them. Mary returned to Jerusalem, and related what she had seen to the disciples. Jesus appeared also to other women, as they returned from the sepulchre; and they adored him. But the apostles treated them all as fanciful persons, and did not believe what they related.

The same day, being the first day of the week (Nisan 16), and the day after the passover, two of Jesus's disciples going on foot to Emmaus, a village about seven miles from Jerusalem, Jesus joined them in the way, appearing as a traveller, and, enquiring what was the subject of their earnest discourse? They spoke at large of his death and passion, which were the subject of universal conversation in Jerusalem. We had hopes, said they, this Jesus should redeem Israel: but—Then Jesus reproved their exhausted faith; and demonstrated from the scriptures, that the Messiah was first to suffer, and afterwards to enter into glory. Being come to Emmaus, they invited Jesus to stay with them, which he at first politely declined, but they constrained him very civilly. At table, he assumed the character of master of the family, blessed the bread, and gave it them; then their eyes were opened, and they knew him: but they soon lost sight of him. Returning immediately to Jerusalem, they found the apostles; and understood that Jesus had appeared likewise to Peter.

While they were together, Jesus entered the room, and presented himself among them. This sight alarmed them, but he removed their apprehensions, by saluting them, "Peace be with you. Look upon my hands and feet, and see that it is I myself: touch me." He also took broiled fish, and part of an honey-comb, and did

did eat before them; then breathing on them, he said, "Receive ye the Holy Ghost; whosoever sins ye remit, they are remitted; and whosoever sins ye retain, they are retained."

Now Thomas, one of the twelve, was not with them at this time; but afterwards, when told of these events, protesting his want of conviction, he said, "Unless I see the print of the nails in his hands, and thrust my hand into his side, I will not believe this report." Eight days after, the apostles being all together, Jesus appeared again among them, and said, "Peace be to you:" then addressing Thomas, he said, "Put your finger into the wounds of my hands and feet, and thrust your hand into my side, and no longer hesitate to believe." Thomas answered, and said to him, "My Lord, and my God."

The apostles going into Galilee after the passover, Jesus shewed himself to several of them at the sea of Tiberias. Peter, Thomas Nathanael, James, John, and two other disciples, were on this sea a-fishing, when Jesus appeared in the morning on the shore, and directed them to a considerable capture of fishes: but none of the Apostles asked him, who he was? for it was evident that he was Jesus.

After this, Jesus enquired of Peter three times successively; Peter, lovest thou me more than these? Peter likewise answered three times; that he loved him with all his heart; and Jesus as often directed him to shew his affection by feeding his flock. He foretold also that Peter should suffer crucifixion for his sake: but that John should live to see Jerusalem severely punished for its rejection of him.

The disciples of our Saviour being assembled on a mountain in Galilee, Jesus shewed himself to them. When they saw him, they worshipped him: but some doubted, whether his body were a real body; for as to his resurrection and his presence, it does not appear, that they could doubt of them. Jesus said to them, "All power is given to me in heaven and in earth; Go, teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost; and lo, I am with you always, even to the end of the world." It is generally believed, that it was on this occasion, he shewed himself to above five hundred brethren at once; many of whom were living when St. Paul wrote his second epistle to the Corinthians, A. D. 57.

After this, Jesus appointed his disciples to meet him at Jerusalem, where he conversed with them, and ate with them; reproaching their incredulity as to his passion and resurrection; shewing them by the Scriptures, that all this was fore-appointed as part of the Messiah's character. He also opened their understandings, and explained the Scripture to them; commissioned them to preach the gospel throughout the world, impowered them to perform miracles, enjoined them to baptize, and convert all nations. He directed them to stay in Jerusalem till they should receive the Holy Ghost.

PART XV. Edit. IV.

After this, he conducted them from Jerusalem to Bethany, and on the Mount of Olives, lifting up his hands, he blessed them, and rising in the air, was gradually taken up by a cloud, beyond their view. Then two angels appeared to them, who said, "Ye men of Galilee, how stand you admiring with your eyes thus lifted up to heaven! This Jesus, shall return in like manner," &c. Then they went back to Jerusalem, and there continued, with Mary the mother of Jesus, till the day of Pentecost, on which the Holy Ghost descended upon them.

This is an historical account of our Saviour's life, in a chronological order, according to the harmony of the gospels. We have avoided critical and theological questions, which abound in commentators, whose writings may be consulted. A Dictionary is not a collection of dissertations, nor a heap of critical reflections.

The power of performing miracles is so well known to have resided in Jesus Christ, not by Christians only, but likewise by Mahometans, that it is a kind of proverb with them, when commending an expert workman, to say, he has the breath of the Messiah; because our Saviour by his breath alone, not only raised the dead, but also gave life to things inanimate: for they hold, agreeably to the spurious "Gospel of the Infancy of Jesus," that in his youth he formed birds of potter's earth, and then with a puff of his breath only, set them a-flying. They affirm, that he was but three hours in the cradle; they call him sometimes the Spirit of the Father; an expression borrowed from some of the writings of the Christian fathers; they acknowledge that he was born without a father, of the Virgin Mary; they say he had a brother, whose name was Okil, or Okail (but this brother is in the Hebrew style, who call cousin-germans thus); they believe that he ascended up to heaven; that he will destroy Antichrist; that he exercises Almighty power in heaven, where he is our mediator, and possesses the place of honour in the fourth heaven, which is the Empyrium, according to their system. They own that from the gospel is derived the life of the soul, and the renovation of the heart. A Mahometan poet expresses himself on this subject after the following manner: He speaks to Jesus Christ; "The heart of man under affliction derives all its consolation from thy words: the soul recovers life and vigour, at the simple hearing of thy name pronounced. If ever the mind of man can raise itself to the contemplation of the mysteries of the Deity, it is from thee that it derives the lights necessary to attain to the knowledge of God, and the attraction which it feels so sensibly, springs all from thee." Would any believe, that these were the words of one who did not acknowledge the divinity of Jesus Christ?

The Jews do him much less justice; some among them have the impiety to say, that the soul of Esau animated Jesus Christ; that he was born of one Panther, and a young milliner whom he had debauched; that Jesus had the dexterity to steal the name of God out of the temple, that he concealed it in a wound which he made in his thigh by opening the skin; and by the power of this name he escaped two lions formed by magic art, which were placed, one at the right, the other at the left of the sanctuary, and roared in a most frightful manner when any one went in, or came out: that by virtue of this name, he immediately raised one from the dead; and cured a leper at Bethlehem, the place of his nativity. The noise of this miracle drew a crowd of people after him, who conducted him to Jerusalem, as it were, in triumph, mounted on an ass, &c. Such are the stories in Toledoth Jesu.

There are several Jewish books, or tracts, entitled ספר תולדות ישו, Sepher Toledoth Jesu, in imitation of the title of St. Matthew's gospel, Βιβλος γενεσεως 'Ιησου Χριστου. "The book of the generation of Jesus Christ," or the history of Jesus Christ. The Jews have two principally, which go under this name: one published by Wagenseil, in the second volume of his Tela Ignea Satanae; the other by M. Huldreich, with annotations, in 1705.

Any one need only read these two works, in order to conceive that entire contempt for them which they merit. Notwithstanding, it is by works of this kind, that the Jews confirm one another in their aversion from Christianity. They have gone farther; for to get rid of the objections made to them, relating to the time when the Messiah should appear, they have abridged the chronology of the Old Testament, and placed the birth of our Saviour A. M. 3671, i. e. 329 years before his real epoch. They have altered the text of some prophecies, which were too clear for Jesus Christ [it is however doubted, whether this has been purposely done, at least in so many passages as Christian commentators suspect]. They have wrested the meaning of almost all the others that concern him; those particularly, whose completion is most evident and observable. They confound the characters of the Messiah; some insist that he has been come a long time, but lies concealed among men; others expect him, but curse those who compute the time of his coming. Others again maintain, that the coming of the Messiah is no article of faith. What insatiation! what knavery!

The fathers inform us, that at the beginning of Christianity, the Jews sent agents over all the world to defame Jesus Christ and his doctrine, [Comp. Acts xxviii. 22.] and to persuade people that his disciples were impostors, who having stolen their master out of his grave, reported that he was risen again. Euseb. in Isaiam. xviii. 1. Hieronym, ibid. Oecumen. in Ep. ad Rom.

Much has been written concerning the form, beauty, and stature, of Jesus Christ. Some have asserted, that he was the handsomest of the sons of men. Others, that there was no beauty nor grace in his outward appearance; some think him to have been of an advantageous size; others say, he was diminutive; and passages of Scripture are wrested to support each of these opinions.

Nicephorus is of opinion, that St. Luke drew the pictures of Jesus Christ, of the Blessed Virgin, and of the Apostles, and that by this means their likenesses or representations, were preserved. [Comp. FRAGMENT No. CCLXXX.] It is certain, there has been always a particular tradition in the church, concerning the figure and stature of our Saviour. I will here describe our Lord's person, after the images which are believed to have been painted by St. Luke. "He was very beautiful in the face, and about seven spithamas, near six feet, high; his hair was inclining to be very fair, not thick, but a little curled; his eye-brows were black, and did not form exactly a semicircle. His eyes were large, lively, and something yellowish; his nose long, his beard black, and pretty short; but he wore his hair long: for the scissars had never been used upon his head, nor had the hand of any one touched him besides that of his mother the Virgin, when he was yet a child. His neck was not stiff, nor his carriage lofty or proud. He stooped a little with his head; his complexion was almost of the colour of wheat; his countenance neither round nor sharp; but like his mother's something longish, and pretty much upon the vermilion. Gravity, prudence, meekness, and clemency, were painted in his face; in a word, he resembled perfectly his divine mother." Nicephor. Hist. Eccles. lib. ii. ch. 43.

II. JESUS, or JESHUA, son of Jozadak, the first high-priest of the Jews, after their return from the Babylonish captivity. We do not know exactly how many years he exercised the high-priesthood. His first care after his arrival at Jerusalem, was to restore the sacrifices, to regulate the offices and orders of the priests and Levites, Ezra iv. 3. S. and, to rebuild the temple plé, as far as the then condition of the Jews would allow of the work. The prophets Haggai and Zechariah often mention Jesus, or Joshua, son of Jozadak. Haggai, i. 1, 2, addresses himself to him and Zerubbabel, exciting them to build the temple, after the death of Cyrus and Cambyses, A. M. 3485, ante A. D. 519.

Zechariah relates, that the Lord shewed him the high-priest, Joshua son of Jozadak, standing before the angel of the Lord, and Satan standing at his right hand to accuse him. And the angel of the Lord said to Satan, "The Lord rebuke thee," &c. Zech. iii. 1, &c.

The same prophet having seen a vision of two olive-trees, which furnished oil for the golden candlestick, through which the oil ran into the lamps of that candlestick, the angel of the Lord told him, that these two olive-trees were Jesus son of Jozadak, and Zerubbabel son of Salathiel, "who are the two anointed ones that stand by the Lord of the whole earth." See also Zec. vi. 11. Jesus son of Sirach in Ecclesiasticus, commends Jesus son of Josedec, and Zerubbabel, as signets on the Lord's right hand, &c. chap. xlix. 14. Jesus son of Josedec was succeeded in the high-priesthood by his son Joachim, who was high-priest in the reign of Xerxes. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xi. cap. 5. initio.

III. Jesus, son of Sirach, author of the book of Ecclesiasticus, was, according to Genebrard, in his chronicle, descended from the high-priest Jesus son of Jozadak. Some Greek copies make Eleazar the father of Sirach of Jerusalem, to have been his grandfather: but Jesus son of Sirach, who speaks of himself, chap. xxix. and throughout chap. li. and in other places, says nothing of his being a priest, or that any of his ancestors were so. He informs us only, that he was desirous of wisdom, and earnestly entreated God for it, while prostrate before him in the temple; that he had studied hard, and had travelled much, to complete his studies; that he had run many risques; that having been slandered to the king, he was in imminent danger of death; but by God's mercy was rescued from it. Jesus his grandson, the translator of his work, testifies that his grandfather had been in great reputation for his wisdom. See the Preface to Ecclesiasticus. We do not know who Sirach was, the father of Jesus, nor can we certainly tell his name who was father of Jesus, the author's grandson, and translator of his work.

The Arabians are acquainted with this writer and his works. They believe that he, or his grandfather, was visier to Solomon; that he had a very virtuous wife, named Fikia, whose life has been written in Arabic. There is an Arabian book entitled, The Sentences and Wisdom of Jesus the son of Sirach.

IV. JESUS, otherwise Jason. See JASON.

V. JESUS, son of Damneus, high-priest of the Jews, was created by king Agrippa, A. D. 63, and deposed the same year. He succeeded Ananus:—his successor was

VI. JESUS, son of Gamaliel, high-priest. The two high-priests, Jesus son of Damneus, and Jesus son of Gamaliel, having each their party in the temple, and the city, disputed sword in hand for the pontificate. Agrippa, to end this bloody contention, deposed them both; and elected Matthias, son of Theophilus, A. D. 64.

JETHER, יֶתֶר, he that excels, or remains; from יָתַר, jathar: or, that examines, searches; from יָתַר thur: otherwise, a line, or string.

I. JETHER, son of Gideon had not courage to kill Zebah and Zalmunna, though his father commanded him. Judg. viii. 20.

JETHRO, יֶתְרוֹ יֶתְרוֹ, his excellence, his remains, his posterity. See JETHER.

JETHRO, priest, or prince, of Midian, [Ita Ezechiel Poeta apud Euseb. Præpar. lib. ix. cap. 4. Jonath. alii plures. The Hebrew כֹּהֵן cohen, signifies sometimes a prince.] the father-in-law of Moses. It is believed that he was a priest of the true God, and maintained the true religion, being descended from Midian, son of Abraham and Keturah. Moses does not disguise his alliance with Jethro's family, but invites him to offer sacrifices to the Lord on his arrival in the camp of Israel, as one who adored the same God, Exod. xviii. 11, 12. Some assert that he had four names, Jethro, Raguel, Hobab, and Ceni. Others, that Jethro and Raguel were the same person; that Hobab was son of Jethro, and brother to Zipporah; that Ceni is a common name, signifying the country of the Kenites, inhabited by the posterity of Hobab, south of the promised land. The Hebrew, chothen, which Jerom translates cognatus, kinsman, is used Numb. x. 29. to denote the relation between Moses and Hobab; also, Exod. xviii. 1. 27. Nevertheless, in Numbers Hobab is called son of Raguel. For which reason others are of opinion, that Raguel was the father of Jethro, and Jethro the father of Hobab. On the other side, Raguel gives Zipporah to Moses, Exod. ii. 18.

The signification of the Hebrew chothen, not being fixed, it is impossible to determine certainly this question. Chother חוֹתֵן Gener, Affinis, Cognatus. LXX. Παιδερὸς, Socer, vel Ταμβός, Gener: Aquila. Sym, Theod. Νυμφίος, Sponsus.

Moses having killed an Egyptian, who ill-treated a Hebrew, was obliged to fly from Egypt. He retired into the land of Midian, east of the Red Sea, near the gulph of Elam. As he sat near a well where Jethro's daughters were watering their cattle, there came shepherds, who forced them away. Moses defended the young women, and watered their flock. Their father, informed of what had passed, sent for Moses, and, eventually gave him his daughter Zipporah. After he had been forty years here, Moses saw the vision of the burning bush, and Jethro understanding the will of God, permitted him to return to Egypt with his wife and children. But Zipporah being obliged by incidents to return to her father, Jethro brought her to Moses, at the foot of Mount Sinai, about a year after the Hebrews came out of Egypt.

Moses went out of the camp to meet Jethro, fell prostrate before him, embraced him, introduced him into his tent, and related to him what the Lord had done for Israel. Jethro blessed God for it, offered burnt-offerings, and peace-offerings, and ate with Moses, Aaron, and the elders of Israel, in the presence of the Lord. The next day, Moses taking his seat to judge Israel, continued so employed from morning to evening. Jethro remonstrated that this fatigue was too great, and advised him to appoint deputies for lesser causes.

When the Israelites were decamping on their journey, Moses desired Jethro to accompany them; but he returned to Midian, leaving, as some believe, Hobab his son, to conduct the Israelites. Exod. xviii. 27. Comp. FRAGMENT No. CXCI. Hobab had a share in the division of the land made by Joshua. Numb. x. 29. We read nothing of Jethro after this time.

The Jews have published several fabulous accounts relating to Jethro.

The following curious, but uncertain particulars, of Jethro's life, are handed down by the Arabians. Bibl. Orient. p. 790. Schoaib. They say one Michael, son of Taskir, and grandson of Midian, was his father: this last was the immediate son of Ishmael, according to the author of Leb-Tarik; for Moses makes no mention of Midian among the sons of Ishmael, Gen. xxv. 13, 14. Jethro gave his son-in-law Moses the miraculous rod. He was favoured with the gift of prophecy, and God sent him to the Midianites, to preach the unity of God, and to withdraw them from idolatry. Mahomet says, (Alcoran, cap. Araf,) that he wrought miracles to convert this nation; and one of his commentators affirms, that whenever Jethro had a mind to perform his devotions on the top of a certain mountain, the mountain became lower, in order to render the ascent more easy to him.

Another commentator on the Koran says, that Jethro took pains principally to reform the bad customs of the Midianites, such as stealing; or having two sorts of weights and measures, of buying by the larger, and selling by the smaller. He often used to say, "Get just weights and measures, and defraud no man, of what belongs to him." Beside these frauds of the Midianites in their trading, they offered violence to travellers, and robbed them on the highways. They threatened even Jethro for his remonstrances.

This insolence obliged God to manifest his wrath. He sent the angel Gabriel, who, with a voice like thunder, set the earth a-trembling, which destroyed them all, except Jethro, and those who like him, believed the unity of God. After this punishment, Jethro went to Moses, as related Exod. xviii. 1, 2, 3. The advice of Jethro on this occasion, made the Mussulmen call him, The preacher of the prophets.

JETUR, יֶתֶר, Ἰεθρ or יתרו, he that keeps: otherwise, order, succession: from יתר, thur; or, according to the Syriac, mountainous. Son of Ishmael, Gen. xxv. 15, father of the Ituræans. [A column: i. e. support of the family.]

JEW. The Israelites who returned from the captivity of Babylon, were then, and ever after, called by this name; because the tribe of Judah was not only the most powerful, but almost the only tribe which made any figure, and was considerable, after the captivity.

The Jews rebuilt the temple and the holy city, under Ezra and Nehemiah; and from this time were more zealous in the observance of their law, more faithful in the practice of their duties, and more averse from idolatry than they had been before. The Israelites of the ten tribes, who returned at different times from the captivity, were mingled with those of Judah, and were called Jews, perhaps politically, because the permission granted by Cyrus to the Hebrew captives, of returning to their own country, was granted expressly to those only of the kingdom of Judah; or, because after the captivity, being united under one monarchy, and and there being no distinction of government between Judah and Israel, they took the name of Judah, as being that wherein the head of their religion resided (the high-priest at Jerusalem); and the prince of the country, who was always of the tribe of Judah: subordinate to the governor sent by the kings of Persia.

Under these kings they enjoyed peace, and settled themselves quietly in their country; they rebuilt their cities, and cultivated their lands.

When Alexander the Great warred against Darius Codomannus, the last king of Persia, the Jews continued firm in their duty to Darius, their lawful sovereign, and refused Alexander the succours he demanded for the siege of Tyre, in which he was then employed. That prince, resolved to punish their refusal, marched against Jerusalem. But the high-priest coming out to meet him at the head of his people, Alexander received him with respect, bestowed many favours on the Jewish nation, and granted them an exemption from tribute every seventh year, a favour which he would not grant to the Samaritans, as Josephus relates. Vide ALEXANDER.

After the death of Alexander the Great, the Jews were subject sometimes to the kings of Egypt, sometimes to those of Syria, according as these princes extended their conquests.

Under Ptolemy Philopater king of Egypt, they suffered a cruel persecution in his dominions, A. M. 3787, ante A. D. 213.

A division arising among their priests, and Jason purchasing the high-priesthood of Antiochus Epiphanes, A. M. 3834, ante A. D. 166, this prince took the opportunity to persecute the Jews, in order to force them to abandon their religion for that of the Greeks. He met with an inflexible resistance from the Maccabees, and from a great number of honest Israelites, who joined them, who maintained their religion with prodigies of valour, and at last restored their country to liberty. The Asmoneans (or Maccabees,) having some time exercised the high-priesthood under the Syrian kings, at length annexed the temporal sovereignty to the priesthood. Hircanus shook off the Syrian yoke, A. M. 3874, ante A. D. 126. Aristobulus his son and successor first assumed the title of king, A. M. 3898, ante A. D. 102. The kingdom continued in his family till the time of Herod son of Antipater the Idumæan. ante A. D. 36.

There was, however, some interruption; for Gabinus governor of Syria, entering Judæa, with a powerful army, not long after Pompey's leaving it, reduced Alexander the eldest son of Aristobulus, who had escaped from Pompey; restored Hircanus to the high-priesthood, and changed almost intirely the civil state of the country; from being monarchical he made it aristocratical; suppressed the title of king, and instead of the Great Sanhedrim, and the courts of justice in Jerusalem, and other cities, he settled five courts in Judæa, each independent of the rest, and possessing a sovereign authority within its own district. The first was at Jerusalem; the second at Jericho; the third at Gadara; the fourth at Amathur; the fifth at Sephoris.

Some years afterwards, Julius Cæsar coming from Egypt to Palestine in his way to Syria, Antigonus son of Aristobulus, the last king of the Jews, threw himself at his feet, desiring to be restored to the principality of his father; complaining of Hircanus and Antipater. But Antipater, to whom Cæsar had great obligations, for services performed in Egypt, justified his own conduct and that of Hircanus; and Antigonus was dismissed as seditious. Cæsar appointed Hircanus to continue high-priest and prince of Judæa, giving Antipater the office of procurator of Judæa under Hircanus. The aristocracy settled by Gabinus was abolished; and the government restored as before.

Antigonus son of Aristobulus having given the Parthians large sums of money, that they might assist him in recovering the throne, defeated the forces of Hircanus, who was supported by Herod and his brethren; after which, Herod retired into Italy, Antigonus took Hircanus, had his ears cut off, in order to render him incapable of the high-priesthood, delivered him to the Parthians, who carried him into their country, and himself assumed the pontificate and principality of the Jews. A. M. 3964.

Herod arriving at Rome, laid before Antony the state of affairs in Judæa. Antony jointly with Octavian (afterwards Augustus) procured the crown of Judæa for him, which he transmitted to his children. I run over all this very slightly, my design being only to give a general idea of the state and government of the Jews, after the captivity of Babylon to the time of Herod.

After the death of Herod, his kingdom was divided among his sons. Archelaus had Judæa, Idumæa, and Samaria; Herod Antipas had Gallilee and Peræa; and Philip had the Auranitis, Trachonitis, Paneas, and the Batanæa.

Archelaus reigned ten years in Judæa. He was accused before Augustus by the Jews and Samaritans, and being unable to justify himself, was banished to Vienne in Gaul; and Judæa was reduced into a Roman province. In this condition it was at the death of our Saviour.

From that time to the destruction of Jerusalem, Judæa had Roman governors. See GOVERNORS. After the destruction of Jerusalem, Judæa was comprehended under the government of the presidents presidents of Syria, and the Jews formed a separate people, and continued in their own country subject to the Romans, till the reign of Adrian; when they rebelled against the Romans: in this war many perished miserably, and their nation was intirely dispersed. See ADRIAN, BARCHOCHEBAS, and JERUSALEM.

THE RELIGION OF THE JEWS may be considered in different views, with respect to the different conditions of their nation. Under the patriarchs, they observed natural religion, opposing idolatry, and atheism; using circumcision, as the appointed seal of the covenant made by God with Abraham, and following the laws which reason, assisted by the lights of grace and faith, discovers to honest hearts, who seriously seek God, his righteousness, and truth; living in expectation of the Messiah, the desire of all nations, to complete their hopes and wishes, and fully to instruct and bless them. Such was the religion of Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Judah, Joseph, &c. who maintained the worship of God, and the tradition of the true religion.

After the time of Moses, the religion of the Jews, [now become a nation] was more fixed. Before, every one honoured God according to his heart and judgment; but after Moses, ceremonies, days, feasts, priests and sacrifices were determined with infinite exactness. That legislator described the age, sex, and colour of certain victims: their number, qualities, and nature: at what hour, by whom, and on what occasions they were to be offered. He regulated the tribe, the family, the bodily qualities, the habits, order, rank, and functions of the priests and Levites. He specified the measures, metals, woods, and works of the tabernacle, or portable temple; the dimensions, metal, and figure of the altar, and its utensils; in a word, he omitted nothing which concerned the worship of God, who is the first and principal, or, more properly speaking, the only object of the Jewish religion.

To this may be referred likewise the several purifications used in preparing themselves for their approach to things holy, and the legal impurities which forbade their approach, the means of preventing, of avoiding, and of expiating pollutions; the continual care required of the Jews to avoid certain pollutions, which excluded them from civil society, from the use of things holy, from the camp, and from their own houses, under some circumstances; even certain natural infirmities, diseases, and involuntary accidents required purification. The bare touching of an animal which died of itself; or the being present at a funeral, or the touching of an unclean person, was capable of polluting a man, and laid him under an obligation of purifying himself.

I cannot forbear remarking the rigour of that law which condemned to death, for example those who violated the sabbath; those who contracted marriage within prohibited degrees; those who were guilty of adultery; those who came near a woman at a particular time; those who committed sins against nature; those who solicited their brethren to idolatry; those who consulted diviners and magicians; those who blasphemed God; or those who came near to things holy without being purified. A layman, or even a Levite, who should have entered the temple, i. e. the holy, or the sanctuary, [Vide ANNUNCIATION II.] who should have touched the ark of the covenant, [Vide UZZAH, ADDITION] or who should have seen it uncovered. These, and many other faults, were punished with death. Such was the spirit of the old law, a spirit of fear, of bondage, and of constraint.

The long abode of the Hebrews in Egypt, cherished a strong propensity in them to idolatry; neither the miracles of Moses, wrought before their eyes, nor his precautions to withdraw them from the worship of idols, nor the rigour of his laws on that subject, nor the splendid marks of God's presence in the Israelite camp, were able to overcome this unhappy perversity. We know with what facility they fell into the adoration of the golden calf, when they were scarcely, as we may say, come out of the channel of the Red Sea, where they had been eyewitnesses of Divinely preserving wonders!

Moses gave his laws in the wilderness, but they were not all observed there. Vide Deut. xii. 8, 9. They did not circumcise the children born in the wilderness, because of the danger to which infants newly circumcised would have been exposed, by the fatigue of journeys, and frequent decampings: because, also, the people of Israel not being then mingled with other nations, were under no necessity of taking that sign, which was instituted principally to distinguish them from others. Josh. v. 4, 5, 6, 7.

During the wars of Joshua against the Canaanites, and before the ark of God was established in a fixed place, it was difficult to observe all the laws of Moses; wherefore under Joshua and the Judges, and even in the reign of Saul, we see licence enough in Israel with regard to the observance of many articles of the law, which were much better observed under David, or Solomon, for example; and when the Hebrews were at peace in their land, and when there was more easy access to the tabernacle. Before that period they sacrificed in different places of the country, and the most religious observers of the law made no scruple on this point, provided their sacrifices were offered to the Lord. They were even obliged to tolerate many abuses, for want of necessary power and authority authority to suppress them. "In those days (says Scripture) there was no king in Israel, and every man did that which was right in his own eyes." Judg. xvii. 5, 6.—Hence Micah's ephod, which was removed to Laish, Judges xviii. 31.—hence that which Gideon made in his family, Jud. viii. 27.—hence the irregularities of the high-priest Eli's sons, 1 Sam. ii. 12, 13,—hence the crime of the inhabitants of Gibeah, Judg. xxi. 24. and hence also the frequent idolatries of the Israelites, mentioned in the book of Judges.

Saul and David, with all their authority, were not able entirely to suppress such inveterate disorders. Superstitions which the Israelites did not dare to exercise in public, they practised in private. They sacrificed on the high-places: they consulted diviners and magicians. Solomon, whom God had chosen to build his temple, was himself a stone of stumbling to Israel: he erected altars to the false gods of the Phœnicians, Moabites, and Ammonites; and he not only permitted his wives to worship the Gods of their own country, but himself adored them in their company. 1 Kings xi. 5, 6, 7. Few among the kings his successors, but shewed in this respect a like weakness. Jeroboam, son of Nebat, king of Israel, introduced the worship of the golden calves in Israel; and this worship took such deep root, that it never was entirely extirpated. From time to time some reformation in Judah suspended the evil, but they did not absolutely stop it, nor close the source of it.

The captivity of Babylon was a more effectual remedy. The Hebrews, borne down by the hand of God, were brought to reflection; and now renounced idols. They never were more faithful, or more exact in the observance of God's laws than after this period. The persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes, served only to sift the chaff from the wheat, and to display the zeal, courage and firmness of the Maccabees.

About the same time appeared among the Jews various religious sects, and divided opinions on the most important matters of the law. The Pharisees, Sadducees, and Essenes, formed three parties. The Pharisees prevailed most, and acquired infinite credit with the people. The Sadducees were not so numerous, but had a greater number of rich persons in their party. The Essenians were the most perfect, but lived retired, and did not concern themselves with public affairs.

Our Saviour found much to reprove in the Pharisees. He declared loudly against their dangerous explanations of the law; and thereby excited their hatred, which at last accomplished his death. In his time the law was known and observed; and perhaps greater zeal and punctuality were never seen in the outward observance of Moses's ordinances. But the spirit of the law, the solid virtues of it, humility, simplicity, self-denial, the love of God, and of our neighbour, were scarcely known. The Pharisees practised the law-rites from ostentation. They abounded in pride, envy, and avarice; and they had changed the most important precepts, by their erroneous explanations.

The nation of the Jews, their priesthood, and their kingdom, were, according to St. Austin, prophetic of Christians, and of the priesthood and kingdom of Jesus Christ: what happened to them was figurative, says St. Paul; their bondage in Egypt, their miraculous deliverance, their passage through the Red Sea, their sojourning in the wilderness, their entrance into the promised land, their circumcision, their ceremonies, their priests, their sacrifices, were all predictive figures of Christ's coming, of the establishment of Christianity, of the duties and privileges of Christians, of the worship, sacraments, and excellence of the gospel.

This nation, which Moses first intended should live collected in one country, was afterwards, by God's wisdom, dispersed into many countries, that, before the coming of the Messiah they might be known throughout the world; that, by the singularity of their lives, their manners, religion, history, and laws, strangers might be every where informed who the Jews were, and that this information might insensibly dispose them to receive the Messiah, whom the Jews expected, and of whom they foretold so many wonders. Wherefore, when Jesus Christ appeared, all the east was in expectation of the birth of this redeemer, of this monarch, who was to be the happiness, the hope, and salvation of all people. [Com. FRAGMENT No. CCCXXXII.]

Providence has permitted that since the death of Jesus Christ, the Jews should be again dispersed into all the world, carrying every where the marks of their reprobation, and the punishment of the sin committed by their fathers against the Messiah, whom they rejected and delivered, and crucified. We see them every where odious, despised, debased, and persecuted, yet continuing obstinately fond of their ceremonies, and of the traditions of their fore-fathers; though being distant from Jerusalem, and without priests or temple, they are unable to observe the generality of their ceremonial laws. They expect continually the coming of the Messiah.

They preserve, they carry about with them, they read and study the sacred books of the Old Testament, without penetrating the sense of them; they know the letter of them, but not the mysteries contained in them. They afford light to others, but do not enlighten themselves, says

says St. Austin. They carry our books, as servants do those of children, going to school. When we dispute with Pagans, Infidels, and Unbelievers, we argue from the sacred writings of the Jews, who certainly neither preserved, nor composed them, to oblige us. [Seen under this view, the Jews are strong and standing evidences in favour of Christianity, and indeed are (and will be much more) unwitting assistants to it.]

ADDITION.

[The existence of the Jews as a people distinct from all others, to this day, is a miracle of that indisputable kind which may well justify a further view of it.

I. The Jews are spread into all parts of the Earth. They are not only found in Europe, but to the uttermost extremity of Asia, even in China, where they settled A.D. 73. These say that some of their brethren settled in India ante A. D. 187. The settlement of Jews at Cochin, on the coast of Malabar, was most particularly described by the late Dr. Buchanan, who visited them in 1806; and, subsequently by other visitants. Their number may be about a thousand souls; five hundred of them descendants of white Jews; the rest black; these were the first settlers. Other colonies of Jews in India, were long before A. D. they call themselves Israelites, not Jews. But the settlers at Cochin describe themselves as being of the tribe of Benjamin; emigrants after the destruction of Jerusalem, by Titus. Jews abound in the cities of Persia, Northern India and Tartary, wherever our travellers have penetrated; and these are, as they assert, probably enough, descendants of the tribes which were carried captive by the Assyrian monarchs. Comp. FRAGMENT No. XXXIV. Jews are numerous in Arabia. In Egypt, and throughout Africa, along the coast of the Mediterranean, they have established themselves; nor should we overlook the settlements and former power of the Jews in Abyssinia, and along the Red Sea, &c.

II. These dispersions are of different epochs; some were voluntary, others by force. That many Jews settled in Egypt from the days of Solomon, is very credible: Comp. I Kings xi. 40. Jer. xli. xlii. et al. Many thousands were in Alexandria alone. See ALEXANDRIA. And we learn from the history of the Acts, that they had synagogues in Cyrene, Lybia, &c. also throughout Greece and Asia Minor; at Rome, and elsewhere in Italy, &c. Juvenal, and other heathen writers, hint that they were mostly regarded as little better than vagrants even before the final destruction of Jerusalem, by Titus. Yet these Jews in Italy, could not be any part of those involved in the Babylonish captivity; which was the first great dispersion of their nation. These epochs should be well understood; because, the descendants of the earliest emigrants insist that their ancestors had no share in the crucifixion of Jesus Christ; consequently, they are not in a state of punishment for that crime, nor do they bear any enmity to Christ or Christianity.

III. In all parts of the world their state is much the same; that of dislike, contempt, or of actual oppression and suffering. Jews are every where aliens; and though natives of the country, are in no country treated as members of the community. Even in Persia, where they have been established for ages, and where they have occasionally obtained great power and influence, they are marked as strangers. They are tolerated only, among the Mahometans, and even among Pagans.

In Europe their condition is that of endurance, for the most part; and even where Jews are strongest in numbers, they are not the more respected. They have been rated and taxed as dogs, or beasts of burden, in ages past, in various parts, as Germany, &c. Their walking in the same public paths as others, gave offence, and exposed them to insults from the populace, till very lately; and perhaps does still. Among the Mahometans a common name for Jews is asses. They are usually shut up in an allotted district of each city, by themselves. We must not judge of the condition of the Jews, generally, by what they experience in Britain; where none of the privileges of humanity are denied them; neither are their rites or customs interrupted, nor their persons maltreated, except by a few inconsiderate profligates.

IV. They every where maintain observances peculiar to themselves; such as circumcision, performed after their own manner, and at their own time of life, i.e. infancy, even among nations which are circumcised; also the observance of a sabbath, or day of rest, not the same day of the week as that of nations which also observe a sabbath. They mostly have retained some remembrance of the Passover; but, if I mistake not, there are Jews who not being included in the plot of Haman to destroy their nation, do not commemorate the Purim. This national constancy demonstrates a most wonderful energy in the Mosaic institutions; which are still fresh and vigorous, and not obsolete.

V. They are divided into sects of various opinions. Some of them are extremely attached to the traditions of the Rabbins, and to the multiplied observances enjoined in the Talmud, &c. Others reject these with scorn, and adhere solely to Scripture. The major part of the Jews in Europe, and those with whose works we we are mostly conversant, are Rabbinitis; and may be taken as representatives of the antient Pharisees. But, all Jews profess a veneration for their Sacred books; and according to the best information that can be obtained, they preserve them carefully, and read them with respect in their places of worship; to which, in all countries, they fail not to resort.

VI. They every where consider Judea as their proper country; and Jerusalem as their Metropolitan city. This is a mark not to be disregarded. Wherever settled, and for how long so ever, even for many ages and generations, the Jews still cherish a recollection or reference, unparalleled among nations. They have not lost it; they will not lose it, and they transmit it to their posterity, however comfortably they may be settled in any residence, or in any country. They hope against hope, to see Zion and Jerusalem revive from their ashes.

VII. The number of the Jewish nation, was estimated a few years ago, for the information of Buonaparte, at the following amount; but from what documents we do not know.

|--|-----------|
| In the Turkish Empire . . . | 1,000,000 |
| In Persia, China, India, on the East and West of the Ganges | 300,000 |
| In the West of Europe, Africa, America. | 1,700,000 |
| Total | 3,000,000 |

This number is probably very far short of the truth: it is supposed by the best informed, that another million may safely be added to this estimate; if not two millions.

VIII. The States of Christendom have lately manifested a disposition to relax the severities of their laws against the Jewish nation. In various places princes have admitted them to the rights of citizenship; but the populace still retain prejudices against them. From some countries they are excluded; as they long were from England: and we do not learn that under the Mahometans their condition is in any degree improved. It seems to follow, that if they are destined by Providence to return to their own land, as they hope, and as many pious Christians believe, they have yet long to wait for it,—till “the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled.” The attempts lately made to convert the Jews are, no doubt, extremely laudable; but they have made little impression on the bulk of the nation, or will make, till the Spirit be poured out from on high; when this people will become a miracle of another kind from that which they now exhibit; and with them will come in, also, “the fulness of the Gentiles.”

IX. The long protracted existence of the PART XV. Edit. IV.

Jews as a separate people, is not only a standing evidence of the truth of the Bible; but is of that kind which defies hesitation, imitation, or parallel. Were this people totally extinct, some might affect to say, that, they never had existed; or, that if they had existed, they never practised such rites as were imputed to them; or, that they were not a numerous people, but merely a small tribe of ignorant and unsettled Arabs. The care with which the Jews preserve their sacred books, and the conformity of those preserved in the East with those of the West, as lately attested, is a satisfactory argument in favour of the genuineness of both; and farther, the dispersion of the nation has proved the security of these documents; as it has not been in the power of any one enemy however potent, to destroy the entire series, or to consign the whole to oblivion.

[JEWELS. Valuable, whether for store, or for apparel. This word does not mean jewelery works, gems, &c. but whatever is stored up in consequence of its superior estimation. God calls his people jewels, Mal. iii. 17. the lips of knowledge are a jewel, Prov. xx. 15.]

JEZANIAH, יֵזַנְיָה, Ἰεζωνίας, whom the Lord will hear, or who is attentive to the Lord.

JEZANIAH, son of Hoshaiiah, Jer. xlii. 1. is probably the Azariah, son of Hoshaiiah, chap. xliii. 2. a principal person who engaged the Israelites, left in Judea, to go into Egypt.

JEZEBEL, זִבְזִי, island of the habitation; from זִי ai, an island, and זִבְזִי zabal, habitation: otherwise, woe to the habitation; from זִי oi, woe: or, according to the Hebrew and Syriac, isle of the dunghill, or woe to the dunghill.

[Rather, from the Arabic, or Phenecian, habitation of Ail, (or Akil, i. e. Venus) a Phenician deity. This compliment to the beauty of Jezebel, is a very credible origin of her name: but the term זִבְזִי, zebel, being variable by pronunciation, into the signification of dung, is alluded to in the phrase, “the carcase of Jezebel shall be as dung on the field—so that they shall not say this is Jezebel”—the mansion of Venus. 2 Kings ix. 37.]

JEZEBEL, daughter of Ethbaal, king of the Zidonians, and wife to Ahab king of Israel. 1 Kings xvi. 31. This princess introduced into the kingdom of Samaria the public worship of Baal, Astarte, and other Phenician deities, which the Lord had expressly forbid; and with this impious worship, a general prevalence of those abominations which had formerly incensed God against the Canaanites, to their utter extirpation. Jezebel was so zealous, that she fed at her own table four hundred prophets belonging to the goddess Astarte; and her husband Ahab in like manner kept four hundred of Baal's prophets, as ministers of his false gods.

Jezebel seems to have undertaken the utter abolition of the worship of the Lord in Israel, by persecuting his prophets: and she had destroyed them all, if a part had not been saved by some good men. Elijah, who lived at this time, having brought fire from heaven on his burnt-offering, in sight of Ahab and of all Israel, assembled at mount Carmel, and the people having killed four hundred and fifty of Baal's prophets, Jezebel sent to Elijah, declaring, that the next day she would take care he should be dispatched: hereupon he fled. 1 Kings xix.

Some time after, Ahab being desirous to buy Naboth's vineyard, but meeting with a refusal from Naboth, Jezebel wrote in the king's name to the principal men of Jezreel, requiring them to accuse him of blaspheming God, and the king, and to punish him capitally. These orders were but too punctually executed. Ahab returning from Jezreel, Elijah met him, and threatened his destruction in the name of God; and that Jezebel, who had been the cause of this evil, should be eaten by dogs in the field of Jezreel, or, according to the Hebrew, by the outward wall of Jezreel. These predictions were verified, when Jehu son of Nimshi rebelling against Ahab, and coming to Jezreel, Jezebel in full dress, looked out of a window, which was in the apartment over the city-gate, and seeing Jehu as he entered riding in his chariot, she cried out, "Had Zimri peace who slew his master?" Jehu asked who was there? whereupon two or three eunuchs made him a low reverence; and Jehu said, "Throw her down." They threw her out of the window, and she fell into the inclosure of the outward wall, where she was eaten by dogs. Jehu afterwards said, "Go, see what is become of this unhappy woman, and bury her; for she is a king's daughter." They went, and found only her skull, her feet, and the palms of her hands. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. LII. LIII.

In Rev. ii. 20. the angel of Thyatira is reproached with suffering, Jezebel, "that woman who calleth herself a prophetess, to teach and to seduce the servants of Jesus Christ," &c. Jezebel is in this place a figurative name, and signifies some impious and cruel woman, who dogmatized and domineered in the church.

JEZER, זֶרַח, 'Isa'ap, who is shut up, made, created; or who is in a straight, or in pain. Son of Naphtali, head of a family. Gen. xli. 24. Numb. xxvi. 49.

JEZIEL, זִיְאֵל, sprinkling of God; from זָרַח zarah, and אֵל el, God. 1 Chron. xii. 3.

JEROAR, זָרַח Sahar, (ISAAR, Vulg.) or Zohar, bright, white; from צָרַח tzachar. 1 Chr. iv. 7.

JEZRA, יֶזְרָא, 'Ez'epa, [JAHZERAH, Eng. Tr.] which pertains to the hog; from חָזִיר chazir, a hog. Son of Meshullam. 1 Chron. ix. 12. [Rather brought back, i. e. from captivity or evil; probably the Ahasai of Neh. xi. 13.]

JEZRAHIAH, יֶזְרָחִיָּה, the Lord is the east, or the Lord arises: otherwise, brightness of the Lord; from זָרַח zarach, to arise, and יָה jah, the Lord. Intendant, or chief, of the singers belonging to the temple. Nehem. xii. 42.

JEZREEL, יֶזְרְעֵאל, seed of God; from זָרַע zeruah, seed: otherwise, God who spreads the evil; from נָזַח nazah, to spread, and רוּחַ ruah, evil: otherwise, dropping of the friendship of God; from the same, and רַעַה raah, friendship, אֵל el, God.

[Possibly this name might be taken optative-ly, "may God sow and preserve (Israel) as seed!" otherwise, sowing, and preservation, for which we have no single name in English.]

I. JEZREEL, a city of Judah. Josh. xv. 56.

II. JEZREEL, son of Etam, of Judah. 1 Chr. iv. 3.

III. JEZREEL, son to the prophet Hosea, i. 4.

[A remarkable variation of this name is employed by the prophet Hosea, symbolizing the fate of the people of Israel. "The Lord said to me, call his name Jezrael, for yet a little while, I will avenge the blood of Israel on the house of Jehu, and cause to cease the kingdom of the house of Israel, and will break the bow of Israel in the valley of Israel." Here are three allusions in one name. The royal palace was called Israel; here Jehu slew Ahab's family: Israel was also a valley, Josh. xvii. 16. in the border of Naphtali, where the Assyrians routed Israel, 2 Kings xv. 29. so that the blood shed in the palace Israel, was avenged in the valley Israel, on the kingdom of Israel. Jehu's family was dethroned, 2 Kings xv. 12. Moreover, the Hebrew words זָרַח zarah, to disperse, and זָרַע zero, to sow, in order to increase and gather, being nearly the same in sound, the prophet hints at the restoration of Israel, verse 11. "Then shall the children of Judah and Israel be gathered under one head, and they shall come out of the land (of their dispersion), for great is the day [Targ. gathering] of Israel," or, as Jarchi, the gathering of the seed of Israel. Again, chap. ii. 22. "The earth shall hear the corn and wine and oil, and they shall hear Israel [Israel] for I will sow her [Israel] unto me in the land," &c. It is impossible to preserve this play of words in translation; but, this instance may be allowed to stand in evidence of the allusions and references couched under prophetic symbols, concealed from ignorant norant or unobservant readers; and of the metaphorical import of names, occasionally imposed, and variable by the slightest change of letters or of emphasis, to different meanings.]

IV. JEZREEL, or Esdrael, or Stradelar, or Jezrahel, a celebrated city, in the great plain between Legio west, and Scythopolis east. Euseb. in locis. It belonged to Issachar, Josh. xix. 18. Ahab had here a palace; and this city became famous on account of his seizure of Naboth's vineyard, and the vengeance executed on Ahab at Jezreel, 2 Kings ix. 10, &c. Jerom, on Hosea i. says, Jezreel was pretty near Maximianopolis; that not far from it was a very long vale. Josephus calls Jezreel, Azarius, or Azares. In the time of William of Tyre, it was called Little Gerin. Guill. Tyr. lib. xxii. cap. 26. There was a fine fountain in it, whose waters fell into the Jordan, near Scythopolis.

IGAL, גַּאֵל, who is redeemed, or who is blest, or defiled; from גָּאֵל goel. Of Issachar, deputed to view the land of promise. Numb. xiii. 7.

IGDALIAH, גִּדְלִיָּה, Γοδολίας, grandeur of the Lord, or the Lord shall exalt me, or make me great; from גָּדַל gadal, grandeur, and יָהּ jah, the Lord. Jeremiah carried the Rechabites into Igdaliah's apartment, to offer them wine. Jer. xxxv. 4.

IGEAL, גַּאֵל, he that redeems, or defiles; from גָּאֵל gaal, or gheel. [brought back. 1 Chr. iii. 22.]

IGNATIUS, a disciple of the apostles, bishop of Antioch, and a martyr. He suffered under Trajan. Some have asserted, that St. Ignatius, otherwise called Theophoros, or Theopheros, (a bearer of God, or borne by God) was the child whom Jesus took in his arms, and proposed as a pattern of humility, Matth. xviii. 2, 3—5, &c. But this is by no means certain. (Quidam apud Anastas. Bibliothec. et alii.) There are letters of Ignatius to the Virgin, and from the Virgin to Ignatius; but clearly spurious. The name of Ignatius is not in the New Testament. Chrysostom says, tom. 1. Orat. 42. that he never saw Jesus Christ; but he is believed to have been a disciple of St. Peter, and of John the Evangelist. We have several epistles written by this holy man, when going to Rome, to suffer martyrdom there. They abound with that divine fire, with which he was inflamed. The history of his martyrdom is generally known, and is received as authentic. [Translated by Abp. Wake.]

[IGNORANCE is taken in Scripture in several senses, as, 1. for the absence of knowledge or information, when the subject in question was truly unknown, Lev. iv. 13. So Jonathan was ignorant of Saul's oath, 1 Sam. xiv. 27. Vide 2 Sam. xv. 12. 2. For the absence of distinguishing knowledge, or the not rightly discerning, when the subject was known, Lev. iv. 2, 3, 22. Numb. xv. 25. Heb. v. 12. 13. i. e. for mistake after having considered the subject: erring by incorrect judgment.

Ignorance is sometimes simple, sometimes wilful: ignorance of the power of God, while surrounded by the works of God, ignorance of the will of God, while favoured by the word of God, are inexcusable.]

JIBSAM, יִבְסָם, delightful, extremely pleasant, fragrant. Son of Tola, 1 Chron. vii. 2.

JIDLAPH, יִדְלָפִי, Ἰδλᾶφ, he that distils, or drops water; from יָדַל dalaph: otherwise, joined hands, according to the Hebrew and Syriac. Son of Nahor, and nephew of Abraham. Gen. xxii. 22. [From the Arabic, prime.]

IJE-ABARIM, יֵה־אַבְרִים, Ἀβραρίμ, heap, mass, or hills of the Hebrews, or of the passengers; from יָבַע or יָבַע, heap, or hill, and עָבַר aber, to pass: otherwise, defiles of Abarim, or defiles of the passengers. An encampment of Israel in the land of Moab, after their departure from Egypt. Numb. xxi. 11. Moses says, this place is east of the land of Moab: In the same country are the mountains Abarim. Jeremiah, xlix. 3. speaks of Hai, or Gai, which is Je, or Jai, in the land of Moab.

["The heaps of Abarim," as we call some parts of certain mountains the pinnacles, certain rocks, the needles, &c.]

IIM, יֵימִי, Ἀἶμα, heap, mass, in the plural; from יָבַע hi, or hai, a heap. A city of Judah, Josh. xv. 29. [Part of the mountains of Abarim. Numb. xxxiii. 45.]

IMNA, יִמְנָה, hindrance; from יָמַח manah: otherwise, the sea disturbed; from יָם jam, the sea, and נָוַח nuah, to move, to fluctuate. 1 Chr. vii. 35.

JIMNAH, יִמְנָה, his right-hand; from יָמִין jamin: or he that reckons, or prepares; from יָמַח manah: or, according to the Syriac, he that regulates or establishes.

JIMNAH, eldest son of Asher, head of a family. Gen. xlii. 17. Numb. xxvi. 44.

JIPHTAH, יִפְתָּח, that opens; from פָּתַח pathach. A town of Judah, Josh. xv. 43.

JIPHTAH-EL, יִפְתָּח־אֵל, God opens; from פָּתַח pathach, and אֵל el, God. A valley. Josh. xix. 14.

IJON, יֵזָן, Ἰων, or Ἀἰων, look, eye, fountain; from יָזַן hain. Perhaps Ein, or Enan, a frontier town to Damascus. Ezek. xlviii. 1. We find Inna in Coele-Syria, lat. 68½, long. 33, according to Ptolemy.

IKKESH, יִקְשֵׁשׁ, Ἰκκῆς, wicked, corrupt, perverse, dangerous. A brave officer in David's army, 2 Sam. xxiii. 26. [Eng. Tr. Ira son of Ikkes. Twisted, i. e. his members; rather his hair, Curly-pate: so the Latin Crispus, Crispinus, Cincinnatus, &c.]

ILAI, 'לַי, 'חַלָּא, he that ascends; from לָי halah, or he that is above: otherwise, a heap to me; from יָ hi, a heap, and לִי to, and אֲנִי me. A valiant man in David's army, 1 Chron. xi. 29. [Shadowed, i. e. protected, by the Lord.]

ILLYRICUM, 'Ιλλυρικόν, joy, rejoicing.

ILLYRICUM. St. Paul says, Rom. xv. 19. that he had preached the gospel, from Jerusalem round about unto Illyricum. Illyricum is a province, in Europe, whereof the old northern limits were the two Pannonias, the Adriatic Sea south, Istria west, Upper Moesia and Macedonia east, so that St. Paul preached in Syria, Phœnicia, Arabia, Cilicia, Pamphilia, Pisidia, Lycaonia, Galatia, Pontus, Paphlagonia, Phrygia, Tronis, Asia, Caria, Lycia, Ionia, Lydia, the isles of Cyprus and Crete, Thracia, Macedonia, Thessalia, and Achaia. Vide the MAP.

IMAGE or representation, of any thing. God created man after his own image; i. e. as another self upon earth, to exercise a dominion subordinate to his. Vide ADAM. Otherwise, Eccl. xvii. 3. he created him after his image, wise, immortal, good, just, provident, knowing, &c. Lastly, God imprinted his image in man, his holiness, virtue, wisdom. He created man, gave him a terrene body and a reasonable soul; as in after ages his word, his wisdom, was to assume the nature of man;—body and soul. Adam by sin disfigured his image of God, and forfeited the gifts of grace and immortality; which Jesus Christ by his spirit forms a-new in our hearts.

God forbid the Hebrews from making any image or representation of any creature in heaven, or on earth, or in the waters, with intent to worship it. Nevertheless, Moses and Solomon made cherubim over the ark, and in the tabernacle. Moses made a brazen serpent; Solomon cast lions and oxen, and placed them in the Temple: [but not with design that they should be worshipped, though the brazen serpent of Moses did receive worship; and who knows whether the oxen, &c. of the Temple might not have received the same perverted attention, had they not been taken away to Babylon?]

Beside the common acceptation of the word image meaning a representation of something real, e. gr. of a horse, an ox, a star &c. this term is understood in several other senses; Psalm. xxxix. 6. In imagine pertransit homo: Man passes away like a phantom. Imaginem ipsorum ad nihilum rediges, Psalm lxxiii. 20. Thou shalt dissipate their image, their shadow, their figure, thou shalt reduce themselves to nothing. Eliphaz says, Job iv. 16. that at midnight an image, a phantom, appeared to him, he heard, as it were, a voice, or whisper. Stetit imago coram oculis meis, et vocem quasi auræ lenis audiui.

Image is sometimes taken in a contrary sense, in opposition to a transient image, a phantom, so the law having a shadow of good things to come, and not the very image of the things, it represented these good things in a slight and superficial manner, like shadows which have nothing substantial and permanent; whereas the gospel represents the same good things under a lively, solid, firm, stable and real figure: the law was but a shadow, whereof the gospel is the reality. [The law was an outline, a sketch; the gospel is a finished figure, whether picture or statue.]

In St. Paul's epistles, Jesus Christ is called "the image of the Father," 2 Cor. iv. 4. And Col. i. 15. "The image of the invisible God, the first born of every creature." And Hebr. i. 3. "the brightness of his glory, the express image of the Father's substance." This is not a mere image and no more, a ray only, but it is an emanation from the Father, an efflux of his light and substance.

St. Paul requires that "as we have borne the image of the earthly, we should likewise bear the image of the heavenly." 1 Cor. xv. 49. As we have borne the image of sinful and offending Adam, as we have imitated his sin and disobedience, so we should endeavour to retrace on our souls the features, of the heavenly man, Christ Jesus; his obedience, humility, patience, meekness, &c. [rather, to be cast in the mould, as a figure.]

Image is often taken for a statue, figure, or idol: the book of Wisdom, speaking of the causes of idolatry, says, that a father afflicted for the death of his son, made an image of him, to which he paid divine honours. We read, Rev. xiii. 14, 15. that God permitted the beast to seduce men, whom it commanded to make an image of the beast, which became living and animated; and all who refused to adore it were put to death.

IMLAH, מִלָּא, 'Imlā, Plentitude, or [fulfilment] from מָלָא mala: otherwise, circumcision; from מָל מִל. Father of Micaiah, 1 Kings xxii. 8.

IMMANUEL, עִמָּנוּאֵל, God with us: from the preposition עִי him, with, the pronoun וְ eno, us, and אֵל el, God. Vide ALMAH, Addition.

IMMER, אִמְרוֹ, 'Emrō, He that speaks, saying; according to the Syriac, Lamb; otherwise exaltation. Head of a family of priests, the sixteenth in the temple service. 1 Chron. ix. 12, xxiv. 14. The descendants of Immer returned from Babylon in number 1052. Ezra ii. 37.

[IMMORTALITY. God is absolutely immortal; he cannot die: angels are immortal, but God who made them, can terminate their being: man is immortal in part, i. e. his spirit, but but, his body dies: inferior creatures are not immortal, they die wholly: thus the principle of immortality is differently communicated, according to the will of the communicator, who can render any creature immortal, by prolonging its life; can confer immortality on the body of man, together with his soul; and who maintains angels in immortality by maintaining them in holiness. Holiness is the root of immortality, but only God is absolutely holy, as only God is absolutely immortal. All imperfection is a drawback on the principle of immortality: only God is absolutely perfect; therefore, only God is absolutely immortal.]

IMPOSITION OF HANDS, Is understood in different senses both in the Old and New Testament. 1. For ordination and consecration of priests, and sacred ministers, as well among the Jews as Christians. Acts vi. G. xiii. 3. 1 Tim. iv. 14. v. 22. 2 Tim. i. 6. Also 2. To signify the establishment of judges and magistrates, on whom it was usual to lay hands, when they were invested with their employments. Numb. xxvii. 18. Jacob laid his hands on Ephraim and Manasseh, when he gave them his last blessing. Gen. xlviii. 14.

The Israelites who presented sin-offerings at the tabernacle, confessed their sins, while they laid their hands upon those offerings. Lev. i. 4. iii. 2. ix. 22. Witnesses laid their hands upon the head of the accused person, Dan. xiii. 34. Apoc. as if to signify that they charged on him the guilt of his blood, and freed themselves from it. Our Saviour laid his hands upon children that were presented to him, and blessed them, Mark x. 16. We find imposition of hands used likewise in confirmation, Acts viii. 17. xix. 6. The apostles conferred the Holy Ghost by laying their hands on those who were baptized.

The Israelites laid their hands on the Levites, when they offered them to the Lord, to be consecrated to his service, Numb. viii. 10, 12.

IMPURE, legal impurity. There were several sorts of impurity under the law of Moses. Some were voluntary, as the touching a dead body, or any animal that died of itself; or any creeping thing, or unclean creature: or the touching things holy by one who was not clean, or who was not a priest; or the touching one who had a leprosy, one who had a gonorrhea, or one who was polluted by a dead carcass; a woman who had newly lain in, or was in her courses, or was incommuted with an extraordinary issue of blood. Sometimes these impurities were involuntary; as when any one unawares entered the chamber of a person that lay dead, or touched bones, or a sepulchre, &c. or either by night or day suffered an involuntary pollution; or such diseases as pollute, as the leprosy, or a gonorrhea; or the use of marriage, lawful or unlawful.

Beds, clothes, moveables, and utensils, which had touched any thing unclean, contracted likewise a pollution, and often communicated it. Legal pollutions were generally purified by bathing, and lasted only till the evening. The person polluted plunged over head and ears into water, either with his clothes on, or washed himself and his clothes separately. Other pollutions continued seven days; as that contracted by touching a dead body. Others lasted forty or fifty days, as that of women lately delivered. Others lasted till the person was cured; as the leprosy, or a gonorrhea. Certain diseases excluded the patients from the commerce of the world, as the leprosy: others excluded only from the use of things holy, as involuntary touching an unclean creature, the use of marriage, &c. Others only separated the person from his relations in his own house, restraining such to a particular distance; as women who had newly lain in, &c.

Many of these pollutions were purified by bathing. Others were expiated by sacrifices; others by a certain water, or ley, made with the ashes of a red heifer, sacrificed on the great day of expiation. When a leper was cured, he went to the temple, and offered a sacrifice of two birds, one whereof was killed, the other liberated. He who had been polluted by touching a dead body, or by being present at a funeral, was to be purified with the water of expiation, on pain of death. A woman who had been delivered of a child came to the tabernacle at the time prescribed, and there offered a turtle-dove and a lamb for her purification; or two turtle-doves, or two young pigeons.

The impurities, which the law of Moses expressed with so much accuracy and care, were figures of other more important impurities, meant to be prohibited; such as sins against God, or trespasses against our neighbour. The saints of the Old Testament well understood this difference; and our Saviour in the gospel has strongly inculcated, that not outward and corporeal pollutions render us unacceptable to God, but inward pollutions, such as infect the soul, and violate piety, truth, and charity.

The regulations prescribed by Moses relating to impurity, are very numerous and perplexing. but the Rabbins have multiplied them enormously, and thereby have made the law a still more insupportable burden. A good part of the Mishnah is wholly taken up in resolving cases of conscience on this subject. See Mishnah סדר טהרה Ordo Puritatum.

IMRAH, ימרה, ἑμιβρα, rebel, factious. [who is self-related, 1 Chron. vii. 36.]

IMRI, אַמְרִי, bitter; from מָרַר marar; otherwise, he that speaks; from אָמַר amar; otherwise, raised up; from רָמַח ramah.

I. IMRI, son of Omri, 1 Chron. ix. 4.

II. IMRI, father of Zaccar, Nehem. iii. 2.

INCENSE, an aromatic and odoriferous gum. It issues out of a tree named by the ancients Thurifera:—its leaves resemble those of a pear-tree, according to Theophrastus. Incisions are made in it in the dog-days, to procure the gum. Male incense is the best; it is round, white, fat within, and kindles instantly as put on the fire. It is likewise called Olibanum. Female incense is soft, more gummy, and less agreeable in smell than the other. That of Saba was the best, and most esteemed by the ancients; they speak of it with great approbation. Theophrast. Hist. Plant. lib. ix. cap. 4. et alii, passim. Virgil, Georg. l. et 2. Vide Æneid, l.

India mittit ebur, molles sua thura Sabæi.

To offer incense was an office peculiar to the priests; they entered every day into the holy apartment of the temple, morning and evening, to burn incense there. On the great day of expiation, the high-priest took up with a spoon incense or perfume pounded, and ready for the censer; he threw it on the fire in his censer, the moment he entered the sanctuary; that the smoke which rose from it might prevent his looking with too much curiosity on the ark and mercy-seat: God threatens him with death on failing to perform this, Numb. xvi. 13. The Levites were not to touch the censers; and Korah, Dathan, and Abiram suffered a terrible punishment for imprudently arrogating this honour. The censers of the ancient Hebrews were a sort of chafing-dishes, or perfuming pans, with, or without handles; which the high-priest placed on the altar of incense, or carried into the sanctuary. See PLATES: ANCIENT CENSERS. St. John, Rev. v. 8, speaking of the censers held by the four-and-twenty elders, calls them dishes only, or golden cups full of incense; Phialas aureas plenas odoramentorum: which gives an idea of censers very different from those used at present. In medals of Simon Maccabæus, we see smoking censers like a cup, or a chalice with a foot to it, [if those smoking representations be genuine. See the PLATES, HIGH PRIEST.]

INCENSE, incensum, sometimes signifies in Scripture the sacrifices and fat of victims; as, "Aaron and his sons burnt incense upon the altar of burnt offerings and on the altar of incense." We know that no incense was offered on the altar of burnt offerings; but victims were burnt thereon as an odour agreeable to the Lord. 1 Chron. vi. 49.

INCEST, an unlawful conjunction of persons related within the degrees of kindred prohibited by God and the church. In the beginning of the world, and again long after the deluge, marriages between near relations were allowed. In the time of Abraham and Isaac, these marriages were permitted, and among the Persians much later; it is even said to be esteemed neither criminal nor ignominious, among the remains of the old Persians at this day.

Some authors believe, that marriages between near relations, were permitted, or at least tolerated, till the time of Moses, who first prohibited them among the Hebrews: that among other people they were allowed even after him. Others hold the contrary; but it is hard to establish either of these opinions, for want of historical documents. God prohibits such alliances, Lev. xviii. 24, 25. "Ye shall not do according to the customs of the land of Egypt, wherein ye dwelt; nor according to the manners of the land of Canaan, whither I am bringing you;" which intimates, that incests were common in Egypt and Palestine. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CXXVI.

Marriage is prohibited, 1. between the son and his mother; the father and his daughter; the son and his mother-in-law. 2. Between brothers and sisters, whether both by the same father or mother, or, by one or the other of them only. 3. Between the grand-father and grand-mother, and their grand-son or grand-daughter. 4. Between the daughter of the father's wife, and the son of the same father. 5. Between the aunt and the nephew; but the Jews pretend that the uncle might marry his niece. 6. Between the father-in-law law and the mother-in-law. 7. Between the brother-in-law and the sister-in-law. There is an exception to this law; that when a man dies without children, his brother was obliged to marry his widow, to raise up heirs for him. 8. The same man is forbid from marrying both the mother and the daughter; or the daughter of his wife's son, or, the daughter of his daughter. 9. His wife's sister. But some translate the Hebrew thus; "When thou marryest a wife, thou shalt not take a second;" and many maintain, that this passage forbids polygamy, which was only tolerated afterwards.

All these degrees of relation, wherein marriage was not lawful, are comprehended in the following verses:

Nata, soror, neptis, matertera, fratri et uxor,
Et patris conjux, mater, puivigna, noverca,
Uxorisque soror, privigni nata, nurusque,
Atque soror patris, conjungi lege vetantur.

Moses forbids these incestuous marriages, Lev. xviii. 29, on pain of being "cut off from among their people;" i. e. put to death. This is plain, because adultery and other crimes, which the law elsewhere subjects to death, are here made liable to the same punishment, "of cutting off from among the people." And these crimes are made capital; for "if any one lieth with his mother-in-law, let them both be punished with death," Lev. xx. 11, 19. "And he who having married the mother, marries afterwards the daughter, shall be burnt alive with her." Most civilized people have looked on incests as abominable crimes. St. Paul, speaking of the incestuous man of Corinth, says, "It is reported commonly, that there is fornication among you, and such fornication as is not so much as named among the Gentiles, that one should have his father's wife." 1 Cor. v. 1.

Tamar's incest with her father-in-law Judah, is well known: Scripture does not condemn it; nay, seems rather to approve it; and Judah, who designed to have had her burnt as an adulteress, acknowledges that she was more righteous than he; because, he deferred marrying her to his youngest son Shelah, who should have wedded her, according to the law, which obliges one brother to marry the widow of another, on his dying without children. Gen. xxxviii. 24, 26. Vide LEVIT, also, FRAGMENTS, Nos. LXXXII. CXXV.

Lot's incest with his two daughters can be palliated only by his ignorance, and the simplicity of his daughters, who believed, or pretended to believe, that after the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, there remained no man upon the earth to perpetuate the race of mankind by them. The manner of their procedure shews that they looked on this action as unlawful, and that they did not question but their father would have abominated it, had they not put it out of his power to detect it, by making him drunk. Gen. xix. 31, &c.

For the incest of Amnon and Tamar, 2 Sam. xiii. 12. Vide AMNON.

INCHANTMENTS. The law of God condemns inchantments and inchanters. Several terms are used in Scripture to denote inchantments.

1. Lachash, לַחַשׁ, which signifies to mutter, to speak with a low voice, like magicians in their evocations, and magical operations. Ps. lviii. 5.

2. Latim, לַטִּים, secrets, when Moses speaks of the inchantments wrought by Pharaoh's magicians.

3. Caschap, כַּשָּׁפִים, meaning those who practice juggling, legerdemain, tricks and witchery, deluding peoples eyes and senses. 2 Chron. xxxiii. 6.

4. Chabar, חָבַר, which signifies properly, to bind, assemble, associate, reunite; this occurs principally among those who charm serpents, who tame them, and make them gentle and sociable, which before were fierce, dangerous, and untractable. Deut. xviii. 11. 5.

We have examples of all these ways of inchanting. It is common in Scripture for magicians, sorcerers, and inchanters to speak in a low voice, to whisper: they are called Ventriloqui, because they spake as one would suppose from the bottom of their stomachs. They affected secrecy, and mysterious ways, to conceal the vanity, folly, or infamy of their pernicious art. Their pretended magic often consisted in cunning tricks only, in sleight of hand, or some natural secrets, unknown to the ignorant. They affected obscurity and night, or would shew their skill only before the uninformed, or mean persons, and feared nothing so much as serious examination, broad day-light, and the inspection of the intelligent.

The INCHANTMENTS of Pharaoh's magicians, in imitation of the miracles wrought by Moses, were either mere witchcraft, and illusion, whereby they deceived the eyes of the spectators; or, if they performed miracles, and produced real changes of the rods, of the water of the Nile, &c. they did it by the application of second causes to the production of effects, which depend originally on the power of God, and by giving certain forms to, or impressing certain motions on, a created substance; and as these changes, and motions, were above the popularly known powers of Nature, they were thought to be miraculous. But God never permits miracles produced by evil spirits to be such as may necessarily seduce us into error; for, either he limits their power, as he did to Pharaoh's magicians, who who were obliged to acknowledge the finger of God in some instances; or they discover themselves by their impiety, or bad conduct; which are the marks appointed by Moses for discerning a false from a true prophet. Deut. xiii. 12, &c.

Incantments of serpents, the cure of wounds by charms, fancied metamorphoses, &c. were common among the ancients. The Psalmist speaks, Psalm lviii. 5. of "the serpent, or deaf asp, that stoppeth her ears, lest she should hear the voice of the charmers, charming wisely." Heb. "The voice of those who speak low, and of those who make use of charms with skill;" or the voice of him who tameth, who softeneth serpents. (Vide Asp.) Jeremiah, viii. 17, threatens the Jews, "behold I will send serpents among you, which will not be charmed." Ecclesiastes, x. 11, says, "A babbler is like those serpents against which charms have no power." Job likewise speaks of incantments by whose power serpents were burst asunder, "Shall the enchanter cause the Leviathan to burst?" Job xl. 25. And Ecclesiasticus, xii. 13. "Who will pity a charmer that is bitten with a serpent?"

St. Austin, de Genesi ad litter. lib. xix. 28, confesses that the Marsians, a people of Italy, had formerly the secret of incanting serpents: "Any one would say, that serpents understood the language of this people, so obedient do we see them to their orders: as soon as the Marsian has done speaking, they come out of their holes." Charmers are often satisfied with driving serpents from some certain district.

Sometimes they made them burst:

Viperas rumpo verbis & carmine fauces.
OVID METAMORPH. Fab. 2. de Medea.

At other times they benumbed them, lulled them asleep, tamed them, and took away their fierceness.

Spargere qui somnos cantuque manuque solebat.
VIRG. ENFID. vii.

Origen and Eusebius speak of the charming of serpents as common in Palestine. Nearchus, apud Strabo. lib. xv. who followed Alexander the Great in his expeditions, says that the Indians scarcely use any other remedies against the bites of serpents beside incantments; and that some travel up and down the country professing this art, and making a livelihood by it. The Pyllis and the Marsi not only cured the wounds by sucking them, but sold magical plates, as preservatives against the bite of serpents. Arnob. lib. ii.

To charm diseases, to stop flowing blood by incantments, to cure the bitings of serpents, to charm the gout, and sprains, are things very common in antiquity. Pindar, Pyth. Ode 4. affirms, that Chiron the Centaur cured diseases by charms; and that Æsculapius cured fevers, ulcers, wounds and pains, by gentle charms, by potions, topical remedies, or incisions. Homer, Odys. l. assures us, that the blood which issued out of Ulysses's wound was stopped by incantments. Cato, De Re Rust. cap. 160. produces certain verses which were pronounced in order to heal a limb that was out of joint.

Music and singing, which is a kind of charm, were sometimes used to cure certain diseases of the mind, or at least diseases caused by disorder of the mind, or of the passions. Galen, De sanitate tuenda, lib. i. cap. 8. says, that he had great experience in this, and that he could produce the authority of Æsculapius, his countryman, who by melody and music relieved constitutions impaired by too great heat: and Plato says, that the midwives of Athens had a secret of making the delivery of women more easy by certain charms and incantments. Plato, Theoet. p. 145.

The Hebrews, a people extremely superstitious, did not indeed carry so far the use of charms and incantments in the cure of diseases, because they were restrained by their law, and because their kings and priests were vigilant in preventing these misdoings. Notwithstanding, we see traces of this superstition among them. Nay, some pretend even to authorize it by the example of Moses, who ordered a brazen serpent to be elevated on a pole, that those Israelites who had been bitten by serpents, called saraphs, might be healed by looking towards it. Num. xxi. 8. Saul employed music, i. e. David's harp, to procure relief in his fits of melancholy. Vide EXORCISTS. DAVID. ELISHA.

INDIA, Ἰνδία, 'Indiā, praise, law; from ἰνδῆ hod. [Or confession: otherwise becoming, or beautiful. Esth. i. l. viii. 9.

Hodu is thought to mean India, or the river Indus; but rather, it ought to be pronounced Hindu, the n being being omitted in writing: so we have lapad, for lampad; &c. This name, however, fixes the extent of the Persian dominions eastward to that original station of the Hindoos, which I have supposed at the head of the Indus. There is not, I believe, any memorial of the Persian power having permanently maintained itself east of the Indus. Only Alexander the Great ever thought of establishing dominion in those countries. The Mahometans, indeed, have so done; but then they have renounced the west. Nadir Shah penetrated to Delhi, but he returned to Persia, and did not attempt to retain both regions under his rule.] It

It is said, Ahasuerus reigned from the Indies to Ethiopia. Heb. from Hoddo to Cush. By Hoddo all interpreters understand India; and by Cush, Ethiopia, between Arabia and Egypt. Vide CUSH. Herodot. lib. iii. cap. 94. 97. Job, xxviii. 16. speaks of India;—Non conferetur tinctis Indiæ coloribus. Heb. "It cannot be valued with the Chethem of Ophir:" the word Chethem is taken for Gold. See OPHIR. In the Maccabees, the guide of an Elephant is called an Indian, because generally Indians were chosen to conduct these creatures. The Indian sat on the beast's neck, and with a bent iron rod, pricked his ear, and guided him. The best authors of antiquity commonly call the master of an elephant, of what nation soever he might be, an Indian.

[INHERITANCE, a portion which appertains to another, after some particular event. As the principles of inheritance differ in the East from those which are established among ourselves, we shall insert some of them. The reader will observe, that there is no need of the death of the parent in these countries, as there is among us, before the children possess their inheritance. Vide HEIR.

"The rights of inheritance, [among the Hindoos] are laid down with great precision, and with the strictest attention: to the natural claim of the inheritor in the several degrees of affinity. A man is herein considered but as tenant for life in his own property; and, as all opportunity of distributing his effects by will, after his death, is precluded, hardly any mention is made of such kind of bequest. By these ordinances also, he is hindered from dispossessing his children of his property in favour of aliens, and from making a blind and partial allotment in behalf of a favourite child, to the prejudice of the rest; by which the weakness of parental affection, or of a misguided mind in its dotage, is admirably remedied. These laws also strongly elucidate the story of the Prodigal Son in the Scriptures, since it appears from hence to have been an immemorial custom in the East for sons to demand their portion of inheritance during their father's life-time, and that the parent, however aware of the dissipated inclinations of his child, could not legally refuse to comply with the application.

If all the sons go at once in a body to their father, jointly requesting their respective shares of his fortune; in that case, the father shall give equal shares of the property earned by himself, to the son incapable of getting his own living; to the son who hath been particularly dutiful to him, and to the son who hath a very large family, and also to the other sons who do not lie under any of these three circumstances; in this case, he shall not have power to give to any one of them more or less than to the others.

PART XV. Edit. IV.

If a father has occupied any glebe belonging to his father, that was not before occupied, he shall not have power to divide it among his sons in unequal shares, as in the case of property earned by himself. Halhed's GENTOO LAWS p. 53.]

[Our translators have frequently used the term inheritance in the sense of participation, or property. So Mark xii. 7. let us kill the son and the inheritance—the property, shall be ours. Acts xx. 32. xxvi. 18. an inheritance, participation, among those who are sanctified. Eph. i. 18. the riches of the glory of his inheritance, his immediate property, in the saints. Comp. 1 Peter i. 4. So Abraham is spoken of Ezek. xxxiii. 24, as inheriting the land, which could not be true, as his family had no previous possession in Canaan; and is expressly contrary to Acts vii. 5. which says Abraham had no inheritance there: but he had possessions, or property. Comp. 2 Chron. x. 16. et al.]

[INIQUITY. This word means not only sin, but the punishment of sin, and the expiation of it; "Aaron will bear the iniquities of the people;" he will atone for them, Exod. xxviii. 38. The Lord "visits the iniquities of the fathers upon the children," Exod. xx. 5. He sometimes causes visible effects of his wrath to fall on the children of criminal parents. Comp. FRAGMENT, No. CCCXL.

To bear his iniquity, to endure the punishment of it, to be obliged to expiate it. "The scape-goat shall bear upon him all the iniquities of the people, unto a land not inhabited;" as an expiatory victim for the whole nation. Aufer iniquitatem famule tue, said Abigail to David, let not the fault of my husband Nabal be imputed to me. 1 Sam. xxv. 28.

The man of iniquity, the child of iniquity, the hand of iniquity, the workers of iniquity, need no explanation. Torrentes iniquitatis conturbaverunt me. Heb. "The torrents of Belial made me afraid," Psalm xviii. 5. The wicked have fallen upon me like a torrent. "The iniquity of my heels shall compass me about." Psalm xlix. 5. The punishment of my iniquities, which pursue me gradually, will suddenly lay hold on me. "Shall the throne of iniquity have fellowship with thee, which frameth mischief by a law?" Psalm xciv. 20. Is it possible, O my God, that thou shouldest be in concert with the throne of iniquity, with the Chaldeans, those proud and unjust rulers, who abuse their power that they may overwhelm us with calamities? "Judas purchased a field with the reward of iniquity," Acts i. 18. rather, he furnished the chief priests with the price of it, by restoring to them the reward of his treachery.

To bear iniquity, to expiate it. The priests bear the iniquity of the people; they are charged with the expiation of it. "Aaron shall bear the iniquity of the holy things, which the children of Israel shall hallow in all their holy gifts." Exod. xxviii. 38. "Wherefore have ye not eaten of the sin offering in the holy place, seeing it is most holy; and God hath given it you to bear the iniquity of the congregation, to make atonement for them?" Lev. x. 17.

If a man is called upon to give testimony of any thing whereof he was a witness, and will not declare it, he shall bear his iniquity; he shall be punished with death: for so bearing his iniquity is generally explained. See Lev. xix. 8. xx. 17, 19, 20. xxiv. 15. Numb. ix. 13. xvi. 31, &c. It must be confessed, however, that sometimes to bear his iniquity, particularly when the matter in question is secret, or of less consequence, for the expiation whereof the law ordains certain sacrifices, signifies no more than to expiate his sin, and offer the prescribed sacrifices.

INNOCENT, INNOCENCE. The signification of this word is well known. The Hebrews considered innocence as consisting chiefly in an exemption from external faults committed contrary to the law; hence they often join innocent with hands. Gen. xxxvii. 22. Psalms xxiv. 4. xxvi. 6. "I will wash my hands in innocency." And Psalm lxxiii. 13. "Then have I cleansed my heart in vain, and washed my hands in innocency." Josephus acknowledges no other sins beside those actions which are put in execution. Sins in thought, in his account, are not punished by God.

To be innocent, is used sometimes for being exempt from punishment. "I will not treat you as one innocent," Jer. xlv. 28. literally, I will not make thee innocent: I will chastise thee, but like a kind father. Jeremiah, xlix. 12. speaking to the Edomites, says, They who have not (so much) deserved to drink of the cup of my wrath, have tasted of it, et tu quasi innocens relinqueris? Non eris innocens, sed bibes. And Nahum. i. 3. "God is ready to exercise vengeance, he will make no one innocent: he will spare no one." Exod. xxxiv. 7. Heb. "Thou shalt make no one innocent:" no sin shall remain unpunished. Thou, O Lord, says the Psalmist, xviii. 26, cum viro innocente innocens eris. Thou treatest the just as just, the good as good; thou never dost confound the guilty with the innocent.

Job being accused by his friends, declares he will never renounce his innocency, chap. xxvii. 5. Non recedam ab innocentia mea. I will suffer continually; yet will not confess that God punishes me for my sins. God tells Satan, that notwithstanding the evils which he had inflicted on Job, he still retained his innocency. And Job's wife insults him in these words, Adhuc permanes in simplicitate tua? Heb. innocentia tua, Job ii. 3—9. Thou continuest as firmly attached to thy duty, as submissive to the will of God, as before thy misfortunes.

INNOCENTS. By this name those infants are called who were massacred by Herod's order at Bethlehem, [from the age of entering on the second year and under,] with a design of including in this slaughter, the new born king of the Jews, whose birth he had learned from the wise men of the east. Matt. ii. 16, 17. See HEROD THE GREAT, and MAGI.

The Greeks in their Menology, and the Ethiopians in their Liturgy, affirm, that the number of the children massacred at Bethlehem, and round about, amounted to fourteen thousand; which is not credible. The church very anciently looked on them as the first fruits of the martyrs. The Latin church celebrates their festival December 28, the Greek, December 29.

It is very surprising, that Josephus the historian, should say nothing of this massacre. This makes people think, that the number of children slain was but small, [rather 14, than 14,000] Some assert that Augustus being informed that Herod had put to death his own son, among the children whom he had caused to be executed in Syria, said, "It is better to be Herod's hog than his son." Macrobi. Saturnal, lib. ii. cap. 4. It is probable enough that the emperor might at the same time learn the death of the innocents, and that of Antipater, which his father Herod ordered five days before his own death; and that on this occasion he used the expression related by Macrobius, [which in the Greek has a play of words on hog and son.] There was not above six weeks interval between the death of the innocents and that of Antipater. As to what St. Matthew says, that the massacre of these innocents was a fulfilment of the prophecy by Jeremiah, xxxi. 15. "A voice was heard from Ramah," &c. it is our opinion, that the primary sense of this prophecy related to the carrying away the ten tribes into captivity, and that St. Matthew accommodated it to the circumstances he relates.

INTERCALATION. By this name they call the Jewish custom of adding a thirteenth month to their lunar year, at the end of every two or three years, i. e. in the revolution of the cycle of nineteen years, there are seven years of thirteen teen months each; the rest are only of twelve months. When an intercalary month is added, it is placed between February and March, and then there is a first Adar; and a following month called Ve-Adar; or second Adar.

The intercalation of the Jews is owing to all the lunar months taken together, being not so long by twelve hours, or thereabouts, as the solar months; which at the end of three years makes twenty-nine or thirty days. See MONTHS.

[INTERCESSION, an intreaty used by one person toward another: whether this person solicits on his own account, or on account of one for whom he is agent. Man intercedes with man, sometimes to procure an advantage to himself; sometimes as a mediator to benefit another: he may be said to intercede for another, when he puts words into the suppliant's mouth, and directs and prompts him to say, what otherwise he would be unable to say; or to say in a more persuasive manner what he might intend to say. The intercession of Christ on behalf of sinners, Rom. viii. 34. 1 John ii. 1. and the intercession of the Holy Spirit, Rom. viii. 26. are easily illustrated by this adaptation of the term.]

[INTERPRETATION, a conversion of a difficult subject, expression, symbol, parable, &c. into one more easy: As of a dream from its symbols to plain matter of fact, as Pharaoh's dream, &c. of an obscure saying, apothegm, or precept, into familiar, and customary expressions; of a foreign language, into a national and popular idiom. The necessity of reading the Scriptures in our own tongue may be clearly inferred from the conduct of the writers of the gospels, who often interpret words of peculiar import, titles, phrases, and idioms, for the benefit of their readers—observing, “which being interpreted is, so or so”]

JOAB, אב, paternity, or who has a father; from אב ab, a father: otherwise, voluntary; from אב joab, [to whom the Lord is a father.]

JOAB, son of Zeruiah, David's sister, and brother to Abishai, and Asahel. Joab was one of the most valiant soldiers, and greatest generals in David's time; but then he was one of the most cruel, revengeful, and imperious of men. He performed great services for David, and was always firm to his interests. He was commander in chief of his troops, when David was king of Judah only. He signaled himself at the battle of Gibeon against Abner, 2 Sam. ii. 13, 14, &c. but Asahel his brother was killed in that engagement by Abner. To revenge his death, Joab treacherously killed Abner, who had come to Hebron to make an alliance with David, and bring all Israel to his obedience, 2 Sam. iii. 27, 39. David abhorred that base action; but did not dare to punish Joab, who was too formidable. Comp. FRAGMENT, No. CCXVIII.

After David was acknowledged king by all Israel, he besieged Jerusalem, and promised to make captain general of his army, the man who should first mount the walls, and beat off the Jebusites, 1 Chron. xi. 6. Joab was the first who appeared on the walls, and by his valour well deserved to be continued in his station. He subdued the Ammonites, and he procured the destruction of the brave Uriah, at the siege of Rabbah, their capital, 2 Sam. xi. 12. He interceded for Absalom's return from exile, and his restoration to favour. But though he shewed himself a friend to Absalom in his disgrace, he was his enemy at his rebellion. He overcame him in a set battle near Mahanaim; and being informed that he hung by the hair on an oak, he pierced him to death with his own hands, though he well knew that David had given strict orders to preserve him. And when the king discovered too much sorrow for the death of his son, Joab reprimanded him.

When Sheba son of Bichri set up the standard of rebellion, David commanded Amasa to assemble the troops of Judah, and pursue him; but Amasa being too slow, David directed Abishai, Joab's brother, to pursue Sheba. Joab accompanied him with the Cherethites and Pelethites of the king's guard. Amasa arrived soon after, and at Gibeon, Joab making as if he would kiss him, plunged his poignard in his belly. Joab brought the war with Sheba to a happy conclusion, without a battle. He returned to Jerusalem, and David continued him in the command of his armies, 2 Sam. xx. 23.

When David by the impulse of an evil spirit, and a criminal curiosity, undertook to number his people, he gave that commission to Joab: who did all he could to change the king's resolution; but being obliged to obey, he executed in part only what the king had commanded.

Adonijah, David's son, being the eldest of the royal family, after the death of Absalom, considered how he might procure himself to be acknowledged king. He took care principally to engage Joab the general, and Abiathar the high-priest; and at a great entertainment, which he made near the fountain of Siloam for the leaders of his party, he was saluted king by them. But David ordered Solomon to be crowned, and anointed by the high-priest Zadok, and the prophet Nathan. Adonijah on receiving this news fled to the temple, as a sanctuary; and Joab with the rest retired.

Joab by this last step increased David's aversion from him, so that when near his end, he advised Solomon to punish Joab for the various violences of which he had been guilty. Some time after the death of David, Joab being informed that Solomon had caused Adonijah to be put to death, and had banished the high-priest Abiathar to his country residence at Anathoth, he thought it high time to provide for his own security; he fled therefore into the temple, and laid hold on the horns of the altar.

Solomon sent Benaiah, son of Jehoiada, who required him to quit his asylum; but Joab answering that he would die on the spot, Solomon ordered execution upon him at the foot of the altar. Thus died Joab. He was buried by Benaiah in his own house, in the wilderness. A. M. 2290, ante A. D. 1014.

II. JOAB, son of Seraiah, 1 Chron. iv. 14.

III. JOAB. Ezra ii. 6. viii. 9. Neh. vii. 11. A person of this name also gave name to a town, Ataroth beth Joab, 1 Chr. ii. 54.

JOACHIN. See JEHOIACHIN.

JOAH, יוֹאָח, 'Iwāḥ, or 'Iwād, fraternity, or who has a brother: from אחא achah, a brother: or brother of the Lord; from achah, and יָה jah, the Lord.

I. JOAH, son of Zimmah, and grandson of Gershon the Levite, 1 Chron. vi. 21.

II. JOAH, secretary to king Josiah, employed in repairing the temple, 2 Chron. xxxiv. 8.

III. JOAH, son of Asaph, sent by Hezekiah king of Judah, to answer Rabshekah, 2 Kings xviii. 18.

JOAKIM, יוֹאֲכִים, 'Iwākīm, Eli, Eliakim. See JEHOIAKIM.

JOAKIM, husband of St. Ann, and father to the Blessed Virgin; grandfather to Jesus Christ, after the flesh. We believe him to be the Eli mentioned Luke iii. 23. Eli, Eliakim, and Joakim, are properly the same name. The name of Joakim, father of the Blessed Virgin, is not in the canonical writings of the New Testament; but has been adopted by the Greek and Latin churches. In the Latin, principally since the festival of St. Anna and St. Joakim has been celebrated; but among the Greeks long before. St. Austin, in his answer to Faustus the Manichee, lib. xxiii. says, that the name of Joakim being known only from apocryphal writings, could not be used in argument. But among the Greeks this name occurs in writings of great antiquity.—The Proto-evangelium, or Preparatory Gospel (of the second century) says a great deal of Joakim and Anna. The apocryphal Gospel of the birth of Mary, speaks of them likewise. This is thought to have been composed by Seleucus, in the second century. Vide Tom. v. nov. Edit. S. Hieronym. p. 44.

Peter of Alexandria, Can. 13. mentions the death of Zechariah, father to John the Baptist, who was killed between the temple and the altar, and Elizabeth's flight, which circumstances are taken from the Preparatory Gospel. Gregory of Nyssa cites the same work. Orat. in Natale Domini, p. 779.

We meet with almost the same things in a discourse of Eustathius of Antioch, on the Hexameron, and in Epiphanius; which shews the antiquity of this tradition. From these sources John Damascenus, Vincent of Beauvais, and Fulbert of Chartres, borrowed what they say concerning the Blessed Virgin's death. The tradition of Joakim's being the father of Mary, was so general in the east, that Mahomet speaks of it. Alcoran, Surat 3.

I do not mean to attribute any authority to the apocryphal books, wherein the name of Joakim occurs; but only to prove the antiquity of this tradition in the church. Neither the Ebionites, nor the Manichees, nor Seleucus, had any interest in deceiving us with regard to the names of Joakim and Anna. The Preparatory Gospel is the most ancient document wherein the name of Joakim, the Virgin's father occurs; and it represents Joakim as a man of power in Israel, who at solemn festivals, made magnificent sacrifices in the temple. Vide ANNA III.

Cedrenus tells us, that the Blessed Virgin lost her father and mother at twelve years of age. They who please may consult the Bollandists on March 19, and M. de Tillemont, tom. 1. not. 2. The worship of St. Joakim and St. Anna is very ancient in the east; but is more modern in the west. It is said, that pope Julius appointed the feast of St. Joakim to March 20, about A. D. 1510. In a martyrology printed in 1491, it is placed Dec. 9. Pope Pius V. struck it out of the Roman Breviary; but Gregory XV. in 1610, replaced it, at March 20.

II. JOAKIM, high-priest of the Jews. He succeeded Joshua, son of Jozedek, his father, after the return from the captivity. He lived under Xerxes king of Persia. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xii. cap. 5. initio.

III. JOAKIM, otherwise ELIAKIM, son of Hilkiah high-priest of the Jews, in the reigns of Manasseh and Josiah, more generally known by the name Hilkiah, or Eliakim. Judith iv. 6, 14.

JOANNA, יוֹחָנָנָה, 'Iwānna, the grace, the gift, or the mercy of the Lord. See JOHANAN.

JOANNA, wife of Chuza, Herod's steward, Luke viii. 3. was one of those women who had followed our Saviour, and assisted him with their property. St. Luke observes, that these women had been delivered by Jesus Christ from evil spirits; or cured of diseases. Perhaps this wife of Chuza was not a widow. It was customary among the Jews, for men who dedicated themselves to preaching, to accept services from women of piety, who attended them without any scandal. We know nothing particular of Joanna.

JOASH,

JOASH, וַיִּשׁ, who despairs; from וַיִּשׁ jaash; otherwise, he that burns, who is of fire; from וַיִּשׁ esh. [From the Arabic, given by God.]

I. JOASH, son of Ahaziah, king of Judah. When the impious Athaliah, undertook to extinguish the race of the kings of Judah, that she might seize the crown herself, she ordered all the princes her grand-children to be murdered. Nevertheless, Jehoshebah or Jehoshabath daughter of king Joram, sister of Ahaziah, and wife to the high-priest Jehoiada, rescued young Joash then a child, from the cruelty of Athaliah, and lodged him in the temple, with his nurse. Here he abode six years; but in the seventh year, Jehoiada procured him to be acknowledged king, and so well concerted his plan, that young Joash was placed on the throne, and saluted king, in the temple, before the queen had notice of it: and she was killed without the temple, 2 Kings xi. xii. [He is also called Jehoash.]

Joash received the diadem, together with the book of the law, from the hands of Jehoiada, the high-priest, who, in the young king's name, made a covenant between the Lord, the king, and the people, for their future fidelity to God. He likewise obliged the people to take an oath to the king. Joash was but seven years old, when he began to reign, and he reigned forty years at Jerusalem. He governed with justice and piety, so long as he was guided by the high-priest Jehoiada. Nevertheless, he did not abolish the high-places.

Jehoiada, in the king's minority, had issued orders for collecting voluntary offerings to the holy place, with design of repairing the temple; but his orders were ill executed, till the twentieth year of Joash. Then this prince directed chests to be placed at the entrance of the temple, and an account to be given him of what money was collected in them, that it might be faithfully employed in reparations of the house of God. Jehoiada dying at the age of a hundred and thirty years, Joash was misled by the evil councils of his courtiers, who had before been restrained by that high-priest's authority. They began to forsake the temple of the Lord, and to worship idols, and groves, (rather Asteroth, goddess of the groves) which drew down wrath on Judah and Jerusalem.

Then the spirit of God came upon the high-priest Zechariah, son of Jehoiada, who reprimanded the people; but they who heard him, stoned him, according to orders from the king. It was not long before God inflicted on Joash, the just punishment of his ingratitude to Jehoiada, and his son: Hazael king of Syria besieged Gath, which belonged to Judah; and having taken it he marched against Jerusalem. Joash to redeem himself from the difficulties of a siege, and from the danger of being plundered, took what money he could find in the temple, which had been consecrated by Ahaziah his father, Jehoram his grand-father, and himself; besides what he had in the royal treasury; all which he gave to Hazael.

It is believed that the next year the Syrian army marched again into Judah: but Hazael was not with it in person. The Syrians made great havoc, defeated the troops of Joash, entered Jerusalem, slew the princes of Judah, and sent a great booty to the king of Syria at Damascus. They treated Joash himself with great ignominy; and left him extremely ill: his servants revolted against him, and killed him in his bed, whereby the blood of Zechariah the high-priest was avenged. He was buried in Jerusalem, but not in the royal sepulchre.

II. JOASH, king of Israel, son and successor of Jehoahaz, was declared king in his father's lifetime, A. M. 3163, and he reigned alone A. M. 3165, ante A. D. 839. He reigned sixteen years in Samaria, including the two years that he reigned with his father. He did evil in the sight of the Lord, and imitated Jeroboam, son of Nebat, who made Israel to sin. We do not know many particulars of his reign; but that the Lord re-established the affairs of the kingdom of Israel, which had been thrown into very great confusion under Jehoahaz his father.

Elisha falling sick of that disease whereof he died, Joash came to see him, and wept before the prophet, who directed him to shoot with arrows; he shot three times, and ceased: he gained therefore only three victories over Syria.

Joash reigned a long time peaceably. Amaziah king of Judah, having been victorious over the Edomites, challenged him, saying, "Come, let us see one another in the face." Joash reproved him by the fable of the cedar, and the thistle of Lebanon. But Amaziah would not hearken to him. Joash took the field; Amaziah was routed, and taken in the battle. Joash entered Jerusalem, and ordered four hundred cubits of the city walls to be demolished, from the gate of Ephraim to the corner gate. He took all the treasures of the temple, and the royal palace, and returned in triumph to Samaria. He died there in peace soon after this victory, and was succeeded by Jeroboam, 2 Kings xiii. 10. [He is also called Jehoash.]

III. JOASH, Father of Gideon. Jud. vi. 11.

IV. JOASH, son of Amealak, was ordered by king Abab to imprison the prophet Micaiah, 1 Kings xxii. 26. [Eng. Tr. Joash the king's son.]

V. JOASH, a descendant of Shelah, son of Judah. 1 Chron. iv. 22, Vulgate Securus, (the Certain.)

JOASH,

JOASH, וַיִּשְׁׁ, gnawed by the moth; from וַיִּשְׁׁ hash; or, who is assembled; from וַיִּשְׁׁ hush.

VI. JOASH, son of Becher. 1 Chron. vii. 8.

VII. JOASH, superintendent of the oil cellars, 1 Chron. xxvii. 28.

JOAZAR, high-priest of the Jews, successor to Matthias son of Theophilus, A. M. 4000, the year of Jesus Christ's birth. He was succeeded by his brother Eleazar, A. M. 4004, and was created high-priest a second time, A. M. 4010, and enjoyed this dignity till 4016. Then Ananus the son of Seth succeeded him. Joazar, otherwise Azar, was brother to Mariamne, daughter of Simon the high-priest, and wife to Herod the Great. Archelaus, at his return from Rome, deposed Joazar in 4004, because he was engaged against him with the seditious. Some time afterwards Joazar was restored by the Romans; for whom he had declared, in 4010. Lastly, Cyrenius governor of Syria being come into Judea, in 4016, deposed Joazar, and substituted Ananus.

JOB, יֹב 'Aşşu, he that cries, or weeps.

I. JOB, third son of Issachar, Gen. xli. 13. called Jashub, 1 Chron. vii. 1. [See the next.]

JOB, יֹב, he that weeps, that cries; otherwise, that speaks out of a hollow place, like the Ventriloquists. [From the Syriac, greatly desired; the height of desire.]

II. JOB, celebrated for his patience, his constancy, his piety, and his virtue, dwelt in the land of Uz, or the Ausitis, in East Edom, not far from Bozra. There are different opinions concerning his family and his time. At the end of the Greek and Arabic copies of the book of Job, and in the old Latin Vulgate, we read these words, there said to be taken from the Syriac.—“Job dwelt in the Ausitis, on the confines of Idumæa and Arabia; his name at first was Jobab. He married an Arabian woman, by whom he had a son, called Ennon. He himself was son of Zerah, of the posterity of Esau, and a native of Bozrah; so that he was the fifth from Abraham. He reigned in Edom; and the kings before and after him reigned in this order. Balak the son of Beor, in the city of Dinhabah, after him Job, (otherwise called Jobab). Job was succeeded by Husham prince of Teman. After him reigned Hadad the son of Bedad, who defeated the Midianites in the fields of Moab. The name of his city was Arith. Job's friends who came to visit him were Eliphaz, of the posterity of Esau, and king of Teman; Bildad king of the Shubites; and, Zophar king of the Naamathites.”

This is the most ancient account of Job's genealogy. Aristeus, Philo, and Polyhistor, acknowledged this genealogy to be true: the old Greek and Latin fathers did the same, and cited it. Theodotion has preserved it in his translation of Job. This tradition is derived, probably, from the Jews. In tracing it we find Job to have been contemporary with Moses.

Jobab. 1 Chron. i. 35—44.

Job was a [chief] man of great probity, virtue, and religion, and he possessed much riches in cattle and slaves; which at that time were the principal wealth even of princes in Arabia and Edom. He had seven sons and three daughters; and was in great repute among all people, on both sides of the Euphrates. His sons, by turns, made entertainments for each other; and when they had gone through the circle of their days of feasting, Job sent to them, purified them, and offered burnt-offerings for each of them; that God might pardon any faults inadvertently committed against him during such festivities. He was infinitely averse from injustice, idolatry, fraud, and adultery; he avoided evil thoughts, and dangerous looks; was compassionate to the poor; a father to the orphan, a protector to the widow, a guide to the blind, and a support to the lame.

God permitted Satan to put the virtue of Job to the test; at first he gave him power over his property; but forbade him to touch his person. Satan began with taking away his oxen. A company of Sabeans slew Job's husbandmen, and drove off all the oxen: one servant only escaped to bring the news. While he was reporting this misfortune, a second came, and told Job that fire from heaven had consumed his sheep, and those who kept them: and that he alone had escaped.

A third messenger arrived who said, the Chaldeans have carried away the camels, have killed all thy servants, and I only am escaped. He had not ended, when another came, and said, While thy sons and thy daughters were eating and drinking in their eldest brother's house, an impetuous wind suddenly overthrew it, and they were all crushed to death under the ruins: I alone am escaped to bring thee this news. Then Job rent his clothes, and shaved his head, and fell down upon the ground, saying, “Naked came I out of my mother's womb, and naked shall I return thither. The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord.”

As Job endured these calamities without repining pinning against Providence, Satan solicited permission to afflict his person, and the Lord said, "Behold, he is in thine hand, but touch not his life." Satan therefore smote him with dreadful diseases: and Job, seated on a dung-hill, scraped off the corruption with a potsherd. His wife said, "Dost thou still retain thy piety? Curse God, and die." Job answered, "Shall we receive good at the hand of God, and shall we not receive evil?" In the mean time three of Job's friends, having been informed of his misfortunes, came to visit him; Eliphaz the Temanite, Bildad the Shubite, and Zophar the Naamathite. A fourth was Elihu the Buzite, who from chap. xxxii. bears a distinguished part in the dialogue. [See ELIHU.] They continued seven days sitting on the ground by him, without speaking. At last Job broke silence, and complained of his misery. His friends not distinguishing between the evils wherewith God tries those whom he loves, and the afflictions wherewith he punishes the wicked; accused Job of having harboured some secret impiety, and urged him to return to God by repentance, and humbly to submit to his justice, since he suffered only according to his demerits.

Job, well convinced of his own innocence, maintained, that his sufferings were greater than his faults, and that God sometimes afflicted the righteous only to try them, to give them an opportunity of manifesting, or of improving their pious dispositions; or, because it was his pleasure, for reasons unknown to mankind. Elihu takes a middle path, referring strongly to God's sovereignty. To terminate this dispute, the Deity appears in a cloud, and decides in favour of Job; nevertheless, not approving those harsh expressions, which the extremity of his sorrow, and the warmth of dispute, had excited. —Job humbly acknowledges his fault, and asks forgiveness. The Lord condemns Job's friends, and enjoins them to expiate their sins with sacrifices, offered by the hands of Job. He restores Job to health, gives him double the riches which he before possessed, blesses him with a beautiful and numerous family, and crowns a holy life with a happy death. This is the substance of Job's history.

The time wherein this pious man lived is very much contested. But, supposing him to have been contemporary with Moses, and fixing the time of his trial to some years after the departure of the Hebrews out of Egypt, (it cannot be placed earlier, because it is supposed he speaks of this event;) he might have lived till the time of Othniel. Supposing, for example, that he was afflicted seven years after the Exodus, A. M. 2520, ante A. D. 1484, and having lived 140 years after, he must have been dead in 2660. Job xlii. 16.

[The Talmudists report Job to have been born in the year of Jacob's settlement in Egypt, and that he died in the year wherein the Israelites departed out of this country. See Huet, Demonstr. Evang. Prop. iv. de libro Job. Here this very learned author, contrary to the opinion of CALMET, asserts Job to have lived before Moses; but that the memory of his misfortunes was recent, when Moses, whom Huetius supposes to be the writer of the book of Job, undertook to compose the history of them, while he lived in Midian with Jethro.] Some believe, that he lived seventy years in prosperity, and that after his misfortunes, God doubled that number. By which account he must have lived in all two hundred and ten years.

Tombs, called Job's, have been shewn in several places. The most celebrated is in the Trachonitis, toward the springs of Jordan, where for many ages a pyramid was believed to be Job's tomb. It is placed between the cities of Teman, Shuah, and Naamath, which are supposed to have been in this country. The Chaldee paraphrast, named Cock, places his residence in Armenia; and travellers tell us, that Job's tomb is shewn there; but this Job is thought to have been a Mahometan captain, of modern date. Another Chaldee interpreter places Job at Constantinople. There is a tomb near the walls of that city, which is certainly called Job's: but it is an Arabian's, killed at the siege of Constantinople, in 672. In the sixth century there was a monastery at Constantinople, dedicated to St. Job; but it is not said that his body reposed there. Eusebius and Jerom assure us, that there was a tradition of Job's having dwelt at Astaroth-Carnaim, a city in the Batanæa beyond Jordan; and that his house was still seen there. The LXX relate that Dinnabab was the capital of Jobab's kingdom. This city was in the Ausitis, or in Arabia Deserta. As we suppose Job and Jobab to be the same person, we must say likewise, that he lived and died at Dinnabab.

We meet with the name of Job in the ancient martyrologies, with the title of prophet, saint, and martyr. The Greeks have chosen May 6, for his festival: and herein they have been followed by the Christians of Arabia, Egypt, Ethiopia, and Russia, or Muscovy. The Latins keep his festival May 10. This, next to the Maccabees, brothers and martyrs, is the first saint to whom the western church decreed public and religious honours; and we know not of any saint among the patriarchs and prophets to whom more churches have been consecrated, or chapels dedicated.

When we consider accurately all that Job in his book says of himself, it seems to us, that his disease disease discovers for the most part symptoms of the leprosy ; and we may affirm, that the fathers and commentators are generally of this opinion. St. Chrysostom, Apollinarius, Polychronus, Philip the priest, venerable Bede, the author of the sermons, ad Fratres in eremo, cited under St. Austin's name, Pineda, Bartholin, Bolduc, Vatablus, Cyprian of the Cistercians, and many others, tell us so explicitly, or implicitly.

They who say that he was attacked with an infamous private disease, agree almost in the same opinion, since that, in all probability, was, originally, a leprosy ; communicated by merely familiar (not criminal) intercourse. [But, some think it was rather Variolous than Venereal.]

Some have questioned whether there ever was such a person as Job. Spinoza believed Job to have been a Pagan. Others say he lived before Moses ; others, in the time of Moses ; others, under the Judges. Some place him so far back as David and Solomon ; others, at or near the captivity. But there is no denying that there was such a person as Job, without contradicting Ezekiel, Tobit, and St. James, who speak of him as a holy man, and a true pattern of patience ; without opposing the current of tradition among both Jews and Christians, and all the authority of the Greek and Latin fathers. Job did not live under the Jewish law, and perhaps was not subject to the law of circumcision ; and in this sense we may confess, that he was a Pagan, like Melchisedek and other good men. Although the time wherein this holy man lived be dubious, we cannot place him so low as David and Solomon, much less at the captivity of Babylon, since he is cited by Tobit and by Ezekiel as an ancient patriarch. Notwithstanding, it is not impossible but the author of this book, as we now have it, might live after David and Solomon : because he seems sometimes to allude to the Psalms, Jeremiah, and the Proverbs.

The eastern people relate several particulars of Job, which we do not read in Scripture. They deduce his genealogy after this manner. Abraham, Isaac, Esau, Razakh, Anosch, Job, or Aiub, as they write it. Eutychius, patriarch of Alexandria, makes him likewise to descend from Esau thus ; Esau, Raguel, Razakh, Amos, Job. But some Arabian historians derive his descent from Ishmael, and pretend, that he is the first of the three prophets sprung from Ishmael ; which three prophets, in their account, are Job, Jethro, and Mahomet.

BOOK OF JOB. Various conjectures have been made concerning this book. Some have thought that Job himself wrote it at first, in Syriac or in Arabic, and that Moses or some other Israelite, translated it into Hebrew. Others suppose Elihu, one of Job's friends, to be the author. No decisive proof is furnished by the book itself. It seems to be beyond dispute, that the composer of it was a Jew by religion ; and later than Job. There are so many allusions in it to Scripture expressions, that every one must believe Scripture was very familiar to the author of this poem.

The original language of the book of Job is Hebrew, but blended with many Arabic and Chaldee expressions, and several particular turns, not usual in Hebrew ; for which reason this work is obscure and difficult. It is written in verse, whose beauty consists principally in noble expressions, bold and sublime thoughts, lively emotions, fine descriptions, and great diversity of character. I do not believe that in all antiquity there is a piece of poetry more copious, more lofty, more magnificent, more diversified, more adorned, or more affecting.

The author, whoever he was, has practised all the beauties of his art, in the characters of the four persons whom he brings upon the stage. The history, as to the substance of it, is true ; the sentiments, reasons, and arguments of the several persons, are faithfully expressed ; but it is very probable, that the terms and turns of expression are the poet's own. Vide FRAGMENT, No. XVIII.

The canonical authority of the book of Job, is generally acknowledged in the Greek and Latin churches ; and this opinion has been derived from the synagogue to the church. St. Paul, in several places, seems to quote the book of Job ; at least to allude to it. St. James commends the patience of Job, and says, it was well known to those he wrote to.

JOBAB, יבב, from the same as Job.

I. JOBAB, son of Zerah, and grandson to Esau, Gen. xxxvi. 33. 1 Chron. i. 44.

II. JOBAB, son of Joktan, Gen. x. 29, and 1 Chron. i. 23.

III. JOBAB, king of Madon, Josh. xi. 1.

IV. JOBAB, son of Gera, of Benjamin, 1 Chr. viii. 9.

V. JOBAB, son of Elpaal, of the same tribe, 1 Chron. viii. 18.

JOCHEBED, יכבד, glorious, honourable, a person of merit ; from כבד cabad : or the glory of the Lord, from יהוה jah, the Lord, and כבד cabad, glory.

JOCHEBED, wife of Amram, and mother of Miriam, Moses, and Aaron. Several difficulties are started concerning the degree of relation between Amram and Jochebed.—Some assert that Jochebed was the daughter immediately of Levi, and aunt of Amram, her husband, because (Exod. ii. 1. vi. 20. Numb. xxvi. 59,) she is called daughter of Levi. Others maintain, that she was only cousin-german to Amram, Anram, being daughter of one of Kohath's brethren. The Chaldee on Exod. vi. 20, says, she was daughter of Amram's sister; the LXX. say, she was daughter of Amram's brother. The Hebrew דודא doda, does not always denote the same degree of relation. Nevertheless, it seems to me most probable, that Jochebed was only cousin-german to Amram. Because, 1. Had she been the immediate daughter of Levi, the disproportion between her age and Amram's would have been too great. 2. Marriages between aunt and nephew were forbidden by the law; and we have no proof that they were allowed before the law. 3. By daughter of Levi may very well be meant grand-daughter, according to the style of the Hebrews.

JOED, יודי, Yōdî, who is adorned, or who possesses; from ידד hadah: otherwise, who gives testimony; from יד hud: or who plunders; from יד hed. [Neh. xi. 7. thought to be the same as Judah, verse 9, and Hodaviah, 1 Chr. ix. 7. the Lord's ornament, or praise.]

JOEL, יואל, he that wills, commands, or swears; from יא jail. [Jehovah is God.]

I. JOEL, the prophet Samuel's eldest son. Samuel being old made his sons Joel and Abiah judges over Israel, 1 Sam viii. 1, 2, &c. They exercised their jurisdiction in Beersheba, in the south of Palestine. But they received presents, and were unjust in their judgments; which induced Israel to desire a king.

II. JOEL, son of Josibiah, of Simeon, 1 Chron. iv. 35.

III. JOEL, son of Izrahiah, of Issachar, 1 Chr. vii. 3.

IV. JOEL, a valiant man in David's army, 1 Chron. xi. 38.

V. JOEL, son of Gershom, a Levite, a chief musician in David's time, 1 Chron. xv. 7.

VI. JOEL, son of Pedaiab, of Manasseh, 1 Chr. xxvii. 20.

VII. JOEL, son of Pethuel, יואל, Acts ii. 16. second of the minor prophets, was, it is said, of the tribe of Reuben, and city of Bethoron (rather Betharan, for Bethoron was on this side Jordan, in the tribe of Ephraim; but Betharan was on the other side of that river, in the tribe of Reuben.) Joel prophesied in the kingdom of Judah. It is our opinion, that he flourished after the removal of the ten tribes, and the destruction of the kingdom of Israel. He speaks of a great famine, and an inundation of locusts, which ravaged Judæa: but we can infer nothing from thence toward fixing the time of Joel.

Jerom, followed by many others, believed Joel to have been contemporary with Hosea, according to a rule laid down by him, that when there is no proof of the time of any prophet, our conjectures may be directed by the time of the preceding prophet, whose epoch is better known. But this rule is not certain, and should not hinder us from following a better system. The Hebrews maintain, that Joel prophesied under Manasseh, and they refer the famine mentioned by him, to that of Jeremiah, viii. 13. Vide chap. xiv:—but if so, as is probable enough, it must be said that Joel prophesied after Manasseh, since in that place of Jeremiah, the Lord resolves to disperse his people, on account of the sins which had been committed by Manasseh; which implies that Manasseh was then dead. We choose therefore rather to place Joel under Josiah king of Judah, contemporary with Jeremiah.

Under the comparison to a cloud of locusts, this prophet represents an enemy's army, which fell upon Judæa, and caused great desolation. This, together with caterpillars and drought, brought on a terrible famine. God being moved by the calamities and prayers of his people, scattered the locusts, and the wind blew them into the sea. Subsequently, the prophet foretells the day of the Lord, and his vengeance in the valley of Jezreel. He speaks of the teacher of righteousness, to come from God; and of the Holy Spirit, to descend upon all flesh. He says that Jerusalem will eternally be inhabited; that Salvation will come from thence; that whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord shall be saved. All this relates to the new covenant, and to the time of the Messiah. Vide Acts ii. 6.

JOELAH, יואלה, elevation; from יאל halah: otherwise, he that profits, or advances; from יאל jahal: otherwise, he that takes away the curse; from יאל jahal, to remove, to reject, and אלה alah, a curse [or, an oak.] Son of Jeroham, one of David's party, 1 Chron. xii. 7.

JOEZER, יועזר, he that aids and assists—(sc. the Lord) from יועז hazar. A gallant officer of David's army, 1 Chron. xii. 6.

JOGBEHAH, יובח, Kai úψωσαν αυτας, (and his heights) height, or exaltation; from יובח gabah. A city, Numb. xxxii. 35.

JOGLI, יוגלי, revelation, exile, revolution: from יוגל galah: otherwise, exultation of joy: from יוגל gul. Numb. xxxiv. 22.

JOHAH, יוחא, Joah, who enlivens, and gives life; from יחי chayah, to live, to vivify. A brave man in David's army, 1 Chron. xi. 45.

JOHANAN, יוחנן, Joan, who is liberal, merciful, pious, and grants favours; from יוחנן chanan: otherwise, grace of the Lord [graciously given by the Lord]; from יח jah, the Lord, and יחנן chen, favour.

I. JOHANAN, son of Careah, 2 Kings xxv. 23. also, Jer. xli. 15, 16. Being informed that

U div. 2

Ishmael

Ishmael was come to Mizpah, with design to kill Gedaliah, who was left there by Nebuchadnezzar to govern the remnant of the people, he gave intelligence to Gedaliah, and offered to kill Ishmael; but Gedaliah refusing to credit him, was massacred, A. M. 3417, ante A. D. 587.

II. JOHANAN, son of Josiah, 1 Chron. iii. 15. Probably Johanán died without issue, since Scripture speaks no more of him.

III. JOHANAN, son of Elioenai, a descendant of David by Zerobabel, 1 Chron. iii. ult.

IV. JOHANAN, high-priest, son of Azariah the high-priest, and father to another Azariah, 1 Chron. vi. 9, 10. Some believe him to be Jehoida, the father of Zechariah, in the reign of Joash, king of Judah, 2 Chron. xxiv. 11, &c.

JOHN, Ἰωάννης, Iwánnēs, grace, gift, or mercy of the Lord. The Heb. Johanán, signifies gentle, agreeable, or the grace of God, agreeable to God. Scripture mentions several illustrious men named John, Joannes, or Jochanan.

I. JOHN, the father of Mattathias, the celebrated Maccabee, descended from the priests of Joiarib's family, 1 Macc. ii. 1.

II. JOHN, surnamed Gaddis, son of Mattathias above-mentioned, and brother of Judas, Jonathan, and Simon, Maccabeus. John Maccabeus was treacherously killed by the sons of Jambri, as he was conducting the baggage belonging to his brethren the Maccabees, to the Nabathites their allies, 1 Macc. ix. 36.

III. JOHN HIRCANUS, son of Simon Maccabeus. His Hebrew name was John; his surname was given him on some occasion (perhaps a victory which some think was over the Hircanians) not now well ascertained. His father Simon, high-priest and prince of the Jews, made John governor of the sea coast of Judea. Here he defeated Cendebeus, general of Antiochus Sidetes, then besieging Tryphon in Dora. He escaped from the intended slaughter of the Maccabee family by his brother-in-law Ptolemy, in which his father Simon fell: after whose death John was acknowledged prince and high-priest of his nation. He was quickly attacked in Jerusalem by Antiochus; but defended the city vigorously, and took occasion of the feast of Tabernacles to negotiate a peace; which he effected, paying the king a great sum of money; (300 talents) which, some say, he obtained from David's sepulchre. But this seems to rest on rumour only. See DAVID, ad fin.

John accompanied Antiochus in his war against the Parthians; which however favourable at first, at length issued in the defeat of the king; and John seized the opportunity to render himself independent of the kings of Syria. The year following he conquered the Idumeans, and obliged them to receive circumcision after the Jewish manner, with other Jewish rites. He sent ambassadors to Rome, to renew the alliance with that people; and some years afterwards, he besieged Samaria, which was taken by his sons Antigonus and Aristobulus, after a year's resistance. John ordered the city to be demolished, in which state it continued to the time of Gabinius. He was now master of all Judea, Samaria, Galilee, and many frontier towns; so that he was one of the most powerful princes of his time. Nevertheless, at home he met with trouble from the Pharisees, who envied his exaltation. At length their mutual ill will broke out into open enmity;—John forbade the observance of such ceremonies as were founded on tradition only; and he enforced his orders by penalties on the contumacious.

He is said to have built the castle of Baris, on the mount of the temple, but without the sacred enclosure. It became the palace of the Asmonean princes; here the pontifical vestments were kept; and here, afterwards, Herod built the tower Antonia. After having being high-priest twenty nine years John died, A. M. 3898. ante A. D. 106. Josephus says he was endowed with the spirit of prophecy. Antiq. lib. xiii. 17, 18. xviii. 6. 2 Macc. iii. 11. et al. 4 Macc.

IV. John the Baptist, the forerunner of our Lord Jesus Christ and son of Zechariah and Elizabeth, was born A. M. 4000, about six months before Jesus Christ. His birth, name, and office, were foretold to his father Zachary, when he was performing his functions as a priest in the temple of Jerusalem. Luke i. 10, 11, &c. Vide ANNUNCIATION.

The time of Elizabeth's delivery being come, on the eighth day, when the child was circumcised, they called him by his father's name, Zechariah; but his mother told them his name should be John, which his father confirmed. The child grew, and was strengthened in spirit, and dwelt in the wilderness till the day of his manifestation to Israel.

St. Chrysostom and St. Jerom believe, that he was brought up from his infancy in the wilderness. But St. Paulinus informs us, that he spent the first years of his life in his father's house, where he learned the law; and that as soon as his body was strengthened with age, he retired into the wilderness, where he abode without eating or drinking, as Jesus says of him, Matt. xi. 13. (i. e. eating and drinking so little, and things so far from dainties, that in some sort, it might be said, he did not eat or drink at all,) and being clothed only with camel's hair, and a leathern girdle about his loins, Matt. iii. 4.

After John had arrived at thirty years of age, God manifested him to the world, in the fifteenth year of Tiberius, A. D. 28; and he began his ministry, by publishing the approach of the Messiah, in the country along and beyond the Jordan, preaching repentance. He brought many persons to confess their sins; and he baptised them in the river Jordan, telling them, that they "should believe in him who was coming after him; who would baptize with the Holy Ghost and fire." From this baptism, John derived the surname of Baptist, or Baptizer. Many persons became his disciples, exercising themselves in acts of repentance, and advising it to others: some of his disciples afterwards followed our Saviour.

The virtue of John Baptist was so eminent, that many Jews took him for the Messiah; but he plainly declared that he was not that honoured character; he was only the voice of one crying in the wilderness, "Prepare the way of the Lord." Nevertheless, he was as yet totally unacquainted with the person of Jesus Christ; only the Holy Ghost had told him, "that it was he who should be marked by the Holy Spirit descending and resting on him." When Jesus Christ presented himself to receive baptism from him, John excused himself, saying, "I need rather being baptized by thee." But Jesus said, "it is becoming to fulfil all righteousness." This was A. D. 30. The next day John said publicly of Jesus, "Behold the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sins of the world."

Herod Antipas having married his brother Philip's wife, while he was living, had occasioned great scandal. [See FRAG. No. CCXXVII.] John Baptist with his usual liberty reproved Herod to his face. Herod incensed, ordered him into custody, in the castle of Machærus. This, in all probability, happened about the end of A. D. 30. Josephus gives another turn to the causes of his imprisonment: "John, surnamed the Baptist, was, (says he,) a man of piety, who exhorted the Jews with great zeal to embrace virtue, and to perform all the duties of justice to one another. He was followed by a great multitude of people, who were delighted with hearing his discourses; and the Jews appeared disposed to enter upon any enterprise that he should recommend to them. Herod grew uneasy at it, and was apprehensive that he would stir up some sedition; he thought therefore that it was necessary to prevent this evil, lest, if he should too long defer to remedy it, he might have reason to repent" Antiq. lib. xviii. cap. 2.

He remained a good while in prison, and his disciples did not forsake him. Even Herod respected and feared him, knowing that he was very much beloved by the people; he had heard him, and had sometimes followed his advice. But Herodias, afraid lest Herod should set him at liberty, sought an opportunity of putting him to death. At last she met with it. Herod made a great entertainment for his friends on his birthday, and Herodias sent Salome, her daughter by Philip her former and lawful husband, into the banquetting hall, to dance before the king and his guests. She acquitted herself so much to his satisfaction, that he promised her any thing she should ask of him. Her mother instructed her to demand the head of John the Baptist. Herod was greatly vexed; but not daring to be worse than his word before his company, he gave orders for beheading John the Baptist; which orders were immediately executed. The head was given to Salome, and by her carried to her mother; who, it is said, pierced his tongue with her bodkin. The death of John the Baptist happened, as is believed, about the end of A. D. 31, or early in A. D. 32. The entertainment was made probably at Machærus, where John was in prison. Vide FRAGMENT, No. L.

The Greek and Latin churches celebrate John's beheading August 29. The disciples of John on hearing of his death, came and carried away his body, and gave notice of it to Jesus Christ. The gospel does not say where they buried him; but in the time of Julian the apostate, his tomb was shewn at Samaria, where the inhabitants opened it, and burnt part of his bones; the rest were saved by some Christians, who carried them to an abbot of Jerusalem, named Philip. Theodoret, Hist. Eccl. lib. iii. cap. 3. Chronic. Alex. p. 686.

[DISCIPLES OF JOHN THE BAPTIST. It is certain from the New Testament that the disciples of John were very numerous; and that they continued to exist, and to receive accessions, long after their master's decease. Acts xix. 3. They had frequent fasts, frequent and (apparently) long prayers; they had peculiar notions of purification, and of a manner of life. Jesus was baptized by John; as were also, most if not all of his apostles. Nevertheless, the Gospel writers seem to avoid saying much about them; it may be thought certain, also, that the first chapters of the first Epistle, and of the Gospel of John, are (without naming them) directed against their tenets; which renders an acquaintance with this sect of importance to a due understanding of the Gospel; as well doctrinally as historically; nor is this importance abated by the character given of the Baptist, by Josephus, and the consequences in Jewish affairs, attributed to his death. As divines seldom give that distinction to John, which is his due, and as the sect formed by his followers is almost totally unknown among us, we have thought that a statement, somewhat copious, of their practices and opinions would be useful. As to the forms of language, the combination of phrases, &c. in which their books agree with (and illustrate) the N. T. it is a branch of criticism from which much may be gathered; but it must be omitted here.

This sect has been long known under the names of Sabeans, Christians of St. John, or Mendaites. Their principal establishments are in the vicinity of the Schat-el-Arab, at Bassora, Korna, Schuster, &c. A map of their settlements was published at Rome, and afterwards by Thevenot. Their numbers might be twenty or twenty-five thousand families.

The name of "Christians of St. John," is the very last to which they are entitled, as they abhor the name of Christian; but it is supposed that having received it from the Mahometans, they endure it for the sake of maintaining a toleration. Notwithstanding which, they are, at Korna, &c. extremely ill treated by the Turks, and live in great misery. They now have relinquished their pilgrimages to the Jordan. They call themselves Mendai Jjahi, disciples of John, i. e. the Baptist; also, Bendeh Hâi, creatures of the living (God); or Nasourayi, which some have misunderstood for Nazareni, whence their name of Christians; but they call the disciples of Jesus explicitly Christiani, not Nazareni.

In 1780, M. Norberg, a Swede, read to the Royal Society of Gottingen, a memoir relating to this sect, on which in 1781, M. Walch read Observations tending to prove their identity with the disciples of John mentioned in N. T. and by ecclesiastical writers under the name of Baptistes or Hémérobaptistes.

Their language bears great affinity to that of the Talmudical Jews; and is unquestionably a dialect of the Chaldee or Syriac: their books seem to be in part derived from the latest age of the Jewish polity, and in a still greater proportion to be interpolated by notions and dogmata derived from much later writers, probably Chaldee mystics, and also Arabian; since Mahomet, and some of his followers are mentioned in them. A few passages from some of their books had been translated, previously, from copies extant at Paris, and in the Bodleyan library at Oxford: but our chief knowledge of them is derived from translations by M. Norberg, who after forty years labour, published five volumes quarto, 1815-18. The difficulty of reading the copy was very great, that of translating it, was still greater; and if, as may be suspected, the learned translator has failed in some particulars, he is nevertheless, entitled to the praises due to him who first opens the way in a path so difficult.

M. Norberg has also received information of a branch of this people still existing in Syria, in the territory of Latakiah (Laodicea) at el Merkab, about a day's journey east of Mount Libanus; they call themselves Galileans. Their number may be about fourteen thousand. As this sect is but obscure at Bassora, we shall insert the account of these Galileans, as given by Germanus Conti, a religious Maronite of Mount Lebanon, the deputy of his patriarch in Syria, to M. Norberg, who quotes his own words, taken from his own lips.

"These Galileans formerly dwelt, in sufficient wealth and plenty, in that which is called the Holy Land; but about a century and a half ago, they quitted that country to settle in a tract of Libanus called Mercab. They claim John the Baptist as their founder, and seem to hold a middle station between Jews and Christians. The following are their rites. He who presides in sacred things, wears a vest and tiara both of camel's skin. They also take honey and locusts alternately, sacramentally: which are distributed as consecrated elements, to worshippers present, and are sent to the absent, equally, as a religious rite: Both these kinds of food being taken with the greatest reverence. The day on which this is done is held sacred. It is proper to abstain from worldly occupation, whether of business or of pleasure. A few words are allowed, but those pious: and if more, they relate to the same subject. So also, once a month they have an exhortation in their place of worship; and to this they flock with eagerness. The chief topic of this discourse is the "Light of the World," always introduced with sentences like those of the Evangelist, In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. This they apply to John, and deny to Jesus, Messiah; whom they do not allow to be Son of God, but a prophet, and a follower of John. Their places of worship are void of all ornament. They contain neither pictures nor statues.

"Baptism, the rite of initiation is performed in the open-air, in a large vessel, a mat serving as skreen to the place, at the earliest dawn of day: the middle part of the day is proper to honey and locusts: and, at the close, at the time of divine worship, they light lamps and candles, and solemnly repeat these words: "John, whom we here worship as our father, (instructor) we beseech thee to be propitious to us, to protect us from every hostile power, and to enlighten our minds with the light of the true religion, as thou hast commanded us to light these these luminaries." After discharging this duty, whoever can proceeds to partake of the sacrament already described. Those also who are detained at home do the same; although the duty be done in private. Twice a week, i. e. on Sunday and Thursday, this is never omitted. And the priest, whether standing at the altar, or going up into the pulpit, puts on his official clothing for the shoulders and the head. He also holds in his hand a staff; and delivers an exhortation beginning in the Galilean language, but proceeding in Arabic. Of their ancient language all, except the priests, and a few who have learned it, are extremely ignorant. But they can say prayers by memory, and can repeat certain passages from the sacred volume; during which time the doors are closed, and proper persons are placed at the entrance. During the whole time the utmost respect and silence is preserved: the head of the devout is inclined forwards, and the hands are folded together.

"Beside this, they also dedicate to John four festival days in a year. On the first, which is his birth-day, they dress wheat, they eat grapes, nuts, honey, and locusts, with other things intermingled. And this, in large dishes filled to the brim, it is customary freely to offer, or to place before one another. Nor do they take any other food than this during this day. After this the whole having been well prepared, having been sanctified by prayer, and having gone round the whole congregation (of which every person present takes part of this vegetable fare into his own dish, raising his head and singing) they all make a liberal donation to the priest.

"On that day, when John instituted his Baptism, they repeat this sacred ordinance. They proceed in a body to the water, and among them one who bears a standard; also, the priest, dressed in his camel's hair ornaments, holding a vessel of water in his hand (hydria in manu est) he sprinkles each person singly as he comes out of the river, saying, "I renew your baptism in the name of our father and saviour John: who in this manner baptized the Jews in the Jordan, and saved them; he shall save you also." Last of all, he immerses himself in the water, for his own salvation. After this, the whole assembly resort to the place of worship, singing hymns, where they partake of honey and locusts, administered by the priest.

"And further, on the day on which John was decapitated, every one laments at the place of worship in these mournful terms: "Our most excellent leader was on this day slain by command of Herod, and his cruelty!—well he deserves to be consumed (by fire). O God hear us!"

"Finally, on that day, when as it is believed, John slew a dragon of wonderful size, which issued from the lake of Tiberias, and did much mischief, they practice a ceremony of leading their cattle and sheep in troops round the place of worship, with great joy. But the memory of this miracle is celebrated, in Galilee, by those who have ability and wealth sufficient; they resort to the spot barefooted; taking their sick with them, who hope to recover health by favour of their patron; and when arrived there, they lay them in the place of worship. This they do in their old residence, which is distant a day's journey from Mount Tabor. And between the prayers, they prostrate themselves, by way of penitence; they also partake of the sacramental honey and locusts, as an act of duty."

The works published by M. Norberg, are 1. Codex Nasaræus, סדר לאדם, Seder Adam,) liber Adami appellatus, &c. tom. i. ii. iii. 2. Lexidion Codicis Nasaræi, cui liber Adami nomen. 3. Onomasticon Codicis Nasaræi cui liber Adami nomen. These works do not contain a regular history of the sect; but consist of dogmatical discourses, exhortations, moral reflections, some of them in alphabetical order, &c. They include references to a few historical facts, to the history of Jesus, to the destruction of Jerusalem, and to the persecutions of their sect by the Jews. They say Elizabeth was nearly, or quite a hundred years of age, when she was delivered of John, whom they describe as the great annuntiator of the true Life; and of the most magnificent Light. They speak of two kinds of Death, and three degrees of Life, of Ge-henna, and punishment in black water. They hold Jesus as every way inferior to John; but especially are they angry with his disciples, who after his death, they say, propagated nothing but error. They seem, however, to have received the same reports as were current among the heathen, in reference to the Lord's Supper, that the Christians took an infant, his blood, &c. and ate him: and (apparently) allude to the corruptions of Christianity by monks and hermits, by the (forced) celibacy of youths brought up for the clergy, by the worship of images, &c. They censure baptism in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, saying it ought to be performed in the name of the Living, or the Life, as John did. They say John had baptized forty two years before Jesus was born. They have many mystical numbers, mystical names, and mystical spirits: of which some inhabit the planets, others, the stars, &c. Beside the books translated by M. Norberg, there are others, as the Liturgy of John, a middle sized volume, the Fulfilment, i. e. of their law, law, and ceremonies; and a large volume on the fall of the angels, the creation and fall of Adam, &c. All these books have been obtained from Bassora; not from the Galileans of Syria.]

V. JOHN the Evangelist, was a native of Bethsaida in Galilee, son of Zebedee and Salome; by profession a fisherman. Some have thought he had been a disciple of John the Baptist, before he attended Jesus Christ; but there is no proof of this. He was brother to St. James Major. Our Saviour called them sons of thunder.—Boanerges. It is believed that St. John was the youngest of the apostles. He might be five or six and twenty years of age when he began to follow Jesus Christ, A. D. 30. Some have thought he was the bridegroom at the marriage in Cana; others, that he always lived single; an opinion better supported by antiquity.

Our Saviour had a particular friendship for him; and John describes himself by the name of "that disciple whom Jesus loved." Jesus Christ took him with him to his transfiguration; and at his last supper, when John was lying in his bosom, he discovered to him, who should betray him. John xiii. 25. xxi. 20.

Jesus chose Peter, James, and John, as witnesses of his agony in the olive-garden. After the soldiers had seized his master Jesus, it is believed that John was the disciple who followed him to Caiaphas's house, where he went in, and afterwards introduced Peter. He attended our Saviour even to the cross; and Jesus observing him near it, said to his mother, "Woman, behold thy son;" and afterwards to this disciple, "Behold thy mother." John xix. 26. From that time John took care of her. After the resurrection, John being fishing on the sea of Tiberias with other disciples, Jesus appeared on the shore. John first discovered him, and told Peter. They came ashore, dined with Jesus, and after dinner, as John was following him, Peter asked Jesus, What was to become of him? (meaning John). Jesus answered "If I will that he stay till I come, what is that to thee? follow thou me." Hereupon the disciples believed, that Jesus had said he should not die; many still believed it, when St. John wrote his gospel, and long after: many also have affirmed, that he did not die. But St. John himself confutes this opinion, [the coming of Christ referring to his punishment of Jerusalem, which this evangelist lived to see; not to the general judgment, which is yet distant.]

Within a few days after the apostles had received the Holy Ghost, Peter and John went up to the temple, and near it cured a man lame from his birth, Acts iii. 1.—10. This miracle occasioned their being imprisoned. The next day they were liberated, and forbidden to speak in the name of Jesus Christ; but they continued preaching, whereupon they were again imprisoned with the other apostles. But God miraculously delivered them; and as they did not cease to preach Jesus as the Christ, the magistrates took them into custody, and reproved them. The apostles answered, that it was necessary rather to obey God than men. The Sanhedrim inclined to put them to death; but being persuaded by Gamaliel, commanded them to be scourged, only, and so dismissed them.

Peter and John were sent to Samaria, to confer the Holy Ghost on those whom Philip the deacon had there baptized. Acts iii. 5—14. John was of the council of Jerusalem, and was evidently one of the pillars of the church. It is believed that he preached to the Parthians, and his first epistle has been cited as an Epistle to the Parthians. The Indians maintain, that he published the Gospel in their country. There is no question of his preaching in Asia, and of his abiding some time at Ephesus, and near it. Thither he carried the Blessed Virgin, who died there. [This is very doubtful.] We do not know when he settled there; but it could scarcely be before A. D. 66. Jerom says, he founded and governed the churches of Asia; and Tertullian, that he first established bishops in that country; which is not to be understood rigorously, as if Peter and Paul were not founders of several churches there, or that Timothy did not govern the church of Ephesus, even while John was in this province. Vide TIMOTHY and EPHESUS.

The emperor Domitian persecuted the church in the fifteenth year of his reign, A. D. 95; John, it is said, was carried to Rome, where he was plunged into boiling oil, without being hurt; on the contrary, he was greatly refreshed. He was exiled to the isle of Patmos, in the Egean sea. Here he wrote his Revelations. He did not continue quite two years in banishment. Domitian being killed in September, A. D. 96, his successor Nerva recalled all who were banished by his predecessor; and John returned to Ephesus, A. D. 97, being about ninety years of age. The bishops and Christians of Asia pressing him earnestly to write what he had heard from our Saviour, he complied, and wrote his gospel: after a public fast and prayers. His principal view in this narration was, to relate such things as might confirm the divinity of the son, in opposition to heretics of that time.

We have three epistles by this apostle. The first was never contested.

The second is addressed to a lady of quality, named Electa; or, say some, Electa is a symbolical bolical name denoting a Christian church, to which another church wrote. For I have some suspicion that this epistle is only a letter of commendation given to the faithful, who might travel from one church to another; and such epistles were sometimes necessarily written in an obscure manner, for fear of their falling into the hands of unbelievers. The third letter is directed to Caius, whom John praises for hospitality to the faithful, and exhorts to continue his pious practice.

[It should be remarked, that the intention of these two Epistles is directly contrary one to the other. In that to the lady Electa the apostle cautions her against receiving and patronizing travelling teachers who held not the truth correctly: whereas, in that to Caius, the Apostle greatly commends him for receiving travelling teachers, generally; he censures Diotrephes for rejecting some: and praises Demetrius for his candour. It should seem, therefore, that these Epistles are misplaced. If Caius be St. Paul's host, that to him may be placed the earliest in point of time; and to this agrees the absence of allusion to heretical opinions, which had not yet infected the church: but, in later days, i. e. of the lady Electa, not a few discordant systems were propagated; consequently Christian hospitality was exposed to imposition. It seems likely, also that Caius living at Corinth, was visited by sea, by John; but as John had met (probably) at Ephesus, with "the children of Electa, whom he found walking in the Truth," to his great joy, and to their mother's praise, it is very credible, if not rather certain, that this lady lived at no great distance from that city, i. e. in Asia Minor; so that notwithstanding his advanced age, he might easily, "having many things to say, come unto her, and speak face to face." Her sister probably lived at Ephesus, near, or possibly, with, the Apostle.]

John lived to a very great age, so that he could scarcely go to the assembly of the church, without being carried by his disciples; and being now unable to make long discourses, his custom was to say in all assemblies, to the people, "My dear children, love one another." At last they grew weary of this concise exhortation; and when he was informed of this, his answer was, "This is what the Lord commands you; and this, if you do it, is sufficient." He died quietly at Ephesus, in the third year of Trajan, the 100 of Jesus Christ, being then, according to Epiphanius, ninety-four; but some say he was 98 or 99, others 104, or 106, or 120. He was buried near that city; and several of the fathers have observed, that his sepulchre was there. The council of Ephesus takes occasion to commend this city from its possessing the body of this blessed divine; and pope Celestine exhorted the fathers, who were there assembled, to follow the instructions of St. John, whose remains they had in their keeping. Jerom, on Gal. vi. et de Viri Illust. cap. 9. Con. Ephes. tom. iii. Diony. Alex. apud Euseb. lib. vii. 25.

Several apocryphal writings are attributed to John; as, a book of his supposed travels, another of his acts used by the Encratites, Manichees, and Priscillianists; a book concerning the death and assumption of the Virgin; a creed supposed to have been given by the blessed Virgin and John to Gregory of Neocæsarea. John is generally surnamed 'the Divine,' by reason of the sublimity of his knowledge; particularly in the beginning of his gospel.

Polycrates bishop of Ephesus affirms, that he wore a plate of gold on his forehead, as a priest and apostle of Jesus Christ. He is painted with a cup and a serpent issuing out of it, in allusion to a story of poison given him by some heretics in a glass; he made the sign of the cross over it, and all the venom was dispelled under the form of a serpent. This is related in the spurious Prochorus, who calls himself a disciple of John.

VI. JOHN MARK, cousin to Barnabas, and his disciple, was son of a Christian woman named Mary, who had a house in Jerusalem, where the faithful and the apostles met. Here they were at prayers in the night, when Peter, who was delivered out of prison by an angel, knocked at the door. In this house the celebrated church of Zion was said to have been afterwards established. Acts xii. 15.

John Mark, whom some very imprudently confound with the evangelist Mark, adhered to Paul and Barnabas, and followed them to Antioch; he continued in their company and service till they came to Perga in Pamphylia. But then seeing that they were undertaking a longer journey, he left them, and returned to Jerusalem. Acts xv. 30. A. D. 45.

Some years after, A. D. 51, Paul and Barnabas preparing to return into Asia, to visit the churches which they had founded there; these two apostles separated. Paul went to Asia, and Barnabas, with John Mark, went to the isle of Cyprus. We find him at Rome, A. D. 63, performing signal services for Paul during his imprisonment. The apostle speaks advantageously of him, Col. iv. 10. Marcus sister's son to Barnabas saluteth you; if he come unto you receive him. And again in his epistle to Philemon, (ver. 24.) written A. D. 62, at which time he was with Paul at Rome. But A. D. 65, he was with Timothy in Asia; and Paul, writing to Timothy, desires him to bring him to Rome; adding, adding, that he was useful to him for the ministry of the gospel. 2 Tim. iv. 11.

In the Greek and Latin churches the festival of St. John Mark is kept September 27. Some say he was bishop of Biblis in Phœnicia: The Greeks call him apostle, and say, the sick were cured by his shadow only. It is very probable, that he died at Ephesus; where his tomb was very famous. The year of his death, and the nature of it, we are strangers to. He is sometimes called simply John or Mark.

[Notwithstanding the decision with which CALMET has given his opinion here, and in the article MARK, I incline to think that John Mark is Mark the Evangelist. They are reckoned as the same person by Jones, Lightfoot, Wetstein, Lardner, and Michaelis; and Lardner has well answered the objections to the contrary. To strengthen this opinion, it should be observed, that throughout the Acts he is spoken of as "John, whose surname was Mark;" i. e. St. Luke, writing in Italy, latinizes; it being customary for Jews, when in foreign countries, to use names more familiar to those countries, than their Hebrew appellations: and if Mark, as is beyond a doubt, accompanied Peter to Rome, he would be known there by his surname only. The probability is, that Barnabas being a Levite, held certain Levitical opinions more strongly than Paul did, and that "his sister's son" Mark, coincided with his uncle and Peter; whence some have thought he also was a Levite. Peter was intimate at his mother's, at Jerusalem. It should seem, that Mark made himself extremely useful to Barnabas, to Paul, to Peter, and that he was with (or near) Timothy, also. He was desirous of contributing to the propagation of the Gospel, in whatever sphere, and however humble: how strongly this agrees with the character of the Evangelist Mark, may be seen under his article.]

JOIADAH, ידעיה, 'Iodê, science, or knowledge of the Lord; from ידע jedah, and יה jah, the Lord.

JOIADA, or Judas, high-priest of the Jews, succeeded Eliashib or Joashib, who lived under Nehemiah, about A. M. 3550, ante A. D. 454.

JOIARIB, יריב, he that combats, pleads, strives, or reprehends; from ריב rub: or who multiplies; from רבב rabab. Neh. xii. 6.

JOKDEAM, יקדעם, 'Ikdâu, the humiliation, or abasing of the people; from קדד kadad, to bow one's self: otherwise, the burning of the people; from קדד jakad, a burning, and עמ ham, the people. A city of Judah, Josh. xv. 56.

JOKMEAM, יקמעם, resurrection, or, confirmation, or revenge of the people; from קום kum, and עמ ham, people. A city of Ephraim, afterwards yielded to the Levites of Kohath's family, 1 Chron. vi. 68.

JOKNEAM, יקנעם, 'Iknâu, possession, or purchase; from קנן kanah: otherwise, nest of the people; from קנן kinneen, to build nests, and עמ ham, the people; [resurrection of the people; otherwise, confirmation, or vengeance of the people. A city of Ephraim. 1 Kings iv. 12. 1 Chron. vi. 53.]

The Syriac signifies a collection of people; or a popular assembly. It was otherwise called Kibsaïm, which also implies a congregation.

Was it any thing of the nature of our fairs?

II. JOKNEAM, a city of Zebulun, given to the Levites of Merari's family, Josh. xxi. 34. xix. 11. surnamed Jokneam of Carmel, Josh. xii. 22. by reason of its neighbourhood to that mountain.

JOKSHAN, יקשן, 'Iksan, hard, difficult, scandalous; from קשה kashah. [excellent prey taken: q. in modern language, a good prize.]

JOKSHAN, second son of Abraham and Keturah. Gen. xxv. 2. We are of opinion that he peopled part of Arabia, and that he is the person whom the Arabians call Cahtan, and acknowledge as the head of their nation. He dwelt in the country east of Beersheba, i. e. in part of Arabia Felix, and part of Arabia Deserta. This Moses expressly mentions: But unto the sons of the concubines, which Abraham had, Abraham gave gifts, and sent them away from Isaac his son, eastward unto the east country. Jokshan's sons were Sheba and Dedan, who dwelt in the same country. Bochart, Phaleg, lib. 1. cap. 15.

JOKTAN, יקטן, small; from קטן katan: otherwise, disgust, weariness; from קט kut: otherwise, dispute, contention.

JOKTAN, eldest son of Eber, who had for his portion all the land which lies "from Mesha as thou goest unto Sephar, a mount of the east," or Kedem, Gen. x. 25. Mesha is, in our opinion, where Masias was situated, in Mesopotamia, and Sephar is the country of the Sepharvaim, or Sepharrenians, or Sapiores, or Serapares; for these all denote the same, i. e. a people, which, according to Herodotus, were placed between the Colchians and the Medes. Now this was in the provinces which Moses commonly describes by the name of Kedem, or the east. We find traces in this country of the names of Joktan's sons; which is a farther confirmation of this opinion. Joktan had thirteen sons, whose names were, Almohad, Shaleph, Hazarmaveth, Jerah, Hadoram, Uzal, Diklah, Obal, Abimeel, Sheba, Ophir, Havilah, and Jobab.

The Arabians believe, that their country was originally peopled by Joktan the son of Eber, and brother of Peleg; who, after the division of languages, languages, came and dwelt in this peninsula of Asia, which might take its name from Jarab the son of Joktan, or from a large plain in the province of Tehema called Arabat. These ancient Arabians lived here without mingling with other people, till Ishmael son of Abraham and Hagar and his sons settled here, who mixing with them were called Mos-arabes, or Mostæ-arabes, i. e. mixed Arabians.

The same authors suppose Joktan to have had several sons: as Joarab, the first author of the Arabic language, from whom all the posterity of Joktan were called Arabians; Ad, founder of the Adites, whom God in his anger extirpated; Thamond, Tasni, and Giadis, fathers of some old tribes of Arabians: but, that which embarrasses us is, that the founders of these ancient tribes are called by names nothing like those of Moses; which, however, did not hinder M. Bochart from placing in Arabia the sons of Joktan mentioned in Scripture; wherein he has succeeded very well in the judgment of many learned men. In a thing so obscure, and so distant, we should be satisfied with probabilities, and think ourselves greatly obliged to those who take pains to clear the darkness of such remote antiquity. Vide Bochart.

JOKTHEEL, יְקָתְאֵל, Ἰεκδοῦλ, assembly of God; from יָקַח jakah, I assemble, I unite, and אֵל el, God.

JOKTHEEL, a city of Judah, Josh. xv. 38. perhaps the same as Jekabseel of the same tribe, Neh. xi. 25. But this last is rather Kabzeel, Josh. xv. 21. and 2 Sam. xxiii. 20, &c.

II. JOKTHEEL, a rock which Amaziah king of Judah took from the Edomites, from the top whereof he threw down ten thousand Edomites, whom he had taken in battle. Eusebius is of opinion, that this rock is the city of Petra, the capital of Arabia Petraea; [by the Syrians, called Rekem. 2 Kings, xiv. 7.] The battle, wherein the Edomites were defeated, was fought in the valley of Salt, which we place between Palmyra and Bozra. Pliny says, that the solitudes of Palmyra reach to the city of Petra. It is probable, therefore, that Amaziah pushed his conquest as far as this city, and gave it the name of Joktheel, i. e. Obedience to the Lord; thereby signifying, that he understood the victory he had obtained over the Edomites, proceeded from the obedience he had paid to God. See PETRA.

[From the circumstance of this city receiving this name because it was taken in war, it should seem that this appellation imports the prey, or reward, or prize obtained by struggle, or attack, and given (in this instance) by God.]

JONADAB, יֹנָדָב, who acts in good earnest, gives and offers freely, liberally, or who acts as a prince; from יָדָב nadab.

D. N. XVI. E. J. IV.

I. JONADAB, son of Shimeah, David's nephew, and cousin-german to Amnon. Jonadab was a very subtle man, and the adviser of Amnon, son of David, in the violation of Tamar. 2 Sam. xiii. 3.

II. JONADAB, son of Rechab, head of the Rechabites. Jonadab lived in the time of Jehu king of Israel. He is thought to have added to the ancient austerity of the Rechabites, that of abstinence from wine; to have introduced the non-cultivation of their lands; and the custom of being satisfied with what their flocks and fields produced. [As many tribes of Arabians are at this day.] We read 2 Kings x. 15, 16, that Jehu being raised up to punish the sins of Ahab's house, and coming to Samaria, to destroy the false prophets and priests of Baal, he met Jonadab, son of Rechab, and said, Is thine heart right, as my heart is with thy heart? Jonadab answered, It is. Then Jehu carried him to Samaria, and executed before him all that remained of Ahab's family, and all the ministers of Baal's temple. See RECHABITES.

JONAH, or Jonas, יוֹנָתָן, a dove: otherwise he that oppresses; from יָנַח janah. (Vide DOVE.) Bar-jonah, son of a dove: But the best reading, Matt. xvi. 17, seems to be Bar-joanna or Jochanna, i. e. son of John. The name of Peter's father was Joanna, by abbreviation Jonah.

JONAH, son of Amittai, the fifth of the minor prophets, was a Galilean, native of Gath-hepher, which is believed to be Jotapata, celebrated for the siege maintained by Josephus the historian against the Roman army, before the destruction of Jerusalem. Gath-hepher was situated in the land of Zebulun, where was the district of Opher or Hepher. Jerom places it two miles from Sephoris, towards Tiberias. Some Rabbins are of opinion, that Jonah was son of the widow of Sarepta, and restored to life by Elijah. But Jonah lived in the reigns of Joash and Jeroboam, kings of Israel: He could not, therefore, be son of the widow of Sarepta, since the former of these princes did not begin to reign till sixty years after the translation of Elijah. Others maintain, that Jonah was son of the Shunamite woman, whose child was raised from the dead by Elisha. But Shunam and Gath-hepher are too remote; and we know from Scripture, that Jonah was of Gath-hepher. Some are of opinion, that Jonah was the prophet whom Elisha sent to Jehu, to anoint him king of Israel; but this is not certain.

Epiphanius relates, that Jonah when returned from Ninevah, being ashamed that his prediction was not accomplished, retreated with his mother to Tyre, where he dwelt till his death in the plain of Tyre, and was buried in the cave of Cenezæus, judge of Israel. This judge in all probability is Caleb, or Othniel : Caleb in several places is surnamed the Kenezite ; but we do not read that he had been judge of Israel. Othniel was the son of Kenaz, Josh. xv. 17, Judg. i. 13.

What we know with certainty of Jonah is from his own history, Jonah i. 1, &c. He was ordered first to prophecy at Nineveh ; this he endeavoured to avoid by voyaging to Tarshish : but being overtaken by a storm, he was thrown overboard, and was miraculously preserved. Vide FRAGMENT, No. CXLV.

After this the word of the Lord a second time directed him to visit Nineveh. Thither he went, and when he came into the city, which was three days journey in extent, [as Diodorus of Sicily remarks, Biblioth. lib. ii. i. e. about five and twenty leagues in circumference,] Jonah walked in the city a whole day, crying, "In forty days Nineveh shall be destroyed." The Ninevites believed his word, and appointed a public fast, from the meanest of the people to the greatest. The king of Nineveh himself, whom we take to be the father of Sardanapalus, known in profane authors by the name of Aracyndaraxa or Anabaxarus, and in Scripture by the name of Phul, descended from his throne, covered himself with sackcloth, and sat on ashes. God being moved with their repentance, did not execute at that time the sentence, pronounced against them. Vide FRAGMENT, No. III.

Jonah was afflicted at this, and complained to God, saying, that he had always questioned, whether as being a God of mercy he would not yield to their prayers. Retiring out of the city, he made a little cover for himself, waiting events. The Lord caused a plant to grow over his cabin, called in Hebrew, Kikajon. (See KIKAJON.) The next morning, the Lord sent a worm which bit the root of this plant, and withered it, so that the sun beginning to shine on Jonah's head, he found himself faint, and desired that God would take him out of the world. The Lord said unto him, Hast thou reason to be thus concerned at the death of a plant, which cost thee nothing, which rises one night, and dies the next ? Yet wouldst thou not have me pardon such a city as Nineveh, wherein are a hundred and twenty thousand persons, not able to distinguish their right hand from their left ? i. e. children, not arrived at the use of reason ; nor having offended God by actual sin ? As children make generally about one fifth part of the inhabitants of cities, we presume that Nineveh contained above six hundred thousand persons.

After this Jonah returned, in all probability, from Nineveh into Judea. The eastern people, who shew his tomb at Mosul, [the successor city of Nineveh,] are persuaded, that he died and was buried there. In Jerom's time his tomb was seen at Gath in Palestine ; and the Turks at this day shew his mausoleum at Gath-hepher, in a subterraneous chapel, enclosed within a mosque. The Greeks keep his festival September 21. His name is not mentioned in the old martyrologies of the Latins. About the fourteenth century it was inserted on January 27 ; but Baronius places it September 21.

We do not know at what time Jonah foretold how Jeroboam II. king of Israel should restore the kingdom of Samaria, from the entrance of Hamath to the Dead Sea, 2 Kings xiv. 25. whether before, or after his journey to Nineveh. Our Saviour mentions Jonah in the gospel, Matt. xii. 41. Luke xii. 32. He says, that the Ninevites should rise in judgment against the Jews, and condemn them ; because they repented at the preaching of Jonah. And when the Pharisees required a sign from him, his answer referred them to that of the prophet Jonah, i. e. his resurrection. Vide FRAGMENTS, Nos. CXLV. CCCCLXXII.

Scripture says, that Jonah fled out of Judea from the presence of the Lord, and embarked at Joppa for Tarshish ; which seems to intimate his belief, that if he could get to Tarshish he should be out of the reach of God's power, and that God would not, or could not, send him from thence to Nineveh ; [rather, perhaps, he imagined God would think no more of sending him to Nineveh, but would order some other to go thither ; because it was not usual with God to pour forth the spirit of prophecy out of the holy land.]

[JONAH'S TOMB, at Nineveh :—"a little more upon land on the same side, is the tomb of Jonas in the mosque of a village, but I went not thither because of the excessive heat : for two hours after sun-rising there is no possibility of stirring abroad, till at least two hours after it is set ; the walls besides are so hot, that half a foot from them one feels the heat, as if it were of a hot iron ; and therefore during the summer all sleep in the night time upon terraces in the open air, both men and women ; and the last of July I observed in my thermometer exposed to the sun, seven and thirty degrees of heat [of Reaumur, I suppose.] In short, the heat in Mesopotamia is certainly excessive ; and though (when I travelled there) I wore upon my head a great black handkerchief, like a woman's hood, that I might see through (because the Turks commonly use the handkerchief upon the road) nevertheless, I had many times my forehead scorched : that is to say, it became all over red, after which it swelled exceedingly, and then the skin came off : my hands were also continually scorched. Some also in the caravan had their eyes daily scorched ; and the remedy for it is a powder made of sugar and long pepper per beat small; which being well mixed, is put into a purse, or rather a long narrow bag, and when there is occasion for it, they take a skewer like a bodkin of wood, so long as to reach to the bottom of the bag, and having taken it out full of that powder, draw it betwixt the eye and eyelid, where it leaves all the powder that stuck to it; and this must be done to each eye severally." THEVENOT'S TRAVELS, p. 53. [Query, was this the origin of the use of Stibium for the eyes, so that what was at first a remedy, afterwards became a fashion?]

[The Reader will observe the excessive heat at Nineveh; its application to Jonah, &c. Vide FRAGMENT. No. III.]

JONATHAN, יְהוֹנָתָן, given of God, or the gift of the Lord; from נָתַן nathan, a gift, and ה' jah, the Lord.

JONATHAN, a Levite, son of Gershom, and grandson of Moses, dwelt some time at Laish, in the house of Micah, Judges xvii. 10. ministering as a Levite with an ephod, and images, which Micah had made, and placed in a chapel of his house. But some years after, six hundred men of the tribe of Dan, seeking a new settlement, in the territories of the Sidonians, passing that way, they engaged Jonathan to accompany them. He settled at Dan, where that tribe placed the images which they had taken out of Micah's house, and appointed Jonathan to be their priest, and his son to succeed him. Their idols remained at Dan, while the ark of the Lord was at Shiloh, and till the captivity of Dan, i. e. till the last year of Eli the high priest, wherein the ark was taken by the Philistines. A. M. 2888, ante A. D. 1116. The captivity of Dan may denote either the oppression of this tribe by the Philistines, after the ark was taken; or the more remarkable captivity of the ten tribes, which were carried away beyond the Euphrates by the Assyrian kings.

II. JONATHAN, son of Saul, a prince of an excellent temper, and in all varieties of fortune a most faithful friend to David. 1 Sam. xiv. Jonathan gave proofs of courage and conduct, during the war between Saul and the Philistines. One day when the Philistines were encamped at Michmash with a powerful army, and Saul's army of not above six hundred men, lay at Gibeath of Benjamin, Jonathan said to his armour-bearer, Let us go to the camp of the Philistines. But he told not his father, nor the people. There was a narrow pass between two rocks, which led to their camp. As soon therefore as the Philistines on guard perceived them, they cried out to them, "Come up to us, and we will shew you something." Hereupon Jonathan said to his armour-bearer, "Follow, for the Lord hath delivered them into the hands of Israel." They went up and began to kill all that opposed them. The whole camp soon was in disorder; and the noise and tumult increasing, the Hebrews hastily advancing nearer to them discovered that the Philistines killed one another. Saul therefore pursued the runaways, and said before his whole army, "Cursed be the man that eateth any food this day."

Jonathan, who was absent when Saul spake in this manner, found a quantity of honey in a wood, into which he dipped the end of his staff, and ate of it, for which, afterwards, Saul would have slain his son; but the people opposed the king's resolution, and preserved him.

Some years after, David having overcome Goliath, Jonathan conceived so perfect a friendship for him, that he loved him as himself; He stripped himself of the robe which he wore, and gave it to David: He made him likewise a present of his sword, his bow, and his belt. And when David had incurred Saul's displeasure, Jonathan continued zealous in his friend's interests. He gave him intelligence of his father's determination to kill him, advised him to retire, and so wrought upon Saul, that he promised with an oath, not to kill him; and Saul having again resolved on the death of David, Jonathan dissuaded the king from his design; but perceiving that the destruction of his friend was determined, he informed David, who lay concealed in a field; when on a signal agreed on between them, they met, conversed, and confirmed their friendship and covenant with an oath.

The year following, while David was concealed in a forest in the wilderness of Ziph, and Saul was in pursuit of him with his troops, Jonathan went secretly to his friend, and they renewed their covenant. War breaking out between the Hebrews and Philistines, Saul and Jonathan encamped on mount Gilboa with the army of Israel; but their camp was forced, their troops routed, and themselves killed. The news being brought to David, he mourned for a year, and composed a funeral song to their honour, wherein he evinced his tenderness toward his friend Jonathan. Jonathan had a son named Mephibosheth, to whom David did various favours. See MEPHIBOSHETH.

III. JONATHAN BEN-UZZIEL, i. e. son of Uzziel. We have a Targum, (Vide TARGUM) or Chaldee paraphrase of the five books of Moses, and another of Joshua, Judges, the two books of Samuel, the two books of Kings, Isaiah, and Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the twelve smaller prophets; i. e. all the Old Testament, except the Hagiographa, attributed to Jonathan; of whom the Jews say great things: they believe he lived in the time of Haggai, Zachary, and Malachi, soon after the return from the captivity; and that he received from them the oral law, or tradition. They add, that he was likewise the first and most excellent disciple of Hillel, the famous rabbi, who lived a little before the coming of our Saviour, in the reign of Herod the Great. But, if Jonathan had seen Haggai, Zachary, and Malachi, and was Hillel's disciple, he must have lived about five hundred years! which is incredible. The Jews are never weary of exalting the merit of Jonathan son of Uzziel. They equal him to Moses, and relate, that while he was about his paraphrase, God in a visible manner protected him; that, to prevent any thing diverting his application, if a fly came and sat on his paper, or a bird flew over his head, they were immediately consumed with fire from heaven, without his being hurt by it, or any thing about him: that, intending to compose a Targum on the Hagiographa, as he had done on the law and the prophets, he was diverted from his design by a voice from heaven, which told him, that the end of the Messiah was therein determined. This story whether true or false (but rather false than true) has occasioned some Christians to take advantage of this confession, to maintain against the Jews, that the death of the Messiah was clearly foretold in the prophet Daniel, whom the Hebrews place among the Hagiographa. And since these disputes the modern Jews have taken the liberty of changing this passage, lest such an acknowledgement should be prejudicial to their reasonings.

Of the two Targums attributed to Jonathan, son of Uzziel, it appears that he composed only that on the first and last prophets. The Jews call Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and the Kings, the first prophets: and Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the twelve smaller prophets, the last prophets.

The Targum, or paraphrase, on these books comes near the style of Onkelos, which is esteemed the best of all these comments: but, whereas the Targum of Onkelos is an exact and literal version, Jonathan takes the liberty of paraphrasing, of enlarging, and adding, sometimes a gloss, sometimes a story, which do no great honour to his work. What he has done on the last prophets is still less correct, less perfect, and less literal than the rest.

That on the law, which is attributed to him, is very different from the first, both as to style and method: being more stuffed with fables, glosses, long explanations, and vain additions, than the Targum on the prophets, which without contest is Jonathan's. Besides, he speaks there of several things not as yet existing; or, at least, not under the names he gives them; for example, he mentions the six orders, or books, of the Mishna, which were not written till long after his time; there are the names of Constantinople and Lombardy in it, which are still more modern than the Mishna.

We cannot tell who is the real author of this last Targum; it continued long unknown even to the Jews: they had no notice of such a book, till it was published at Venice, about an hundred and fifty [240] years ago; the name of Jonathan was in all probability put to it only to give credit to the work, and to promote the sale of it. See TARGUM. In the Polyglott Bible of Antwerp many of the impertinences in Jonathan's Targum have been suppressed. See F. Morinus's Exercitat. Bibl. lib. i. Exercitat. 8. cap. 1, 2, 3.

IV. JONATHAN, son of Abiathar the high-priest, gave notice to Adonijah and his party, near the fountain of Rogel, that David had declared Solomon his successor. 1 Kings i. 42, 43.

V. JONATHAN, son of Shage the Hararite, distinguished for bravery in David's army, 1 Chr. xi. 34. In 2 Sam. xxiii. 32, 33, we read Jonathan and Shammah the Hararite.

VI. JONATHAN, son of Shimeah, David's nephew, killed a giant, who had six fingers on each hand, and six toes on each foot, 1 Chron. xx. 7.

VII. JONATHAN, or Jehonathan, son of Uziah, was David's treasurer, 1 Chron. xxvii. 25.

VIII. JONATHAN, son of Asael, named by Ezra, to detect those who had married strange women. Ezra x. 15.

IX. JONATHAN, or Johanen, or John, high-priest of the Jews, son of Jehoiada, and father of Jeddoa or Jaddus, celebrated in the time of Alexander the Great. Neh. xii. 10, 11, 12. He lived under Ezra and Nehemiah. Josephus, and after him Eusebius and Jerom, call him John instead of Jonathan; and say that he lived in the reign of Artaxerxes. Josephus relates a transaction which is a great blemish on the memory of Jonathan. Joshua or Jesus his brother was so much in favour with Bagoses, governor of Syria and Phœnicia under the king of Persia, that he obtained for him the office of high-priest, to the exclusion of his brother Jonathan, who had enjoyed it many years. Jesus came to Jerusalem to take possession of his new dignity, and to divest his brother of it. But, he refusing to submit to the order of Bagoses, great contests arose, and they came to blows; and Jonathan killed his brother in the inner court of the temple.

This action, in itself very criminal, was rendered still more so by reason of the profanation tion of the holy place where it was committed. Bagoses being informed of it, came with great indignation to Jerusalem, designing to take cognizance of the murder. He attempted to enter the temple, in order to examine the spot where this fact took place; but he was denied admission as being a Gentile, and profane person. How! said he, am I then more polluted than the dead body which you massacred there? Then, being transported with anger, he went into the temple, notwithstanding the opposition of the priests, examined into the fact, and fined the temple; the fine he ordered to be paid by the priests out of the money belonging to the treasury. It was fifty drachmas for every lamb of the continual sacrifice, which was offered every morning and evening, i. e. two lambs a day. It was paid till the death of Artaxerxes.

The high-priest Jonathan, or John, died, after having exercised the high-priesthood thirty-two years. Jeddoa his son succeeded him.

X. JONATHAN, a scribe, and keeper of the prisons in Jerusalem under king Zedekiah, Jer. xxxvii. 14, 15, 20. He was very severe to the prophet Jeremiah, who therefore earnestly desired king Zedekiah, that he might not be sent back into that dungeon, where his life was in danger.

XI. JONATHAN, surnamed Apphus, son of Mattathias, and brother to Judas Maccabæus. After the death of Judas, he was appointed general of the troops of Israel. Bacchides, general of Demetrius Soter, his enemy, was soon informed of it. Jonathan went immediately into the country bordering on the lake Asphaltites; at last he passed the Jordan, and observing that Bacchides was advancing towards him with a powerful army, to give him battle on the sabbath day; and being posted in such a manner, that he had the enemy before him, Jordan at his back, and woods and marshes at his right and left; he exhorted his people to implore the assistance of heaven, and represented to them the necessity they were under, of either conquering, or dying, since there was no way for escape. He therefore immediately gave battle, and being within reach of Bacchides, he stretched out his arm, meaning to run him through the body, but Bacchides very dexterously avoided the blow by retiring backwards. At length Jonathan and his people having laid a thousand of their enemies dead on the spot, and being apprehensive that they should be overwhelmed with numbers, threw themselves into the Jordan, and swam over it in the presence of their enemies, who not daring to pursue them, retreated to Jerusalem.

After various other fightings Jonathan made proposals of peace, which Bacchides accepted, returned to Syria, and came no more into Judæa. Jonathan dwelt at Machmas, not at Jerusalem, because the troops of Demetrius Nicator were in possession of the citadel. Some years afterwards, Alexander Balas and Demetrius Soter, who contended for the kingdom of Syria, wrote to Jonathan; each endeavouring to engage him in their party. Jonathan declared for Alexander Balas against Demetrius. The first time of his putting on the high-priest's ornaments was on the Feast of Tabernacles, in the year 160 of the Greeks, about A. M. 3852, ante A. D. 152. After his receiving Alexander Balas's letter, who gave him this dignity, the people importuned him to accept it, and he solemnly performed the functions belonging to it.

Two years after, Alexander Balas celebrating his marriage with the king of Egypt's daughter at Ptolemais, Jonathan was invited thither, and appeared with royal magnificence. Some of his enemies attempting to accuse him to the king, he would not hear them, but clothed him in purple, and seated him near himself. Jonathan returned to Jerusalem, and there abode some time in peace. But at the end of two years Demetrius Nicator, son of Demetrius Soter, king of Syria, sent Apollonius general of his troops to Jamnia in Palestine, to defy Jonathan, telling him, that he trusted only to his rocks and mountains, where he kept close, without daring to descend into the plain. Jonathan stung with these reproaches, assembled ten thousand chosen men, besieged Joppa, and took it with ease. From thence he marched against Apollonius, defeated him, killed eight thousand of his men, and returned loaded with spoil to Jerusalem.

Alexander Balas was killed some years after; whereupon Demetrius Nicator was advanced to the throne of Syria. Jonathan taking advantage of the troubles in Syria, besieged the citadel of Jerusalem. And eventually, Jonathan having desired Demetrius to recall his troops from the citadel of Jerusalem; that prince answered him, that he would not only do what he requested, but more, provided he would send him succours to reduce the inhabitants of Antioch. Jonathan sent him three thousand chosen men; who rescued him from his danger, for his people had besieged him in his palace.

Demetrius was not so grateful as he might have been, but shortly after he quarrelled with Jonathan. His ingratitude was the cause of Jonathan's declaring for young Antiochus, whom Tryphon had set on the throne of Syria. Jonathan fought several battles with Demetrius's generals. About the same time he renewed newed his alliance with the Romans and Lacedæmonians. Jonathan marched against the Zabadean Arabians, or Nabatheans, defeated them, and returned to Jerusalem with great booty. He undertook to rebuild the walls of the city, and to raise a wall between the fortress (which was in the hands of the Syrians) and the town.

Tryphon having conceived the design of dispatching young Antiochus, and stepping into his throne, thought it necessary to secure the person of Jonathan. He persuaded him to come to Ptolemais, having not above a thousand men with him: the inhabitants, when he was entered into their city, shut the gates, killed the Jews who attended Jonathan, seized him, and put him in chains. Tryphon killed Jonathan and his sons some time after at Bascama, perhaps Besek, not far from Bethsan. Simon procured the bones of Jonathan his brother, and buried them at Modin in a magnificent mausoleum. There was a general and great mourning over all Israel for Jonathan many days.

XII. JONATHAN, son of Absalon, was sent by Simon Maccabeus to make himself master of Joppa, 1 Macc. xiii. 11. A. M. 3861, ante A. D. 143.

XIII. JONATHAN, son of Ananus, high priest of the Jews, succeeded Joseph Caiaphas, A. M. 4038, A. D. 38: was succeeded by his son Theophilus, A. M. 4040. Vitellius, governor of Syria, created Jonathan high-priest; but some time after deprived him of that dignity, to invest Theophilus with it. Agrippa took it from Theophilus, and gave it to Simon Cantharus. Some time after he deprived Simon of it, and offered it again to Jonathan: but he excused himself, and recommended his brother Matthias, A. D. 43.

Jonathan had been principally concerned in procuring for Felix the government of Judea, and therefore thought it his duty to represent the great mischief which his misconduct did the country. Felix, weary of these remonstrances, resolved to dispatch him, and prevailed with one Dora, a native of Jerusalem, and Jonathan's particular friend, to assassinate him. Dora prepared ruffians, who coming to Jerusalem with daggers under their cloaks, got among Jonathan's people, and falling on the old man, murdered him: we do not know in what year. Felix was governor till A. D. 60.

IONIA, part of Asia Minor, lying along the Egean sea, to the west. Caria lies south; Æolis north. There were twelve cities anciently in Ionis, Miletus, Myus, Lebedus, Colothon, Priene, Theos, Clazomena, Ephesus, Phoea, and Smyrna, on the continent, with Chios and Samos in the islands. The name Ionians came from Javan, son of Japhet; but some suppose that of old, it included the people of Attica, and others. See JAVAN. Vide FRAGMENT, No. CCLXXXVIII.

JOPPA, יֹפָא, beauty, fair, from יָפָה japhah.

JOPPA, a sea-port in Palestine, on the Mediterranean. Profane authors think it derived its name from Jopa, the daughter of Æolus, and wife of Cepheus, who founded it. In Jerom's time were shewn, marks reported to be those of the chain by which Andromeda was fastened, when exposed to be devoured by the sea monster. It is probable that the fable of Andromeda was forged from Jonah's adventure, who having embarked at Joppa, was cast into the sea, and swallowed by a sea monster. Joppa was situated in a fine plain between Jamnia south, Cesarea of Palestine north, and Rama or Ramula east. The port of Joppa is unsafe by reason of rocks which project into the sea. Joppa is frequently mentioned both in the Old Testament, and in the New. Tabitha, whom St. Peter raised from the dead, dwelt at Joppa. Peter was at Joppa when God shewed him a sheet full of creeping things, and taught him no longer to make any distinction between Jew and Gentile, if disposed to receive the word, Acts ix. 36.

[The port of Joppa, by all accounts, hardly deserves the name of fair, being exposed to troublesome winds: but if the name implies decorated, as I suppose, the town might answer to this description: Cultipolis, "fair town." It appears, however, that the situation is pleasant; as are the prospects from the town, and in the country around. It was on the border of the tribe of Dan. Josh. xix. 46. 2 Chron. ii. 15. Jonah i. 3. It is written Jappua, Ezra iii. 1. Joppe, Acts ix. 36.

According to tradition and fable, Joppa was one of the most ancient cities in the world. Report said it was built before the deluge; that here reigned Cepheus, the father of Andromeda; and the rock to which his daughter was chained, and from which she was delivered by Perseus, was shewn here, together with the ribs of the sea monster which would have devoured her. The story probably referred to a pirate vessel of considerable bulk, which ravaged the coast, and being driven on shore by superior force, was here wrecked, and the country delivered from its exactions.

Pausanias tells us, lib. iv. cap. 35, that "the country of the Hebrews, not far from the city Joppa, affords a yellow water, which is perfectly similar to the colour of blood. This water is near the sea, and they report that Perseus, when when he slew the whale to which the daughter of Cepheus was exposed, washed himself from the blood in this fountain."

Strabo says, lib. xvi. "Joppa was so high, that from it might be seen Jerusalem, the metropolis of the Jews. The Jews also that go down to the sea use this port." He probably had heard this of the heights near Joppa, but no sea port could itself be of such elevation.

"And the region about Joppa was so well peopled," says Strabo, "that out of Jamnia, a near village, and its neighbourhood, might be raised 40,000 men capable of bearing arms."

Modern Travellers inform us that "the town of Jaffa stands on a circular eminence, close to the sea shore. The houses are white, and are all of them provided with domes and square towers. Near Jaffa on a white sandy soil,—the heat reflected from which is very oppressive. The sea breeze constantly prevails during the day time.

"The Turkish camp was near Jaffa. Our tents were very agreeably pitched in the midst of a garden filled with orange, lemon, pomegranate, fig, and mulberry trees; on the whole, indeed, our situation was very eligible, and contiguous to a well of excellent water. We had plenty of excellent mutton and poultry." Dr. Wittman, p. 125.

Nearly in the centre of the town is an old ruinous building, called the citadel, on the top of which is a round casemated tower, provided with one or two wretched pieces of cannon. The city is surrounded by a stone wall, provided, at certain distances, with towers alternately square or round. In 1799, Bonaparte erected batteries and breached this wall; then stormed and carried the town.

Jaffa is pretty secure from attack by sea, which would be rendered extremely hazardous by the violence of the surf, and the heavy swell from the westward. The anchorage of the port is very bad, owing to the extreme unevenness of the ground, which abounds in rocks and shoals, for a considerable extent of coast.

There are at Jaffa two convents, or monasteries, one belonging to the Greek, the other to the Latin church. In these the pilgrims reside, on their way to Jerusalem, which is distant about twelve leagues. It maintains an intercourse by land with Damascus, Jerusalem, and several other places of no little importance in its vicinity. The streets are very narrow, uneven, and dirty, and are rather entitled to the appellation of alleys, than that of streets. Jaffa was fortified by the British officers, 1800, 1801.

The port of Jaffa is not so safe as that of Caiffa: in heavy gales of wind, shipping quit the former port. Intelligence was frequently received from Suez and Gebel-Tor at Jaffa, during the encampment there; being maintained by an Arab sheik at Suez, and the sheik at El Arish.

At Jaffa abundance of prickly pear trees employed as fences, are admirably well adapted to the purpose. The natives are very fond of the fruit. Grapes and figs of excellent quality. A water melon which weighed twenty-five pounds. The land breeze generally prevails in the morning, as early as two o'clock.

During the encampment of the Turks going against Egypt, so careless were that people, that at Jaffa Major H. "counted upwards of thirty dead camels, lying in one field alone." A fine treat for the jackals. "They infest every part of Syria, where they are very numerous. During the day they confine themselves to their holes and lurking places; but sally out at night, in large bodies, in search of their food, they then rendezvous in the neighbourhood of the towns and villages, molesting the inhabitants by the most disagreeable of all howlings."

August 24, Rode out from the camp near 1800. Jaffa, in the evening, to a village named Judah.

Aug. 28. The Reis Effendi said the plague generally ceased here about Aug. 15, old style.

Sep. 9. The first change of weather we have had, being foggy, with a mist, or small rain.

25. A great number of jackals come into the camp every night, with such a yell, that, with the howling of dogs, and the braying of asses and mules, a noise so hideous is made by them all, as would astonish and alarm a person not accustomed to it.

Feb. 2. At Jaffa the weather became settled and pleasant, attended by the land breeze, which, setting in towards evening, furnished an indubitable token of its continuance. The country in the vicinity of the encampment, began to wear a smiling appearance; and, in consequence of the late heavy rain, was covered with a fine verdure, which overspread even what had been hitherto merely arid and sandy hills.

D'Arvieux is of opinion that the port of Jaffa was anciently much superior to what it is at present. He remarked, in the sea, south of the present port, the vestiges of a wall, which extended to a chain of rocks at some distance from the shore, by which the port was formed, and protected against the violence of the south-west winds. "This port," says he, "was, no doubt, sufficiently good before it was filled up, although its entrance was exposed to the winds from the north. At present it is so shallow, that only insignificant vessels can enter it. There was a quay, faced with hewn stone, fronting the port. It has been ruined purposely; what remains of it at each end, shews that it was very handsome." Vol. ii. p. 69.

As this port was used by Solomon for receiving his timber brought from Tyre; and by the succeeding kings of Judah, as their port of communication with foreign parts, it would, no doubt, receive every accommodation they could bestow on it. Comp. 1 Kings xv. 17.]

JORA, ירה he that casts, or shews; from ירה jarah: otherwise, in season, in time; from ירה jarah. [Autumn rains, says Simon; he being born at that time of the year.]

JORAI, יורי. From the same. 1 Chr. v. 13.

JORAM, יורם, also written יהורם, Jehoram, to cast; from ירה jarah, otherwise, elevated: from רום rum.

I. JORAM, son of Toi, king of Hamath, sent to David by his father, to compliment him on his victory over Hadadezer, 2 Sam. viii. 10. A. M. 2960, ante A. D. 1044.

II. JORAM, son of Ahab king of Israel, and successor to his eldest brother Ahaziah, who died without children, 2 Kings iii. 1, &c. He did evil before the Lord, but not like Ahab his father, and Jezebel his mother. He removed the statues of Baal which his father had erected; but he continued to worship the golden calves. Mesha king of Moab, having refused to pay his tribute, Joram warred against him, and invited Jehoshaphat king of Judah to accompany him, who also brought the king of Edom his tributary. These princes advanced through the wilderness of Edom, but soon were in danger of perishing for want of water, from which they were relieved by Elisha the prophet.

Elisha did very important services to Joram during his wars with Syria, by discovering to him the designs of Benhadad. Benhadad having besieged Samaria, the famine was so terrible, that a woman ate her own son.

Joram, being informed of such calamities, rent his clothes, and all the people saw that he wore sackcloth. He ordered a servant to go and cut off Elisha's head, as if the cause of these distresses had been in his power. Elisha, who was then in his house, desired his friends to hold the door, and to prevent such a person from entering; observing, that Joram was close at his heels, to revoke the order.

Accordingly, the king came almost at the same instant, and complained to Elisha, who comforted him, and foretold a great plenty for the morrow; which came to pass. 2 Kings vii.

Some time after, the king conversing with Gehazi about Elisha's miracles; the Shunamite woman, whose son Elisha had raised from the dead, solicited the king for restitution of her estate, which had been confiscated while she was absent during the famine. Gehazi informed the king, that this was the very woman: Joram immediately gave directions for the restitution of all her property. 2 Kings viii. 6.

About that time Joram took the city of Ramoth-Gilead, but being dangerously wounded, was obliged to return to Jezreel for cure. He left Jehu, who commanded his army, to reduce the citadel, which still held out. In the mean time, Jehu, having been anointed king by a young prophet, made haste to destroy king Joram at Jezreel. See 2 Kings ix. in the twelfth year of Joram. A. M. 3120, ante A. D. 884.

JORDAN, ירדן, the river of judgment; from יאר jeor, a river, and דן dun, judgment; otherwise, he that shews, or rejects judgment: from ירה jarah, to shew, or reject: otherwise, descent; from ירד jarad.

JORDAN, a river of great note in Scripture. Some derive its name from יאר Jor, which signifies a spring, and דן Dan, a small town near the source of this river; others derive it from two rivulets, Jor and Dan. But these etymologies are dubious: because,

1. It is doubtful whether the river Jordan is formed of two rivulets, one of which was called Dan, though the geographical maps mostly describe it so. The visible origin of the Jordan is a little stream, whose source is in mount Libanus, and on which the little town of Dan is situated, four leagues higher than Cæsarea Philippi, where properly the Jordan begins. The other and most considerable source of Jordan, though the least apparent, is the lake Phiala, about four leagues south of Cæsarea Philippi. This lake has a communication under ground with the Jordan, and furnishes Cæsarea with large supplies of water, says Josephus, de Bello, lib. i. cap. 16. lii. 18.

2. The name Dan is more modern than that of Jordan. A colony of the tribe of Dan having seized Laish, called it Dan, from the name of their tribe. Now before this time the Jordan was well known; nor does it appear to have been called by any other name. We may, perhaps, therefore, with more reason, derive Jordan from jared, to descend, by reason of the full and rapid course of this river.

[The latest traveller who has visited these parts parts, is Burckhardt, January, 1811. He says, "From Hasbeya, a village at the foot of Mount Hermou, famous for its wells of bitumen Judaicum, and for the cinnabar found near it, I went to Baniyas, the ancient Cæsarea Philippi, where I saw some ruins, and copied some inscriptions. At an hour's distance from it is the source of the river El Dhan (the Jordan) in the plain of the Houle, or lake Samachonitis." Hence we learn that in this early part the Jordan is called Dhan to this day; and that Cæsarea Philippi is not "four leagues" from its source.]

The Jordan from Cæsarea Philippi runs about fifty leagues, till it discharges itself into the Dead Sea. In its course it forms the lake Semechon, at five or six leagues distance from its spring. From thence it enters, and passes through the lake of Tiberias. It overflows about the time of barley harvest, or the feast of the passover. The banks of the Jordan are covered with rushes, reeds, willows, and other trees. There are, as it were, two banks to the Jordan. The first, is that of this river in its natural state, the second is that of its overflowing. Pietro della Valle, Maundrell.

Travellers observe, that lions, during the summer, hide in the trees and reeds along this river, and are forced from thence when the river swells: Jeremiah alludes to this, (xlix. 19) when he compares the enemies marching to attack Jerusalem or Babylon, "to lions which come up from the swelling or inundation of Jordan." Zechariah represents the princes of Judah afflicted at their distance from Jerusalem, like lions roaring when they see the pride, or height, of Jordan spoiled. Maundrell says, that the river Jordan near Jericho, was, when he saw it, about sixty feet wide, and so rapid that a man could not swim against it.

On each side of the Jordan a great plain extends to the Dead Sea. Josephus, de Bello, lib. v. cap. 4. says, this plain is 1200 furlongs in length, and 600 wide: extremely dry in summer, and unwholesome, by reason of the excessive heat. The banks of the Jordan only may be said to have any moisture; the rest is a wilderness. Joseph. de Bello, lib. iii. cap. 18.

Little Jordan is the Jordan nearer to its spring, and before it receives the waters of those rivulets, which enlarge it. Josephus says, that the marshes of the lake Semechon extend to the delicious plain of Daphne, the fountains whereof feed little Jordan, and convey it into great Jordan below the temple of the golden ox, or golden calf. It is my opinion, that instead of Daphne we should read Dan; and that Dan should be placed much nearer to the lake Semechon than generally it is. Vide Joseph.

PART XVI. Edit. IV.

Antiq. lib. v. cap. 2. viii. cap. 3. Reland, Palest. cap. i. p. 273. Joseph. de Bello, lib. iv. 1.

[Simon supposes this name describes a continual roaring; and he quotes Mocquet, Itin. lib. v. p. 308. as a witness that it falls with considerable noise from the hason which is its head. Wolle, in Dissert. de loco Dan. and Le Clerc, in Bib. Ant. et Mod. defend, against Reland, the composition of this name from Jor and Dan.

The Talmudists say the Jordan rises out of the cave of Paneas: and so is the tradition. Bab. Bava Bathra, fol. 74. They say too, that Leshem is Paneas. Leshem was subdued by the Danites, and Jeroboam placed one of his golden calves in Dan, which is at the springs of Jordan. Vide Judges xviii. 29. Philip built the city of Cæsarea at the springs of the Jordan, or rather he enlarged and finished Paneas, and called it Cæsarea. Josephus, de Bell. lib. iv. 1. says the springs of the Jordan rise from under the temple of the golden calf. Possibly this temple of the golden calf might stand on a hill, so convenient and proper for a temple, that the temple of Augustus was afterward built on it.

The Talmudists say, "the waters of the Jordan are not fit to sprinkle the unclean, because they are mixed waters," meaning, mixed with the waters of other rivers and brooks, which empty themselves therein. The reader will compare with this description of them, the opinion of Naaman the Syrian, 2 Kings v. 11, 12, who probably had received the same notion; and perhaps this their inferiority was well understood, and not forgot by the prophet of Israel. I learn further that the waters of Jordan are not limpid, but are mixed with particles of soil. The words of Chateaubriand are very expressive; "Through the middle of this valley flows a discoloured river, which reluctantly creeps towards the pestilential lake, by which it is engulfed."

D'Arvieux says, "the Jordan is bordered with trees, which render its course very agreeable: it is pretty rapid; but its waters are thick, because its bed is of fat earth. Nevertheless, they are wholesome, and it is pretended that they are incorruptible, or, at least, that they continue good many years.

"The Jordan is extremely full of fish, because nobody catches them. What the fishes have to avoid, as well as the trees on the banks of the stream, is not to suffer themselves to be carried into the Dead Sea; because the former would die instantly, and the others would become as light as cork."

Higher up the Jordan, Mocquet says, coming from Damascus, he passed many woods, and at length arrived at Jacob's bridge, by which we cross over a very rapid river which runs into the lake of Tiberias, which is at no great distance, p. 853. "I found the water of the lake of Tiberias," says he, "very soft and tranquil, and very good to drink, having a bottom of very fine sand. The river Jordan passes, with a very determined course, through the very midst of this sea, without mixing with its waters, and from thence proceeds for the Dead Sea, not far distant from Jerusalem, the Mount of Olives commanding a full view of it, as I saw from that place." p. 886.

The regular passages over the Jordan were,

1. Jacob's bridge, between the lake Semechon and Gennesareth, said to be the place where Jacob met his brother Esau, and where he wrestled with an angel.

2. A bridge at Chammath, at the issue of the river from the lake of Gennesareth.

3. At Beth-abara, rather a ferry than a bridge. 2 Sam. xix. 18. 2 Kings ii. 8.

It is probable there was another at Bethshan, or Scythopolis.

"As we approach the Jordan," says Volney, "the country becomes more hilly, and better watered; the valley through which this river flows, abounds, in general, in pasturage, especially in the upper part of it. As for the river itself, it is very far from being of that importance which we are apt to assign to it. The Arabs, who are ignorant of the name of Jordan, call it El Sharia. Its breadth, between the two principal lakes, in few places exceeds sixty or eighty feet, but its depth is about ten or twelve. In winter it overflows its narrow channel, and, swelled by the rains, forms a sheet of water, sometimes a quarter of a league broad. The time of its overflowing is usually in March, when the snows melt on the mountains of the Shaik; at which time, more than any other, its waters are troubled, and of a yellow hue, and its course is impetuous. Its banks are covered with a thick forest of reeds, willows, and various shrubs, which serve as an asylum for wild boars, ounces, jackals, hares, and different kinds of birds." Trav. vol. ii. p. 300. Comp. LEBANON.

[BEYOND JORDAN. In Matth. xix. 1. we read of "the coast of Judea, beyond Jordan," meaning, perhaps, the eastern side of the Jordan; where it was well inhabited by Jews.]

JORIM, יורִים, he that exalts the Lord, or the elevation of the Lord; from ירם rum, to elevate, and יר the Lord. Luke iii. 29.

JORKOAM, ירקום, ירקום, their extension; from ירק racah, and כו am, theirs: otherwise, verdure, or spittle of the people; from ירק jarah, evacuation; or armour, from ירק rik; and כו ham, people. 1 Chron. ii. 44.

JOSE, יוֹסֵף, raised, or who exists; from יושׁ jesh: otherwise, who pardons, or Saviour; as if it had been Jehoshua. Luke iii. 29.

JOSEPH, יוֹסֵף, increase, addition; from יסוֹפ jasaph. [written יוסף, Psalm lxxxi. 6. from the Chaldee.]

1. JOSEPH, son of Jacob and Rachel, born in Mesopotamia, A. M. 2256, ante A. D. 1745. Joseph was favoured by God in his youth with prophetic dreams. His father Jacob loved him tenderly, and gave him a coat of divers colours. His brothers became jealous of such little marks of affection; and Joseph unawares increased these evil dispositions in them, by accusing them of some enormous crime; or, by reporting their wicked discourses. The LXX. (followed by the Greek fathers) read that his brethren the sons of Bilhah and Zilpah, defamed Joseph to his father, Κατήγγαλιν δὲ Ἰωσήφ λόγον πονηρὸν πρὸς Ἰσραὴλ. Gen. xxxvii. 2, 3. Vid. Chrysost. Theodoret. Diodor, &c.

But what most augured his brethren was his relating certain dreams, in one of which he had seen twelve sheaves belonging to them, bow before his sheaf, which stood upright in the field, &c. Jacob heard this without remark; but Joseph's brethren could not bear the allusion.

Joseph being sent by his father to visit his brethren, they conspired against him, and at first would have slain him, but Reuben opposing this resolution, they threw him into an old well, which had no water: soon after, perceiving a caravan of Midianite merchants going into Egypt, they sold Joseph to them, and deceived Jacob into a belief of his destruction by a wild beast.

The merchants took Joseph into Egypt, and sold him as a slave to Potiphar, captain of Pharaoh's guards. Joseph obtained his master's confidence so greatly, that he made him steward of his house, and committed to him all his domestic affairs, Gen. xxxix. But Potiphar's wife conceiving a criminal passion for this young slave, solicited him to gratify that passion; and at last she pressed him so closely, that he could only escape by leaving his cloke in her possession. Seeing herself thus despised, she began to cry out, and complain that the young Hebrew had offered her violence. Shewing his cloke as evidence against him, she easily persuaded her husband Potiphar; who therefore put Joseph in prison.

Two of the king of Egypt's officers, his butler and his baker, having incurred their master's displeasure, were put into the same prison with Joseph. Each of them had a dream in reference to himself, which Joseph explained; his interpretation of both dreams was fulfilled: the butler butler was restored to his dignity, but did not remember Joseph.

Two years after this event Pharaoh had dreams, which none of his wise men were able to explain. This making him very uneasy, his butler at last remembered Joseph, and told the king of him. Pharaoh commanded Joseph into his presence, to whom the king related his dreams, and Joseph interpreted them; foretelling a prodigious plenty succeeded by exhausting famine. Comp. FRAGMENTS, No. CXLVII. and Plate of EGYPTIAN WHEAT.

Pharaoh said to Joseph, since you have discovered futurity to us, where can I find a more proper person than yourself for the government of my house, and of Egypt? My people shall obey you; and I will be your superior only in the throne." Then he put his own ring on Joseph's finger, clothed him in fine linen, or cotton, put a chain of gold about his neck, made him ride in the chariot next to his own, and gave orders to proclaim him governor of all Egypt. He changed his name to Zaphnath-paaneah, which in Egyptian signifies, says Jerom, Saviour of the world: others translate it, He who discovers things secret. Joseph married Asenath, daughter of Potipherah, priest of On, or Heliopolis. (Vide ASENATH), by whom he had two sons, Manasseh and Ephraim.

During the seven years of plenty, Joseph accumulated vast stores of corn and grain. After this abundance came the famine, which afflicted not Egypt only, but also Canaan, where Jacob lived. Jacob therefore sent his sons into Egypt to buy provisions, but retaining Benjamin. Joseph knew his brethren, though they did not discover him. He spoke roughly to them, called them spies, detained Simeon in bonds (probably because he had been the warmest of his enemies) and let the rest depart, only on condition that they should bring their youngest brother with them. He ordered their sacks to be filled with corn, and every man's money to be put into his sack, without their perceiving it.

Jacob was constrained by the famine, notwithstanding his reluctance, to send his sons again into Egypt, and Benjamin with them. When Joseph saw his brother Benjamin, he ordered an entertainment for these strangers that day at noon: when he came in, his brethren prostrated themselves before him, and offered him presents from Jacob. Having saluted Benjamin, he immediately retired, being unable to restrain his tears. Joseph placed his brethren at table according to their age; and sent to Benjamin a portion five times larger than the rest; which mightily raised their admiration.

The next morning the corn they had purchased was loaded, and Joseph's cup [of distinguishing, or prerogative] was privately conveyed into Benjamin's sack. They were scarcely out of the city, when Joseph sent in great haste after them, reproaching them bitterly for this theft. Benjamin's sack was opened, and Joseph's cup was found in it! all in confusion at this accident, they returned with Benjamin to the city. Judah entreated Joseph to receive him for his slave instead of Benjamin, remonstrating, that if he returned to his father, without bringing back his favourite son, he would die with grief. Joseph then discovered himself, embraced them all, and principally Benjamin, and sent them with a message to their father, proposing his removal into Egypt. To this Jacob agreed. Joseph therefore gave Jacob and his sons allotments in the land of Goshen, where the city of Rameses was situated, that they might dwell there with their flocks.

The famine increasing, Joseph drained all the money of the Egyptians into the king's coffers; then their cattle; afterwards, their lands; and lastly, their persons. He restored to the Egyptians their lands and cattle, with corn for seed, on condition that they paid the fifth part of the crop to the king.

Jacob having spent 17 years in Egypt, sent for Joseph, and made him promise to bury him in Canaan, in the sepulchre of his fathers. Some time after, Joseph was informed that his father grew very ill; wherefore taking his two sons with him, Manasseh and Ephraim, he went to visit him. Jacob adopted his two sons, embraced them, and blessed them. Joseph, observing his left hand to be placed on Manasseh's head, though he was the eldest, and his right on Ephraim, who was the youngest, was desirous to remove them, but Jacob told him, he knew what he did.

After this, Jacob gave to each of his children a particular blessing. Of Joseph he said, "Joseph is a fruitful bough, even a fruitful bough by a well; whose branches run over the wall," &c. Gen. xlix. 22, 23.

As soon as Jacob expired, Joseph fell on his face, and melted into tears. He had him embalmed, and afterwards buried him in the cave of Machpelah, which Abraham had purchased of Ephron the Hittite. After Joseph was returned to Egypt, his brethren, apprehending some resentment might remain latent in him, solicited his favour; which he promised them.

Joseph, after he had lived a hundred and ten years, and had seen his grand children of the third generation, fell sick, and made his brethren promise with an oath, to carry his bones with them, when they should depart from Egypt.

After his death, his body was put into a coffin [soros, a stone coffin] in Egypt; and it was carried away at the Exodus, Exod. xiii. 19. The tribe of Ephraim buried it near Shechem, in the field which Jacob had given to Joseph, Josh. xxiv. 32. The Rabbins have abundance of stories concerning Joseph's coffin.

The author of Ecclesiasticus has an encomium on Joseph, chap. xlix. 16, 17.

Many learned men have been [mistakenly] of opinion, that the Egyptians worshipped Joseph as Osiris, Apis, and Serapis, and even under the names of Hermes, Tammuz, and Adonis. There is a book ascribed to Joseph, intitled Joseph's prayer, cited by Origen. Trimethius speaks of a magical book ascribed to Joseph, called Joseph's Mirror.

Artapanus, (apud Euseb. Præparat. Evan. lib. ix. cap. 23.) says, that Joseph coming into Egypt shewed the Egyptians the way of dividing the lands, and cultivating each his own portion, whereas before, every one tilled what he thought proper, the lands being in common: he adds, that he invented likewise measures; for which he deserved extraordinary honours from that people.

The Mahometans have books containing the supposed amours of Joseph with Zuleikah, daughter to Pharaoh king of Egypt, and wife to Potiphar. They make use of the name and example of Joseph to raise their hearts to a love of God. Joseph and Zuleikah are with them, what the bridegroom and the spouse are in Solomon's Canticle, i. e. Jesus Christ and the church; or God and a faithful soul: wherein, under the allegory of common love, the heart is exalted to divine and supernatural affection. Bibl. Orient. p. 996. Art. Jousouf ben Jacob.

Mahomet relates the history of Joseph in a manner different from that of Moses.

II. JOSEPH, son of Jacob, and grandson of Matthan, spouse of the Blessed Virgin, and foster-father of Jesus Christ, Matt. i. 15, 16. His age, and other circumstances of his life, excepting what are related in the Gospels, are uncertain. Many of the ancients believed that before his marriage with the Virgin, he had a wife, named Escha, or Mary, by whom he had James the Less, and those who are called in Scripture, "brethren" of Jesus Christ. But this opinion is not maintainable, since Mary the mother of James was living at the time of our Saviour's passion, unless it be said, she had been divorced by Joseph, (whether to marry the Blessed Virgin) or, that he was married at the same time to two sisters; which is contrary to the law, Lev. xviii. 18.

The Apocryphal Gospel of the Virgin's birth, followed by Epiphanius, Hæres. li. cap. 10, and others, imports, that Joseph was old when he married the Virgin. Epiphanius says, he was above fourscore, and had six children by a former wife; that he married the Blessed Virgin not out of choice, but by lot: to be the guardian of her virginity. Others think, that he was obliged to marry her, as being her nearest relation. Grotius, Matt. i. 16. Casaubon. ad Baron. 1. n. 37. alii ex Epiphanius. lxxviii. cap. 7.

Joseph, says the Gospel, Matt. i. 19. was a just man: this is the greatest encomium on his virtue since justice comprehends all virtues. (But see ANNUNCIATION). He married the Blessed Virgin; his ordinary abode was at Nazareth, particularly after his marriage; for some believe that the place of his birth was Capernaum, but others say Bethlehem. He lived by labour, and worked at a trade; though at what trade is not agreed. (Matt. xiii. 55. Ὁυκ ὄτις ἐστὶν ὁ τῷ τέκτονος υἱός;) Most say a carpenter, some a locksmith; others a mason. Justin Martyr, Dialog. cum Tryphon. p. 306, says, he made yokes and ploughs. The apocryphal book Of the Infancy of Jesus, which is of great antiquity, relates a miracle wrought by our Saviour in his father's shop, who was a carpenter. St. Ambrose, in Lucam, lib. iii. n. 2, says, he was employed in felling and cutting trees, and in building houses: but at the same time says he handled the utensils belonging to a smith. Libanus asking a Christian in railery, what Jesus Christ was doing? he replied, that he was making a coffin for the emperor Julian. [Julian died at the very time.] Apud Theodoret. Hist. Eccles. lib. v. cap. 18. Sozom. lib. iv. cap. 2, &c.

They who maintain that Tryphon was a smith, or farrier, cite St. Hilary, St. Peter Chrysologus, venerable Bede, and the Hebrew gospel of Matthew, published by Tilius. Cardinal Hugo makes him a goldsmith; but does not disapprove the opinion, that he was a mason. Theophilus of Antioch, and St. Ambrose, are not against his being a smith, since he worked, say they, with fire and bellows.

The incarnation of the Son of God was not at first discovered to Joseph; but being informed that Mary his espoused wife was pregnant, not knowing how to account for it, he inclined to dismiss her privately, by giving her a bill of divorce, instead of publicly dishonouring her. But while he was under this embarrassing uncertainty, an angel of the Lord appeared to him in a dream, and encouraged him to take home Mary. See ANNUNCIATION.

About six months after, Joseph went to Bethlehem, there to be registered with Mary his wife, in pursuance of an edict from Augustus.

While

While they were there, the time of Mary's delivery came. Forty days after the child's birth, Mary and Joseph carried him to Jerusalem, and performed what the law appointed. While here the angel of the Lord directed Joseph in a dream, to carry the child into Egypt, because king Herod sought to kill him. How long they continued in Egypt we cannot tell, probably not long, since Herod died about the passover, some few months after the massacre of the innocents. The angel again informed Joseph, that he might return to Judea; but, learning that Archelaus succeeded Herod, Joseph retired to Nazareth in Galilee, which was not subject to Archelaus, but to Herod Antipas. He took Jesus at the age of twelve, with Mary, to the passover at Jerusalem, where they lost him for three days, but found him at last in the temple, Luke ii. 42—51.

It is believed with great probability, that Joseph died before Jesus began his public ministry. Joseph does not appear at the marriage of Cana, or in any other instance; and Jesus on his cross recommends his blessed mother to St. John, which, without doubt, he would not have done, had her husband been living. His name is in very ancient martyrologies, March 19: but his festival is of late introduction.

III. JOSEPH, or Joses, son of Mary Cleophas, was brother to James the Less, and nearly related to our Lord Jesus, being son of the blessed Virgin's sister, and of Cleophas, Joseph's brother; or of Joseph himself; as those ancients suppose, who assert, that Joseph was married to Mary Cleophas, or Escha, before he was married to the Virgin. Some believe, Joseph son of Mary and Cleophas to be Joseph Barsabas, the Just, who was proposed to fill up the traitor Judas's place, Acts i. 23. But there is no certainty in this. We learn nothing particular in Scripture concerning Joseph the "brother" of our Lord. If he were one of those kinsmen who did not believe in him, John vii. 5. he was afterwards converted; for we gather from Scripture, that at last all our Saviour's "brethren" believed in him; and St. Chrysostom says, they were distinguished for eminent faith and virtue.

IV. JOSEPH BARSABAS, surnamed Justus. He was one of the seventy-two disciples. Peter proposed him, with Matthias, to fill by lot the traitor Judas's place; Matthias was preferred. Joseph continued in the apostolic ministry to the end. Papias, apud Euseb. Hist. Eccles. lib. iii. cap. 39. informs us, that having drank poison, he was by the grace of Jesus Christ secured from death. The martyrologies of Usuardus and Ado place his festival, July 20, and say he suffered much from the Jews, and at last died in Judea gloriously.

V. JOSEPH of Arimathea, or Ramatha, a Jewish senator, and privately a disciple of Jesus Christ, John xix. 38. He did not consent to the acts of the Sanhedrim, who condemned Jesus Christ; and when our Saviour was dead, he went boldly to Pilate and desired the body of Jesus, that he might bury it, [Vide PUNISHMENTS] Mark xv. 43. John xix. 38. He buried it in an honourable manner; in a sepulchre newly made, in his garden, adjoining where Jesus was crucified: and he closed the entrance of it with a great stone, Matth. xxvii. 60. John xix. 40, 41.

The Greek church keeps his festival July 31, his name is not in the old Latin martyrologies, nor was it in the Roman, till A. D. 1585.

VI. JOSEPH, husband to Salome, Herod the Great's sister. Vide SALOME.

VII. JOSEPH, son of Ellem: the high-priest Matthias dreaming in the night, that he had commerce with a woman, became incapable, according to the law, of performing his sacred functions: Joseph, his relation, was for that day appointed to perform them for him. [Vide Heb. vii. 26. ἀμάρτωρ.]

VIII. JOSEPH, son of Canceus, high-priest, from A. M. 4048 to 4050.

IX. JOSEPH;—surnamed Cabei or Gaddis, made high-priest by Agrippa, A. M. 4066, and deprived the same year.

X. JOSEPH-BEN-GORION, an author, whose age, birth and profession are not exactly known: he describes himself as "a priest and prince of his people, who was particularly qualified for war, and received the spirit of wisdom and understanding, of council and fortitude, of knowledge and the fear of God; one who gave his life for the people of God, for his sanctuary, and for his nation." Adding, that one of his soldiers cried out to him, "Thou art the man of God; blessed be the Lord God of Israel who hath created the soul that animates thee, and hath filled thee with wisdom." When he was taken, they asked one another in the enemy's army, "Is this the man so formidable to the Romans? How came he to be taken who alone spread terror through our army, and hath filled the universe with the fame of his valour?" When Jerusalem was taken, Titus did justice to the excellent qualities of the son of Gorion, and raised him above all the priests and Levites of his nation.

These commendations, so extravagant, and heaped together with so much affectation, prejudice us very much to his disadvantage. But the Jews, who set an extreme value on every thing thing that proceeds from themselves, discern nothing excessive in these praises. Rabbi Than, who published the history of this spurious Josephus, affirms, "that all the words of this writer are truth and justice; that there is not one falsehood in his writings; that he comes nearer to the old prophets than any writer that hath appeared; that the hand of the Lord rested upon him, while he composed his work: and that his words may be said almost to be the words of a God incarnate."

Joseph says, that he was born 134 years after the Cæsareat, which the Greeks call Imperiosia, was instituted among the Romans; and that "he was one and fifty years old when Julius Cæsar came into the world." He says, he "had seen Julius Cæsar, who is the first king, called by the Latins Imperius, or the first Cæsar, he who resettled the Cæsareat a third time among the Romans." He says likewise, that he was contemporary with "Jesus the son of Sirach, a prince among the Jews." How is this chronology to be reconciled?—one contemporary with Jesus the son of Sirach, fifty-one years old at the birth of Julius Cæsar, and born 134 years after the establishment of the Roman empire!!

His father Gorion survived the taking of Jerusalem, for he left the city when Titus had made himself master of it. Gorion therefore must have been then at least 240 years old, and he foretold what was to befall the great city of Rome, till its total destruction. Nevertheless, he did not set up for a prophet; but he "reported what he had learned from the Sages who had lived with the prophets, and from the heathen, who are true and sincere in their conjectures." He had greatly obliged us, if he had told us, who these Sages were "whom he had seen, and who lived with the prophets." There is besides a considerable interval from the time of the ancient Hebrew prophets to that of Julius Cæsar. As for the rest, it was easy for him, who did not live till the eleventh century, to write the revolutions of the city of Rome, and give an account of what had been transacted so many years before.

Lastly, he published the famous history which we are speaking of, whereof no one had any knowledge till the twelfth century, no ancient author having taken any notice of it. Solomon Jarchi, a French Jew, who lived about A. D. 1140, was the first who spoke expressly of it. After him we find it cited by Aben-Ezra, Abraham Ben Dion, and David Kimchi, who lived about the same time.

This work may be considered as a chronicle of what was done under the second temple. The author persuades himself, that he should be esteemed by posterity as the prince of historians. He exalts himself above Livy, whose faults he pretends to correct. He affirms that he had several other authors before him, from whom he had extracted part of what he delivers. He says that he had read Livy, Trogas Pompeius, Strabo, Porophyus (probably Porphyrus) the books of Cainan son of Enos, those of the Medes, Macedonians, and Assyrians; Alexander's letters to Aristotle; the book of the Greeks, that of the Roman alliances; also Kirker's (Cicero's) works, who had been an eyewitness of the hardships put on the priests by Pompey at the taking of Jerusalem; the calendar which Julius Cæsar composed for the Greeks and Nazarenes; the chronicle of the Roman Cæsars; the collection of Roman Laws, that Vespasian kissed on the day of his coronation. What falsehoods and impostures are here? yet these are only a part.

His history of Alexander the Great is a collection of fables and gross errors; there never was a romance more mistaken, or fuller of silly trifles. The author boasts of having extracted his history from that prince's genealogy, written by the Egyptian Magi the year immediately following his death. M. Gagnier published a Latin book with this title, The Actions of Alexander, with a Latin translation of Joseph-Ben-Gorion. The Latin author agrees in almost all the facts with Joseph, and says, as he does, that he hath taken his history from memoirs by the Egyptian Magi. But it is hard to decide which of the two is most ancient; the Latin writer is some small matter less stuffed with fables. He is not ancient; but the Hebrew seems to be more modern. He often speaks of Britany, mentions Normandy, the Loire, Amboise, Chignon, France, Lombardy, England, Hungary, and Turkey.

He speaks of the Burgundians, Bulgarians, of the inhabitants of Cracow, of the Croats or Crevats, of gold florins, &c. which are incontestable proofs of novelty. It is remarkable that he had read Josephus the historian only in Rufinus's translation. No one doubts but that he was by origin, a Frenchman, and wrote in France, but whether in Touraine, Britany, or Normandy, is uncertain.

XI. JOSEPH, or JOSEPHUS, the historian, a Jew, surnamed Flavius, son of Matthias, of the race of the priests: born at Jerusalem in the first year of the reign of Caius, A. D. 37. He was well instructed, and made an early proficiency in learning. From the age of sixteen to nineteen he engaged in laborious exercises in the wilderness, under one Banes; and after having well examined the three principal sects then then in repute among the Jews, he adhered to the Pharisees. At nineteen years of age, he returned to Jerusalem. About A. D. 65, being above twenty-six years of age, he voyaged to Rome; but was shipwrecked; and out of more than six hundred persons, he and fourscore others only were saved, by swimming all night. It appears that he had three wives.

In the beginning of the war between the Jews and Romans, A. D. 66, he was sent into Galilee, as governor for the Jews. There he performed many memorable actions, which he has particularly described. Vespasian besieged him in Jotapata, a city of Galilee, which he defended in a manner, admired even by the Romans. When they had taken the place, Josephus fled into a cave; where he found forty Jews; they were discovered after three days; Vespasian sent three times to offer him his life. Josephus at last determined to trust the Romans, but his companions opposed him, and declared, he must die by his own hands or theirs. He opposed self-murder, as a weak, not a generous action; but all he could prevail with them to do, was, to draw lots who should die first: the lot so happened, that the rest being dead, he was left with one other, whom he persuaded without much difficulty to prefer life to death.

He surrendered therefore to Vespasian, who inclined to send him to the emperor Nero at Rome. Josephus being informed of his design, desired to speak with Vespasian in private; to whom he foretold his promotion to the empire after Nero, and some others his immediate successors: although Vespasian at that time made little account of this prediction, yet the event shewed its truth, for he was proclaimed emperor in Judea, A. D. 69. Some time after he held an assembly at Berytus, wherein, after he had publicly commended the courage of Josephus, he ordered his chains to be broken, that he might do him honour as well as give him liberty.

Josephus attended Titus at the siege of Jerusalem, and endeavoured, several times, to bring the Jews to submit to the clemency of the Romans: but the Jews answered him only with affronts and curses. One day as he was speaking to them pretty near the walls, he received a blow from a stone, which laid him senseless on the ground. After the city was taken, A. D. 70, he procured the liberty of several Jews, and Titus gave him the sacred books, which he had desired. [Mr. Whiston thought, that Josephus having obtained from Titus that copy of the Scriptures which had been preserved, officially, in the temple, from Nehemiah's time, it contained more than those synagogue copies which are the basis of the common text; with more correct readings in various places.]

The war being ended, Titus returned to Rome, with Josephus, A. D. 71. Vespasian appointed him a lodging in the house which belonged to him before he was emperor, made him a citizen of Rome, assigned him a pension, gave him lands in Judea, and shewed him great affection: which was continued by Titus. He assumed the name of Flavius, which was that of Vespasian's family, because he considered himself as the emperor's freedman.

At Rome, he employed himself in writing the history of the Jewish war, from memoirs which he had prepared; he composed it first in his own language, (the Syriac;) and this work soon spread among the Arabians, Adiabeniens, Babylonians, Parthians, and Jews beyond the Euphrates. Afterwards he translated it into Greek for the benefit of the Romans. At what time he learned the Greek language is not known. He confesses that he never could pronounce it well, because he did not learn it when young; the Jews having very little esteem for the study of foreign languages. He calls on all those as witnesses to the truth of his narration, who had been present in the war. As soon as this work was finished, he presented it to Vespasian, Titus, and king Agrippa, who all approved and highly commended it. Titus ordered it to be placed in a public library, and signed the copy, which was lodged there, with his own hand. We are interested in all these circumstances, because his history shews the accomplishment of the predictions of Jesus Christ, who foretold them as a just punishment for the sin of the Jews in crucifying him.

After Josephus had written his history of the war, he composed a general history of his nation, from the beginning of the world, to the twelfth year of Nero, A. D. 66, wherein the Jews revolted. He undertook this work at the instance of Epaphroditus, who is believed to be Nero's celebrated freedman, whom Domitian put to death, A. D. 95. Josephus finished this work in the fifty sixth year of his age, the thirteenth of Domitian, A. D. 93. He professes to adhere closely to the sacred books: but he has on several occasions, suppressed, altered, or disguised certain Scripture histories.

To his Antiquities he joined a History of his own life; inscribed to the same Epaphroditus: who dying A. D. 95, the book containing his life must be of 93 or 94. The principal part of this work is employed in describing his conduct while governor of Galilee.

As several persons questioned what he had said concerning the antiquity of the Jews, he undertook a new work intitled Against Apion; or according to Eusebius and Jerom, Of the Antiquity of the Jews. He dedicated it to the same same Epaphroditus. Herein, by a great number of extracts from profane authors, he shews the antiquity of the Hebrew nation, and the agreement of several ancient and foreign writers, with many great events in Jewish history.

There is a very eloquent discourse cited under his name entitled, Of the Empire of Reason, which in some Greek bibles is called, The fourth book of the Maccabees; because in this he speaks of the martyrdom of the seven brothers, the Maccabees, whose history is related in a more simple manner, 2 Macc. vii. But we can scarcely believe this work to be Josephus's. First, by reason of the difference of style. Secondly, because Josephus nowhere cites or speaks of it, as he does of his other works. Thirdly, because there are many things in it contrary to the history of the Maccabees.

Josephus has spoken very advantageously of Jesus Christ, as the Messiah, or the Christ. Some moderns have questioned the authenticity of this passage; but many ancients having cited it, and it being in all the copies of Josephus, we see no reason to give it up. Consult Francis de Roye, M. Huet Demonstratio Evangelica, & M. de Tillemont, note 40. on the destruction of the Jews; and lastly, a little piece published in 1661, by Christopher Arnoldus, wherein he hath collected thirty letters from several learned men, who give their opinions on this subject, and nine and twenty extracts from different works relating to the same.

[In order to judge correctly on the value and credibility of Josephus's testimony concerning Jesus Christ, it is necessary to ascertain in the first place the character of Josephus himself. That he was by descent a Jewish priest, he has told us expressly; but, whether he were not a disciple of the sect that claimed John the Baptist as their founder, may admit of great doubt. That many Jews, and Jewish priests associated with that party is certain; and that party made no scruple of giving to Jesus the title of Messiah, which is what occasions suspicion in Josephus. It is true, that, subsequently, they added the term false, or self-called Messiah; but, this should seem to be an after-thought. As this people, and their books, were unknown in Mr. Whiston's days, it is very pardonable in that writer, and others, to suppose Josephus might be an Ebionite Christian: the conjecture was plausible, but, in common with all conjectures, it is unsupported by direct evidence. See DISCIPLES OF JOHN THE BAPTIST.]

Josephus has likewise given a very advantageous testimony to John the Baptist, Antiq. lib. xviii. cap. 7. and to St. James minor, whom he describes by the name of the brother of Jesus called Christ, Antiq. lib. xx. cap. 8. (see their articles.) It was before mentioned in his history, that the emperor Claudius expelled the Jews from Rome, and that the Jews imputed the destruction of Jerusalem to the death of St. James minor. It is surprising that he has said nothing concerning the murder of the innocents; but there are many other things omitted by him. The old Latin version of Josephus's works still extant, is thought to be by Rufinus, priest of Aquileia [in the fourth century.] Photius expresses great esteem for it; and Jerom makes a magnificent encomium on him: calling him the Livy of the Greeks. Lastly, Eusebius says, that his statue was erected at Rome in consideration of his writings. We do not meet with his name in any of the sacred books. But as we cite him frequently in this Dictionary, and have borrowed many particulars from him, we thought ourselves obliged to mention him somewhat at large in this place.

XII. JOSEPH, surnamed the Blind, was, it is said, a professor in the university of Sara, about A. D. 351. [He is indeed commonly called Josephus Cæcus, or Josephus the Blind: but this is not to be understood as if he were blind of both eyes: for then he could not have performed this work. The word in Hebrew, by which he is so denominated, signifies Luscum, blind of one eye, as well as Cæcum, blind of both eyes. Prid. Connect. &c. Part ii. book viii.]

The Jews call him the great light, or Saghi-Nahor, (Ganz, Tzemach David, ad An. 113.) likewise Sinai, because he gloried in having a perfect knowledge of all the traditions delivered to Moses on mount Sinai. He is said to be the author of the Chaldee paraphrases on the Psalms, Job, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Solomon's Song, Ruth and Esther. But it is not agreed, that the paraphrases on all these books are by the same author, there being so visible a difference in style and method; which sometimes is too close and concise, and sometimes too copious and diffuse. The names of Turk and Constantinople appear in them, for which reason F. Morin says, that they are of a much later composition than the Jews will allow. Elias the Levite says, that several traces of the Babylonish, Greek, Latin, and Persian languages may be discerned in them.

JOSHABAD, יוֹשָׁבָד, יוֹזָבָד, he that is endowed by the Lord; compounded of יוֹ jah, God, and יוֹזָבֹד zabod, to endow. 1 Chr. xii. 4.

JOSHAI, יוֹשִׁי, יוֹשִׁיָּה, who is, or who exists; from יוֹשֵׁה jesh, otherwise, who forgets; from יוֹשֵׁה nashah. 1 Chr. iv. 34.

JOSHBEKASHAH, יוֹשְׁבֵקֶשֶׁה, he that asks, or informs himself; יוֹ information; from יוֹשֵׁה bikkesh: otherwise, difficult respiration; from יוֹשֵׁה nashab, to breathe: or conversion, difficult return; return; from שׁוּב shub, to return, and from קָשָׁה cashah, difficult, troublesome. Son of Heman, a Levite and singer: of the seventeenth class of Levites, 1 Chr. xxv. 4, 24.

JOSHAVIAH, יְהוֹשָׁפָא, equity, justice, [gift] or plain of the Lord; from שָׁוָה shavah, equity, &c. and יָה jah, the Lord: or the Lord will put equality; from the same. 1 Chron. xi. 46.

JOSHIBIAH, יִשְׁבִּיָּה, abroad, residence, or return of the Lord; see Jushabhesd: otherwise, captivity of the Lord; from שָׁבָה shabah, captivity, and יָה jah, the Lord. 1 Chron. iv. 35.

JOSHUAH, יְהוֹשֻׁעַ, Ἰησοῦς, JESUS, or Ἰωσήφ, the Lord, the Saviour; from יָשָׁה jashah, to save, to help, and יָה jah, the Lord.

JOSHUA, son of Nun, by the Greeks called Jesus son of Nave, was of the tribe of Ephraim; born A. M. 2460, ante A. D. 1544; he is commonly called the servant of Moses. His first name was Hosea, Numb. xiii. 8, 17. Some believe that Moses changed his name, by adding that of God to it. Hoseah signifies saviour, Jehosua, the salvation of God, or he will save: (יְהוֹשֻׁעַ Hoseah, יְהוֹשֻׁעַ Jehosuah.) There is some dispute concerning the time when Joshua began to be so called. Some think it was after the defeat of the Amalekites, others not till after the return of the agents sent to survey the promised land. The Greek instead of Hosea reads Ausem.

Joshua signalized his valour against the Amalekites: he routed their whole army. When Moses went up mount Sinai, to receive the law, and remained there forty days and forty nights, Joshua abode with him, though in all probability, not in the same place, nor with the same abstinence; and when Moses descended from the mountain, Joshua heard the noise of the people, shouting about the golden calf, and thought it was the cry of battle, Exod. xxxii. 17.

Joshua was very constant at the tabernacle of the congregation; he had the care and custody of it, Exod. xxxiii. 11, and seems to have dwelt in, or near it. When the people came to Kadesh-Barnea, Joshua with others, was deputed to survey the land of Canaan; and when these deputies returned, and represented the difficulties of conquering that country as extremely great, Joshua and Caleb maintained, that the conquest was easy, if the Lord were with them. The murmurers were all excluded from the land of promise; but God promised Joshua and Caleb that they should enter and possess it.

When Moses was near his end, God commanded him to lay his hands on Joshua, to communicate to him part of his spirit and his glory, that the people might obey him. After the death of Moses, he took the command of the Israelites; and God favoured him. He sent spies to the city of Jericho, and ordered the army of Israel to pass the river Jordan. Joshua took twelve stones out of the midst of the river, which he placed at Gilgal, and set up twelve likewise in the midst of the Jordan, as monuments of Israel's miraculous passage.

Some few days after the passage of the Jordan, Joshua caused to be circumcised those men who being born in the wilderness, by reason of their changing place frequently, had not received circumcision. After this, they kept the passover on the 14th of Nisan, A. M. 2553. While Joshua was before Jericho meditating the siege of that city, he saw a man standing with a naked sword in his hand: to whom he said, "Art thou for us, or for our adversaries?" The man answered, "I am captain of the Lord's host; and I am come to thine assistance." Joshua fell with his face to the earth; and the angel said to him, 'Take off thy shoes, for the place where thou standest is holy ground.'

A few days after, he received orders from the Lord to besiege Jericho. Some think this siege was carried on during the seven days of the passover. The first six days, the army of Israel, with the priests and the ark at their head, marched round the city once, on the seventh day they marched seven times round it; and at the seventh time, the priests sounding the sacred trumpets, the people shouted, and the walls of the city fell, so that each man entered at the place opposite to him: Joshua then uttered his [predictive] imprecation against the rebuild-er of Jericho: which prophecy was accomplished many ages after. See HIEL. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. V.

Joshua sent 3000 men against Ai: but this small army was repulsed with the loss of thirty-six men. Joshua complained to the Lord, who told him, that Israel had violated the anathema pronounced against Jericho. The people hereupon were convened; and the lot fell on Achan son of Carmi, who was punished for his crime. Vide ACHAN. After this Joshua took Ai.

God had commanded, that after the Israelites had passed the Jordan, they should erect an altar on mount Ebal. Joshua fulfilled this order.

About the same time, the Gibeonites came to Joshua, pretending they were from a distant country, and were not of the people of Canaan, who were devoted to the curse. Joshua and the elders of Israel made a covenant with them, without consulting the Lord; but three days after they found that they were inhabitants, and dwelt in the cities of Gibeon, Cephirah, Beeroth, and Kirjath-jearim. The people murmured against the elders; but it was resolved, that their lives should be preserved, since this they had had been promised in the name of the Lord; nevertheless, they were condemned to cut wood and to carry water for sacred services. Hereupon Adonibezek king of Jerusalem, confederated with four other kings of Canaan, to attack Gibeon. Joshua marched all night, and in the morning fell upon them so briskly, that he put the five kings to flight, and as they fled along the way to Bethoron, the Lord poured a shower of large hail stones upon them as far as Azekah, which killed many. Then Joshua said, "Sun, stand thou still over against Gibeon, and thou moon, in the valley of Ajalon." And the sun and moon obeyed, and stood still. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CLV. and Plate, JOSHUA'S MIRACLE.

The five kings having fled into a cave near Makkedah, Joshua ordered great stones to be rolled against the mouth of it, till the enemy were entirely dispersed. Towards the close of the day, Joshua killed these five kings, and hung their dead bodies upon gibbets, where they remained till evening. Joshua taking advantage of the consternation of the Canaanites, attacked and took several cities belonging to their country. He pillaged all the land from Kadesh-barnea to Gaza, and all the land of Gosen as far as Gibeon, i. e. all the southern part of Palestine.

The year following the king of Hazor, who dwelt above the lake Semechon, in Galilee, confederated with several kings of Canaan, to endeavour, if possible, to oppose the Israelites with their great numbers. They assembled at the waters of Merom. Joshua charging them suddenly, defeated and pursued them to great Zidon. The Hebrews killed all that fell into their hands: they ham-strung their horses, and burnt all their chariots. Joshua returned to Hazor, and burnt it. He took and destroyed in like manner all the cities round about, and killed their kings. All this was not done in a day. Some years were necessary to reduce the country; for he was obliged to make war on all these kings, none surrendering without a battle.

In the sixth year after the Israelites had entered the land of Canaan, they began to divide the conquered lands; Caleb first demanded his portion in the mountains of Judah and Hebron. See CALEB. After this, a division was made to every tribe by lot: first to Judah, then to Ephraim and the half tribe of Manasseh, which hitherto had not received its partition.

After this, the people assembled at Shiloh, to allot the portions of the other tribes. Joshua sent surveyors throughout the country; and the tribes of Benjamin, Simeon, Zebulon, Issachar, Asher, Naphtali, and Dan, had their portions assigned them. And lastly, they gave to Jo- shua for his inheritance, Timnath-Serah, in the mountains of Ephraim. They then appointed six cities of refuge for those who had committed casual and involuntary murder, and forty-six cities as residences of the priests and Levites. The tribes of Reuben and Gad, and the half tribe of Manasseh, having assisted their brethren in conquering the land of Canaan, they returned to the country beyond the Jordan, which was their settlement. On the banks of the Jordan, they erected a monument, as a memorial to future generations, that they were the same people with the tribes on the other side the river. Joshua fearing lest this might be idolatrous, sent to inquire their intentions by it. But the tribes proved their real intentions to be upright.

This great man drawing near his end, summoned all Israel to Shechem, and ordered the ark of the covenant to be brought thither. After he had represented to the Israelites the favours they had received from God, and had exhorted them to continue faithful, he made a covenant on the part of God with the people, and the people reciprocally engaged to serve the Lord. Joshua wrote it in the book of the law of the Lord; and to preserve the memory of this transaction, he erected a very large stone, under the oak, near Shechem. He died, aged an hundred and ten, A. M. 2570, ante A. D. 1434. Jesus ben Sirach has made his encomium, Eccclus. xlv. 1, 2, &c.

The BOOK of JOSHUA is generally attributed to this great man. All the copies of it go under his name. It is said in the last chapter, ver. 26. that Joshua wrote all these things. Both the church and synagogue agree, in this, and acknowledge the book to be canonical; nevertheless, it contains certain terms, names of places, and particular circumstances, which do not agree with Joshua's time; and which induce a belief, that this book has been revised, and that additions and corrections have been made by transcribers; [rather by Ezra, in his edition.] But there are few books of Scripture, wherein something like this is not observable.

The Samaritans have a book of Joshua, which they preserve with respect, and use in supporting their pretensions against the Jews:—it is very different from that in our bibles. It contains forty-seven chapters, filled with fables and childish stories. It begins, where Moses chooses Joshua to succeed him: It relates the history of Balaam; of the war of Moses against the Midianites; of the occasion of it; of Balaam's death; of the death of Moses, and the lamentation made for him. It relates the passage of the river Jordan very much at large, the taking taking of Jericho, and adds a great number of miracles which are not in the genuine book of Joshua. It describes a certain war which it mentions to have been carried on against Sathubec, son of Heman king of Persia, with the addition of a thousand fabulous circumstances. After the death of Joshua, this book names one Terfico, of the tribe of Ephraim for his successor. The author includes within his history what concerns the judges and kings of Judah, Jaddus, and Alexander the Great, and the siege of Jerusalem by Adrian. He concludes with what relates to Nathanael, and his sons Babaraba, Akbarus, and Phinehas. This book is not printed. Joseph Scaliger, to whom it belonged, left it as a legacy to the library of Leyden, where it is at present, in Samaritan characters, but in the Arabian language, translated from the Hebrew.

The Jews make Joshua the author of a prayer, which they repeat, either intire or in part, as often as they go out of their synagogues: It begins thus, "It is our duty to praise the Lord of the universe, and to celebrate the creation of the world; for he hath not made us like unto the nations of the earth, and hath prepared for us an inheritance infinitely richer and greater," &c. See Wagenseil, Tela ignea Satanae, p. 223, 227. They likewise ascribe to Joshua ten rules which were to be observed in the Holy Land. The first is, that it is lawful to feed small but not large cattle in forests, the trees whereof are large. The second, that all Israelites are allowed to pick up little pieces of wood, such as briars or the like, in another man's field; provided nevertheless, that they find them upon the ground, and do not cut them. The rest of these regulations are much of the same nature. We do not read, that Joshua was married or had children. After his death the elders of Israel governed the people in a sort of aristocracy. But we do not know whether any one among them was first in rank, [except the High priest] or who he was. Nevertheless it is believed, that Othniel had the principal share in the government.

[Procopius mentions, that two pillars were standing in his time on the coast of Mauritania, opposite Gibraltar, on which were inscriptions in the Phœnician tongue: "We are Canaanites, flying from the face of Joshua, the son of Nun, the robber." De Bello Vand. lib. ii. cap. 10. A Moorish author, Ibn el Raquique says, this inscription was on a stone on a monument at Carthage. Marmol l. i. c. 25.]

JOSIAH, יְהוֹשִׁיָּהוּ, Yehoiashah, the Lord burns, or the fire of the Lord; from שָׂרַף sh, fire, and יָהּ jah, the Lord.

JOSIAH, son of Amon king of Judah, and Jedidah daughter of Adaiah of Bosath, 2 Kings xxii. He began to reign when eight years of age, A. M. 3363, ante A. D. 641. He did right in the sight of the Lord, and walked in the ways of David. He began to seek after God from the eighth year of his reign, which was the sixteenth year of his age; and in the twelfth year of his reign, which was the twentieth of his age, he purged Judah and Jerusalem from high-places, groves, idols, and superstitious images. He burned the bones of deceased priests of the false gods upon the altars of their idols. Nor was he satisfied with thus destroying the remains of idolatry in his own dominions, but he visited for the same purpose the cities of Ephraim, Manasseh, Simeon, and Naphtali.

After this he made it his business to repair the temple of the Lord, which in the preceding reigns had been neglected. As they were removing the money which had been offered by the Israelites at the temple, to give it to the workmen, the high-priest Hilkiah found in the treasury-chamber a book of the law of the Lord given by Moses. It is thought, that this was the ORIGINAL of the law, and that it was found either in some wall, or chest, or beside the ark; for it appears, that the ark was not then in the sanctuary, since Josiah commands the priests to restore it to its place, and forbids them to carry it about any more. St. Chrysostom says somewhere, that this book was found in a heap of filth and nastiness; and in another place, that it was found in a hole under ground, and almost defaced. He is of opinion, that the book of Deuteronomy only was then discovered, probably, because it is said, Deut. xxxi. 26. that Moses ordered this book of the law to be placed beside the ark.

Josiah having heard this book read, rent his clothes, and sent to Huldah the prophetess, the wife of Shallum, for advice. The king having convened the elders of Judah and Jerusalem, went up to the temple of the Lord with them. He read to them the book lately found, and made a covenant with God, engaging to walk in his ways, and to observe his precepts and ordinances; and he made the assembly promise the same. He afterwards ordered the destruction of all remains of superstitious and idolatrous monuments in Jerusalem, and Judah: he cut off the soothsayers; those who worshipped the stars; and the sodomites: he enjoined those priests who had offered sacrifices on the high places, to desist. He defiled Tophet and the valley of Hinnom, and profaned all places which had been consecrated to superstition and idolatry, idolatry, filled them with dead men's bones, and broke down the statues which were in them. He demolished the altar erected by Jeroboam son of Nebat at Bethel, dug up the bones of the false prophets and priests of the golden calves, but spared the sepulchre of that prophet, whom the Lord had sent to prophecy against Jeroboam, 1 Kings xiii. 31, 32.

Josiah afterwards commanded all his people to keep the passover, according to the law. Scripture says, that from the time of the judges, and during the reigns of all the kings, no passover had been kept like this of the eighteenth year of Josiah; and that no king before him, like unto him, turned as he did to the Lord with all his heart, with all his soul, and with all his strength. Pharaoh Necho king of Egypt, desiring to pass through Judea, to attack the city of Carchemish on the Euphrates, Josiah opposed his passage, at Megiddo, at the foot of mount Carmel. Here this good prince was mortally wounded; and being carried to Jerusalem, died there. The people mourned very much for his death, and Jeremiah composed an elegy on the occasion. Josiah was buried with the kings his predecessors at Jerusalem. The people made Jehoahaz, otherwise Shallum, one of Josiah's sons, king in his room.

Jesus, the son of Sirach, speaks highly of king Josiah, Eccles. xlix. 1, 2, 3, &c.

There were several prophets in Judah while Josiah reigned; Jeremiah and Baruch, Joel and Zephaniah: also the prophetess Huldah. Many have been of opinion, that the Lamentations of Jeremiah, which are extant, were composed on the death of Josiah; and that these are the lamentations mentioned 2 Chron. xxxv. 24, 25. which were so celebrated, that the singing men and singing women continued to sing them long after. The mourning of the people on the death of this prince, passed, as it were, into a proverb; and the prophet Zechariah, xii. 11. speaking of the lamentation of future ages, at the death of the Messiah, alludes to that of Josiah, as "the mourning of Hadadrimmon in the valley of Megiddo." Josiah, it is well known, received his death's wound at Megiddo, near Hadadrimmon. He left four sons, Jehoahaz, otherwise Shallum, Eliakim, or Jehoiakim, Zedekiah, otherwise Matthanias, and Johanan. This last, in all probability, died young; the other three reigned after him. See their Articles.

There are some difficulties in the history of Josiah: First, in that he was not satisfied with abolishing idolatry in Jerusalem and in his own dominions, but he went likewise into the territories of Israel, and did the same in the kingdom of Samaria. It is true, the kingdom of Israel at that time was not in being, the ten tribes having been transplanted beyond the Euphrates: but there was still a great number as well of Israelites, who were left behind, as of Cutheans and other people, sent thither by the kings of Assyria. However, it seems certain, that Josiah was not sovereign of that country; which was in subjection to the kings of Assyria: how then could he exercise the rights of sovereignty?

We may answer, 1. that Josiah did not so much follow the rules of policy, as of his zeal and piety. 2. It is very credible, that as a wise prince, and well advised, he did nothing without consulting the wisest men of his kingdom. 3. We see by the sequel of Josiah's history, that he was in alliance with the kings of Chaldea, since he opposed Necho king of Egypt, who marched against Carchemish. It is therefore most probable, that Josiah held the territories of Samaria, under the kings of Chaldea. 4. Lastly, the Cutheans and other people, whom Esar-haddon had sent into this country, might concern themselves very little in maintaining the religion of the Israelites; and those of the ten tribes who remained were not in condition to resist Josiah, since their continuance in the country was by sufferance only. [5. His party, as a native Jewish king, would naturally be strong among the remaining Israelites; who being now under punishment were, perhaps, also under penitence. Vide CAPTIVITIES.]

The Second difficulty relates to Josiah's expedition against Necho king of Egypt. Josiah at the head of his army opposed his passage. The king of Egypt sent to him, saying, "I have no designs against thee; but I make war on another house, against which God hath commanded me to march with all expedition." Josiah refused to acquiesce in what Necho had said to him from the mouth of God: he attacked him at Megiddo, and was there mortally wounded. Herein, Scripture expresses itself, as if Necho had really been engaged by God's order to march against the city of Carchemish.

It is the opinion of some, that Jeremiah, or some other prophet, had enjoined Necho to pursue hostilities against that city. But it is highly probable that Josiah was either an ally, or even tributary [as above, for his authority over the former kingdom of Israel] to the kings of Chaldea, successors to those of Assyria, to whom his father Manasseh had been delivered, and who was restored to the crown by them only on conditions. Josiah no doubt was under the same engagements. It was therefore both [his duty] policy and justice, to forbid the king of Egypt's passage passage through his country, who was going to attack a place belonging to the sovereign of Chaldaea [Josiah's paramount Lord.]

JOSIPHIAH, יוספיה, the Lord is my increase, or the profit of the Lord; from יסף jasaph, increase: otherwise, the Lord who consumes and finishes; from ספח saphah to consume, and יה jah, the Lord. Returned from Babylon with one hundred and sixty persons, Ezra viii. 10.

IOTA, ι, a letter in the Greek alphabet, derived from the (ι) jod of the Hebrews, or the Judh of the Syrians. Jesus Christ says, Matt. v. 18, that every iota, or title, in the law would have its accomplishment. This seems to have been a kind of proverb among the Jews, i. e. that all should be completed to the uttermost, because an iota is the smallest letter in the alphabet: iota unum, aut unus apex; now apex is properly a stroke, a point, or the extremity of certain Hebrew letters, which exceed others in length, as ל lamed, ש schin, &c.

JOTBAH, יטבה, 'Iteβa, that does good, or his goodness; from טוב tob, or יטב jatab, and יה ah, his. A city of Judah, 2 Kings xxi. 19.

JOTBATHAH, יטבתה, or יטבתא, 'Iteβaθa, or JETEBa, she that is a benefactress; from טוב tob, goodness; otherwise, she that declines; from יט jat, to decline, and בת bath, a daughter. The root of this word is not easily found in the Hebrew. An encampment of Israel, in the wilderness between Gidgad and Ebronah, Numb. xxxiii. 34. We conjecture that this may be the same as the graves of lust. le-taabatha, signifies a heap of lust.

JOTHAM, יוחם, Vulgate, Joathan, perfection of the Lord; from תם tham, or תמים thammam, perfect, or perfection, and יה jah, the Lord.

I. JOTHAM, or Joathan, Gideon's youngest son. He escaped the slaughter which the inhabitants of Ophrah made of his seventy brethren, killed in the presence, and by the order, of Abimelech, Gideon's bastard son, Jud. ix. 5. The men [and soldiers] of Shechem having made this same Abimelech king, because he was their countryman, Jotham went up to the top of mount Gerizim, and from thence addressed them in the famous fable of the trees, who offered their kingdom, which the valuable trees declined, but at length they elected the bramble; out of which came fire, and consumed them. He then fled to Beer. We do not know what became of him after this, but his prediction against Shechem and Abimelech was soon accomplished. Judges ix. 5, &c.

II. JOTHAM, son and successor of Uzziah, otherwise Azariah, king of Judah. Uzziah having been smitten with a leprosy for attempting to offer incense, 2 Chron. xxvi. 16, 17. the government was committed to Jotham his son, A. M. 3221, ante A. D. 783. He governed twenty-five years. Then he assumed the title of king, and reigned alone sixteen years, to A. M. 3262, ante A. D. 742; so that he governed Judah forty-one years. He did right in the sight of the Lord, and imitated the piety of his father Uzziah: nevertheless he did not destroy the high places. He built the great gate of the temple, and other works on the walls of Jerusalem, in Ophel. He caused forts and castles to be erected on the mountains, and in the forests of Judah.

The Ammonites, who had been brought into subjection by Uzziah his father, having attempted to revolt, he defeated them, and imposed on them a tribute of a hundred talents of silver, and ten thousand measures of wheat, with as many of barley. Towards the end of his reign, the Lord sent Rezin king of Syria and Pekah king of Israel against him. It appears from Isaiah i. that Judah was in a very melancholy condition in the beginning of the reign of Abaz, son and successor of Jotham.

IOZACHAR, יוזכר, who remembers, or is male; from זכר zucar. 2 Kings xii. 21.

IPHEDEIAH, יפרה, the redemption of the Lord; from פדה phudah, to redeem, and יה jah, the Lord. 1 Chron. viii. 25.

IRA, עירא, 'Irac, city; from עיר hir: otherwise, watch; from עיר hur; otherwise spoil; from ערה harah; otherwise, effusion, or heap or vision: from עי hi, a heap, and ראה ruah, vision. 1 Chr. vii. 12.

[Most probably this term imports a crowd, mob, or conflux of people, whence it came to signify a city, in which the assemblage of people is most noticeable. I have, however, ventured to suggest the possibility that it may import a bridge; and certainly there is no part of a city where the conflux of people is so evident, as it is on a bridge which unites the divisions of a city. I would not press this conjecture too far; but it is open to remark, that a conflux of waters may as well be the import of this word, as a conflux of people. Comp. AROER.]

If the word be taken for risings, liftings up, this may express waves of water, as well as agitations of a multitude.]

[IR-MELACH, city of salt. Josh. xv. 62. It probably stood on the margin of the Salt Sea, or Lacus Asphaltites; or had salt pits.]

[IR-NAHASH, city of the serpent: some suppose, from abundance of serpents in its neighbourhood. Rather, from a person named Nahash, if not from an image of the animal, worshipped here. 1 Chron. iv. 12.]

IR-SHEMESAI,

[IR-SHEMESH, city of the Sun; or, from the Hebrew and Syriac, city of servants, or those who minister. A city in Dan, Josh. xix. 41. supposed to be the same as Beth-Shemesh, the temple of the Sun. 1 Kings iv. 9.]

[IR-TAMARIM, city of palm trees, i. e. Jericho. Deut. xxxiv. 3. Judges i. 16. 2 Chron. xxxviii. 15. Is this also the Tamar of Ezek. xlvii. 19. xlviii. 28. ?]

I. IRA, son of Jair, 2 Sam. xx. 26. Perhaps, II. IRA, son of Ikkesh, a gallant officer in David's army, 1 Chron. xi. 28.

IRAD, עיר, wild ass; from עיר hared: otherwise, heap of descents, or of empire; from עיר hi, a heap, and עיר rud, to rule, to command; or from עיר jarad, to descend. Son of Enoch, and grandson of Cain, Gen. iv. 18.

IRAM, עיר, 'Epaṁ, their city, their watch, &c. from עיר hir, a city, and עיר am, theirs. The last duke of Edom of Esau's family, Gen. xxxvi. 43.

IRI, עיר, 'Oupi, my watch, my city, my ass; from עיר hir: or, he that spoils. 1 Chr. vii. 7.

IRIJAH, יראיה 'Iapovias, the fear of the Lord; from ירא jara, to fear: otherwise, vision of the Lord; from ירא raah, to see: otherwise, projection of the Lord; from ירה jarah, to cast, and ירה jah, the Lord. He arrested the prophet Jeremiah as he was going to Anathoth, Jer. xxxvii. 13, &c.

IRIS, עיר, the rainbow; from עיר ir, one who watches. [Mr. Bryant says "what the Grecians called Iris seems to have been expressed Eiras by the Egyptians; and was a favourite name with that people. One of the female attendants on Cleopatra, i. e. who supported her when dying, was named Eiras, Rainbow."]

IRON, יראן, fear; ירא jara: or vision; from ירא raah: or he that rejects pain or force; from ירה jarah, to reject, and און aven, or on: according to different readings, force, or pain. A city of Naphtali, Josh. xix. 38.

IRON. Moses forbids using any stones to form the altar of the Lord, which had been in any manner wrought with iron; as if iron communicated pollution to them. He says the stones of Palestine are of iron, Deut. viii. 9. i. e. of hardness equal to iron, or, that being smelted, they yield iron. An iron yoke, 1 Kings viii. 51. a hard and insupportable dominion. "Iron sharpeneth iron," says the wise man, "So a man sharpeneth the countenance of his friend." The presence of a man, of a friend, gives us more confidence and assurance. God threatens his ungrateful and perfidious people with making the heaven, iron, and the earth brass, i. e. to make the earth barren, and the air to produce no rain. Chariots of iron, are chariots armed with iron, with spikes and scythes. See CHARIOTS. The false prophet Zedekiah made himself iron horns, to persuade Ahab that he would overcome Syria. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CXIV. Thy neck is an iron sinew, as hard and inflexible as iron. God said that he would make Jeremiah as stiff as a pillar of iron, Jer. i. 18.

IRPEEL, ירפאל, 'Ierophel, health, or physick of God; from רפא rapha, to comfort, to treat, and אל el, God. [Restored by God.] A city of Benjamin, Josh. xviii. 27.

IRU, עירואה, 'Hr ada, or 'Ips, 'Epalaa, a city. Some pretend, that this word should not be separated from Elah, which follows it; and that it ought to be read, Hir-velah, i. e. Hir and Elah. Son of Caleb, 1 Chr. iv. 15.

ISAAC, יצחק, שחק, or שחק, laughter; from שחק shahac, or שחק tzachac, to laugh.

ISAAC, son of Abraham and Sarah. Sarah gave him this name, because when the angel promised that she should become a mother though she was beyond the age of having children, she privately laughed at the prediction. And when the child was born, she said, "God hath made me to laugh, so that all that hear will laugh with me." She suckled him herself. She would not suffer Ishmael to inherit with him; but prevailed on Abraham to turn him and his mother Hagar out of doors. When Isaac was about twenty five years of age, the Lord tempted Abraham, and commanded him to sacrifice his son. Abraham therefore took Isaac, and two of his servants, to the place which the Lord should shew him. On the third day, discerning this place, (supposed to be mount Moriah) he took the wood as for a burnt-offering, placed it on his son Isaac, and took fire in his hand, and a knife. As they two only were going together toward the mount, Isaac said, "Behold the fire and the wood, but where is the victim for the burnt-offering?" Abraham answered, "My son, God will provide a victim for himself."

When come to the place appointed,—where afterwards the temple of Jerusalem was built (but the Samaritans think it was mount Gerizim, called likewise, according to them, Moreh or Morah; and it is certain that a Morah was in the neighbourhood of Shechem)—Abraham put the wood in order, bound Isaac as a victim, and taking the knife, stretched forth his hand, designing to kill his son. But an angel of the Lord called to him and said, "Lay not thine hand on the lad." He therefore unbound Isaac, and in his stead sacrificed a ram, which he found with his horns entangled in the thicket.

When Isaac was forty years of age, Abraham sent sent Eliezer his steward, into Mesopotamia, to procure a wife for him, from Laban his brother-in-law's family. Eliezer brought Rebekah to Isaac. Rebekah being barren, Isaac prayed for her, and God granted her the favour of conception. She was delivered of twins, Esau and Jacob. Isaac favoured Esau, and Rebekah favoured Jacob. Some years after, a famine obliged Isaac to retire to Gerar, where Abimelech was king: he reported that Rebekah was his sister; but Abimelech having observed, that Isaac behaved otherwise with Rebekah than he would have done with his sister, reproved him. Isaac grew very rich, and his flocks multiplying, the Philistines of Gerar were so envious, that they filled up all the wells which Isaac's servants dug. Abimelech himself desired him to depart: which he did, and pitched his tent in the valley of Gerar, where he dug new wells, but was put to some difficulties again. At length he returned to Beersheba, where he fixed his habitation.

The Lord appeared to him, and renewed the promise of blessing him. Abimelech king of Gerar came thither likewise, to make an alliance with him. Isaac when grown very old, (for he was an hundred and thirty seven years of age,) and his sight being extremely weakened, called Esau his eldest son, and directed him to hunt for him some venison. But while Esau was hunting, Jacob stole Isaac's blessing, so that Isaac could only give Esau a secondary blessing. See JACOB and ESAU.

Isaac lived a good while after this. He sent Jacob into Mesopotamia, to take a wife of his own family. Jacob returned after twenty years absence: Isaac was living, and continued so twenty-three years longer. He died aged an hundred fourscore and eight years, A. M. 2288, ante A. D. 1716; and was buried with Abraham, by his sons Esau and Jacob. The Hebrews say, that Isaac was instructed in the law by the patriarchs Shem and Eber, who were then living; and that when Abraham departed, with a design to sacrifice Isaac, he told Sarah, that he was carrying his son to Shem's school. They believe likewise, that Abraham composed their morning prayers, Isaac their noon-prayers, and Jacob their evening prayers.

ISAIAH, יְרֵמְיָהוּ, salvation of the Lord; from yah yashah, salvation, and yah, the Lord.

ISAIAH, son of Amos, was, it is said, of the royal family, if it be true that his father Amos was son to king Joash, and brother to Amaziah king of Judah. Jerom says, in Isaiah, lib. iii. cap. 20. ex Hebræis, that Isaiah gave his daughter in marriage to Manasseh king of Judah; which we cannot easily believe: because Manasseh did not begin to reign till sixty years after Isaiah's entering on the prophetic office. The beginning of Isaiah's prophecies we date from the death of Uzziah; and his death we place in the reign of Manasseh, who began to reign, A. M. 3306, ante A. D. 698. The Jews believe, that Amos, Isaiah's father, was a prophet, as well as his son; according to a rule, which they esteem certain, that when Scripture mentions the name of a prophet's father, this is a proof that his father was a prophet. But this rule is certainly fallible. Vide Amos II. for the different spelling of the name Amos; Amotz.

Isaiah's wife is called a prophetess, chap. viii. 3. the rabbins from thence conclude, that she had the spirit of prophecy. But it is very probable, that the prophets' wives were called prophetesses, as the priests' wives were called priestesses, only from the quality of their husbands. Vide AIMAH. The Scripture mentions two sons of Isaiah, one called "Shear-Jashub," the remainder shall return; the other "Hashbaz," hasten to the slaughter. The first shewed, that the captives carried to Babylon, should return from thence, after a certain time; the second name shewed, that the kingdoms of Israel and Syria should shortly be ravaged.

The prophecies of Isaiah may be divided into three parts. The first part includes six chapters, which relate to the reign of Jotham; the six following to the reign of Ahaz: and all the rest to the reign of Hezekiah. The great and principal objects of Isaiah's prophecies, are the captivity of Babylon, the return of the Jews from that captivity, and the reign of the Messiah. For this reason the sacred writers of the New Testament have cited Isaiah more than any other prophet; and the fathers say, he is rather an evangelist than a prophet. Aug. de Civit. lib. xviii. c. 29.

In the fourteenth year of Hezekiah, Sennacherib king of Assyria, coming against Judea, sent Rabshakeh his cup-bearer with a summons to Hezekiah. Rabshakeh in his harangue spoke in a very insolent and blasphemous manner. Hezekiah informed hereof by his officers, rent his clothes, went to the temple, and sent messengers to tell Isaiah: who answered, "Fear not the blasphemous words wherewith the king of Assyria's servants have dishonoured me: behold I will send a blast upon him, and he shall hear a ramour, and return to his own land, and I will cause him to fall by the sword in his own land." Accordingly, the Lord caused [18,500] 185,000 (Vide HEZEKIAH.) men of Sennacherib's army to perish by the hand of the destroying angel; and this prince was obliged to fly to Niniveh, where he was killed by his own sons. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. IV.

Niniveh,

About that time Hezekiah fell dangerously ill, and Isaiah coming to visit him, said, 'set thine house in order, for thou shalt die and not live.' Hezekiah prayed unto the Lord; and Isaiah was directed to return, and comfort him, and to promise him fifteen years addition of life, of which he gave him a sign in the returning shadow. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. II. He also directed a lump of figs to be laid on Hezekiah's boil, who was so perfectly cured, that in three days he was able to go to the temple.

Soon after this, Isaiah received orders from the Lord, to walk three years barefoot and naked, to denote the approaching captivity of Egypt, and Cush, or Ethiopia.

It is the constant tradition both of Jews and Christians, that Isaiah was put to death by a saw, in the beginning of the reign of Manasseh king of Judah. It is said, that the pretence of this impious prince for thus executing him, was an expression, chap. vi. 1. I saw the Lord sitting on a throne; which he affirmed to be a contradiction to Moses, Exod. xxxiii. 20. No man shall see me and live. Some say that his body was buried near Jerusalem, under the fuller's oak, near the fountain of Siloam; whence it was removed to Paneas near the sources of Jordan, and from thence to Constantinople, in the reign of Theodosius the younger. A. D. 442.

Isaiah prophesied a long time. They who date his first predictions in the twenty-fifth year of Uzziah, allow him to perform this function during fourscore and five years. But we are of opinion, that more than threescore years cannot be allowed, since he did not enter on the prophetic office till the beginning of Jotham's reign, A. M. 3246, and died in the first of Manasseh, A. M. 3306, ante A. D. 698.

Isaiah is esteemed to be the most eloquent of the prophets. Jerom says, that his writings are, as it were, an abridgment of the holy scriptures, a collection of the most uncommon knowledge, that the mind of man is capable of; of natural philosophy, morality and divinity; quid loquar de Physica, Ethica et Theologica? quicquid Sanctorum est Scripturarum; quicquid potest humana lingua proferre, et mortalium sensus accipere, isto volumine continetur. Grotius compares Isaiah to Demosthenes. In the prophet we meet with the purity of the Hebrew tongue, as in the orator, with all the delicacy of the Attic taste. Both are sublime and magnificent in their style, vehement in their emotions, copious in their figures, and very impetuous when they describe things of an enormous nature, or that are grievous and odious. Isaiah was superior to Demosthenes in the honour of illustrious birth, and the advantage of belonging to the royal family. What Quintillian. lib. x. cap. 20. says of Corvinus Messala may be applied to him, that he speaks in an easy flowing manner, and in a style which denotes the man of quality. Caspar Sanctius thinks Isaiah to be more florid, and more ornamented, yet at the same time more weighty and nervous, than any writer we have, whether historian, poet, or orator; and that in all kinds of discourse he excels every author, either Greek or Latin.

[Isaiah appears to justify this character even in our common version; but in the more elegant diction of Bishop Lowth, he still more eminently supports it.]

Besides the writings of Isaiah which are in our possession; this prophet wrote a book concerning the actions of Uzziah, which is cited 2 Chr. xxvi. 22. and is not now extant.

ISCAH, יסכּה, he that anoints; from יסך ja-sac: otherwise, that covers or protects; from סך sacac: or, according to the Syriac, that beholds.

ISCAH. Many are of opinion, that she is the same as Sarah, wife to Abraham. But there is some difficulty in this; for Sarah is never called Iscah, and Abraham does not call her niece, but sister. "She is indeed my sister, (says he,) the daughter of my father, but not the daughter of my mother." Gen. xx. 12. [i. e. by another venter.]

ISCARIOT, Ἰσκαριώτης, a native of the town of Iscarioth; or, of the tribe of Issachar. A man of murder; from איש ish, a man, and כרת carath, he that cuts off, or exterminates. Others maintain, that this surname given to Judas, signifies recompence, retribution; from שכר sha-car, to receive a recompence.

ISCARIOTH. Eusebius and Jerom speak of the village Iscarioth in Ephraim, where the traitor Judas is said to have been born. Others are of opinion, that he was of the tribe of Issachar, and that Iscariothes is put for Issachariothes; lastly, some suppose that he was of Carioth or Kerioth in Judah. Josh. xv. 25.

ISHBAI, ישה, tranquillity, or return; from שוב shub: otherwise, praise; from שבח shibach. Son of Ezra, of Judah. 1 Chr. iv. 17.

ISHBAK, ישבק, who is empty, or exhausted; from יש jesh, he is, and בך buc: otherwise, who is forsaken or abandoned; from בקק bacac, to exhaust. Fifth son of Abraham and Keturah. Gen. xxv. 2.

ISHBI-BENOB, ישיבי בנב, Ἰσσηὶ ἀπὸ Νωβ, he that sits in the prophecy, or in the word, or in the the production; from יֵשֶׁבָה jeshiba, to sit down, and the preposition בְּ beth, in, and נֹבָה niba, prophecy; or from נֹב nub, word, or production of force: otherwise, conversion, or blowing, or respiration in prophecy, &c. from the word שָׁב shub, conversion, or נָשָׁב nashab, respiration: or, captivity in prophecy; from שָׁבָה shabah, to chain. LXX. Jeshbi of the city of Nob.

ISHBI-BEN-OB, i. e. Ishbi the son of Ob, of the giants, or Rephaim. [Son of swelling: i. e. a mountain of a man.] The iron of his spear, or rather his spear, as the Hebrew implies, weighed 300 shekels, i. e. 150 ounces, or twelve pounds and a half. This giant being on the point of killing David, who was fatigued in the battle, was himself killed by Abishai son of Zeruiah. 2 Sam. xxi. 16. 17.

ISHBOSHETH, אִישְׁבֹּשֶׁת, the man of shame; from אִישׁ ish, a man, and בֹּשׁ bosh, shame: otherwise, the retarding of the man; from בֹּשַׁשׁ boshesh, delay. Ishbosheth is the same as Ishbaal, the man of Baal.

ISHBOSHETH, or ISHBAAL, son of Saul, and also his successor. Abner, Saul's kinsman, and general, so managed that Ishbosheth was acknowledged king by the greater part of Israel, while David reigned at Hebron over Judah. Ishbosheth resided at Mahanaim, beyond Jordan. He was forty-four years of age when he began to reign, and he reigned two years pretty peaceably; afterwards he had skirmishes, with loss, against David. 2 Sam. ii. 8, &c.

Saul had left a concubine named Rizpah, Abner was accused of having been too free with her; Ishbosheth said therefore to Abner; why hast thou come near my father's concubine? Abner provoked at this reproach, swore he would endeavour to transfer the crown from the house of Saul to David: but he was treacherously killed by Joab.

Ishbosheth informed of Abner's death, lost courage; and all Israel fell into great disorder: Ishbosheth almost at the same time was assassinated in his own house, by two captains of his troops, who entered his palace, while he was sleeping on his bed during the heat of the day; and cutting off his head, they brought it to David at Hebron, thinking to receive a considerable reward. But he commanded these two murderers to be killed, and their hands and feet to be cut off, and hung near the pool in Hebron: and the head of Ishbosheth he placed in Abner's sepulchre at Hebron. With him ended the royalty of Saul's family.

ISHI, יִשְׁעִי, my salvation; from יָשָׁה jashah, to save: otherwise, he that beholds; from יָצָה shahah. Son of Appaim, 1 Chron. ii. 31.

ISHMA, יִשְׁמָא, named; from שָׁם sham.

PART XVI. Edit. IV.

shem: otherwise, desolation, or admiration; from שָׁמָם shamam, or from יָשָׁם jasham, to make desolate. Son of Elam, 1 Chron. iv. 3.

ISHMAEL, יִשְׁמָעֵאל, God that hears; from שָׁמָה shamah, to hear, and אֵל el, God. [Heard by God.]

I. ISHMAEL, son of Abraham and Hagar. Sarah Abraham's wife, being barren, desired her husband to take her handmaid Hagar, that by her means she might have children. Gen. xvi. 1, 2, 3, &c. Hagar having conceived, began to despise her mistress Sarah, who using her harshly, she fled. The angel of the Lord appeared to Hagar in the wilderness, and bid her return, adding, thou shalt bring forth a son and call his name Ishmael, 'the Lord hath hearkened;' because the Lord hath heard thee in thy affliction. He shall be a fierce savage man, whose hand shall be against all men, and the hands of all men against him. Hagar returned therefore to Abraham's house, and had a son, whom she named Ishmael.

Fourteen years after this the Lord visited Sarah, and Isaac being born to Abraham, by his wife, Ishmael, who till then had been considered as Abraham's sole heir, saw his hopes disappointed. Isaac being about five or six years old, Ishmael teased him in a manner displeasing to Sarah; who said to Abraham, expell this servant, with her son Ishmael. Abraham thought this hard: but the Lord assenting, he sent away Hagar, who departing with Ishmael, wandered in the wilderness of Beersheba: her skin of water failing, she left him under a tree, and went to a distance. While here, a voice from heaven, said, "Fear not, Hagar, the Lord hath heard the child's voice. Rise, and take him up; for I will make him the father of a great people." The Angel having shewn her a well, she gave water to her son; and carried him farther into the wilderness of Paran, where they abode. He became expert in archery, and his mother married him to an Egyptian woman. He had twelve sons; viz. 1. Nabajoth; 2. Kedar; 3. Adbeel; 4. Mibsam; 5. Mishma; 6. Dumah; 7. Massa; 8. Hader or Hadad; 9. Tema; 10. Jetur; 11. Naphish; 12. Kedemah. He had likewise a daughter named Mahalath or Bashemath, Gen. xxxvi. 3. who married Esau, Gen. xxviii. 9.

From the twelve sons of Ishmael are derived the twelve tribes of the Arabians, still subsisting. Jerom says, Qu. Hebr. in Genes. that in his time they called the districts of Arabia, by the names of their several tribes: the Gentiles call the heads of the Arabian tribes Phylarchs, and the Arabians Scheich-el-kebir. See Thevenot, Part 1. lib. ii. cap. 32. The descendants of Ishmael inhabited from Havilah to Shur. Havilah lies towards the junction of the Tigris and Euphrates; and Shur towards the Isthmus of Suez. They are usually mentioned in history under the general name of Arabians and Ishmaelites. Since the seventh century, they have almost all embraced the religion of Mahomet. Ishmael died in the presence of all his brethren, Gen. xxv. 18. says the Vulgate; or according to another translation, his inheritance lay opposite to that of all his brethren. See Gen. xvi. 12. The year of his death is not known. See FRAGM. No. LXXXVIII. CCCCLXXXII.

The Mahometans insist, that Ishmael was the favourite son of Abraham, and he in whose behalf God made such promises to that patriarch: that Abraham intending to sacrifice Ishmael, the angel Gabriel, by God's order prevented him, and substituted a ram, which the father and son sacrificed to the Lord in the place where now stands the temple of Mecca. The Arabians of Abraham's time fastened the horns belonging to the ram which had been sacrificed by Abraham, to the gutter on the top of the temple, whence Mahomet removed them, to take away all occasion of idolatry. They say, that—

Ishmael after having lived some time at Jathrah, now Medina, retired to Yemen, where he settled and married. Besides the twelve sons of Ishmael mentioned in Genesis, the Arabians say he had another called Thor, or Thour, who gave name to mount Sinai, still called Thour, and Thour Sinai; as well as to a city on the Red Sea. [Vide Tor, in the MAP of SINAI.]

Arabia was peopled by old Arabians, before the sons of Ishmael settled there, and not till after long disputes with the Giorhamides the first possessors, they agreed about the temple of Mecca. The race of the old Arabians still subsists, but blended with the Ishmaelites. See ARABIANS.

These histories of the Mahometans are very disagreeable on account of their little regard for the rules of history, and their destroying the recitals of the old and new Testament, in order to substitute their own extravagancies and traditions; which have no foundation in antiquity, but are owing to the ignorance of their false prophet. This man having heard of the sacred histories of the Jews and Christians, has related them after his own way; his followers have added new fables, and new circumstances; and when any would call them back to the ancient and authentic scriptures, they treat them as spurious and corrupt.

II. ISHMAEL, son of Nathaniah, of the royal family of Judah, treacherously killed Gedaliah, whom Nebuchadnezzar had established over the remains of the people, in Judea, after the destruction of Jerusalem; but was obliged to fly to Baalis king of the Ammonites. Jerem. xli.

III. ISHMAEL I. high priest of the Jews, son of Phabi, or Phabaus, had a brother named likewise Ishmael, who also was high priest. The former Ishmael succeeded Ananus, and was appointed by Valerius Gratus governor of Judea, A. M. 4027, A. D. 24. He was deposed the year following, and Eleazar son of Ananus succeeded him.

IV. ISHMAEL II. brother to the former, succeeded Ananias son of Nebedæus, by the favour of king Agrippa. The deposed high priests joining with him, pretended to make themselves masters of the tythes and oblations, which were designed for the maintenance of the common priests. But these being supported by the principal of the people, rebelled against the high priests; and there was a kind of war between them in the temple. Ishmael was obliged to go to Rome with Chelcias, and ten of the chief inhabitants of Jerusalem, to desire of Nero permission to rebuild the wall which Festus governor of Judea had demolished, because it hindered the Roman troops from seeing the temple, and confined the view from Agrippa's palace. They procured what they desired by the credit of Poppæa. Ishmael returned no more to Jerusalem; and Agrippa deprived him of the high priesthood.

ISHMAIAH, ישמעיהו, Saqalas, he that hears the Lord, or that obeys the Lord; from שמע shamah, to hear or obey, and יה jah, the Lord. Son of Obadiah, chief of Zebulun. 1 Chr. xxvii. 19.

ISHMERAI, שמרי, guardian; from שמר shamar. Son of Elpaal, 1 Chr. viii. 18.

ISHPAN, ישפן, Vulgate, Jespham; a rabbit, or some other wild animal; from שפן shaphan: otherwise, hidden, or broken; from שף shuph. 1 Chr. viii. 22.

ISHTOB, איש טוב, good man; from איש ish, a man, and טוב tob, good. [Chief of Tob.]

ISHTOB, an inhabitant of Tob, or an honest man, or martyr of the country of the Tubienians. 2 Sam. x. 6. 8. This country was at the northern extremity of the mountains of Gilead, towards mount Libanus. Jephthah retired into the land of Tob, Judg. xi. 3, 5. called Tobie, 1 Macc. v. 13. See TOB.

ISHUAH. See JESHUAH. Asher's second son, Gen. xli. 17.

[ISLANDS, ISLES, א"י הים Gen. x. 5.]

Considerable errors in Sacred Geography have arisen from taking the word rendered islands, for a spot surrounded by water. It rather imports a settlement, or plantation: that is to say, a colony or establishment, as distinct from an open, unappropriated region. E. gr. It agrees infinitely better with the sense of this place to say, "By these were the settlements of the Gentiles divided in their lands," than to understand the isles of the Gentiles: because, the sacred writer had enumerated countries, which were not isles in any sense whatever. Job xxii. 30. "He (God) shall deliver the island of the innocent," read settlement, or establishment. Isaiah xlii. 15. "I will make the rivers islands," read settlements of human population. And Isaiah xlii. 21. "wild beasts of the islands," read vermin of the plantations. The same, xlii. 15. as contradistinguished from those of the desert.

In these places, and many others, the true idea is establishments, or colonies, understood to be at some interval from others of a like nature. I would add, that the Oases of Africa, west of Egypt, which are small districts of wells, verdure, and population, surrounded by immense deserts of sand, are called islands, in Arabic, to this day: and no doubt but such were so called by the Hebrews, notwithstanding they had no stream of water within many days' journey around them.]

ISMACHIAH, יִסַּחְיָהוּ, Σαμαχιας, who is joined and united to the Lord; or the Lord is my support; from סָמַח samac, to unite, to support, and יָה yah. Probably a priest, or Levite, in the time of Hezekiah. 2 Chr. xxxi. 13. One to whom that prince entrusted the care of the first-fruits and offerings brought to the temple.

ISMAIAH, of Benjamin, a valiant man, who joined David, 1 Chron. xii. 4.

ISPAH, יִשְׁפָּא, jasper; from יִשְׁפָּא jishphe, a precious stone: otherwise, shore, lip; from שֵׁפָה shaphah.

ISRAEL, יִשְׂרָאֵל, who prevails with God; or a prince of God; from שָׂרָה sharah, to govern, and אֵל el, God: otherwise, the man that sees God, according to many of the ancients; as if it had been written, אִשְׂרָאֵל, Ish-ra-el.

ISRAEL. This name the angel gave Jacob, after having wrestled with him at Mahanaim, or Penuel. Gen. xxxii. 1, 2, and 28, 29, 30. Hosea xii. 3. See JACOB.

By the name Israel is sometimes understood the person of Jacob; sometimes the people of Israel, the race of Jacob; sometimes the kingdom of Israel, or the ten tribes, distinct from the kingdom of Judah. See Kings of Israel.

ISRAELITES, descendants of Israel, called afterwards Jews, Judæi, particularly after their return from the captivity of Babylon; because the tribe of Judah was then most numerous, and foreigners had scarcely any knowledge of the other tribes.

ISSACHAR, יִשָּׁכָר, price, or recompence; from שָׂכָר shacar. [אִישׁ, the man of payment?]

ISSACHAR, fifth son of Jacob and Leah, conceived after Rachel's purchasing the mandrakes, which Reuben brought to his mother Leah. Gen. xxx. 14—18. Born about A. M. 2255, ante A. D. 1749. He had four sons; Tola, Phuvah, Job, and Shimron. Gen. xlii. 13. We know nothing particular of his life. Jacob blessing him, said, "Issachar is a strong ass couching down between two burdens. And he saw that rest was good, and the land that it was pleasant, and bowed his shoulder to bear, and became a servant unto tribute." The Chaldee translates it in a quite contrary sense, "He shall subdue provinces, and make those tributary to him, who shall remain in his land." The tribe of Issachar had its portion among the best parts of the land of Canaan, along the great plain, or valley of Jezreel, with the half tribe of Manasseh to the south, Zebulon to the north, the Mediterranean sea west, and Jordan, with the south point of the sea of Tiberias, east.

ITALY, Ἰταλία. A Latin word, from Vitulus or Vitula, because this country abounded in calves and heifers. According to others, from a king called Italus. We do not know the true and ancient name of Italy in the holy language. Sometimes Jerom has rendered כֶּתִּים chethim, "Italy." See CHITTIM. Numb. xxiv. 24. Ezek. xxvii. 6. But we have shewn on Gen. x. 4. that Cethim means Macedonia. In Isaiah lxvi. 19. Jerom translates תּוּבָל thubal, Italia, though according to others the Tibareniens are signified by it. In the sacred books written in Greek, there is no ambiguity in the word Italiu; it signifies that country whereof Rome is the capital.

[ITALIAN BAND, Ἰταλικῆς. Acts x. 1.

It may be doubted whether this band were properly named from Italy; or whether it were not more probably named from Italica, a city in Spain.

I do not know sufficient evidence of the existence of a band, or cohort, named from Italy. That there was in later ages an Italian Legion, does not prove any thing in this inquiry: neither is it certain that this Italian band received the name of Italian, because it had been levied in Italy, and its soldiers were mostly Italians. Cohorts were named rather after towns, than after extensive countries, and I believe no instance can be produced of a cohort named after a whole dominion, as Italy.

Italica was a city in Spain, on the river Betis; it was built by Scipio, A. U. C. 654, at the beginning of a peace with the Carthaginians. Appian, de Bello Hisp. informs us that Scipio
2 A 2 div. 2. collected collected his wounded soldiers into one city, which, from Italy, he named Italica. It was a municipium, as appears from the oration of Hadrian to the Senate. The Italicans erected several temples to Augustus, from whom, probably, they received authority for coining money. The medals of this city have legionary standards for their type. Silius Italicus the famous poet was born here; hence his name Italicus. As it was peopled by legionary soldiers, their sons would no doubt be sufficient to form a cohort, and ready to do so; especially as Augustus frequently sent additional settlers to this city. If this conjecture be founded, it accounts for the early introduction of Christianity into Spain.]

ITHAMAR, אִיתָמָר, island of the palm-tree, or of palms; from תָּמָר thamar, a palm-tree, and אֵי i, an island; see ISLAND; or change of the isle; from מִוֶּר מור, a change: otherwise, woe to the palm, or to the change; from אֵי oi, woe, &c.

ITHAMAR, Aaron's fourth son. We know nothing particularly of his life, and probably he never exercised the high priesthood. He and his sons continued as simple priests, till the high priesthood came into his family in the person of Eli.

The successors of Eli, of the family of Ithamar, were Ahitub, Ahiah, Ahimelech, and Abiathar, whom Solomon deposed. See 1 Kings ii. 27.

ITHIEL, אִיתִיאל, ὸθιῆλ, God with me; from אֵת eth, with, and אֵל el, God: otherwise, sign, coming of God; from אֵת eth, a sign, אֵל al, coming, and אֵל el, God. Son of Isaiah, of Benjamin, Neh. xi. 7.

ITHLAH, תִּלְחָה, Ἰθλᾶ, which is fastened, or suspended; from תִּלְחָה thalah: or which is gathered; from תָּלַל thalal. A city, Josh. xix. 42.

ITHIMAIL, תִּמְאִי, Ἰθμαί, orphan, or pupil; from יָתָם jatham: otherwise, admiration, or perfection; from תָּמָה thamah, to admire, or תָּמָם thamam, perfection. A gallant officer of David's army, 1 Chron. xi. 46.

ITHNAN, יִתְנָן, Ἰθναν, Vulgate, Jethnam; reward, salary; from נָתַן nathan, or nathan. A city of Judah, Josh. xv. 23.

ITHOBAL, king of Tyre. We do not meet with this name in the Old Testament. We read of Ethbaal, father to Jezebel. Josephus calls him Ithobal. Antiq. lib. ix. cap. 6. compare 1 Kings xvi. 31. He says in another place, that one Ithobal priest of Astarte, having killed Phelletes king of Tyre, reigned thirty-two years.

We are of opinion, that the invectives and menaces of the prophet Ezekiel are directed to this prince. The old Phœnician historians call the king of Tyre Ithobal, in whose reign Nebuchadnezzar besieged that city. Ezek. xxviii.

Philostrat. apud Joseph. Antiq. lib. x. cap. 2, & contra Appion. lib. i.

We believe, likewise, that the words of Habakkuk, chap. ii. 12, regard the same prince, — Woe to him who buildeth a town with blood, &c.

ITHREAM, יִתְרֵא, Vulgate, Jethraam, excellence of the people; from יָתָר jathar, and עַם ham, the people. Son of David and Eglah. 1 Chron. iii. 3. See EGLAH.

ITHRAN, יִתְרָן, 1 Chr. vii. 37. See JETHER.

ITHRITE, יִתְרִי, 1 Chr. ii. 53. See JETHER.

ITTAH-KAZIN, יִתְחֶקֶץ, Ἰτθῆ, Vulgate, Thacasin, the hour or time of the prince; from יָתָר heth, time; otherwise, the prince of the present time; from יָתָר hathath, now, and קָצָן catsin, a prince. A town of Zebulun. Joshua xix. 13.

ITTAI, יִתָּי, Ἰθῆ, sign; from אֵת oth: otherwise, mattock: otherwise, who comes; according to the Syriac. Also strong: from אֵת eth. Son of Ribai, surnamed the Gittite, native of Gibeath. 1 Chr. xi. 31. 2 Sam. xv. 19, 20. &c.

ITUREA, Ἰτρυαία, which is guarded; from יָתָר thur, to keep: otherwise, a country of mountains, according to the Syriac.

ITUREA, a province of Syria or Arabia, beyond Jordan, east of the Batanea, and south of Trachonitis. St. Luke, iii. 1. speaks of Iturea and 1 Chron. v. 19. of the Itureans, or of Jethur according to the Hebrew. Jethur was one of the sons of Ishmael; who gave name to Iturea, says Jerom. Gen. xxv. 15. and 1 Chr. i. 31. Iturea is included in Arabia Petræa.

Aristobulus, king or prince of the Jews, and son of Hircanus, early in his reign made war with the Itureans; subdued the greater part of them, and obliged them to embrace Judaism, as Hircanus his father had some years before obliged the Idumæans; he gave them their choice, either to be circumcised, and embrace the Jewish religion, or to leave the country, and seek a settlement elsewhere. They chose to stay. They therefore, though descended from Ishmael, had not continued circumcision; [rather, had practiced it in a mode different from that of the Jews: comp. Jer. ix. 5, 6.] or, perhaps, Aristobulus might compel them to receive it on the eighth day, whereas before they delayed it till the age of twelve, or thirteen. Philip, one of Herod's sons was tetrarch, or prince of Iturea, when John the Baptist entered on his ministry. Luke iii. 1.

[The tetrarchy of Philip was part of the tribes of Dan and Gad: it lay towards Arabia; it was made a tetrarchy by Tiberius: by whom, says Josephus, the Batanea, Trachonitis, and Paronitis, were assigned to Philip. De Bell. lib. ii. 9. The Itureans were famous for their skill in archery.

archery. Hence Virgil mentions Ituræi arcus, the Iturean bow. Georg. ii. 448. And Lucan lib. vii. 280, 514. Ituræis cursus fuit inde sagittis. Vide Cic. Orat. Phil. ii. 13. 8. Vopiscus, in Vit. Aurel. cap. ii. 11.

Simon supposes that Ietur, from whom are named the people, 1 Chron. v. 19. and Iturea, Luke iii. 1. were so called as signifying a pillar or column, i. e. erect, tall: as the name Columella among the Romans.]

IVAH, יוֹבֵה, 2 Kings xviii. 34. It seems to be the same as Ava, though differently written.

JUBAL, יוֹבָל, he that runs: otherwise, he that produces: or the Jubilee, or the trumpet of the Jubilee. [a flowing stream.]

JUBAL, son of Lamech and Adah, invented instruments of music. Gen. iv. 21.

JUBILEE, in Hebrew, Jobel. The Jubilee year was the fiftieth year which occurred after seven weeks of years, or seven times seven years: "And ye shall hallow the fiftieth year; and it shall be a Jubilee unto you." Lev. xxv. 10. Notwithstanding the clearness of this text, several commentators maintain that the Jubilee was celebrated in the forty-ninth year, the last year of the seventh week of years. Moses favours this opinion, Lev. xxv. 8. "Thou shalt number seven sabbaths of years, seven times seven years, and the space of the seven sabbaths of years shall be unto thee forty and nine years." They who maintain this, shew the inconvenience of celebrating the Jubilee in the fiftieth year, after the sabbatical rest of the forty-ninth year. These two years of rest following one the other might be attended with dangerous consequences in any country, and produce a famine.

Jobel signifies, according to some rabbins, a ram's horn, with which the Jubilee year was proclaimed. But how could a ram's horn, which is solid and not hollow, be used as a trumpet? It was therefore in all probability a brazen trumpet in the form of a ram's horn. Others derive Jobel, from Jubal, which formerly signified, they say, to play on instruments. We are of opinion, that it comes from the verb Hobil, to bring or call back; because then every thing was restored to its first possessor.

The Jubilee year began on the first day of Tizri (the first month of the civil year, September, O. S.) and about the autumnal equinox. In this year no one either sowed or reaped; but all were satisfied with what the earth and the trees produced of themselves. Each resumed possession of his inheritance, whether it were sold, mortgaged, or alienated; Hebrew slaves were set free, with their wives and children; even they who had renounced the privilege which the sabbatical year gave them of recovering their liberty. Even all foreign slaves enjoyed the right of the jubilee. For particulars, see Lev. xxv.

To reconcile the two opinions, whether the jubilee was celebrated in the fiftieth year, (as Moses requires, Lev. xxv. 10; and as Philo, Josephus, Eusebius, St. Jeron, St. Austin, St. Gregory the Great, St. Isidore, all the Jews, both Talmudists and Caraites, and a great number of commentators understand it) or in the forty ninth year as Moses mentions pretty clearly in Lev. xxv. 8. and as several good commentators and chronologists explain it. To reconcile these two opinions, it may be said, I think, that the fiftieth year is set down for the forty ninth, for the sake only of making a round number; as we say every day, that there are thirty days to a month, though rigorously speaking there are sometimes twenty-eight, twenty-nine, or thirty one days in a month. Besides, if the Jubilee year began after the forty-ninth year, at the beginning of the fiftieth, it might be called indifferently the forty-ninth or fiftieth year.

[If the civil year began at a different time from the ecclesiastical year, will that solve this difficulty?—i. e. the fiftieth year, by one account, might begin before the forty-ninth year, by the other account was fully completed.]

The greatest difficulty consists, in knowing whether in both these years the sabbath was observed, and the earth remained untilled, or only in the forty-ninth year. One would think there should be too many inconveniences in observing the sabbatical rest two years together; the intention of the legislator was complied with by the rest of one year only. The seventh of the sabbatical years had only more privileges annexed to it, and was more celebrated than the two preceding. By this expedient every thing is reconciled.

I shall lay before you some particulars relating to the Jubilee year. The first nine days were spent in festivity, almost like the Romans in their Saturnalia. During these nine days the slaves did not work, but ate, drank, and were merry, and every one put a crown on his head. No sooner was the day of solemn expiation come, (the tenth of Tizri;) but the counsellors of the Sanhedrim ordered the trumpets to sound, and instantly the slaves were declared free, and the lands returned to their hereditary owners. Maimonid. Halac Schemitta Vejobel.

This law was designed to hinder the rich from oppressing the poor, and reducing them to perpetual slavery, and to prevent their getting possession of all the lands by purchase, mortgage, or usurpation; that debts should not be multiplied too much; and that slaves should not continue tinue always, with their wives and children, in bondage. Besides, Moses intended to preserve, as much as possible, the liberty of persons, a proportion of fortunes, and the order of families. Also, that the people should be bound to their country, their lands, and inheritance; that they should cherish an affection for them, as estates descended from their ancestors, and designed for their posterity.

Something like this Lycurgus established among the Lacedæmonians, by instituting an equality of fortunes; banishing slavery, and preventing, as far as he could, any one's becoming too powerful and too rich. For this reason he appointed the ostracism; which consisted in banishing those citizens, whose too great riches or power gave umbrage. Stolo was desirous of checking the greediness and avarice of the old Romans, by a law, which forbade individuals from having more than five hundred acres of land; but fraud soon crept in, and destroyed this wise constitution. Stolo himself was the first who violated his own law, and was condemned for possessing a thousand acres, jointly with his son, whom he had emancipated expressly for the purpose.

There were several privileges, says Maimonides, belonging to the Jubilee year, which did not belong to the sabbatical year; and the sabbatical had likewise some small advantages above the Jubilee year: the sabbatical year annulled debts, which the Jubilee did not, but the Jubilee restored slaves to their liberty, and lands to their owners; besides, it made restitution of the lands immediately on the beginning of the Jubilee, whereas in the sabbatical year debts were not discharged till the end of the year. Estates which had been purchased, or given, returned to their former proprietors; those which came by succession continued with those who enjoyed them: contracts of sale, wherein a certain number of years was expressed, subsisted during all those years, notwithstanding the Jubilee. But absolute and unlimited contracts were voided by the Jubilee. Houses and other edifices built in walled towns did not return to the proprietor in the Jubilee year. Selden, de succession. in bona, lib. iii. 24.

After the captivity of Babylon the Jews continued to observe the sabbatical, but not the Jubilee year. Alexander the Great granted the Jews an exemption from tribute every seventh year, by reason of the rest which they then observed. But, as the Jubilee was instituted only to prevent the utter destruction of the partition made by Joshua, and the confusion of tribes and families, it was no longer practicable, as before the dispersion of the tribes; those which returned from the captivity settling as they could, and where they could, while a great number of families, and perhaps whole tribes, continued in the place of their captivity. Maimonides, Halacha Schemitta Vejobel. Cunæus, de Rep. Heb. lib. i. cap. 6. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xi. cap. ult.

The third Jubilee, A. M. 2707, ante A. D. 1297, and so on. See the Chronological Tables, and reckon, as, if you please, you may, forty-nine years from Jubilee to Jubilee.

JUDAH, יְהוּדָה 'Isdā, the praise of the Lord; from יָדָה jadah, to praise, and יָה jah, the Lord.

JUDAS, 'Iḏac, Greek, from Heb. JUDAH.

1. JUDAH, or JEHUDA, the fourth son of Jacob and Leah, born in Mesopotamia, A. M. 2249, ante A. D. 1755. He advised his brethren to sell Joseph to the Ishmaelite merchants, rather than to imbrue their hands in his blood. He married Shuah, daughter of a Canaanite, named Hirah, and had three sons by her, Er, Onan, and Shelah. Gen. xxxvii. 26. He married Er to a young woman, named Tamar: but Er died prematurely. Judah required Onan his second son to marry his brother's widow, and to raise up seed to him: but Onan eluded the purpose of his father, and the law: he also was punished with death. Judah being afraid to give Shelah his third son to Tamar, amused her with promises, without performing them. Wherefore Tamar disguised herself, and sat in a way by which Judah was to pass: he yielded to the incitement, and she had two sons by him, Pharez and Zarah. Gen. xxxviii. 27, 28, 29.

Judah was always looked on as the chief of Jacob's children. His tribe was the most powerful and numerous. Certain privileges of the first-born seem to have been transferred to Judah after the punishment of Reuben. The blessing given by Jacob on his death-bed to Judah is as follows, "Judah, thou art he whom thy brethren shall praise, thy hand shall be on the neck of thine enemies, thy father's children shall bow down before thee. Judah is a lion's whelp, from the prey, my son, thou art gone up: he stooped down, he couched as a lion, and as an old lion, who shall rouse him up? The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a law-giver from between his feet, until Shiloh come, and unto him shall the gathering of the people be." This includes a promise that the regal power should not go out of his family; and that the Messiah should derive his birth from it. See FRAGMENT, No. CCCXXIV.

The

The southern part of Palestine fell to Judah's lot; and the tribes of Simeon and Dan possessed many cities, which at first were given to Judah. This tribe at the Exodus, was composed of 74,600 men, capable of bearing arms. The crown passed from Benjamin, (from Saul and Ishbosheth) into Judah, which was David's tribe, and so continued, till the Babylonish captivity. And after the return from that captivity, although this tribe did not reign, it gave the sceptre to those who did reign; and in some sort united in itself the whole Hebrew nation, who from that time were known only as Judæi, Jews, descendants of Judah.

JUDAH, when named in opposition to Israel, or the kingdom of the ten tribes, or Samaria, denotes that of Judah, and of David's descendants. One of the principal prerogatives of this tribe was, that it preserved the true religion, and the public exercise of the priesthood, with the legal ceremonies in the temple at Jerusalem; while the ten tribes gave themselves up to idolatry, and the worship of the golden calves. Kings of Judah. See KINGS.

II. JUDAS MACCABÆUS, son of Mattathias, succeeded his father as captain of the people, during the persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes. He had before given marks of his valour, conduct, and zeal for God's law, by opposing those who forsook the Lord, and sacrificed to Idols. One of the first expeditious of Judas Maccabeus was against Apollonius general of the Syrian troops, in Palestine. Judas killed him, and destroyed his army; he took Apollonius's sword, and generally used it, during the remainder of his life.

Antiochus, surprised at the valour of Judas, sent three generals against him, Nicanor, Gorgias, and Ptolemy. Judas attacked Nicanor separately, and routed his army. Gorgias coming afterwards, and seeing Nicanor's camp on fire, retreated in haste, without engaging. The year following, Lysias, regent of the kingdom, came into Judea with 60,000 foot, and 5000 horse. Judas met them at Bethoron, and defeated them.

Judas being thus master of the field, went up to Jerusalem, where he found the holy places deserted, the altar profaned, the courts filled with briars, and the chambers adjoining the temple destroyed. Judas employed part of his people in cleansing the holy places. They laid by the stones of the old altar, which had been profaned, built a new one of rough stones, rebuilt the holy place, and the sanctuary, made new sacred vessels, and on the 25th of Casleu, in the year 148 of the Greeks, A. M. 3840, ante A. D. 164, they offered the morning sacrifice on the altar of burnt offerings, and restored the public worship in the temple, which had been interrupted three years. They dedicated the temple anew with all the pomp they could, according to the present state of their affairs, and celebrated this feast for eight days. 1 Mac. iv. 53. The memorial of this dedication is referred to where it is said, that Jesus came to the temple of Jerusalem, at the dedication, in the winter. John x. 22.

In a little time after, and probably the same year, Judas defeated two Syrian generals. Timotheus and Bacehides. Bethsura likewise was fortified by his order, that being a sort of barrier, which covered Jerusalem on the side of Idumea. Judas attacked the Idumeans, the inhabitants of the Acrabatene, the sons of Bean, the Ammonites, and Timotheus; and dispersed all his enemies.

Judas afterwards made war with the Idumeans, took Hebron, entered the country of the Philistines, took Azotus, overran Samaria, and returned, loaded with booty, to Judah.

Lysias came a second time into Judea at the head of a powerful army, but was forced to save himself with dishonour, and to make peace with Judas. Eupator, who succeeded Antiochus Epiphanes, permitted the Jews to live according to their own laws, and to perform all their sacred offices in the temple at Jerusalem.

Lysias returned to Antioch. But Timotheus, Apollonius, Hieronymus, Demophon, and Nicator, who stayed in the country, sought opportunities of interrupting the peace. The inhabitants of Joppa having invited the Jews of their city, to come aboard their vessels, as if to divert themselves upon the sea, drowned all of them, with their wives and children. Judas, to avenge this perfidy, burnt their ships and their harbour; he had done the same to their city, if he had not received news that the people of Jamnia designed likewise to extirpate the Jews of their city. Judas prevented them, burnt their harbours and their vessels. From thence he went beyond Jordan, attacked Caspis or Ecebon, took it, sacked it, and advanced as far as Characa in the land of the Tubienians; but not finding Timotheus there, whom he was in pursuit of, he met him soon after at the head of 120,000 foot, and 2,500 horse. Although Judas had but 6000 soldiers, he dispersed this army, and killed 30,000 men.

After Pentecost he marched against Gorgias, who being attacked, escaped with great difficulty. Judas gathered his people together at Odollam, to celebrate the sabbath; and the day after the battle when they came to bury the Jews who had been killed, they found under the clothes of the dead, some things which had been consecrated to idols in Jamnia. All imputed their death to their appropriating what was so impure and profane. Judas made a gathering of twelve thousand drachms of silver, which he sent to Jerusalem, that sacrifices might be offered for the sins of the dead.

Antiochus Eupator came himself into Judea, attended by Lysias, with an army of 100,000 foot, 20,000 horse, and thirty-two elephants. He besieged Bethsura, and the small number of troops which Judas had with him, being unable to make head against the king's forces, retired to Jerusalem. Eupator followed them, and besieged the city, particularly the temple, which Judas had fortified and retreated into. The siege being tedious, and Lysias fearing lest Philip, who had been declared regent of the kingdom by Antiochus Epiphanes, might make himself master of Antioch, he concluded a peace with Judas, and returned into Syria.

Demetrius, son of Seleucus, Eupator's uncle, and lawful heir to the kingdom of Syria, having put to death Eupator and Lysias, and procured himself to be acknowledged king of Syria, gave the high priesthood of the Jews to Alcimus, and sent Bacchides with him into Judea to establish him. But Alcimus became oppressive; and Judas punished some of his partizans with death; on which Alcimus fled to Antioch.

Demetrius sent Nicanor with troops into Judea, who offered to Judas proposals of peace, which Judas laid before the people and senators, and all were of opinion to accept them. Nicanor continued afterwards at Jerusalem in the citadel, and Judas in the city. Nicanor conceived great esteem for Judas, and they lived together with familiarity.

But Alcimus observing the good understanding between them, told Demetrius that Nicanor betrayed his interests. The king exasperated by these calumnies, wrote to Nicanor, that he took very ill his friendship with Judas, and commanded him to send him instantly in chains to Antioch. Nicanor sought an opportunity for this purpose, but Judas perceiving him to be grown cold, distrusted him; and gathering troops, stole privately from Nicanor, who attacked him at Caphar-Salama: but was repulsed, and obliged to retreat to Jerusalem. He threatened to destroy the temple, if Judas was not put into his hands; and departing to Bethoron, where the Syrian army joined him, Judas attacked him with so much impetuosity, that he routed his troops, and Nicanor himself, was among the first who fell. Nicanor's head and right hand were hung up over against Jerusalem, and a feast was instituted on the 13th of Adar, in memory of this victory.

Demetrius being informed that Nicanor was killed, and his army defeated, sent again Bacchides and Alcimus into Judea, with the right wing of his troops. They came first to Jerusalem, from thence to Berea or Beroth, a city of Benjamin. Judas was at Laish, or Bethel, with three thousand chosen men. His people were terrified at so great an army, and many fled; so that not above eight hundred remained with him. Judas, finding himself forsaken, was discouraged, and said, "Let us go, and, if we can, engage the enemy!" His people remonstrated that he should wait for reinforcements. He said, "God forbid we should do so. If our hour is come, let us die courageously." After a long and obstinate fight, Judas himself fell, and the rest fled. Jonathan and Simon carried off their brother's body, and laid it in their sepulchre at Modin. All Israel made great lamentations at his death. Joseph Ben Gorion says, that Judas had children, but that they died young. Scripture says nothing of them; and Judas dying the same year he was married, it is very credible that he left no issue. This great man was one of the figures of the Messiah, the true saviour of Israel; and in our opinion, the prediction of Isaiah prophetically referred to him, as a figure of Jesus Christ, chap. lxi. Who is he that cometh from Edom, with dyed garments from Bozrah, &c.

III. JUDAS. This name is given to the fourth of the seven Maccabees, who suffered martyrdom under Antiochus Epiphanes. But is not in any authentic writer.

IV. JUDAS ISCARIOT, being chosen by Jesus Christ into the number of his apostles, and appointed their treasurer, was so wicked as to betray his Lord into the hands of his enemies. Mary, Lazarus's sister, having poured a precious perfume on our Saviour's feet, Judas was one who murmured most at it. Not long afterwards, he went to the priests, undertaking to deliver his master to them. They promised him thirty shekels, [about 3l. 8s: or 4l. 10s. if, with Dr. Prideaux, we value a shekel at three shillings.] Before the last supper was ended, he left the room, and went to inform the priests, that he would that night execute his purpose; because he knew the place whither Jesus designed to retire. This he performed; and distinguished the person to be seized by kissing him. See FRIEND.

Several questions are proposed relating to Judas; 1. Why he was named Iscaariot? Eusebius and Jerom think he was of Ephraim, and native of the town of Iscaariot in that tribe. Others, that he was of Issachar; whence was formed the word Issachariothes. Others derive this this name from the town of Carioth in Judah, Josh. xv. 25. Isch-Carioth signifies in Hebrew, the man of Carioth.

2. Whether he partook of the Eucharist in the last supper? Several of the ancients, as the author of the Apostolic Constitutions, St. Hilary, Innocent III. Victor of Antioch, Abbot Rupert, Theophylact, and some others, are of opinion, that he was not present at the Eucharist, but that as soon as Jesus Christ had signified him as the person who should betray him, he went away. But the generality of ancients and moderns think he was present at the Eucharist; which is confirmed by St. Luke, who having related our Saviour's words at the institution of this sacrament, says, that Jesus added, "The hand of him that betrayeth me is with me on the table." Some have thought that the piece of bread dipped in sauce, and given by Jesus to Judas was the Eucharist; others, that by such dipping the piece of bread was unconsecrated. Luke xxii. 21.

[The notion that Judas partook of the Eucharist, is certainly not recommended by considerations of propriety, or convenience. That the feet of Judas were washed by our Lord, is clear; and equally clear that our Lord marks him as an exception, by saying "ye are clean; but not all." This action was in the introductory part of the supper. Subsequently, our Lord observes, "I speak not of you all;—but, he that eateth bread with me, hath lift up his heel against me." The traitor was still more distinctly pointed at, when, as they reclined during the supper, the hand of Judas happened to be placed on the table, at the same time as our Lord's hand was so placed: and, to John he was personally marked by the sop given to him, which sop was dipped in the sauce composed of bitter herbs, &c. that accompanied the Paschal lamb; a moment after, he was discovered to all the company, by the answer to his question, "Lord, is it I?" This was so instant on his receiving the sop, that the Evangelist John observes, "Jesus said to him, what you do, do directly;"—and, "he having received the sop, went immediately out." It is therefore evident, that Judas went out during the Paschal Supper, but the Eucharist was not instituted, till after the Paschal Supper had been concluded; and the last action of that supper was what gave opportunity to the institution of the new rite. To suppose that Jesus would give to Judas the sacramental cup in token of his blood "shed for the remission of sins"—of sins which Judas had traitorously committed, or which he designed traitorously to commit, is to trifle with this most solemn of subjects; and indeed, is a contradiction to the Evangelist, who says, "when he (Judas) was gone out, Jesus said, "Now is the son of man glorified," &c. He then gave warning to Peter of his frailty; and to all his disciples of their instability, &c.]

4. How he came to bring back the money to the priests which he had received from them? Some think, this did not happen till after the death of Jesus Christ; others, that it was before he was condemned by Pilate, and when the priests and scribes insisted with the governor, that he should be crucified; others suppose that he did not carry back this money till he had heard of the sentence of death against his master. Hereupon he threw the money into the temple, went away, and hanged himself. Some of the fathers seem to speak favourably of Judas's repentance; others think it absolutely defective and unprofitable, since he despaired of mercy. Origen, and Theophylact, writing on Matthew say, that Judas, seeing his master was condemned, and that he could not obtain pardon from him in this life, made haste to get the start of him, and wait for him in the other world, in order to beg mercy of him there.

5. There are difficulties concerning the manner wherein Judas died. Matthew says simply he hanged himself. Luke in the Acts i. 18. says farther, that "falling headlong, he burst asunder in the midst, and all his bowels gushed out." Theophylact affirms, that having first hanged himself, as Matthew relates, the weight of his body made the tree bend on which he hung, and that being assisted, he lived some time; but that falling into a dropsy, he burst and died. Euthymius says, that just as Judas had hanged himself, some person took him down, and he lived awhile; but that he fell afterwards from some high place, burst in the fall, and his bowels dropped out. Papias, who is cited in Cecumenius on the Acts, said, that the halter by which he was fastened to the tree breaking, he lived some time, and at last burst in the middle. Others think, that being thrown into a common sewer after his death, he burst there; as is usual with carcases which are abandoned in that manner; and all his bowels fell out. Several of the moderns are of opinion, that the Greek of Matthew may signify only, that Judas was suffocated with grief, despair, or even a quinsy, and that in the extremity of his disease he fell upon his face, burst, and expired; or that, being tormented with despair, he threw himself headlong and burst. See ACELDAMA.

The ancient fathers notice a spurious gospel, under the name of the Gospel of Judas, composed by the Cainites to countenance their extravagant opinions. See CAINITES. [These strangely credulous persons who venerated and worshipped Judas, were certainly among the many Antichrists alluded to by the Evangelist John: if their vile notions were propagated so early. See SIMON MAGUS; also, FRAG. CCXCII.

It should, however, be remembered, that this base action of Judas has passed into a proverb, expressive of detestation for ingratitude and treason. Arringhian, Roma Subterranea, p. 436, mentions a funeral inscription dug up in the Via Nomentana, from which it appears that the Fate of Judas became a proverbial form of cursing. And the path in the garden of Gethsemane by which Judas advanced to betray his master, is blocked up to execration, by the Turks themselves, as a kind of terra damnata.]

V. JUDAS, or JUDE, surnamed Barsabas, was sent from Jerusalem, with Paul and Barnabas, to the church at Antioch, to report the resolution of the council of Jerusalem, concerning the non-observance of the law by the Gentiles. Acts xv. 22, 23. A. D. 54. Some are of opinion, that this Jude was the brother of Joseph, surnamed also Barsabas, who was proposed, together with Matthias, to fill up the place of the traitor Judas. Acts i. 23. St. Luke tells us, that Judas Barsabas was a prophet, and one of the chief among the brethren. It is believed that he was one of the seventy disciples. After he had been some time at Antioch, exhorting the brethren, he returned to Jerusalem.

VI. JUDAS or JUDE, surnamed Thaddæus or Lebbæus, also the Zealot, is likewise called the Lord's brother, Matt. xiii. 55. because he was, as is believed, son of Mary, sister to the Blessed Virgin, and brother to James the Less, bishop of Jerusalem. He was married and had children; for Hegesippus speaks of two martyrs, who were his grandsons. Nicephorus says, his wife's name was Mary. In the last supper, he asked Jesus, "how he could manifest himself to his apostles, and not to the world?" St. Paulinus, carm. 26, tells us, that he preached in Lybia, and seems to say, that his body remained there. Jerom, on Matthew, x. 4. says, that after the ascension he was sent to Edessa, to king Abgarus. The modern Greeks affirm likewise, that he preached in the city of Edessa, and throughout Mesopotamia. Some insist, that he preached likewise in Judea, Samaria, Idumea, Syria, and principally in Armenia, and Persia. But we know no particulars of his life with certainty.

[The Syrian writers, as we learn from Asseman, speak of Jude in these terms: "Jude, the son of James, was one of the twelve, and is also called Lebbæus and Thaddæus. Jude, the son of James, preached the Gospel in Antarus and

Laodicea. Then he went to Thadmor [Palmyra] and Raca, and Circesium, and Teman, and certain other parts of the East." Epitome of the Syrian Canons. Ebedjesu says, "During the time that Thaddæus . . . spread the evangelical doctrine in Mesopotamia, Chaldea, and other parts of the East;" . . . "Bartholomew and Matthew and Thaddæus went into Parthia, and into Persia." Mar Salomon Sobensis says, "Addeus [Thaddæus?] returned to Edessa; he died in the twelfth year of his preaching. But, see THADDEUS I. and II.]

We have a Canonical Epistle written by Jude, addressed to all the faithful who are beloved by the Father, and called by the Son, our Lord. It appears by the 17th verse, where he cites the second epistle of Peter, and throughout the letter, wherein he intimates that the expressions of that apostle, were already known to those he writes to, that he had principally in view the converted Jews, who were scattered throughout the East, in Asia Minor, and beyond the Euphrates. He contends against false teachers, the Gnostics, Nicolaitans, and Simonians, who corrupted the doctrine, and disturbed the peace, of the church.

We do not know when this epistle was written; but Jude speaks of the apostles, as of persons who had been dead some time. He quotes the second epistle of Peter, and alludes to Paul's second epistle to Timothy; whence we determine, that it was not written till after the death of the apostles Peter and Paul, and consequently after A. D. 66. It is pretty credible that he did not write it till after the destruction of Jerusalem. Jude 17. compared with 2 Peter ii. &c. 2 Tim. iii. 1. compared with Jude 18.

Some of the ancients questioned its being canonical and authentic. Eusebius, lib. ii. cap. 23. testifies, that it was very seldom quoted by ecclesiastical writers: but he observes, at the same time, that it was publicly read in many churches.—What has contributed most to its being questioned, is the citation from the book of Enoch, or at least Enoch's prophecy. He cites also a particular fact of Moses's life, which is not found in the canonical books of the Old Testament, and is thought to have been furnished by an apocryphal work intitled The Assumption of Moses. Jude might know from other sources, what he quotes of these apocryphal writings; or, being inspired by the Holy Ghost, he might be able to distinguish truths which in these books were blended with errors.

Grotius was of opinion, that this epistle was not Jude's the apostle, but Judas's the fifteenth bishop of Jerusalem, who lived in the reign of Adrian; a little before the appearance of Barchochebas.

chochebas. He believes that these words, the brother of James, in the beginning of this epistle, were added by transcribers; and that Jude would never have forgotten to have styled himself "apostle," which he does not. Lastly, that had it been believed that this epistle was written by an apostle, it would have been received from the beginning. But this author produces no proof of this supposed addition of the words, the brother of James: Peter, Paul, and John, do not always insert their quality of apostles in the front of their epistles. Lastly, the doubts of some churches concerning the genuineness and authority of this book, [most likely written at a great distance from Greece, &c.] ought no more to prejudice it, than the same suspicions against other canonical books.

There has been a spurious gospel ascribed to Jude, which was condemned by pope Gelasius. We have already observed, that Jude had two grandsons who were martyred in the reign of Domitian. They were accused and carried to Rome, as persons descended from David, and related to Christ, says Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. lib. iii. cap. 19, 20.

Abdias, Fortunatus, Bede, and the Latin martyrologists inform us, that Jude suffered martyrdom, and was buried in Persia. Some of the Greeks say, he died peaceably at Berytus. Their Menologies, which place his festival June 19, say he was shot to death with arrows at Arara: probably in Armenia, where is mount Ararat, and the city of Ariaratha. The Armenians by tradition maintain, that he suffered martyrdom in their country.

VII. JUDAS or Joiada, high priest of the Jews after the Babylonish captivity; son of Eliashib and father of Jonathan. Neh. xii. 10.

VIII. JUDAS, 2 Macc. i. 10. was perhaps Judas the Essenian, or Judas son of Hircanus, and surnamed Aristobulus, whom we shall next speak of. We have no other knowledge of him, than by finding his name in the beginning of a letter from the senate of Jerusalem to Aristobulus, king Ptolemy's preceptor, written about A. M. 3880, ante A. D. 124.

IX. JUDAS, surnamed the Essenian, is noticed for the gift of prophecy. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 19. He foretold truly enough, that Antigonus the Asmonæan, brother to king Aristobulus, should be killed on a certain day in Strato's tower. Vide ANTIGONUS.

X. JUDAS, otherwise, Aristobulus, eldest son to John Hircanus. See III. ARISTOBULUS.

XI. JUDAS, son of Sarifeus joining with Mattathias son of Margalothus, persuaded his scholars to pull down a golden eagle, which Herod the Great had ordered to be fixed on one of the temple gates. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xvii. cap. 8 and 11.

XII. JUDAS of Gaulan, or the Gaulanite, opposed the enrolment of the people made by Cyrenius in Judea, (vide CYRENIUS,) and raised a very great rebellion; pretending that the Jews being free, ought to acknowledge no dominion besides that of God. His followers chose rather to suffer extreme torments than to call any power on earth lord or master. The same Judas is named Judas the Galilean, Acts v. 37. Judas was a Galilean, a native of the city of Gamala in the Gaulanitis; whence he is indifferently called Judas the Galilean, or Judas Gaulanites. And as this country was under the dominion of Herod, whereas Judea was subject to the Romans, the Jews called the followers of Judas the Gaulanite, Herodians. See HERODIANS.

The sect, or party, which held his opinions, subsisted long after Judas, and long after Gamaliel himself. The sect of the Herodians did not differ much from that of the Pharisees, except by its excessive love of liberty. It produced the two factions of the Sicarii or murderers, and the Zealots, who having kindled the flame of rebellion throughout Judea, were the cause of the destruction of Jerusalem, and of the whole country. See Josephus, Antiq. lib. xviii. cap. 1, 2. We do not know either the time or manner of Judas the Gaulanite's death.

XIII. JUDAS, Paul's host at Damascus, Acts ix. 9, 11. We know nothing of his life.

JUDEA, a province of Asia called anciently the Land of Canaan, or Palestine, the land of promise, the land of Israel. It was not named Judea till after the Jews returned from the Babylonish captivity; because then the tribe of Judah was the principal; and the territories belonging to the other tribes were possessed by the Samaritans, Idumæans, Arabians, and Philistines. The Jews, when returned from the captivity, settled about Jerusalem, and in Judah, from whence they spread over the whole country.

Judea, before the arrival of the Hebrews, was governed by Canaanitish kings, each in his respective city. When Joshua had conquered the country, he governed it as the Lord's vicerent. The elders succeeded Joshua about fifteen years. After which the Israelites fell into a kind of anarchy for seven or eight years. They were governed by judges three hundred and seventeen years; then by kings, from Saul to the Babylonish captivity, five hundred and seven years. After the captivity, Judea continued subject to the kings of Persia, then to Alexander the Great, and his successors.

Sometimes to the kings of Syria, sometimes to the kings of Egypt; paying nevertheless great deference, in matters of private government, to the high priest, and to princes of David's family. After the Maccabees they continued in possession of the sovereign authority till the time of Herod the Great, a hundred and thirty-five years. See PRIESTS, GOVERNORS, JERUSALEM, PALESTINE, &c.

[JUDEA, may be considered as divided into four parts. 1. The western district, Palestine, that inhabited by the Philistines. On the east of this, 2. The mountainous district called the hill country, Josh. xxi. 11. Luke 1. 39. which the Rabbins affect to call the king's mountain; whether, because on the northern part of this ridge Jerusalem is situated; or for any other reason, is not known. East of these mountains was, 3. the wilderness of Judea, along the shore of the Dead Sea. 4. The valleys, &c. west of Jerusalem, towards the Mediterranean.

Judea being the seat of religion and of government, claimed many privileges: "It was not lawful to intercalate the year out of Judea, while they might do it in Judea." Hieros. Nid. fol. 41. "Nor was the sheaf of first fruits of barley to be fetched from any other district than Judea; and as near as might be to Jerusalem." Bab. Sanhed. fol. 11. 2.

Judea no doubt derived its name from Judah, which tribe was settled in the south of the promised land, and maintained its kingdom after the northern tribes had been expatriated. This circumstance, together with that of Judah being principally peopled with Israelites after the return from the captivity, and being first settled, on account of the temple being established in it, accounts for the general name of Jews being given to the Hebrew nation.

Judea was one of the principal divisions of the Holy Land in the days of Christ; it included from the Mediterranean Sea west, to the Dead Sea east. It was bounded north by Samaria, and south by Edom, or the Desert.

It is extremely mountainous in some parts, as from Hebron to Jerusalem. West of these mountains is the principal extent of country; but this has many hills. East of these mountains is the Wilderness of Judea, stretching to the Dead Sea.

In the Wilderness of Judea John Baptist first taught, Matth. iii. 1. and Christ was tempted, probably towards the north of it, not far from Jericho. Some parts of the Wilderness were not absolutely barren or uninhabited: of other parts the following is the latest description which has reached us.

Dr. Carlyle visited the monastery of St. Saba in the Wilderness of Judea: he says, "the valley of St. Saba is an immense chasm in a rifted mountain of marble. It is not only destitute of trees, but of every other species of vegetation; and its sole inhabitants, except the wretched monks in the convent, are eagles, tigers, and wild Arabs. The monastery joins to the rocks on the right, and stretches itself half way across the valley. You enter from the top, and descend by several flights of stairs and iron doors, to the platform where the church is situated.

The monks are obliged to fetch all their provisions from Jerusalem, and are subject to the continual depredations of the Bedouins. The banditti, only a fortnight before I was there, had made an attack on the Convent; plundered and set on fire the part of it to which they could force their way, and murdered a considerable number of persons belonging to it. It would have been impossible for me to have accomplished my visit, had not the governor of Jerusalem furnished me with an escort of these very banditti, to protect me against their brethren. April, 1800."

Chateaubriand describes this wilderness in truly melancholy terms: "I doubt whether any convent can be situated in a more dreary and desolate spot than the monastery of St. Saba. It is erected in the very ravine of the brook Kedron, which in this place is three or four hundred feet in depth. This channel is dry, and only in spring a muddy stream of reddish water flows along it. . . . You are shewn three or four thousand skulls which belonged to religious murdered by the infidels. . . . As we advanced, the aspect of the mountains continued the same,—that is, white, dusty, without shade, without tree, without herbage, without moss." Such was the scene of John Baptist's introductory ministrations. He is still called Sabo, (whence St. Saba,) by his followers, who call themselves Sabeans.]

JUDGMENT, in Hebrew מִשְׁפָּט Mischpat; in Greek, κρίσις, Krisis; in Latin, Judicium. These terms have different significations in Scripture.

1. For the power of judging absolutely. Judicium est Dei. Deut. i. 17. the power of judging belongs to God; judges are but his vicerents; "God hath given his son authority to execute judgment, because he is the son of man." John v. 27. Judicium datum est illis (apostolis)—judgment was given to the apostles.

2. Judicium is taken for rectitude, equity, and the other good qualities of a judge. Deus, judicium tuum regi da, et justitiam tuam filio regis: Give the king thy judgments, and thy righteousness righteousness to the king's son, Ps. lxxii. 1. Honor regis judicium diligit: The honour and glory of a king shine in the rectitude of his judgments, and in his love for equity, Ps. xcix. 4. Iustitia et judicium præparatio sedis tue: Justice and equity are the supports of thy throne. Psalm lxxxix. 14.

3. Judicium signifies very often the vindictive justice and rigour of God's judgment. For example, In cunctis Diis Egypti faciam judicium: I will exercise my vengeance, my judgments on all the gods of Egypt, Exod. xii. 12. Quando facies de persequentibus me judicium? When wilt thou avenge me of my persecutors? When wilt thou exercise thy judgments against them? Ps. cxix. 84. Cum feceris judicia tua, in terra, justitiam dicent habitatores orbis: When thou shalt exercise thy judgments, thy severities upon the earth, men will learn to practise righteousness. Isai. xxvi. 9.

4. Facere judicium et justitiam: denotes the exercise of all virtues; justice, equity, truth and fidelity. Scio quod Abraham præcepturus sit filiis suis ut faciant judicium et justitiam: I know that Abraham will charge his children to act according to equity and justice. Gen. xviii. 19. Feci judicium et justitiam: I have practised justice and equity. Psal. cxix. 121. Expectavi ut facerent judicium, et ecce iniquitas; et justitiam, et ecce clamor: I expected that my vineyard, my inheritance, my people, would exercise judgment and equity, and I see none but unjust actions;—that they should practise righteousness, and I hear only the cries of their iniquities. Isaiah. v. 7.

5. Judicium is put often for the laws of God, and particularly for judicial laws. Hæc sunt judicia, quæ proponis eis: These are the ordinances which thou shalt propose to them, Exod. xxi. 1. Narravit Moyses populo omnia verba Domini, atque judicia: Moses proposed to the people all that the Lord had said to him, and all his commandments, Exod. xxiv. 3. Non fecit taliter omni nationi, et judicia sua non manifestavit eis: he has not treated all nations in this manner, nor hath he made them acquainted with his judgments, his ordinances, &c. Ps. cxlvii. 20.

[It is very probable, that the decisions given from the oracle, or by the priests, in cases of difficulty, which had been brought to Jerusalem, according to the law, should form, in process of time, a body of judgments, distinguished as being Divine: hence, in the Psalms we frequently read of the Judgment of God being according to truth, to justice, equity, &c. meaning, not his judgment, in the sense of punishment inflicted on individuals, or on nations; but his legal, or discriminative decisions. On the other hand, care should be taken not to confound the Divine judgments in the sense of punishments, evils inflicted, with those decisions which were merely judicial and administrative.]

6. Judicium is likewise put for custom, usage. Miserere mei secundum judicium diligentium nomen tuum: Have pity upon me, and treat me, as thou art wont to treat those who love thee. Ps. cxix. 132. This expression, secundum judicium, according to custom, is much more frequent in the Hebrew, than in the Vulgate, where it is translated, ut assolet, ut decet, pro more, &c. Levit. v. 10. Hebr. Faciet holocaustum secundum judicium: He shall offer a burnt-offering according to the custom, &c.

7. Judicium is put for discretion, wisdom, prudence. Disponet sermones suos in judicio: he shall regulate his discourses with wisdom. Ps. cxii. 5. Jurabis: vivit Dominus—in veritate, et in judicio, et in justitia: Thou shalt swear: the Lord liveth—in truth, in judgment, and in righteousness, Jerem. iv. 2. that is to say, in truth, so as to say nothing false; in judgment, so as to discern when it is proper to swear; in righteousness, so as to avoid doing wrong to thy neighbour. But in this passage, in judicio, may very well mean equity, justice.

8. The high priest's pectoral was called pectoral judicii, and sometimes simply judicium. Aaron gestabit judicium filiorum Israel: Aaron shall wear the judgment of the children of Israel; that is to say, the pectoral, which is the sign of his authority over the children of Israel. The high priest was a chief person concerned in the administration of justice among the Hebrews. Exod. xxviii. 15, 29, 36.

9. Judicium is taken for the last judgment. Statutum est hominibus semel mori: post hoc autem judicium. It is appointed that all men should die, and that judgment should follow. Heb. ix. 27. In Joel iii. 2. the Lord says, that he will gather together all the nations in the valley of Jehoshaphat, and will enter into judgment with them, to avenge his people, whom they have oppressed. See JEHOSEPHAT; and VALLEY OF JEHOSEPHAT. Solomon says, Scito quod pro omnibus his adducet te Deus in judicium: Know that for all these things God will bring thee into judgment. Eccles. xi. 9. Non intres in judicium cum servo tuo, quia non justificabitur in conspectu tuo omnis vivens: Enter not into judgment with thy servant; for in thy sight shall no man living be justified. Ps. cxliii. 2. Judicium post mortem veniet, quando iterum reviviscemus: judgment shall come after death, when we shall rise again, 4 Esdr. xiv. 35.

[10. In the Revelations the term judgment seems to be used in a peculiar sense, (probably, a Syriac sense) implying beneficence, in God's taking vengeance on the oppressors of his people, Rev. xv. 4. xvi. 5. See HOLY, Add. ad fin.]

JUDGMENT OF ZEAL. The Jews pretend, that under particular circumstances, when any one saw a Jew offending against God, violating the law, blaspheming God, his temple, or legislator; or even if any one saw a heathen, who would engage the people in irregularities, in idolatry, or the breach of God's laws, they might with impunity kill such an one, and without any form of justice remove this scandal from the people. They found this law on the instance of Phinehas, son of Eleazar, who having seen an Israelite enter the tent of a Midianitish woman, took a javelin, followed them, and killed them both, Numb. xxv. 6. &c. They cite likewise the example of Mattathias the father of the Maccabees, who in his transport of zeal killed an Israelite, while he was sacrificing to false gods. 1 Macc. ii. 24, 25.

The inconveniences of this sort of judgment are very evident: an inconsiderate multitude, a provoked Israelite, or a fanatic, shall believe themselves allowed to kill any man whom they wildly fancy to be an enemy to the interests of God and religion. Examples of this are but too frequent in history. With this mistaken zeal the Jews stoned St. Stephen, they laid hands on Paul, determined on his death, and, more than forty men made a vow, neither to eat nor drink till they had killed him. James, bishop of Jerusalem was executed in this manner; and Jesus Christ had not escaped death in the temple, when they imagined he uttered blasphemy, if he had not retired. John viii. 59.

The Fountain of Judgment, is the same as the Fountain of Kadesh, south of the land of promise. The waters of Kadesh were called the waters of Strife, because Moses was here contradicted and provoked by the murmurs of the Israelites; also the Fountain of Judgment, as here God displayed his wrath against Moses, and warned him that he should not enter the promised land, because he had not honoured him in the eyes of Israel. The Rabbins affirm that the name Fountain of Judgment came from the neighbouring people's assembling in this place, to receive justice, and terminate their differences. See KADESH.

JUDGES, in Hebrew שופטים Shophetim, governed the Israelites from Joshua to Saul. The Carthaginians, a colony of the Tyrians, had likewise governors, whom they called Suffetes, or Sophetim, with authority like those of the Hebrews, almost equal to that of Kings. T. Liv.

Decad. iii. lib. 7. Suffetes summuſerat Pœnis Magistratus. Some are of opinion, that the Archontes among the Athenians, and Dictators among the Romans, were the same almost as the judges among the Hebrews. Grotius compares the government of the Hebrews under the judges, to that of Gaul, Germany, and Britain, before the Romans changed it. The office of judge was not hereditary among the Israelites. These governors were no more than God's vice-gerents, for he was their only true monarch. When the Hebrews desired a king, God said to Samuel, "They have not rejected thee, but they have rejected me, that I should not reign over them," 1 Sam. viii. 7. When the crown was offered to Gideon, and his posterity after him, his answer was, "I will not rule over you, neither shall my son rule over you; the Lord shall rule over you." Jud. viii. 23.

The dignity of judge was for life, but the succession was not always constant. There were anarchies, or intervals, during which the commonwealth was without rulers and judges. There were likewise pretty long intervals of servitude and oppression, under which the Hebrews groaned, and were without either judges or governors. Although God himself did regularly appoint judges of the Israelites: yet the people, on some occasions, chose that individual who appeared to them most proper to deliver them from oppression. So the Israelites beyond Jordan chose Jephthah. As it often happened, that the oppressions, which occasioned recourse to the election of a judge, were not felt over all Israel, the power of such judge did not extend over all the people, but over that country only which he had delivered: we do not find that Jephthah exercised his authority on this side Jordan; nor that Barak extended his beyond that river. [Vide the MAP of CANAAN, illustrating the Book of JUDGES.]

The verb to judge, and the noun judge, sometimes signify in Scripture to reign, to exercise sovereign authority. Make us a king to judge us, said the Israelites to Samuel. 1 Sam. viii. 5, 6. Solomon, 1 Kings iii. 9. begs of God such a measure of understanding as was necessary to judge Israel. Jotham, son of Azariah king of Judah, governed the palace instead of his father, who was a leper, and judged the people of the land. 2 Kings xv. 5. And Absalom, when making interest for the crown, said, Oh that I were made judge in the land! Moreover, the authority of judges was not inferior to that of kings; it extended to peace and war. They decided causes with absolute authority; but they had no power to make new laws, nor to impose new burdens on the people. They were protectors of the laws, defenders of religion, and avengers of crimes, particularly of idolatry; they were without pomp or splendor, without guards, train, or equipage, unless their own wealth might enable them to appear answerable to their dignity. The revenue of their employment consisted in presents; they had no regular profits, and levied nothing upon the people.

The time of the Judges from Joshua to Saul is three hundred thirty-nine years. For the conclusion of the Judges, vide the CHRONOLOGICAL TABLES.

THE BOOK OF JUDGES, is by some ascribed to Phinehas, by others to Ezra, or to Hezekiah, by others to Samuel, or to all the judges, who wrote each the history of his time and judicature. But it appears to be the work of one author, who lived after the time of the Judges. A clear proof of this, is, that in the second chapter, the tenth and following verses, he makes a short abridgement of the whole book, and gives a general idea of it.

There is something to be said for the opinion which attributes it to Samuel. 1. The author lived at a time when the Jebusites were masters of Jerusalem, and consequently before David, Judg. i. 21. 2. It appears that the Hebrew Commonwealth was then governed by kings, since the author observes, in several places, that at such a time—there was no king in Israel.

Notwithstanding, there are considerable difficulties against this opinion, as Judges, xviii. 30, 31. "And the children of Dan made Jonathan and his sons priests in the tribe of Dan, until the day of the captivity of the land. And they set them up Mical's graven image, which he made, all the time that the house of God was in Shiloh." The tabernacle or house of God was not at Shiloh till about the time of Samuel's first appearance as a prophet; for then it was brought from Shiloh and carried to the camp, where it was taken by the Philistines; and after this time it was sent back to Kirjath-jearim. 1 Sam. iv. 4, 5, &c. 1 Sam. vi. 21. As to the captivity of the tribe of Dan, it can scarcely, one would think, be understood of any other than that under Tiglath-pileser, many hundred years after Samuel. And consequently he could not write this book; unless it be acknowledged that this passage has been added since; which is no way incredible.

Ordinary JUDGES for civil and religious affairs. In Deut. xvi. 18, and xvii. 8, 9. (see likewise Ezek. xlv. 24. and Josephus, Antiq. lib. x. c. ult.) Moses ordained, that judges and magistrates should be appointed in every city, to terminate differences among the people; but that affairs of greater consequence should be removed to the place which the Lord should choose, in order to lay the difficulty before the priests of Aaron's family, and before the judge (or prince of the people) at that time established by the Lord; and he requires all to acquiesce in their judgment on pain of death. When Jehoshaphat king of Judah resolved on reforming his dominions, 2 Chron. xix. 5, 8, &c. he settled judges in all the cities, to whom he recommended vigilance and justice, as exercising the authority of God himself. He likewise set up two courts at Jerusalem, one consisting of priests and Levites, the other of the heads of families of Israel. The first had cognizance of affairs which related to the law and religion; the second of the king's matters; i. e. of civil affairs, and private interests,—[and dues of royalty.] Such was the polity of the Hebrews before the captivity, as we collect from the sacred books.

But the Jewish doctors give us very different ideas of these judges. They maintain, that there was an assembly at Jerusalem, consisting of seventy-two judges: this assembly they call the Sanhedrim, which is a word formed with some variation from the Greek Synedrion. They believe that this council always subsisted in their nation, ever since it was established by Moses, when he appointed seventy-two elders, to whom God communicated his spirit, in order to assist him in the government of the people. Numb. xi. 16, 17. But we are of opinion, that this settlement continued no longer than the time of Joshua's dividing the land; and that it was not restored till after the Maccabees. It was in being in our Saviour's time, and lasted, probably, till the destruction of the temple, but not always with equal authority; for after the banishment of Archelaus, the Romans, having reduced Judea into a province, confined the power of life and death to themselves. See SANHEDRIM.

As for inferior courts, we have the following account of what they were in our Saviour's time, from the Rabbins and interpreters. 1. There were three judges in every city, who had the cognizance of lesser faults, such as theft and the like. 2. There was another court of twenty-three judges, who decided matters of importance, and of a more criminal nature; and their sentences were such as generally affected the lives of persons, no causes being brought before them but such as deserved death. 3. The great Sanhedrim was at Jerusalem, and had cognizance of the most important affairs of the state and religion. Our Saviour is thought to have alluded to these two last courts, Matt. v. 21, 22, "Whosoever shall be angry with his brother brother without a cause shall be in danger of the judgment," i. e. of the twenty-three judges. "And whosoever shall say to his brother, Raca, shall be in danger of the council," i. e. of the great Sanhedrim. The common place where the judges assembled was the city gate. See GATE. The Sanhedrim met in one of the chambers of the temple.

I shall here add some remarks taken from the Mishna, and the commentators, relating to the different judges which were in Palestine, and their jurisdiction. The Rabbins agree, that in every city, containing at least a hundred persons, there was to be a court, consisting of three judges, before whom causes of lesser consequence were pleaded, concerning loss, gain, and restitution. These three judges had a right only to condemn criminals to be whipped. This tribunal was consulted about the intercalation of months. The three judges might confer imposition of hands, and receive doctors; they might install judges, with these words; "Thou Rabbi Such an one, hast been honoured with the power of judging and instituting penalties." But for the enjoyment of this privilege it was necessary that at least one of the three judges had received ordination, himself, that he might impart it to others. The parties named their judges: one of the parties chose his judge; the other named a second, and these two judges took a third, with whom they decided the cause.

Josephus states differently the polity of the Jews; he says that Moses ordained seven judges of known virtue to be established in every city, or a body of senators composed of seven judges, and to these seven judges two ministers were added of the tribe of Levi; so that according to this author, there were in every city nine judges, seven lay-men, and two Levites. Now Josephus certainly is more to be credited in matters of this nature than the Rabbins, because he is much more ancient, and was better acquainted with things than the Jewish doctors. Josephus saw the commonwealth of the Hebrews in being, and flourishing; whereas the Rabbins are long after the destruction of the temple, and the dispersion of their nation.

The second tribunal was composed of twenty-three judges, who gave sentence in capital causes, and condemned men to death, also beasts that had wounded any man. I do not find this number of judges either in Moses or in the sacred authors. Josephus speaks nothing of them; he says only, that if the seven judges above-mentioned found themselves insufficient to decide a cause, they referred it to the high-priest in the holy city.

It may not be improper to represent the manner wherein the judges of this court were seated, because, having some relation to that of the great Sanhedrim, this may be of use, to give a more exact idea of it, and explain the opinion of the Jewish doctors.

The twenty-three judges formed a semi-circle, in the midst the president was seated, whom they called Prince of the senate; his merit and wisdom raised him to that dignity. The Father of the senate was seated at his right hand, and held the second rank; but this charge was imagined by the Talmudist doctors. Every one of the twenty-three judges took his place at right and left according to his rank; some say there were three secretaries, one for collecting the votes of those who absolved; the second, to gather the votes of those who condemned; and the third received both the one and the other. The three orders of disciples were placed on forms at the bottom of the hall, each according to his age and capacity. They brought thither the ablest men from all parts of Judea, removing them from other courts to this of Jerusalem composed of twenty-three judges; they were placed at first in the lowest class, and the scholars rose afterwards by degrees to the quality of judges. By this description it appears, that the Rabbins designed to give a high idea of their magistracy and magistrates. Notwithstanding, the learned seem not inclinable to prefer their authority to that of Josephus, who quite over-sets all these ideas.

JUDITH, יודית, who praises God: see Judah.

JUDITH, of Reuben, daughter of Merari, and widow of Manasseh, celebrated for the deliverance of Bethulia, besieged by Holofernes. See HOLOFERNES and BETHULIA. Judith after she became a widow, made a private chamber for herself on the top of her house, where she remained secluded, with the young woman who attended her. She was of uncommon beauty, and great riches; and was much esteemed.

Being informed that Ozias, who was the leading man in Bethulia, had promised to deliver it up within five days to Holofernes, she sent for Chabris and Carnis, elders of the people, and said to them, Who are you that have tempted God, this day? adding, I am resolved to depart this night out of the city with my maid-servant; you shall stand at the city-gate, and let me go, without inquiring my design, and in some days I will return.

Judith after this prayed, dressed herself in her best, and pretending to have fled from the city, went over to the camp of Holofernes. As soon as that general saw her, he was captivated. Judith fell prostrate at his feet, who, ordering her her to be raised, said, "Be of good courage, and fear not, for I never hurt any who were willing to submit to king Nebuchodonozor."

Judith continued with Holofernes, but had liberty of going out of the camp at night. On the fourth day, Holofernes sent Bagoas his eunuch to invite her to pass the night with him. Judith went, decked with all her ornaments. She ate and drank, not from Holofernes's table, but what her maid had prepared for her; and Holofernes was so transported, that he drank more wine than he had ever done in his life. In the evening his servants retired, and Bagoas shut the chamber doors and departed. Holofernes, through excess of wine, slept very soundly. Judith, therefore, placed her maid without to watch, and having put up her prayer to God, she took down Holofernes's sabre, which hung on a pillar at his bed's head, and struck him twice upon the neck, cut off his head, wrapped him up in the curtains of his bed, gave Holofernes's head to her maid, and directed her to put it in her bag. After which they went out of the camp as usual.

Judith and her maid returned to Bethulia, and displaying the head of Holofernes over the walls of the city struck his army with dismay. Their defeat was extraordinary, and the whole country was enriched with their spoils. The high-priest Jehoiakim came from Jerusalem to Bethulia, to compliment Judith. Every thing which they thought belonged to Holofernes, his clothes, gold, silver, and precious stones, they gave to Judith, who sung a hymn to the honour of God, and taking the arms of Holofernes, and the curtain of his bed, consecrated all of them to the Lord. Having lived a hundred and five years at Bethulia, and made her maid free, she died, and was buried with her husband, at Bethulia; and all the people lamented her seven days. The day on which this victory was obtained, was placed by the Hebrews among their festivals. Several learned men are of opinion, that there is no other festival to be met with in commemoration of Judith's victory, beside that which is celebrated for the dedication or renovation of the temple by Judas Maccabæus on the 25th of Casleu. Leo of Modena, and the Jewish calendar published by Sigonius, place it on this day.

The greatest difficulty relating to the book of Judith is the time of the history. The Greek and Syriac seem to prove, that it was after the captivity of Babylon. The Vulgate may be explained as referring to a time preceding that captivity. Great difficulties embarrass us in what manner soever we understand it, and in what time soever we place it.

PART XVI. Edit. IV.

To remove all difficulties, and answer perfectly all objections which may be formed against this story seems impossible. Neither sacred nor profane history, in the time of Manasseh, or in that of Zedekiah, either before or after the captivity, say any thing of a king of Nineveh named Nebuchodonozor, who in the twelfth and seventeenth year of his reign conquered a king of the Medes called Arphaxad. It would be very difficult to find at this particular time a high-priest of the Jews named Joachim or Eliakim. Lastly, we should meet with almost invincible difficulties, in every attempt to reconcile the Greek text, and the Syriac, with the Latin of St. Jerom, would we scan every thing relating to the geography and other circumstances of this recital. Nor would there be, perhaps, less, were we to adhere to the Vulgate and reject the Greek, Syriac, and old Italic Versions.

If the names were granted, there is another question of more consequence, and that is, to know what text to adopt, the Greek or the Latin; as to the Syriac, no one doubts but it was taken from the Greek, and I confess sincerely, that were I to read the Greek only, I should believe that the story of Judith was translated and written after the captivity; but if we follow the Latin, it may be placed before the captivity. The Greek text is very ancient; some suppose it to be Theodotion's, who lived under Commodus, after A. D. 180: but it is of greater antiquity, being cited by Clemens Romanus in his epistle to the Corinthians, written above a hundred and twenty years before. The Syriac is likewise very antient, and translated from some Greek text more correct than that we have at present; but the same in substance.

The Latin Italic version, or the old Vulgate, is made likewise from the Greek; but is very defective. Jerom's Vulgate was translated from a Chaldee text, which that writer supposed was the genuine original of Judith, but he leaves us in much perplexity, when he says in his preface, that he rendered the sense without adhering to the letter; and that he suppressed the faulty variations found in different copies. Magis sensum è sensu, quam ex verbo verbum transferens, multorum codicum varietatem vitiosissimam amputavi, sola ea, quæ intelligentiâ integrâ in verbis Chaldaicis invenire potui, Latinis expressi. He had therefore the old Latin version before him; from this he pared off what was superfluous, and left all that he found agreeing with the Chaldee; in all probability, he added likewise what was wanting; so that his version is rather a reform of the old, than a translation altogether new; and, in reality, we still observe some words in it, which are taken from the old Italic.

2 C div. 2 still

They who maintain, that the history of Judith passed before the captivity, and in Manasseh's time, believe it sufficient to demonstrate, that there is nothing in the narration repugnant to this assertion. E. gr. supposing the Nabuchodonozor in Judith to be Saosduchinus in Ptolemy, that Arphaxad is the Phraartes of Herodotus; that these two princes made war with one another in the twelfth year of Saosduchinus; that Arphaxad being overcome, Saosduchinus sent Holofernes to reduce by force those who refused to acknowledge him for sovereign; that at this time Manasseh, then lately delivered from captivity, in Babylon, now dwelt at Jerusalem, concerning himself little with the government, not daring to declare openly against the Chaldeans, but leaving the care of affairs mostly to Joachim or Eliakim, the high-priest:—

Now supposing all this, I say, there is nothing in it against the laws of history, or chronology. The war between Nabuchodonozor and Arphaxad, we place A. M. 3347, the expedition and death of Holofernes, in 3348. Manasseh was carried to Babylon in 3329. He returned some years after, and died in 3361.

There are some expressions a little perplexing, in the Greek text of Judith, which however are very susceptible of being set right; for example: Achior says, "that the temple of the Lord was cast to the ground: that after the return of the Jews from their dispersion, they took possession again of Jerusalem, where their Sanctuary is;" and again, "that they were newly returned from the captivity, and all the people of Judah were lately gathered together." To this, it may be replied, by distinguishing particular captivities and dispersions of Israel from their general dispersions. Under Manasseh the temple was profaned, and part of the people carried away; that prince and his people returned from this short dispersion, and the temple was purified; which happened but a little before. Here therefore you have what is alleged for the support of that system which we have followed in our comment.

The opinion which places the history of Judith after the captivity of Babylon, is founded principally on the authority of the Greek. This translation is certainly very ancient; the Italic version, which was the only one in use among the Latins before Jerom, and the Syriac, were both made from it. It may pass for an original, there being nothing more ancient and authentic; for it is dubious whether Jerom's Chaldee were the original.

If any would maintain the Chaldee text to be the original, it will follow, that this work was written after the captivity. Besides, there was no king at that time in the country; there is no mention of a king in this history; there is no application made to any but the high priest, in an affair wherein the king directly was concerned, and to say that Manasseh, out of fear or policy, dissembled, and left the management of affairs to the high priest, is to advance a thing almost incredible; besides, it were to attempt imposing on the king of Chaldæa with child's play, as if that prince could be ignorant, that there was a king in Judah, who was subject to him, &c.

Besides, where is a high priest in Manasseh's time, named Eliakim? Neither the chronicles in Josephus nor Scripture, furnish us with any of that name about this time. We find one Hilkiah under Hezekiah, and another under Josiah. Hilkiah comes pretty near Eliakim, and the Hebrews took great liberties in changing names, particularly when there was little or no difference as to their meaning; and there is scarcely any between Hilkiah and Eliakim. I am willing not to insist strongly on this argument; and to confess that the same Hilkiah, or Eliakim might live under Manasseh and Josiah.

But what seems demonstrative for the opinion which places this after the return from the Babylonian captivity, is the import of the Greek, chap. iv. ver. 2. "that the Israelites were newly returned from the captivity, and all the people of Judea were lately gathered together, and the vessels and the altar, and the house, were sanctified after the profanation." Achior, general of the Ammonites, says the same to Holofernes: "They were destroyed in many battles very sore, and were led captives into a land that was not theirs; but now they are returned to their God, and are come up from the places where they were scattered, and have possessed Jerusalem, where their sanctuary is." And observe, that this last passage is taken from the Vulgate; but the Greek adds, "And the temple of their God was overthrown (literally) reduced to the pavement, or trampled under foot, and their cities were taken by the enemies,—and they dwell again in the mountains which were not inhabited." It is in vain to endeavour to correct the sense of these passages, the bare reading of them naturally leads us to say, that this history was translated after the return from the captivity; and thus almost all the ancients, and many of the moderns, have believed.

Besides, some assert, that Phraartes, whom they suppose to be the Arphaxad in Judith, long survived Saosduchinus, whom they think to be Nabuchodonozor, who, in Judith's account, shot his adversary Arphaxad, and killed him. Sossuduchinus died, according to Petavius, in the year 4067 of the Julian period, and Phrartes not till the year 4071. If this be true, we must of necessity place this history after the return from Babylon.

Lastly, It is said, to support this opinion, that the text of the Vulgate, as well as the Greek implies, that, "Judith lived a hundred and five years, and that during her life time, and many years after her death, no enemy disturbed Israel." Let them suppose, if they please, that Judith was fifty years of age when she appeared before Holofernes, with design of fascinating him by her beauty, nay, that she was fifty-five, how can any maintain, that for the last fifty years of her life, and for many years after, the Jews were not molested; since we know, that from A. M. 3347, in which this war with Holofernes is dated, to sixty years beyond that time, there was nothing but a chain of evils in Judea, and a succession of almost continual misfortunes.

It must be acknowledged, therefore, say they, that this history was not transacted till after the captivity of Babylon. David Ganz, a Jewish historian, tells us, that a certain poet, who wrote the history of the dedication of the temple, refers this event to the time of the Asmoneans; another refers it to the time of Cambyses, son of Cyrus. Eusebius places it in the reign of Cambyses; Syncellus in that of Xerxes; Sulpitius Severus in that of Ochus; others under Antiochus Epiphanes, and in the time of the Maccabees.

And this last opinion doubtless is the most easy to maintain, if it be admitted, that a feast was instituted in memory of this event, as we read in the Vulgate, but not in the Greek, nor in the Syriac, nor in the old Italic, which imply nothing like it. The generality of Commentators believe, that this festival of Judith is the same with that of the renovation of the sacred fire, and the new dedication of the temple by Judas Maccabæus. Leo of Modena is of this opinion, as well as Salianus, Bellarmin, Tornielle, Cornelius a Lapide, Grotius, &c.

Whether the book of Judith be authentic and canonical, is a point very much disputed. There are a hundred difficulties started concerning the persons, and other circumstances of this history. The Jews read it in Jerom's time, St. Clement hath cited it Ep. i. ad Corinth. cap. 55. as well as the Apostolic Constitutions written in St. Clement's name, lib. viii. cap. 2. can. 85. Clemens Alexandrinus, Strom. lib. iv. Origen, Homil. 19. on Jeremiah, and tom. iii. 1. on John, Tertullian, lib. de Monogamia, cap. 17. St. Ambrose, lib. iii. de Officiis, et lib. de Viduis. Je-rom quotes it in his epistle to Furia; and in his preface to the book of Judith, he says, that the council of Nice received this among canonical books; not that any canon expressly approves it; for we know of none wherein it is mentioned; and Jerom himself does not produce any; but he knew, perhaps, that the council had favoured it, since after that council the fathers acknowledged it, and have cited it. St. Athanasius, or the author of the Synopsis ascribed to him, gives a summary account of it, as of other sacred books. St. Austin and the whole African church received it. Pope Innocent I. in his epistle to Exuperus, and pope Gelasius in the council of Rome, acknowledged it. It is quoted in Fulgentius, and by two ancient authors, whose sermons are printed in the appendix to the fifth volume of St. Austin. I say nothing of more modern ecclesiastical writers, who are very numerous and very favourable to Judith. The council of Trent confirmed the book of Judith.

[Grotius, and many other learned protestants, are of opinion that this book is rather a parabolical than a real history. See Grotius, in Præfatione ad Annotationes in Librum Judith, and Dr. Prideaux's Connection, &c. In the judgement of this last author, this book seems to carry with it the air of a true history in most particulars, except that of the long continued peace, which is said to be procured by Judith. For, according to the account given of it in this book, it must have lasted eighty years, which is what the Jews never enjoyed from the time they were a nation; and what scarcely any other people ever did enjoy: this therefore, he allows to be a fiction; though otherwise inclined to think the book to be founded on a true history.]

The author of the book of Judith is unknown. Jerom seems to think, that Judith wrote it herself; others, that the high priest Joakim or Eliakim, mentioned in this book, was the author of it, which is mere conjecture.

They who believe that the history of Judith happened in the time of Cambyses, and after the captivity of Babylon, suppose that Joshua son of Josedek, then high priest, wrote it. The author, whoever he was, does not appear to have been contemporary with the transactions. He says that Achior's family was still in his time subsisting in Israel, Judith xiv. 6. and that the festival instituted in memory of Judith's victory was still celebrated. Judith xvi. 31.

The Jews in Origen's time had the history of Judith in Hebrew, i. e. they might have it probably in Chaldee, which is often confounded with Hebrew. Jerom says, that in his time they read it in Chaldee, as among the Hagiographa. Sebastian Munster thinks, that the Jews of Constantinople have it at present in that language. But hitherto we have seen no part of Judith printed in it. The Syriac version which we have, is from the Greek, but from some copy more correct than what we have at present. Jerom made his Latin version from the Chaldee, and his translation is so different from the Greek, that no one can think they both came from the same original. Jerom complains much, of the variety observable among the Latin copies of his time; and we may be easily convinced that his complaints were just, by comparing the fragments of these translations which have been handed down to us, with the citations from them in the fathers.

JULIA, Ἰουλία, downy; from the Greek ἰῶλος, down, soft and tender hair. Vide JUNIA.

JULIAS, otherwise Livias; for Josephus generally calls Livia, Augustus's wife, Julia. There were two towns of this name in Judea; one [before called Betharampta.] built by Herod Antipater at the mouth of the river Jordan on the lake of Tiberias; the other built by Philip, before called Bethsaida. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xviii. cap. 3.

Julias Betharampta, says Lightfoot, was seated at the influx of Jordan into the lake of Gennesareth: Julias Bethsaida was beyond the Sea of Galilee in Perea. Jos. de Bell. lib. ii. cap. 13. Pliny places Julias east of the sea of Gennesareth. N. H. lib. v. cap. 15.]

JULIUS, Ἰούλιος, from the same as Julia.

JULIUS CÆSAR. The name Cæsar became peculiar to the Roman emperors after Julius Cæsar, who changed the Roman commonwealth from an aristocracy to a monarchy. Scripture speaks frequently of the Cæsars, i. e. the emperors, but rarely mentions their proper name: Is it lawful to pay tribute unto Cæsar? Matt. xxii. 17. i. e. to Tiberius, who then reigned; and Paul in the Acts, I appeal unto Cæsar.—Hast thou appealed unto Cæsar? unto Cæsar thou shalt go. Acts xxv. 11, 12. i. e. to Nero. And elsewhere, Philip. iv. 22. they of Cæsar's i. e. of Nero's household salute you. St. Luke names Cæsar Augustus, Luke ii. 1. Tiberius Cæsar, chap. iii. 1. and Claudius Cæsar, Acts xi. 28.

Julius Cæsar, or Caius Julius Cæsar, the first Roman emperor, had some part in Jewish affairs. He was son of Lucius Cæsar and Aurelia daughter of Cotta, born in the year of Rome 654, 98 years before Jesus Christ. At the age of sixteen he lost his father, and the year after was appointed high priest of Jupiter. The dictator Sylla resolved to destroy him; and Cæsar, was forced to hide himself, and to gain with money those who were ordered to seize him. Sylla at last forgave him, being overpowered by the intreaties of his friends: but foretold, that this young man would one day ruin the state.

After having passed through the offices of tribune, quæstor, ædile, high priest, and prætor or governor of Spain, he obtained the consulship in the year of Rome 695, and chose the government of Gaul, which he reduced into the form of a province, after nine or ten years of government. His daughter Julia dying, the good understanding, between him and his son in law Pompey, husband to Julia, ceased; because Cæsar was unable to endure a master, and Pompey a rival. Pompey, at Rome, opposed all the demands made by Cæsar in his absence; and Cæsar entered Italy with his victorious army, and so terrified his enemies that they fled.

He set at liberty Aristobulus king of Judea, and sent him with two legions, to support his interests in Syria, Phœnicia, and Arabia. But Pompey's party found means to poison him by the way. Alexander son of Aristobulus had already levied troops in Syria, to join his father, but Pompey sent orders to Scipio in Syria, to have him killed, which was done. Cæsar went into Spain, where he defeated Pompey's army. He afterwards returned to Rome; then passed into Macedonia, where he beat Pompey at Pharsalia.

He pursued him to Alexandria, where being informed that he had been killed, he turned his arms against Ptolemy king of Egypt. Cæsar was shut up in Alexandria, with some troops, where he was very much embarrassed, and pressed by the Egyptian army. He sent Mithridates, into Syria and Cilicia, to procure succours. Antipater, father to Herod the Great, who governed the high priest Hircanus prince of the Jews, engaged assistance for Cæsar. He himself marched into Egypt with 3000 men, and joined Mithridates. They both together attacked Pelusium, which they carried; then they advanced towards Alexandria, and Antipater by his own credit, and letters which he carried from Hircanus, induced the Jews in the canton of Onion, to open the passages, and to declare for Cæsar. Those of Memphis did the same. Ptolemy sent a flying camp against Mithridates and Antipater, to dispute the passage of the Nile, but the king's troops were beaten. Ptolemy followed in person with his whole army: Cæsar did the same. They soon came to a battle, wherein Cæsar obtained a complete victory, which made him master of all Egypt.

He always preserved a very grateful remembrance

brance of the important service which Antipater had done him; he confirmed all the privileges of the Jews in Egypt, and caused a pillar to be erected, on which he ordered all these privileges to be engraved, with the decree which confirmed them. As he passed through Palestine, Antigonus son of Aristobulus threw himself at his feet, representing to him in a very affecting manner the death of his father and brother, the first poisoned, the second beheaded at Antioch, for supporting his interests; and desired to be restored to his father's principality. He likewise complained of the wrong done him by Antipater and Hircanus; but Antipater, who was still in Cæsar's retinue, justified his conduct, and that of Hircanus.

Some years after, in his fifth and last consulship, Cæsar at the request of Hircanus, permitted him to rebuild the walls of Jerusalem, which Pompey had demolished. There was a decree made at Rome to this purpose, which was no sooner brought to Jerusalem, but Antipater began the work, and the city was very soon fortified. Cæsar was killed shortly after, March 15, A. M. 3960, ante A. D. 44.

JULIUS, a centurion of the cohort of Augustus, to whom Festus governor of Judea, committed Paul, to convey him to Rome. Julius had great regard for Paul. Acts xxvii. 1, 2, 3, &c.

[He suffered him to land at Sidon, and to visit his friends there; he was advised by Paul in certain occurrences of the voyage; he opposed the violence of the soldiers directed against the prisoners, generally; in order to save Paul; and when he delivered his charge to the custody of the chief captain of the guard, there can be no doubt, but what his favourable report of the apostle contributed essentially to the indulgences he afterwards met with, by which his imprisonment was greatly moderated.]

JUNIA, Ἰωνία, from the goddess Juno, or from juventus, youth.

JUNIA, or as some copies read Julia, is joined with Andronicus, Rom. xvi. 7. "Salute Andronicus and Junia my kinsmen and fellow-prisoners, who are of note among the apostles." These words, "who are of note among the apostles," persuade many that the right name is Junias, i. e. of a man, as well as Andronicus. [So Eng. trans.] But St. Chrysostom, Theophylact, and several others take Andronicus for a man, and Junia for a woman, perhaps his wife. The Greeks and Latins keep their festival May 17, as husband and wife.

JUNIPER-TREE, a common tree. It is mentioned in the Latin, in two places. Elisha flying from Jezebel, towards Beersheba; being overwhelmed with fatigue, laid down under a juniper-tree. 1 Kings xix. 4, 5. The Hebrew רֵתֶם rethem, which Jerom, after Aquila, translates juniper-tree, the Syriac renders a turpentine-tree, the Chaldees, broom. The LXX keep to the Hebrew word retem; Symmachus explains it only by a covert or shelter. In the Vulgate of Job, a juniper-tree is mentioned; the root of the juniper-tree was their meat. But as the root of the juniper-tree is by no means fit to eat, no more than that of the turpentine-tree or broom, this translation is very questionable. Perhaps the Hebrew, retem, may signify any wild shrub, or plant. The Greek radhammos, which comes from the Hebrew ratom, signifies in general a young plant, a sucker, a shoot, &c.

IVORY, in Hebrew שֵׁן Schen, a tooth; ivory being an elephant's tusk. Ezekiel, xxvii. 15. calls it horn of teeth, because it is rather a horn than a tooth, being a natural weapon for defence, and, like horn, easily worked. 1 Kings x. 22. it is said elephants' teeth were brought to Solomon from Ophir; in Heb. Schen-habbim. Bochart is of opinion, that Schen-habbim is put for Schen-kahabim, affirming that kahabim signifies elephants; whereof he produces no proof. In our opinion, these words should be read separately Schen habenim; teeth and ebony, as habenim signifies, Ezek. xxvii. 15. There was an ascent of six steps to Solomon's ivory throne, and on each of these steps a lion. The ivory palaces Psalm xlv. are boxes made of ivory in the form of houses. The houses of ivory built in Samaria, Amos iii. 15. and 1 Kings xxii. 39. are palaces replete with ornaments in ivory.

Amos, vi. 4. speaks of ivory beds. John discoursing of the fall of Rome, Rev. xviii. 12. under the name of Babylon, says, vessels of gold, silver, and ivory, formerly seen there, shall be seen no more. Ezekiel, xxvii. 6. says, the Tyrians carried their magnificence to such an height, as to make the seats on which their rowers sat of Indian ivory: Transtua tua fecerunt tibi ex ebone Indico. This seems to be a very ill judged piece of costliness; and the Hebrew is differently translated; by some, They have made thy hatches of ivory well trodden (literally, of ivory the daughter of steps) and brought from the isles of Chittim. But what can be the meaning of ivory trodden under feet? It is a custom with elephants to hide their teeth under ground, when either by chance or old age they drop them: Dentes deciduos casu aliquo vel senectâ defodiunt, says Pliny, lib. viii. Others translate this passage, "They have made thy benches of ivory wrought in Assyria, and brought from the isles of Chittim, or Macedonia."

nia." But Macedonia we know is not a country where elephants' teeth are to be found. There are others who translate it, "They have made thy seats of ivory set in box, brought from the isles of Macedonia." The Hebrews called peninsulas and maritime countries, islands, as well as the places which properly go by this name; and Macedonia produced box which was much valued. That ivory was sometimes set in box may be seen from Virgil, Compare FRAGMENTS, No. CCXVII. G. on the SHIP of TYRE.

JUPITER, Ζεύς, as if it were, juvans pater, the father that helpeth. Acts xiv. 12. See OLYMPIUS.

[The character of Jupiter is so chequered with good and evil, greatness and meanness, justice and crime, even where it is best drawn by the writers of antiquity, that it appears wonderful how reasoning minds could adopt him as their object of worship, their Deity. Even in Homer we find him sometimes in the fulness of power giving law to his whole court of celestials, and aweing them into submission; then again sinking into the mere mortal, and yielding to all the infirmities and even the grosser passions and sensualities of mankind. Happily, no such deformities degrade the supreme God of the Scriptures, notwithstanding on many occasions the sacred writers are under the necessity of speaking of him after the manner of men, in order to render him in some degree comprehensible by those whom they addressed.]

As the figure of Jupiter was that of a sedate personage, and of venerable age, it is likely that such was the appearance of Barnabas, Acts xiv. 12. He was certainly senior to Paul by years enough to have been his father, (as Jupiter was father of Mercury) more reserved, less active, and less eloquent than his companion, who is characterized as the chief speaker.]

JUSHABHESED, יושב־חסד, the return, the dwelling, or the seat of mercy; from יושב ja-shab, or from שוב shub, conversion, return, seat, and חסד chesed, goodness, mercy. 1 Chr. iii. 20.

JUSTICE, is generally put for goodness, equity, that virtue which renders to every man his due; and oftentimes for virtue and piety in general; lastly, for the conjunction of all those virtues which make an honest man. See Ezek. xviii. 5—9.

2. Justice is placed in opposition to mercy; as a virtue which severely avenges the dishonour offered to God by sin.

3. For the clemency, mercy, and indulgence which God shows to sinners. It is frequently taken in this sense in Isaiah. It is used sometimes when we are speaking of a good natured, mild, indulgent man. Thus St. Matthew tells us, i. 19. that Joseph being a just man, was not willing to defame Mary. Vide ANNUNCIATION.

4. For alms. Redeem thy sins by justice, says Daniel to Nebuchadnezzar. Dan. iv. 27. See Prov. xxi. 26.—xi. 18. [rather restitution.]

5. For the justice of God, and his vengeance against our enemies. "Judgment is far from us, neither doth justice overtake us," Isaiah lix. 9. We expected that God would deliver us from oppression, and avenge us on our enemies; but we see no change in our condition.

6. To do judgment and justice, is a common expression, describing the duties of man towards God and his neighbour; particularly, the being just and equitable to all the world.

7. To justify any one, often signifies to declare him to be just, to absolve him. God condemns the judge who justifies the wicked. Prov. xvii. 15. To justify signifies likewise to instruct, to shew the ways of justice. Isa. v. 23. liii. 11.

8. Lastly, to justify, is to demonstrate another to be comparatively, less culpable than ourselves. Jerusalem by its errors justified Sodom and Samaria; it hath evinced, that people may exceed those cities in dissoluteness. Ezek. xvi. 51, 52.

[JUST, JUSTICE, is a term that branches out into so many significations, and is applied so differently to men and things, as well to deserve peculiar and even anxious investigation. In general, it seems to refer to some rule, law, or standard, by which a quality, an intention, or an action, may be estimated. So Xenophon, Cyrop. ii. 2. 15. speaks of a car as being just, meaning, what it ought to be, fit for the use intended. Pollux, Onom. i. 227. calls good and fertile land just, and barren land, unjust; and the Son of Sirach, Eccus. xxiv. 31, says he will water abundantly his (garden bed, Eng. Tr.) green grass plat, the just," i. e. what answers expectation. The same idea may be transferred to man. Hence a man who fulfils the law is a just man; he answers the intention of the lawgiver. But, Cicero says, justice is used for conduct as it regards man, but piety is the proper term as referring to God: whence we may learn that the heathen acknowledged the impotence of man to equal what God had a right to expect; though man might be just towards his fellow-man. Nevertheless, those who hunger and thirst after righteousness, who earnestly desire complete rectitude of heart and life, who endeavour after perfect conformity with the rule of action, as well in the sight of God as men, are pronounced blessed.

As parts of righteousness, or justice due from man to man, single virtues are sometimes put for the whole, as truth, clemency, integrity, &c. So alms are a species of righteousness, i. e. from man to man; so kindness and moderation, not pushing to the utmost, whether of strictness or severity, those demands which we have a right to make on others; or not pressing them unreasonably, or at all events; and in these respects, and the like, it may well be, that our Lord insists on the righteousness of his disciples surpassing that of the Scribes and Pharisees, whom he frequently brands with the appellation of hypocrites.

It requires considerable skill in the Greek language to trace the correct import of this word in the many places where it occurs, either in its direct forus, or in collateral phraseology; and to distinguish when it is used in a more classical or in a Hebraical sense:—not omitting its sacerdotal application, in various parts of Holy Writ.

We ought not to pass over a personification of the justice of God, rendered “vengeance” in our public version, but, properly importing the power commissioned by the Deity to punish malefactors, the Divine Nemesis. The barbarians said among themselves, when they saw the viper fasten on the hand of Paul, “No doubt this man is a murderer, whom, though he hath escaped the sea, yet Justice—Divine Justice—suffereth not to live.” Acts xxviii. 4. A sentiment founded in the nature of things, in a deep sense of the Divine government, and expressed in terms which the Evangelist has not scrupled to repeat.]

[JUSTIFICATION, implies that the party has been, or is, charged with some matter of complaint against him, from which he vindicates himself, or is vindicated by another, either by producing proofs of his innocence, or of his having suffered the penalty of that transgression formerly, (autrefois acquit, of our lawyers) or referring to some other person who has allegations on his behalf, which will effect his justification.

Justification then is a law term, used in ancient times, and greatly analagous to our term acquitted. When sinners are charged with their sins before God, they cannot in any wise prove their innocence, since they are accused of only bond fide crimes: they cannot say they have been formerly acquitted, in any other sense than by reference to an expected pardon through God's grace, and his proposals of mercy; though some sins are evidently punished in this life, all are not, as is equally evident; but the allegations which may be offered by a mediator-party, remain in full force. When an Israelite had transgressed against any divine law, he acknowledged his transgression, brought his sacrifice to the altar, confessed over it his fault, thereby symbolically transferring his guilt, and the victim was the substituted sufferer, which being sacrifically offered, the offerer had complied with the appointments of the law; so that should he be afterwards charged with that crime, he might plead autrefois acquit; but sacrifices were not in their nature capable of making absolute reconciliation between God and man; they could only refer to a nobler blood, which should accomplish that perfectly which they did imperfectly, should effectually vindicate the guilty from the consequences of their guilt, and should justify, when appealed to, from accusations of conscience, of the world, of human laws, or of the divine law, through the gracious acceptance of the Divine law-giver.]

I. JUSTUS, Joseph surnamed Barsabas, had likewise the surname of Justus. See JOSEPH and BARSABAS. He was proposed with St. Matthias, to be chosen an apostle in the room of the traitor Judas.

II. JUSTUS, a Jew, otherwise called Jesus, and surnamed Justus: he was at Rome with Paul A. D. 62, when he wrote to the Colossians. The apostle says that Jesus, called Justus, and Marcus, were his only fellow-workers unto the kingdom of God. Col. iv. 11.

JUTTAH, יִטְחָה, Yetta, to turn away, to be weak; from יָטָה mut: or rather, inclining; from נָטָה natah, to spread, to incline.

[Perhaps, extended, or says Simon, optatively may it be extended. Reland thinks that this city is intended by the term a city of Judah, Luke i. 39. Palæst. p. 870.]

JUTTAH, a city of Judah, Josh. xv. 55. Bonfrerius is of opinion, that it is the Ashan, Josh. xix. 7. 1 Chron. vi. 59. But more probably it is the Ithnam, Josh. xv. 23. Eusebius places Ithnam eight miles from Hebron, east.

IVY-TREE, in Latin, Hedera; an evergreen shrub, which fastens on walls and trees for its support. The ivy was consecrated to Bacchus, and the figure of an ivy leaf was impressed with a hot iron on those who were devoted to that god. We have observed in the article Jonah, that what the old Greek interpreters translated gourd, encurbita, Jerom translated hedera. We cannot tell how the Hebrews called ivy; for it is certain that the Kikajon, of Jonah, does not signify this shrub.
